brow of the hill, and hangs over several streamlets, which fall down the steep. It commands a noble view of the Anio and its vale beneath, the hills of Albano and Monticelli, the Campagna, and Rome itself, rising on the borders of the horizon. A branch of the river pours through the arched gallery and vaulted cellars, and, shaking the edifice as it passes along, rushes in several sheets down the declivity." This was indeed a spot to which Morpheus might have sent his kindest dreams; and the pure air of Tibur, with the streams tumbling into the valley through the arches of the villa, did bestow on the worn-out and sleepless courtier some few moments of repose.

But all these resources at length failed. The nervous and feverish disorder with which Mæcenas was afflicted increased so dreadfully, that for three years before his death he never closed his eyes. In his last will, he recommended Horace, in the most affectionate terms, to the remembrance of the Emperor:—"Horatii Flacci, ut mei, memor esto." He died in 745, in the same year with Horace, and was buried in his own garden, on the Esquiline-hill. He left no child, and in Mæcenas terminated the line of the ancient Etrurian princes. But he bequeathed to posterity a name, immortal as the arts of which he had been through life the generous protector, and which is deeply inscribed on monuments that can only be destroyed by some calamity fatal to civilization.

Mæcenas had nominated Augustus as his heir, and the Emperor thus became possessed of the Tiburtine villa, in which he passed a great part of the concluding years of his reign. The death of his old favourite revived all the esteem which Augustus had once entertained for him; and, many years afterwards, when stung with regret at having divulged the shame of his daughter Julia, and punished her offence, he acknowledged his irreparable loss, by exclaiming, that he should have been prevented from acting such a part had Mæcenas been alive. So difficult was it to repair the loss of one man, though he had millions of subjects under his obedience. "His legions," says Seneca, "being cut to pieces, he recruited his troops,—his fleet, destroyed by storms, was soon refitted,—public edifices, consumed by the flames, were rebuilt with greater magnificence—but he could find no one capable of discharging the offices which had been held by Mæcenas with equal integrity and ability."

THE WISH.

How oft the gen'rous, with the selfish mated,
Must drag in lonesomeness a galling chain!
How oft the two that might have lov'd are fated
Never to meet, or soon to part again!

Yet here—while in earth's wilderness we linger,
Desponding, sick at heart, unnerv'd in hand,
Young Hope by times will point with cherub finger
To spots of verdure in that "weary land."

Some shadow of the good we're blindly seeking,
Some scene of peace—some maid we might adore,
Will thrill—like music of his far home, meeting
The exile on a friendless foreign shore.

With sighs one asks—O! might not, could not I,
From heartless bustle, dungeon-gloom of town,
With her to love me best, for ever fly,—
'Mid still retirements, make my soul my own?

In sunny vales calm homes arise for many;
The sky, the earth, their glad looks spread for all;
And may not friendship's balm be wish'd by any Whose heart is true, and beats at friendship's call?

Each chain'd to th' oar by thousand imag'd wants,
See Fashion's galley-slaves and Mammon's ply;
Not theirs the bliss love earn'd by virtue grants—
By lofty aims and deeds that may not die!

Their wages, gilded straws, for ever leaving,
Might not one kindred pair go hand in hand—
The heart's joy with the mind's light interweaving—
To wisdom's haunts, to fancy's fairy land?

Th' undying minds of ev'ry age around us,—
The world's, our being's, mystery to view—
If in us dwelt some thoughts might live beyond us,
To form them, find them, hearers "fit tho' few."

In tasks like these were not enough to do?
In other's arms were not enough to feel?
Clear as the summer sun our days might flow,
And bright their end be like that sun's farewell.

Vain longings! vain! No pow'r will hear me,
To darkness fades my baseless dream;
No bosom-friend or home must cheer me,
Low toil, pale care sit mocking near me,
My past, my future mates they seem.

A kingly thought with a captive's fate
Wasteth the heart to misery driven:
But to steadfast men in their low estate,
By stern endeavourings, minds elate,
To light the gloom of life is given.

And noble 'tis, without complaining,
Our lot to suffer, task fulfil,
Thro' scowls, neglect, and chill disdainings,
In pain—alone—our pride retaining,
Untir'd work out our purpos'd will.

Be calm'd, my soul! No act of thine
With fame can gild thy dreary doom;
But whoso walks firm duty's line
'Mid life's sick mists unstain'd may shine,
And—sound is the sleep of the tomb.

Invincible Animal Spirits.—Scarron was seized with such a violent hiccup that all who were present began to fear for his life; however, when it abated, so as to give him some ease, says he with a serious air, "If ever I recover, I'll lash the hiccup in a very fine satire." His friends expected another kind of a resolution; but the public was deprived of this votive satire, the distemper in which he then lay carrying him off. Within a few minutes of his death, when his acquaintance were about him, all in tears, so far from being moved by such an affecting sight, he told them, very unconcernedly, "You'll never cry for me so much as I have made you laugh."

—There is no surer mark of the absence of the highest moral and intellectual qualities than a cold reception of excellence.—Bailey.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We shall certainly not be the less desirous of expediting our version of Mr Landor's Latin Idyll (provided we can satisfy ourselves with it, when it be done) in consequence of the letter written us by a fair Correspondent from Wales. The book we had already seen, and attributed (we guess) to the right author. It will be noticed with as little delay as possible.

FREDERICUS will meet with due attention. Also the communication of J. T. for the 'Romance of Real Life.'

W. H. of Glasgow has nothing to fear for the truth and beauty of his feelings; but he has not yet acquired the art of doing them justice in verse.

The author of 'Hints for Table Talk,' will have seen that we have not forgotten him. Correspondents in general are requested to bear in mind, that articles intended for insertion are sometimes unavoidably thrust out and delayed by such of them as more immediately suit the printer's purpose, when he "makes up" the Journal for press. This is the case with almost every one of our numbers.

We have been much gratified by the letter of G. B. C. who describes himself as reading the 'London Journal,' "seated in his elbow chair by the side of a bright fire, opposite the partner of his joys and griefs busily employed in plying the needle." It is the right way of reading the 'Journal' in winter-time, especially if (as we hope) he occasionally reads aloud. Good husbands read to their wives, as birds warble to their industrious mates. G. B. C. may confidently reckon upon an ample account of the place he mentions.

We are obliged by the specimen of "Cabal and Love," from Schiller, but think it hardly a specimen of him worthy of his fame.

ASRINO's "Verses on presenting his Nephew with a Silver Cup," though not sufficiently surpassing the ordinary elegance of such things for publication, do all honour to his nature, and deserve the respect and gratitude of his young kinsman.

A book, with a letter, will be found at Mr Hooper's addressed to "One of the Million," if he will have the goodness to send for it.

A "NOW";

DESCRIPTIVE OF A COLD DAY.

Now, all amid the rigours of the year.—THOMSON.

A FRIEND tells us, that having written a "Now," descriptive of a hot day (See 'London Journal,' No. 17), we ought to write another, descriptive of a cold one; and accordingly we do so. It happens that we are, at this minute, in a state at once fit and unfit for the task, being in the condition of the little boy at school, who, when asked 'the Latin for "cold," said he had it "at his fingers' ends;" but this helps us to set off with a right taste of our subject, and the fire, which is clicking in our ear, shall soon enable us to handle it comfortably in other respects.

Now, then, to commence.—But first, the reader who is good-natured enough to have a regard for these papers, may choose to be told of the origin of the use of this word Now, in case he is not already acquainted with it. It was suggested to us by the striking convenience it affords to descriptive writers, such as Thomson and others, who are fond of beginning their paragraphs with it, thereby saving themselves a world of trouble in bringing about a nicer conjunction of the various parts of their subject.

Now when the first foul torrent of the brooks—

Now flaming up to heav'n, the potent sun—

Now when the cheerless empire of the sky—

But now—

When now—

Where now—

For now—&c.

We say nothing of similar words among other nations, or of a certain But of the Greeks, which was as useful to them on all occasions as the And so of the little children's stories. Our business is with our old indigenous friend. No other Now can be so present, so instantaneous, so extremely Now as our own Now. The Now of the Latins,—Nunc, or Jam, as he sometimes calls himself,—is a fellow of past ages. He is no Now. And the Nun of the Greek is older. How can there be a Now which was Then? a "Now-then," as we sometimes barbarously phrase it. "Now and then" is intelligible; but "Now-then" is an extravagance, fit only for the delicious moments of a gentleman about to crack his bottle, or to run away with a lady, or to open a dance, or to carve a turkey and chine, or to pelt snow-balls, or to commit some other piece of ultra-vivacity, such as excuses a man from the nicer proprieties of language.

But to begin.

Now, the moment people wake in the morning, they perceive the coldness with their faces, though they are warm with their bodies, and exclaim, "Here's a day!" and pity the poor little sweep, and the boy with the water-cresses. How anybody can go to a cold ditch, and gather water-cresses, seems marvellous. Perhaps we hear great lumps in the street of something falling; and, looking through the window, perceive the roofs of the neighbouring houses thick with snow. The breath is visible, issuing from the mouth as we lie. Now we hate getting up, and hate shaving, and hate the empty grate in one's bed-room, and water freezes in ewers, and you may set the towel upright on its own hardness, and the window-panes are frost-whitened, or it is foggy, and the sun sends a dull, brazen beam into one's room; or, if it is fine, the windows outside are stck with icicles; or a detestable thaw has begun, and they drip; but, at all events, it is horribly cold, and delicate shavers fidget about their chambers, looking distressed, and cherish their hard-hearted enemy, the razor, in their bosoms, to warm him a little, and coax him into a consideration of their chins. Savage is a cut, and makes them think destiny really too hard.

Now breakfast is fine; and the fire seems to laugh at us as we enter the breakfast-room, and say, "Ha! ha! here's a better room than the bed-chamber!" and we always poke it before we do anything else; and people grow selfish about seats near it; and little boys think their elders tyrannical for saying, "Oh, you don't want the fire; your blood is young." And truly that is not the way of stating the case, albeit young blood is warmer than old. Now the butter is too hard to spread; and the rolls and toast are at their maximum; and the former look glorious as they issue, smoking, out of the flannel in which they come from the baker's; and people who come with single knocks at the door are pitied; and the voices of boys are loud in the street, sliding, or throwing snow-balls; and the dustman's bell sounds cold; and we wonder how anybody can go about selling fish, especially with that hoarse voice; and schoolboys hate their slates, and blow their fingers, and detest infinitely the no-fire at school; and the parish-beadle's nose is redder than ever.

Now sounds in general are dull, and smoke out of chimnies looks warm and rich, and birds are pitied, hopping about for crumbs, and the trees look wiry and cheerless, albeit they are still beautiful to imaginative eyes, especially the evergreens, and the birch with boughs like dishevelled hair. Now mud in roads is stiff, and the kennel ices over, and boys make illegal slides in the pathways, and ashes are strewn before doors; or you crunch the snow as you tread, or kick mud-flakes before you, or are horribly muddy in cities. But if it is a hard frost, all the world is buttoned up and great-coated, except ostentatious elderly gentlemen, and pretended beggars with naked feet; and the delicious sound of "All hot" is heard from roasted apple and potatoe-stalls, the vender himself being cold, in spite of his "hot," and stamping up and down to warm his feet; and the little boys are astonished to think how he can eat bread and cold meat for his dinner, instead of the smoking apples.

Now skaters are on the alert; the cutlers' shop-windows abound with their swift shoes; and as you approach the scene of action (pond or canal) you hear the dull grinding noise of the skais to and fro, and see tumbles, and Banbury cake-men and blackguard boys playing "hockey," and ladies standing shivering on the banks, admiring anybody but their brother, especially the gentleman who is cutting figures of eight, who, for his part, is admiring his own figure. Beginners affect to laugh at their tumbles, but are terribly angry, and long to thump the bye-standers. On thawing days, idlers persist to the last in skating or sliding amidst the slush and bending ice, making the Humane-Society-man ferocious. He feels as if he could give them the deaths from which it is his business to save them. When you have done skating, you come away feeling at once warm and numb in the feet, from the tight effect of the skais; and you carry them with an ostentatious air of indifference, as if you had done wonders; whereas you have fairly had three slips, and can barely achieve the inside edge.

Now riders look sharp, and horses seem brittle in the legs, and old gentlemen feel so; and coachmen, cabmen, and others, stand swinging their arms across at their sides to warm themselves; and blacksmiths' shops look pleasant, and potatoe shops detestable; the fishmongers' still more so. We wonder how he can live in that splash of wet and cold fish, without even a window. Now clerks in offices envy the one next the fire-place; and men from behind counters hardly think themselves repaid by being called out to speak to a Countess in her chariot; and the wheezy and effeminate pastry cook, hatless and aproned, and with his hand in his breeches-pockets (as the graphic Cruikshank noticeth in his almanack) stands outside his door, chilling his household warmth with attending to the ice which is brought him, and seeing it unloaded into his cellar like coals. Comfortable look the Miss Joneses, coming this way with their muff and furs; and the baker pities the maid-servant cleaning the steps, who, for her part, says, she is not cold, which he finds it difficult to believe.

Now dinner rejoiceth the gatherers together, and cold meat is despised, and the gout defieteth the morrow, thinking it but reasonable, on such a day, to inflame itself with "t'other bottle;" and the sofa is wheeled round to the fire after dinner, and people proceed to burn their legs in their boots, and little boys their faces; and young ladies are tormented between the cold and their complexions, and their fingers freeze at the piano-forte, but they must not say so, because it will vex their poor comfortable grand-aunt, who is sitting with her knees in the fire, and who is so anxious that they should not be spoilt.

Now the muffin-bell soundeth sweetly in the streets, reminding us, not of the man, but his muffins, and of twilight, and evening, and curtains, and the fireside. Now play-goers get cold feet, and invalids stop up every crevice in their rooms, and make themselves worse; and the streets are comparatively silent; and the wind rises and falls in moanings; and fires burn blue and crackle; and an easy chair with your feet by it on a stool, the lamp or candles a little behind you, and an interesting book just opened where you left off, is a bit of heaven upon earth. People in cottages crowd close into the chimney, and tell stories of ghosts and murders, the blue flame affording something like evidence of the facts.

"The owl, with all her feathers, is a-cold,"

or you think her so. The whole country feels like a petrification of slate and stillness, cut across by the wind; and nobody in the mail-coach is warm but the horses, who steam pitifully when they stop. The "oldest man" makes a point of never having "seen such weather." People have a painful doubt whether they have any chins or not; ears ache with the wind; and the waggoner goes puckering up his teeth, and thinking the time will never arrive when he shall get to the Five Bells.

At night, people get sleepy with the fire-side, and long to go to bed, yet fear it on account of the different temperature of the bed-room; which is fur-

* Keats, in the 'Eve of St Agnes.' Mr Keats gave us some touches in our account of the 'Hot Day' (first published in the 'Indicator') as we sat writing it in his company thirteen or fourteen years back. We have here made him contribute to our 'Cold Day.' Thus it is to have immortal friends, whose company never forsakes us.

thermore apt to wake them up. Warming-pans and hot-water bottles are in request; and naughty boys eschew their night-shirts, and go to bed in their socks.

"Yes," quoth a little boy, to whom we read this passage, "and make their younger brother go to bed first."

ODE TO A FRIEND.

BY WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR.

[We have been just honoured with the receipt of the following ode from the classical pen of Mr Landor, written in the warmth of his heart, and of the sunshine of Fiesole.]

I.

Lord of the lovely plain
Where Celtic Clwyd runs to greet the main!
How happy were the hours that held!
Thy friend (long absent from his native home)
Amid those scenes with thee! how far afield
From all past cares, and all to come!

II.

What hath Ambition's feverish grasp,—what hath Inconstant Fortune, panting Hope,
Nay,—what hath Genius that should cope
With the heart's whispers in that path
Winding so idly where the docile stream
Thro' the tall poplars sheds its playful gleam?

III.

Ablett! of all the days
My sixty summers ever knew,
Pleasant as there have been no few,
Memory not one surveys
Like those we spent together: wisely spent
Are they alone that leave the heart content.

IV.

Together we have visited the men Whose song Scotch critics vainly would have drowned.
Ah! shall we ever grasp the hand again
That gave the British harp its truest sound?
Yea! my soul sugars, yea!
For this alone she would not wing away.

V.

Yet Time now passes hoarse
And panting in his course;
Coleridge hath loost his shoe, or bathes in bliss
Among the spirits that have power like his.
Live Derwent's guest! and thou where Grasmere springs!
Serene Creators of immortal things.

VI.

I never courted Fame:
She pouted at me long; at last she came,
And threw her arms around my neck, and said,
"Take what hath been for years delayed!
And fear not that the leaves will fall
One hour the earlier from thy coronal!"

VII.

Ablett! thou knowest with what even hand
I waved away the offered seat
Among the clambering, clattering, stilted Great,
The rulers of our land.
Nor crowds nor kings can lift me up,
Nor sweeten pleasure's purer cup.

VIII.

Thou knowest how, and why are dear to me
My citron-groves of Tivoli,
My chirping Africo,* my beech-wood nook,
My Naiads, with feet only in the brook,
Which runs away and giggles in their faces—
Yet there they sit, nor sigh for other places.

* Africo, a little stream celebrated by Boccaccio in his 'Ninfale'; to this place also his Bella Brigata retired, to relate the last stories in the 'Decameron.' The author's villa (formerly Count Gherardesca's, the representative of the unhappy Count Ugolino) stands directly above what was anciently the lake described there.

IX.

'Tis not Pelasgic wall,
By him made sacred, whom alone
'Twere not profane to call
The Bard Divine, nor (thrown Far under me) Valdarno, nor the crest
Of Willomthron in the purple east.

X.

Behold our earth! most nigh the sun,
Her zone least open to the genial heat,
But further off, her veins more freely run:
'Tis thus with those who whirl about the great:
The nearest shriek and shiver; we remete
May, open-breasted, blow the pastoral out.

EDUCATION OF THE MIDDLE CLASSES.

From 'Necessity of Popular Education as a National Object; with Hints on the Treatment of Criminals, and Observations on Homicidal Insanity. By James Simpson, Advocate.' Edinburgh, Adam and Charles Black; London, Longman and Co.

[HAVING received the liberal permission of Mr Simpson and his booksellers to make what extracts we please from this interesting and important work, we proceed to avail ourselves of it with a copiousness which we feel sure will be felt (by such writers and publishers) as the best return we can make for the indulgence. Self-interest is beginning now-a-days to identify itself in a noble manner with the general interests of mankind.]

CONTENTS OF THE FIRST HALF OF THE SECOND CHAPTER OF MR SIMPSON'S BOOK.

The term "Educated class" relative. Our vast attainments in Physical Science, Confusion and Error in Moral World. Controversy and Party Divisions. Contrast of Sound Legislation. General Selfishness. Demands of Christianity. Religion of the "Educated." Large Provision for it. Want of Educational Preparation. Fanaticism and Insanity. Certain Social Defects. Remnant of Barbarism, National Jealousies, Offensive Wars, Criminal Code, &c. Barbarous Customs, Fox-hunting, Engrossing Rural Sports, &c. Happiness not attained. Reasons. False Views of Life. Young Men of Fortune. Waste of Life, Wealth, and Happiness by the Affluent. Their Marriages. Sedentary Study. Instructive Illustrations on this head. Incoherent Pursuit of Wealth. Over-trading, glutted Markets. Unwelcome Inquiry. Good admitted. Causes of our Social Evils. No Moral Training in Education. Milton, Locke, Kames. Reading. Dead Languages.

The term "educated class," as applied to the portion of our countrymen who are above manual labour, will scarcely be taken by any one to mean that they enjoy the means of education perfect or nearly perfect. The term is relative; and, certainly, when compared with the manual-labour class, who have no education at all worthy the name, we are an educated class. But no error is more profound, or more prevalent, than the persuasion that we are an educated class in the best sense of the term. Our complacent conclusions on the subject are, however, exceedingly natural. Look, it is said, at our libraries, our encyclopedias, teeming, as they do, with knowledge in every branch of science and literature. See our chemical, mathematical, mechanical powers, with all their realized results, which seem to mould material nature to our will, and render life proudly luxurious. Then turn to our classical literature, our belles-lettres, our poetry, our eloquence, our polished intercourse, our refined society; consider our fine arts and elegancies; and, above all, think of our legislation, our political economy, our institutions of benevolence and justice, and the gigantic combinations of our intire national system. There is much in these high-sounding claims that deceives us. We are prone to borrow from the large fund of credit we possess in the exact and physical sciences, to place the loan to the account of universal intellectual and moral attainment, and to conclude that a pitch of improvement which enables us to travel thirty miles an hour, must comprise in it everything else of knowledge and power. But, alas! when we look beyond the range of physical tangibilities, and, it may be, elegant literature, into the region of mental and moral relations,—in short, the science of man, upon which depend the wisdom of our legislation, and the soundness of our institutions and customs, what a scene of uncertainty do we see! Fixed principles in social affairs have not yet been attained. Scarcely shall we meet two individuals who are guided by the same code. Hence, controversy is the business of the moral, and assuredly, we may add, of the religious world. If any measure affecting the public is propounded, there arises a perfect hurricane of opposition and denunciation, as if it were the most monstrous of errors and the most atrocious of crimes. No plan or project, religious, civil, economic, or merely ornamental, can be proposed, without tearing to pieces the conventions of courtesy—nay, the feelings of common charity, and exposing a lamentable scene of inconsistency and passion. We find sects of men combining to attain by their action certain proposed ends, and these seem to be guided by principles which they all acknowledge; for there is no want of party array and skillful party tactics; but, when we find that the spirit of party is violence and hatred, we must search the humbler regions of selfishness for the bond of their union, for we cannot recognize among them anything which is intitled to be called profound, philosophical, or high moral, principle. Nothing more exposes the low state of our present moral attainments than the endless disputes and hatred which are the sum and substance of what are called our politics. If the time shall ever arrive when legislation shall be brief and practical, founded on benevolence and justice, purified of vain personal display, freed from selfishness, party spirit, pride of caste, and sacrifice to particular interests,—either of an exclusive aristocracy on the one extreme, or a reckless, impatient, and often most aristocratic democracy on the other; when it shall cease to be fettered by a constituency less enlightened than representatives animated by a single-hearted love to their country and their species,—when it shall become an easier task, because abuses will be already removed, and laws will come to be less retrospective remedies than onward meliorations, moving abreast with human improvement,—what will be thought of the political dissensions which at present degrade and retard public affairs? Of the game of parties, with all its frauds and hypocrisies, the irreconcilable varieties of opinion, the diversity of views, the fierceness of divisions! A wide-spread selfishness alone accounts for this spectacle; and who can deny that a systematic selfishness, regulated by law and conventional expediency, is the impelling power,—at once the bond which unites and the divellent influence which tears asunder the centripetal and centrifugal forces which preserve, yet disturb, the circumscribed orbit of our social relations? To engross as much wealth, gain as much of what is mis-called distinction, and outstrip our neighbour, is the business of life. We have, too, a cold-hearted fashion, which denies those without its frivolous pale well-nigh a common nature; and we have all the successive exclusions and repellants descending in society, and freezing up the sources of good-will and brotherly love, which should flow downward to soften and fertilize the humblest regions of the community, and unite the whole in mutual good will and contented co-operation. It is this habitual contumely which separates the great body of the manual-labour class from all who merely enjoy more physical comfort and ease of life, in a scowling attitude of distrust, envy, and hostility. Talk to us of a more liberal basis of social being, of a higher morality, a more wide-spreading philanthropy,—nay, of a mitigation of selfishness, a moderation of wealth-engrossing, a transference of our worship from artificial badges to real intellectual and moral merit, a kindlier feeling to our universal fellow-men,—and we meet you with mockery, as we point to what we call "human nature," and return to our money-getting and self-exaltation. Bonaparte was right—we are a nation of shopkeepers. Nevertheless, when it is put to us in the abstract, we admit that Christianity demands ALL and MORE than in practice we laugh to scorn, and we are terribly scandalized when our Christianity is doubted. Do we not attend church, and yield our assent to the precepts and doctrines there taught? Do we not prove our zeal by cordially hating all other religious sects, cum odio theologico? Are we not the foremost and the loudest in shouting the approved watchwords of "irreligion," "infidelity," to raise the mob to put down all heresy and schism—that is, all opinions not our own? And are we not ready to shed our blood, if we refuse to mend our lives, for the Church, which has always formed an essential part of our politics, and been toasted by us in many an overflowing cup of conviviality?

It can scarcely be averred that any considerable portion of the church-going of the "educated class," have more practical week-day Christianity, than that which was predicated of the manual-labour class. If we should ask any of the first how much of what they listen to on Sunday influences their views and acts in life, they would be sorely puzzled to answer the question. Yet there are no institutions of public instruction, both as supported by state establishments, and by the zeal of private associations, more largely endowed than the ecclesiastical, no part of our well-being more cared for. What is the cause of so small a harvest from so immense a cultivation? Why does not the seed so plentifully sown fructify and produce? There is but one answer to this question. WE ARE NOT A MORALLY EDUCATED PEOPLE. There is a barrenness of soil among us, where genuine Christianity refuses to take root; there is a worse, there are the thorns of an inherent selfishness, which choke it; taxes pre-occupy the whole field, and the husbandmen sow in vain. As was predicated of their efforts to excavate the lower classes from the heathenism in which they are embedded, our religious guides address themselves to unprepared minds much higher up in the social scale. Yet, if a stranger to the actual religious condition of the "educated" were to hear our talk upon the subject, he might mistake us for a religious people: if he contemplated our animosity, division, and violence in the matter; although he might miss the spirit of Christianity, he could not fail to be struck with our zeal each for his own dogmas, and for their substitution by the force of indirect persecution, for all others; dogmas, too, so often adopted yesterday for others as dogmatically maintained the day before,—

"As if religion were intended For nothing else but to be mended."

Nay, he would see religious feeling running into the most extravagant credulity and fanaticism among us; and if he did not know that that melancholy extreme is capable of a physiological explanation, as in actual disease of the brain, which sees visions, hears voices, and dreams dreams, he might conclude that we are an over-religious generation. But the indifference and the enthusiasm have alike their origin in an imperfect education, in unprepared, uncultivated feelings, which, according to the predisposition and temperament, are either roused to success by the mere sympathy—the hysteria of a deceased enthusiasm, or are not stirred at all.

A catalogue of our social defects, all referable to the education wherewith we are mocked, might be expatiated upon to the extent of a volume; the remnants these of barbarism which still cling to us and our institutions, customs, habits, and manners. I will venture to enumerate a few of these. We direct yet, for example, an evil eye to our fellow-men in other communities, and speak of our "natural enemies." We are disgraced by national jealousies, national antipathies, commercial restrictions, and often offensive war. We have our game laws and criminal code also to account for. Brought to the standard of sound ethics and reason, there are many of our customs that have as little chance as these of escaping the reproach of barbarisms, which an educated people would disown; cruel rural sports, for example, fox-hunting, horse-racing, betting, gambling, prize-fighting, duelling, and excessive conviviality. The character and engrossing claims of rural sports, as they are called, will astonish a future better-educated age.* Such an age will scarcely believe "the butcher work that then befell," the unsparing slaughter of all that is furred and feathered and fanned, in field and flood, "on mountain, moss, and moor;" they will discredit the graft of the hunting stage of the race upon a civilization, at its lowest, immensely in advance of that stage; they will reject the story that the boast of the Iroquois and the Esquimaux was also the distinction of the most polished ornaments of our drawing-rooms, namely, the havoc of their unerring aim, the life they have extinguished, the blood they have shed, the "head of game" they have gloried over as trophies spread out dead before them, and the larders which they have out-done the butcher in stocking. All is not right in our habits of thinking: in other words, in our own education,—when our "élite" can claim, and multitudes can accord, a certain distinction to a "capital shot," the victor in what the Olympics knew not—a "steep chace,"—or the proprietor of a pony which can trot sixteen miles an hour.

I know the ready answer to such strictures on rural sports, and that answer implies the very educational vacuum which there is so much reason to deplore. It is of great importance, it is said, to our own rural population, that the aristocracy should pass a reasonable portion of their time in the country. They are the spoiled children of excitement, and if you withhold that in the country, they will seek it in the capital, in pursuits and pleasures infinitely more debasing and more ruinous to health and fortune. Look at Paris. Is an educated aristocracy here spoken of? Is it indeed so, that in the alternative of their urban or rural excitements, the objects are so low? Is it indeed so, that without the slaughter of its innocent animals, which spread a living poetry over its fields, our "better classes" find no attraction in the country, no delight in "the green fields of England in the merry month of May," no luxury in the roses of June, the pride of July, the mellowness of Autumn, that they indeed—

"Renounce the boundless store
Of charms which Nature to her votary yields,
The warbling woodland, the resounding shore,
The pomp of groves, and garniture of fields,
All that the genial ray of morning gilds,
And all that echoes to the song of even,
All that the mountain's sheltering bosom shields,
And all the dread magnificence of Heaven?"

Can we have a more rousing proof than this of a defective, nay, a perverted education? I say perverted, for the barbarism is actually inculcated. The vacuum is filled by precept and example with images of rural slaughter; the young idea is taught to shoot most carefully, and the tender thought assiduously reared, which longs for manhood and bloodshed. The spirit of severity, and even cruelty and blood, of our criminal code, has with no small reason been imputed, in some respects, to this remnant of the hunting stage of society.

The evils suffered by society from ignorance of the human faculties and their right application, will be more obvious, when we come to inquire what the faculties and their relations are; it may suffice at present to say, that happiness is rarely if ever attained, and that the preponderance of selfish feelings, which are incapable of rational satisfaction, verifies the truth that "all is vanity and vexation of spirit." Ignorance of physical and organic conditions of health produce disease, while it transmits the consequences in weakened constitutions to offspring. The selfish desire of wealth brings together, in matrimonial alliance, the predisposed to disease and insanity, and bitter domestic suffering is the consequence. The same desire of wealth, added to ambition to rise above others, regulate or rather derange the whole system of life, and there is not one ray of light but disregarded Christianity to guide in a direction more consistent with real happiness. This is ignorance of the moral conditions of human weal. An enlightened friend of the author's once asked an excellent young man about to embark for India, what views he entertained of life, and the objects of his own existence? The question was new to him. He had been "well educated," in the common acceptance of the words, but he had never conceived that life had any higher aim than to acquire a fortune, marry, rear a family, live in a fine house, drink expensive wines, die, and go to heaven! There was no provision in this for reaping enjoyment from the higher faculties of his nature; he was not aware that these had any other function to perform than to regulate his conduct in the pursuit of the gratification of his inferior feelings. This is the condition of mind in which almost all young men of the upper and middle classes of society enter into active life; and nothing can well be conceived more disadvantageous to their success and happiness. Those who are what is called religiously educated, are not more fortunate; because no sect in religion has yet addressed itself to the duty of teaching the nature of man the value of pursuits in life, the institutions of society, and the relation of all these to the religious and moral faculties of man. Without understanding these, no person entering upon active life can see his way clearly, or entertain consistent or elevated views of duty, and the true sources of happiness.

This deficiency in knowledge is remarkably exemplified in young men born to large fortunes, who have succeeded in minority to their paternal estates, and, on attaining majority, are, by law, intitled to pursue their own happiness in their own way. It is quite lamentable to observe the humble, the debasing course they almost always adopt. Rational views of themselves, of human nature, and of the institutions of society, would be invaluable to such individuals; but they have no adequate means of obtaining them, while positively false views have been implanted in their minds by a perverted education. I grant the case to be an extreme one, of a young gentleman of large fortune, not destitute of talents and good feeling, and regularly subjected to all the appliances of dead-language education at school and college, who, on the day of his majority, was declared a free man, with power to choose the most likely road to real happiness. What did he do? He established, of course, a stud of hunters, a pack of hounds, and a whole armoury of fowling-pieces,—galloping and blazing and slaughtering being universally held inseparable from wealth and rank, in the present state of civilization. Coach-driving, either of private four-in-hand vehicles or the public conveyances, is no longer sanctioned by general approbation, as suiting the age: nevertheless, our hopeful had a trial of coach-driving. From this he was diverted by matrimony, and post-nuptially took to another gratification of his faculties, of rather an original kind; he placed cats upon a float in the middle of a pond, and sent dogs to swim in and attack them! This last occupation would have been disdained by a young nobleman of immense possessions, who, at a feast in honour of his majority, manifested the best natural disposition, by acknowledging that he had always been taught, and had always felt, that the great duty imposed upon him, by his rank and fortune, was to do good. The declaration was sincere, and the character of the speaker such as to warrant the belief that he would act upon it, if his education had been such as to have shown him how to do so, or rather, as the previous point, what to do. To keep a pack of hounds, to be followed over fields and inclosures by the élite of the county, does not stand very high in the scale of good; to engage keenly in party politics is not good, for these are generally incompatible with the general weal; to dispense costly and luxurious hospitality indiscriminately, is to do wide-spreading mischief; to pursue or encourage idleness or frivolous occupations, is not good; to strengthen, by influence and example, the pride of rank and its co-relative sycophancy, to uphold the heartless, icy, withering barriers of fashion, and, by external pomp, circumstance, and equipage, to shut out knowledge of, and sympathy with, the general mass of society, cultivated and uncultivated, are all severally bad; and, although much the practice of our nobility, injurious, in a degree to which their education shuts their eyes, to themselves and to society. Education, rendered what it ought to be, will point out "what is good," both in its temporal and spiritual sense, to the wealth-loaded favourites of fortune. "To do good and to communicate" is eminently in their power, if they will first, "with all their gettings, get knowledge," and apply it to useful purposes; if they will learn and value the acts and manifestations of high intellectual and moral endowments, more than physical comforts, sensual enjoyments, and external pomp; if they will seek the society of enlightened and benevolent men, whose intellects are replenished with knowledge of the Creator's works and ways, whose hearts swell with wonder, adoration, and love, whose whole minds are instinct with sympathy with, and ardent desire for, human happiness. With their aid they would know how to convert their wealth into a powerful engine of social benefit, and, from this, the legitimate gratification of the higher faculties of their nature, they would enjoy as well as confer real good.

The very proposition of such a course for a rich, splendid, elegant, and "spirited" young nobleman, would, of course, at present, raise in himself and the whole table he presides at, a roar of incredulous and scornful laughter, the natural expression of the very barbarism so much to be deplored. But, with more enlightened views, it will come to be acknowledged that the waste of life, fortune, and happiness by the affluent which characterises the present, as it has marked the past ages of the world, is owing, in no small degree, to ignorance of human nature, its wants and capacities—in other words, to imperfect education.

A volume might be filled* with proofs of the suffering from ignorance which visits all classes, and none more than the higher. The inactivity of the faculties of persons of fashion is a perfect adfectum vite. Their vacuity and dislike to mental exercise is constant ennui, and their indisposition to muscular exercise and fresh air, brings in its train a whole catalogue of ailments. Their carriages "stop the way" to health, bloom, and beauty. Who has not pined, when they were thought to envy, the pale-faced victim dragged to what is called an airing, in which lungs and limbs are alike unconcerned, and are both tending to a state of disease by impeded circulation and impaired digestion. Much of high life is an ignorant defiance of nature's laws, and is visited with enfeebled functions, lassitude, uneasiness, anxiety, and a thousand evils, arising from infringement of institutions, which, when observed and obeyed, lead to delight and happiness. No considerations but rank and wealth determine matrimonial alliances, and these are often in consequence ill-assorted. The enfeeblement and diseases of high life are, by nature's law, transmitted to offspring, as surely as those of the reckless and dissolute mechanic; the powers of mind suffer deterioration from the influence of impaired nerves and brain: the race itself degenerates, and imbecility, and even insanity visit the palaces of the great, much more, in proportion to their numbers, than the hovels of the poor.

It is lamentable to see ignorance of the conditions of health inducing the aspirant to college honours to impose upon himself more prolonged labour than that to which the manual labourer is forced by want of bread, reckless that he loses health and life in the pursuit. In the biographies of early talent, when I have come to the usual passage, "when his companions played, he remained to read and study," I have looked on a few pages, and always found that he died early. No attempt is made in our defective education, to inculcate and impress such knowledge upon us; and we find the most talented men acting in practical disregard of these conditions of health and longevity. I cannot withhold the following apposite and most instructive passage from Mr Combe's work, already referred to, on the 'Constitution of Man.' "No idea can be more preposterous, than that of human beings having no time to study and obey the natural institutions. These laws punish so severely, when neglected, that they cause the offender to lose ~~tenfold more time~~ in undergoing his chastisement than would be requisite to obey them. A gentleman extensively engaged in business, whose nervous and digestive systems, have been impaired by the neglect of the organic laws, was desired to walk in the open air at least one hour a-day; to repose from all exertion, bodily and mental, for one full hour after breakfast, and another full hour after dinner, because the brain cannot expend its energy in thinking and aiding digestion at the same time; and to practise moderation in diet; which last he regularly observed; but he laughed at the very idea of his having three hours a-day to spare for attention to

* I say engrossing claims, for I grant that killing game is as legitimate as killing mutton, and do not quarrel with a subordinate and moderate resort to the field by those whose main avocations are more useful and dignified. It is healthful exercise: I cannot concede to it a higher merit.

* An admirable volume has been so filled—'The Constitution of Man in relation to External Objects,' by Mr George Combe, of Edinburgh, a work in its second edition in America, and already translated into French, German, and Swedish.

his health. The reply was, that the organic laws admit of no exception, and that he must either obey them, or take the consequences: but that the time lost by the punishment would be double or treble that requisite for obedience; and accordingly the fact was so. Instead of his attending an appointment, it is quite usual for him to send a note, perhaps at two in the afternoon, in these terms:—"I was so distressed with head-ache last night that I never closed my eyes; and to-day I am still incapable of being out of bed." On other occasions, he is out of bed, but apologises for incapacity to attend to business, on account of an intolerable pain in the region of the stomach. In short, if the hours lost in these painful sufferings were added together, and distributed over the days when he is able for duty, he would find them far outnumber those which would suffice for obedience to the organic laws, and with this difference in the results,—by neglect, he loses both his hours and his enjoyment; whereas, by obedience, he would be rewarded by aptitude for business, and a pleasing consciousness of existence."

Perhaps the most wide-spreading mischief to society comes of the only other ignorance with which I shall detain the reader, the ceaseless, indiscriminate, and incognate pursuit of wealth. There are no limits to this object with most men, but the stern barriers of law. Merchants and manufacturers hasten to be rich beyond the course of nature; they engage in adventures for which they have neither capacity nor talents; they enter into the most inconsiderate partnerships; they lend and borrow, and involve each other in the consequences of the rashest speculations; and they live in splendour far beyond their means.

Machinery should reasonably abridge bodily toil, and leave leisure for intellectual and moral improvement, with its concomitant enjoyment; but machinery has been used only to overlabour workmen and overstock markets; prices fall ruinously low; the labourers lately overworked are thrown idle, and left to starve or be supported on charity; what are called "better times" return; the glut is removed, work is abundant; avarice again overdoes, and again the market is glutted, and the labourers again thrown into idleness, starvation, and misery. In 1825-6-7, these views were fearfully verified; large bodies of workmen were supported on charity. For many miserable hours they were idle, which hours, distributed over the time of their labour, would have afforded them sufficient daily subsistence. The Creator intended man to labour a reasonable portion of his time, but when man infringes this law by abuse, he defeats his own end; he is thrown idle longer than all the time put together which, in each day, would have given him salutary leisure. This has been written in broad characters, and should be remembered. It is a curious and instructive fact, that when these miscalled good times returned, and labour was in request, workmen struck for higher wages, and for months some manufactories were from this cause stopped; when the glut returned and its consequences, these masters were the most fortunate, for they had less on hand, and, blind themselves, had been taught by their blind workmen in quest of a different object, that the overtrading of their neighbours was a folly which they had, by no wisdom of their own, but by an accidental combination of circumstances, escaped. At the present moment, prosperity has returned: the seconder of the address, in the House of Commons the other night went into a detail to show that all our manufactures were thriving and affording full employment. Let us not boast. Love of money, hurry to be rich, still afflicts our imperfectly educated capitalists. Competition will urge them on in the race, another glut will stop them, their workmen will again be thrown idle, and much commercial distress will be the consequence. In nothing is education more wanted than for the attainment of principles which shall put the race for wealth under rational practical regulation, that it may not defeat itself, and subject society to a constant alternation of mock prosperity and overwhelming misery.

But we must proceed from the evils which visit the class of society above manual labour, although they are by no means exhausted, to a short inquiry into their causes. Before doing so, however, it may be necessary to guard the picture I have drawn from the imputation of being overcharged, and on that ground rejected as altogether false. This objection is most likely to come from persons who live in comfortable circumstances, and a fair external good-will towards the circle of their acquaintances, the world to them, and among whom they know kind-hearted, decent, moral, religious, and even a few generous individuals; who shrink from the disgusting task of examining the sores of society, or going deeper than a very satisfactorily varnished skin which covers them; who feel in their own persons no inconvenience from alleged social evils, the degradation, physical and moral, of the working classes, and the humble attainments and practical errors of the middle and higher; and who even resent being disturbed by the tiresome people who are always croaking, "that whatever is, is wrong," instead of enjoying the far more consolatory conviction, that, whatever is, is right. Readily do I concede to the most contented of these objectors, that there is a large portion of genuine good, moral and religious, in society; that this, with a much larger ingredient of conventional morality, and its result, positive law, preserves the system from falling to pieces, which it would do in an hour, were the picture I have drawn of the lower and higher classes of universal and unqualified application. The higher sentiments are at work in our legislation and our social economy; justice is extending its influence, and benevolence and charity are distinguishing the age.* But, while all this is granted, it is maintained that the positive evils which have been enumerated do exist; nay, more, that they immensely preponderate, and we should deeply miscalculate if we glossed over and spared them for the sake of the good wherewith they are mixed. When the question is answered, "What is our education?" all that has been said of our condition will be easily and naturally accounted for.

First, There exist no adequate means, either in private families or public institutions, with the exception of Infant Schools, of which, in the sequel, for educating the feelings, improving the dispositions, restraining the inferior propensities, and exercising the higher sentiments—in short, for MORAL TRAINING. In all this we took our chance, and picked up what we might, from partial parents, nursery-maids, and juvenile companions. The animal feelings, being the strongest, acted in us with all the blindness and all the power of instincts, and laid a broad and deep foundation for habitual selfishness. There is no greater change, nay, revolution in education, than will arise out of the nascent want, the incipient demand which is felt by the more enlightened part of society, for this, education's paramount object. Multitudes do not yet know what it means, or laugh at it as a wild chimera, when they succeed in imperfectly taking in the idea. The refracted ray, the full light, is seen from the mountain before it shines upon the valley; but it must shine as the day, and widely influence our institutions, before we shall merit the name of an educated people. As a proof of the slow progress of truths which nevertheless concern man in his most vital social interests, it is instructive to look back and find such truths announced to an age long past, by master minds that arose long before the generation qualified to appreciate their genius, and profit by their wisdom. Milton and Locke both advocated moral training; they held it paramount to intellectual, and intellectual merely subservient to it. One hundred and fifty years have passed since they urged on the notice of their countrymen its superiority and necessity; but no attempt was made to act upon the principles they taught till within the last fifteen years, when the first Infant School realized their bequest to their country, and commenced the era of moral education. I cannot withhold the solemn words of these great men. Impressed, as I am, profoundly, with a conviction of their transcendent value, they are to me, as it were, "the voice of the spirits of the mighty dead." Milton's words are these—"The end of learning is to repair the ruin of our first parents, by regaining to know God aright, and out of that knowledge to love him, to imitate him, to be like him, as we may the nearest, by possessing our souls of true virtue, which being united to the heavenly grace of faith, make up the highest perfection."—Letter to Samuel Hartlib.

Locke says, "It is virtue, then, direct virtue, which is the hard and valuable part to be aimed at in education, and not a forward pertness, or any little arts of shifting. All other considerations and accomplishments should give way and be postponed to this. This is the solid and substantial good, which tutors should not only read lectures and talk of, but the labour and art of education should furnish the mind with, and fasten there, and never cease till the young man had a true relish of it, and placed his strength, his glory, and his pleasure in it."—Locke's Thoughts concerning Education. § 70.

"Learning must be had, but in the second place, as subservient only to greater qualities. Seek out somebody (as your son's tutor) that may know how discreetly to form his manners; place him in hands where you may, as much as possible, secure his innocence, cherish and nurse up the good, and gently correct and weed out any bad inclinations, and settle him in good habits. This is the main point, and this being provided for, learning may be had into the bargain."—§ 147.

"But under whose care soever a child is put to be taught, during the tender and flexible years of his life, this is certain, it should be one who thinks Latin and language the least part of education; one who, knowing how much virtue and a well-tempered soul is to be preferred to any sort of learning or language, makes it his chief business to form the mind of his scholar, and give that a right disposition; which, if once got, though all the rest should be neglected, would, in due time, produce all the rest; and which,

* The infatuated generation is apt to take credit for the institutions of charity. The subscription lists of these tell a different tale. It has been observed that about 1500 known individuals, of the 150,000 of which Edinburgh is composed, support all the charitable establishments in the place. The London proportion would be 15,000. It would be interesting to know, how the fact stands—charity balls and musical festivals, of course, excluded.

if it be not got and settled, so as to keep out ill and vicious habits, languages and sciences, and all the other accomplishments of education, will be to no purpose, but to make the worse or more dangerous man."—§ 177.

Lord Kames anticipated his age more than half a century. In his 'Hints on Education,' with profound truth to us, but more sentimental writing to the generation he addressed, he says, "It appears unaccountable that our teachers generally have directed their instructions to the head, with very little attention to the heart. From Aristotle down to Locke, books without number have been composed for cultivating and improving the understanding; few, in proportion, for cultivating and improving the affections. Yet, surely, as man is intended to be more an active than a contemplative being, the educating of a young man to behave properly in society, is of still greater importance than the making him even a Solomon for knowledge." Society has suffered much, and suffers severely yet, for its ignorant neglect of these admonitions. The principle and the practice of moral training will be detailed in its proper place.

Having worse than lost five or six years in the nursery,—having passed the practicable season of moral training, with all our natural faults about us, tempers unregulated, pride and vanity decidedly pampered, and selfishness aggravated, we were sent to school to LEARN TO READ. That there is some improvement in schools, it would be great injustice not to acknowledge; but few adults can say that mere reading was in their first school instruction vouchsafed to them. Even yet no attempt is made to direct aright the natural appetite of the young to know. Reading is a useful instrument of knowledge, but it is gross ignorance to call it knowledge itself. Even at an age earlier than that of our "English school," the faculties ardently craved their natural food—knowledge. The infant purveys in some degree for itself, to the great reproach of its unenlightened instructors. At school, these knowledge-craving faculties have little or nothing done for them; on the contrary, their natural neglect of the school-book, the result of their preference of something else much more instructive as well as delightful, was punished as idleness and frivolity; and we left our first school as we went to it, with scarcely any addition to our knowledge.

We were now eight or nine years of age, and not past the season for yet commencing useful knowledge training. Creation might yet have been made to open upon us to the incalculable enlargement of the fund of our happiness, and these faculties might still have been delightfully exercised, by which knowledge is acquired and stored; but no; the "usages of society" demanded that we should then commence "a classical education;" in other words, the study for from six to ten years of the languages which were spoken by the Greeks and Romans, and which being no longer the vernacular tongues of any living people, are called the dead languages. There is a strong feeling prevailing, that this usage is a monstrous error. In the educational crisis at which we have arrived, it is beginning to be inquired into, and there can be no doubt that the schools of the dead languages are falling off in popularity. This is therefore a subject which I am not warranted to omit in this treatise. There is odium and imputed presumption in even approaching the strongholds of habit and prejudice with an inquiring purpose; and that odium always holds an inverse proportion to the merit of the system or practice to be investigated. Truth and real merit neither dread nor resent free discussion. It is matter, too, of current observation, that the temperature of controversy is always increased when interests are endangered; when, therefore, we consider the splendid endowments, especially in England, for the study of classical literature, which have stood for centuries in venerable grandeur, and continue to dispense the richest prizes, it were in vain to look for dispassionate discussion in those who enjoy or look forward to these objects. Antiquity and wealth, however, are not in themselves valid defences of social evils. The time is come for a grave trial of the claims of the dead languages to engross so many of the years of youth, to the exclusion nearly of all other kinds of education. If their advocates and incumbents be confident of the strength of their cause, they ought to court the inquiry, to save them from being prejudiced by a practical rejection which is daily gaining ground.

PATIENCE.

PATIENCE! why, 'tis the soul of peace;
Of all the virtues, 'tis nearest him to heav'n;
It makes men look like gods. The best of men
That e'er wore earth about him was a sufferer,
A soft, meek, patient, humble, tranquil spirit,
The first true gentleman that ever breathed."

THE WEEK.

From Wednesday the 3rd to Tuesday the 9th December.

ANOTHER PICTURE OF DECEMBER.

(From the 'Mirror of the Months'.)

THE meadows are still green—almost as green as in the spring, with the late sprouted grass that the last rains have called up, since it has left off, and the cattle called home to enjoy their winter fodder. The corn-fields, too, are bright with their delicate sprinkling of young autumn sown wheat; the ground about the hedge-rows and in the young copses is still pleasant to look upon, from the sobered green of the hardy primrose and violet, whose clumps of unfading leaves brave the utmost rigour of the season; and every here and there, a bush of holly darts up a pyramid of shining leaves and brilliant berries, from amidst the late wild and wandering, but now faded and forlorn company of woodbines and eglantines, which have all the rest of the year been exulting over, and almost hiding it, with their quick-growing branches and flaunting flowers. The evergreens, too, that assist in forming the home inclosures, have altogether lost their sombre hue which they have until lately worn—sombre in comparison with the bright freshness of spring and the splendid variety of autumn: and now, that not a leaf is left around them, they look as gay by the contrast as they lately looked grave.

Now, the high-piled turnip cart is seen labouring along the narrow lanes, or stands ready with its white load in the open field, waiting to be borne to the expectant cattle, that are safely stalled and sheltered for the season; while, for the few that are still permitted to remain at the mercy of the inclement skies, and to make their unwholesome bed upon the drenched earth, the moveable hay-rack is daily filled with its fragrant store, and the open shed but poorly supplies the place of the warm and well-roofed stalls of the straw-yard.

Now, too, some of the younger members of the herd (for the old ones know by experience that it is not worth the trouble), seeing the tempting green of the next field through the leafless hedge-rows, break their way through, and find the fare as bitter and as scanty as that which they have left.

Now the hazels throw out their husky blossoms from their bare branches, looking, as they hang straight down, like a dark rain arrested in its descent; and the furze flings out its bright yellow flowers upon the otherwise bare common, like little gleams of sunshine, and the moles ply their mischievous night-work in the dry meadows; and the green plover "whistles o'er the lea," and the snipes haunt the marshy grounds; and the wagtails twinkle about near the spring heads; and the larks get together in companies, and talk to each other, instead of singing to themselves; and the thrush occasionally puts forth a plaintive note, as if half afraid of the sound of its own voice; and the hedge-sparrow and tit-mouse try to sing; and the robin does sing still, even more delightfully than he has done all the rest of the year, because it now seems as if he sang for us rather than for himself—or rather, to us, for it is still for his supper that he sings, and therefore for himself.

There is no place so desolate as the orchard this month: for none of the fruit trees have any beauty as trees, at the best; and now, they have not a leaf left to cover their unsightly nakedness.*

Not so with the kitchen-garden; that, if it has been duly attended to, is full of interest this month, especially by comparison with the scenes of decay and barrenness by which it is surrounded. The fruit trees on the walls are all nailed out with the most scrupulous regularity; and by them, as much as by anything else, you may now judge of the skill and assiduity of your gardener. Indeed, this is the month of all others in which his merits are put to the test, and in which they often seem to vie with those of nature herself. Anybody may have a handsome garden from May to September; but only those who deserve one can have it from September to May. Now, then, the walls are all covered with their wide-spread fruit-fans; the celery beds stretch out their unbroken lines of fresh-looking green: the late planted lettuces look trim and erect upon the sheltered borders where they are to stand the winter and be ready, not to open, but to shut up their young hearts at the first warm breath of spring; the green strings of autumn-sown peas scarcely lift their tender downward turning stems above the dark soil; the hardy endives spread out their now full grown heads of fantastically curled leaves, or stand tied up from the sun and air, doing the penance necessary to acquire for them that agreeable state of unhealthiness without which (like modern fine ladies who contrive to blanch themselves in a similar manner, and by similar means) our squeamish appetites could not relish them; the cauliflower, brocoli, and kale plants, maintain their unbroken ranks; and, finally, even the cabbages themselves (Mr Brummel being self-banished to Boulogne, and therefore not within hearing, I may venture to say it) even the young cabbages themselves contrive to look genteel, in virtue of their as yet heartless state, which is, in fact, the secret of all gentility, whether in a cabbage or a countess.*

As to the flower-garden this month, it looks a picture either of pleasantness or poverty; according to the degree of care and skill which has been bestowed upon it: for though nature wills that we should enjoy her beauties during a certain period of the year, whether we use any efforts towards the obtaining of them or not, yet she lays it down as a general principle, in regard to her gifts, that to seek them, is at once to deserve, to have, and to enjoy them;† and that, without such seeking we shall only have just enough to make us sigh after more.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

XIVIL.—THE FIRST FEMALE ACCOUCHEUR.

AGNODICE, an Athenian female, appears to have been endowed with a considerable portion of keen sensibility towards the afflictions and calamities of others: with this amiable disposition she united qualities which persons of that laudable description do not always possess,—good sense to direct, and consummate resolution for carrying into execution the singular efforts she made to alleviate the sufferings of her fellow-creatures; and which in the path chosen by her benevolence could not be exercised without difficulty and danger.

This excellent woman saw with concern numbers of her own sex dying or undergoing extreme and frequently unnecessary risk and protracted pain in child-birth, because they dreaded calling in professional assistance, or resorted to it when too late; for, at the period to which I refer, there was a positive law in Athens, that men only should study and practice this or any other branch of the medical art.

Agnodice could not rest contented till she found a remedy for this evil, which struck at the root of population, laid a cruel tax on the first great law of nature, and overwhelmed with torture, agony, and death, the fairest, the most modest, and often the worthiest of women; whilst certain help was loudly called for and really administered to vicious audacity and callous unconcern.

Inspired by the importance of her object and animated by the humanity of her purpose, she alleged a call from a sick friend at a considerable distance to account for her absence, and, procuring the dress of a man, attended as a pupil at the schools where the knowledge she wished for was dispensed.

As improvement is generally rapid when the desire for it is ardent, Agnodice soon acquired the necessary qualifications, and, in the assumed character and dress of a man, afforded substantial relief to many women who had been deterred by modesty, by fear, and other motives, from applying to male professors; the secret of her being a woman having been previously imparted to those, whose situation rendered her assistance necessary.

But the gratitude of her patients or the selfishness of her opponents, who found they were losing business, led to a discovery of this meritorious imposture.

They circulated reports injurious to the character of the young practitioner, and, ignorant of the truth, insisted that he was frequently called in when, in fact, no medical aid was necessary, and that dangerous and illicit intercourse was carried on under the convenient plea of asking advice.

Agnodice was tried before the Areopagus, a court so called from their assembling on a hill of that name near Athens; and by a party of envious husbands and jealous rivals this excellent and intrepid woman was condemned to die; an unjust and inhuman sentence, which would have been carried into execution, if the prisoner had not convinced her judges in a way I will not describe, that it was impossible she could have been guilty of the crime alleged against her.

Disappointed in their purpose, her adversaries next endeavoured to destroy her, for having violated an express law, mentioned at the beginning of this article, which prohibited her sex from studying any branch of the medical profession. On this charge, the law being positive, her judges paused, when the court was immediately filled with a crowd of women, many of whom had received comfort, and many of them life, from her well-timed aid.

They boldly and loudly appealed to the feelings, the reason, and the interests of the person they addressed. After a short debate Agnodice was honourably acquitted, and the obnoxious law revoked. Such was the salutary triumph of merit and good sense over selfishness and absurd prejudice.

related took place, the opinions of the world on this subject appear to have taken an opposite direction; the art which Agnodice took so generous and effectual a method of acquiring, is now almost universally practised by men.

Yet it has been doubted whether, in nine cases out of ten,—so kind a guardian have we in the superintending providence of God,—whether in nine cases out of ten, nature, with trifling aid, does not conduct the business with safety; but the fear, perhaps a natural one in the breast of each woman, that she may be that unfortunate tenth, has secured, and still secures to the modern accoucheur a large and profitable proportion of patients.

MADAME DE BEAUFREMONT AND CARTOUCHE THE ROBBER.

DURING the night I speak of, Madame de Beaufremont first heard a smothered noise in her chimney, and she soon after perceived a cloud of soot, swallows' nests, and plaister, which rolled down, helter skelter, with a man armed to the crown of his head. As he made the fire-wood roll into the room, with all the lighted faggots, the first thing he did was to take the tongs, and methodically replace all the sparks into the chimney: he kicked away some lighted coals, without crushing them on the carpet; and then he turned towards the Marquise, to whom he said, Madame, may I ask to whom I have the honour of speaking? Sir, I am Madame de Beaufremont; but, as you are a perfect stranger to me, as you have not the appearance of a robber, and as you have taken the greatest care not to injure my furniture, I cannot guess why you thus arrive in my room in the middle of the night. Madame, I have no intention to come into your bed-chamber. Will you have the goodness to accompany me to the gate of your hotel? added he, taking a pistol from his belt, and a lighted candle in his hand.—But, Sir— Madame, have the goodness to hasten, continued he, loading his pistol. We will go down together, and you must order the porter to open the gate. Speak lower, Sir, speak lower, or the Marquis de Beaufremont may hear you, replied she, trembling with fear.—Put on your cloak, Madame, and do not remain in your dressing-gown, it is bitterly cold! In short, everything was settled as he dictated, and Madame de Beaufremont was so overcome by it, that she was obliged to sit down in the porter's lodge, as soon as this terrible man had passed. Then she heard a knock at the window of the lodge which looked towards the street:—Porter, said the same voice, I am Cartouche;—do you hear;—and I have this night walked one or two leagues on the roofs of the houses, because I was pursued by spies. Do not suppose that it is an affair of gallantry, or, that I am Madame de Beaufremont's lover. You would have to answer it to me; however, you shall hear from me by the penny post, the day after to-morrow. Madame de Beaufremont went up stairs, and awakened her husband, who maintained to her that it was a night-mare, and that she had had a frightful dream: but she received, two or three days afterwards, a letter of excuses and thanks, perfectly respectful, and very well worded, in which was enclosed a safe conduct for Madame de Beaufremont, with an act to authorise her to deliver one to her family. The letter had been preceded by a little box, which contained a fine unset diamond; and the stone was valued by Monsieur Lempereur at 6,000 francs, which the Marquis de Beaufremont placed for the sick, at the Hotel Dieu, in the hands of the treasurer of Notre Dame.—Recollections of the Eighteenth Century.

Family-packing of a great Genius.—There is a document among the records of the prison of Valladolid, from which it appears, that in June 1605, Cervantes was taken up on suspicion of being concerned in a night-brawl, which took place near his house, and in which a knight of Santiago was mortally wounded. The wounded man came to the house in which Cervantes lived, and was helped up stairs by one of the other lodgers, whom he knew, assisted by Cervantes, who had come out at the noise. The magistrate arrested several of the inmates of the house, which contained five different families, living in as many different sets of chambers on the different floors. From the examinations taken, it appears that Cervantes, his wife and daughter, his widowed sister and her daughter, his half-sister, who was a monja, or domestic nun, and a female servant, occupied apartments on the first floor; and that Cervantes was in the habit of being visited by several gentlemen, both on commercial business and on account of his literary merit. Cervantes was honourably acquitted; as the wounded man, before he died, acknowledged that he had received the fatal blow from an unknown stranger, who insolently obstructed his passage, upon which they drew their swords.—Gallery of Portraits.

MALAGRIDA.

GABRIEL MALAGRIDA, a native of Milan, in the latter part of the seventeenth century, was a Jesuit, and, during the greatest part of his life, a missionary in South America, where he is said to have conducted himself with orthodox zeal, and exemplary propriety; but, in the decline of life, forgetting his Christian profession, and prostituting the sacred nature of his office, he was accused of engaging in a conspiracy with the Duke of Aveiro, and other noblemen, and of pronouncing absolution on certain assassins, previous to the nefarious attempt on the life of the King of Portugal, in 1757. For this union of sacrilege and homicide, for this worst species of treason, murder, and fanaticism, he had almost escaped punishment; so powerful at that period, and at Lisbon, was the influence of the Church. During a long confinement, and in the imbecility of dotage, vanity or madness, Malagrída awakened the resentments of the Inquisition by heresy, which, in a moment, drew down on his devoted head the thunders of the Inquisition. He published a book, which he called 'The Heroic and Wonderful Life of the Glorious St Anne, mother of the Blessed Virgin Mary, dictated by the same Sovereign Lady, and written with the assistance, approbation, and concurrence, of her most Holy Son.' In this curious publication, he boldly and unequivocally laid claims to divine inspiration, and celestial intercourse; he also was author of another heterodox Latin treatise on the Life and Reign of Antichrist. The poor man, being questioned on the subject of these publications, far from denying what had been alleged against him, pertinaciously adhered to the assertions in his book; and, after recapitulating a great deal of nonsensical or profane jargon concerning the subject of his History, previous to her birth, which it would be neither interesting nor decent to relate, he solemnly declared that the Almighty had repeatedly spoken to him with an audible and distinct voice. A reader of common curiosity, who should inquire for what important service the Creator of the Universe had departed from his customary mode of proceeding, would hear, with a smile or a sigh, that it was to inform a pupil of St Ignatius, that the name of St Anne's husband was Joachim, by trade a mason; that she founded a spiritual retreat in Jerusalem for sixty-three women of a retired life; that the building in which they lived was erected by angels; that from this female society Nicodemus, St Matthew, and Joseph of Arimathea, had chosen each of them a wife, &c. It was in vain that Malagrída was told of the absurdity and impiety of what he said; of the improbability of God's immediately interfering, for purposes so trifling, so inadequate to his attributes and power: the Jesuit remained firm and unmoved, boldly appealing to miracles he had wrought, in confirmation of the truth of his assertions, and positively declaring that he had delivered many persons from sickness and danger, and procured heirs for others. He further informed the tribunal before whom he was examined, that having been applied to, on a certain time, for his intercession, in order to secure the succession of a noble family, they had promised six hundred milreis for our Lady of the Missions; and that, when, by virtue of his prayers and supplications, the desired heir had been obtained, and the parents would pay only two hundred, in consequence of their non-performance of the agreement, the child in question was seized with sudden sickness, and in danger of dying, on account of the dilatoriness of its relations in paying the remainder. The same persons again applying to him on the subject, and paying the four hundred milreis, which had been promised, his prayers were repeated, and the infant restored to perfect health.

Considerable pains were taken with the criminal to prevail on him to recant, and purify himself of such unmeaning and abominable heresies; the holy office being very unwilling to proceed to extremities with an active and successful missionary, who had on many occasions proved himself a faithful and humble Son of the Church; but all reasoning, and all entreaty, proving ineffectual, he was sentenced to be burned; but, as a mark of consideration for the order of which he was a member, and of mercy to the individual himself, it was directed that he should previously be strangled, the following label being affixed to the offender as he was conducted to the place of execution, where he was strangled and consumed to ashes:—

"Abandoned in the Flesh.

"Gabriel Malagrída, from Milan, for feigned relations and false prophecies; for indecent proceedings and heretical opinions, and for asserting that the three persons of the Trinity were father, son, and grandson. For various impostures, duplicity, prevarication, impenitence, and hardness of heart."

Such was Malagrída, who, if suffering death in support of what he avowed be any proof of its truth, afforded this test in its amplest and most unequivocal manner; he died indeed a martyr, but it was the martyrdom of a weak man, who, instead of being put to death, should have been suffered to neutralise the effect of his books, by having them received with a smile of pity and toleration.

THE ABSENT MEMBER.

[This is taken from the new number of the 'Amulet,' just published, and is from the pen of Miss Mitford, the author of the delightful village histories. The picture seems a little caricatured here and there; but absence of mind is in itself a caricature; and whatever exuberance there is at any time in Miss Mitford's style is but truth in a state of luxuriance.]

Everybody remembers the excellent character of an absent man, by La Bruyère, since, so coldly dramatized by Isaac Bickerstaff,—everybody remembers the character, and everybody would have thought the whole account a most amusing and pleasant invention, had not the incredible facts been verified by the sayings and doings of a certain Parisian count, whose name has escaped me,* a well known individual of that day, whose distractions (I use the word in the French sense, and not in the English) set all exaggeration at defiance, who was, in a word, more distract than Le Distract of La Bruyère.

He, "that nameless he," still remains unrivalled: as an odd Frenchman, when such a thing turns up, which is seldom, will generally be found to excel at all points your English oddity, which is comparatively common. No single specimen so complete in its kind has appeared in our country; but the genus is by no means extinct; and every now and then, especially amongst learned men, great mathematicians, and eminent Grecians, one has the luck to light on an original whose powers of perception and memory are subject to lapses the most extraordinary; fits of abstraction, during which everything that passes falls into some pit of forgetfulness, like the oubliette of an old castle, and is never seen or heard of again.

My excellent friend, Mr Coningsby, is just such a man. The waters of oblivion of the Eastern Fairy Tale, or the more classical Lethæ, are but types to shadow forth the extent and variety of his anti-recollective faculty. Let the fit be strong upon him, and he shall not recognize his own mansion, or remember his own name. Suppose him in London, and a fire in the opposite house would, at such a time, hardly disturb him. You might, at certain moments, commit murder in his presence with perfect impunity; he would not know the killer from the killed.

Of course this does not happen every day; or rather, opportunities of so striking a character do not often fall in his way, or doubtless he would not fail to make the most of them. Of the smaller occasions, which can occur more frequently, he is pretty sure to take the advantage; and, from the time of his putting on two different coloured stockings when getting up in the morning, to that of his assuming his wife's laced nightcap when going to bed, his every day's history is one perpetual series of blunders and mistakes.

He will salt his tea, for instance, at breakfast time, and put sugar on his muffin, and swallow both messes without the slightest perception of his having at all deviated from his common mode of applying those relishing condiments. With respect to the quality of his food, indeed, he is as indifferent as Domine Sampson; and he has been known to fill his glass with vinegar instead of sherry, and to pour a ladle of turtle soup over his turbot instead of lobster sauce, and doubtless would have taken both the eatables and drinkables very quietly, had not his old butler, on the watch against such occurrences, whisked both glass and plate away with the celerity of Sancho's physician, Don—Bless me! I have forgotten that name also! I said that this subject was contagious. Don—he who officiated in the island of Barataria—Don—no, Doctor Pedro Resio de Aquero, that is the title in which the gentleman rejoices.—Well, the vinegar would have been drunken, and the turbot and turtle sauce eaten, had not the vigilant butler played the part of Don Pedro Resio, and whipped off the whole concern, whilst the good man, his master, sat in dubious meditation, wondering what had become of his dinner, and not quite certain that he might not have eaten it, until a plateful of more salubrious and less incongruous viands—ham and chicken for instance, or roast beef and French beans, was placed before him. But for that inestimable butler, a coroner's inquest would have been held upon him long ago.

After breakfast he would dress, thrice happy if the care of his valet prevented him from shaving with a

* In writing of the forgetfulness of others, a touch of that quality may be permitted in oneself. It is in keeping, and belonging to the subject: and in good truth, if one may say of this sort of distract, as of that worst species of hallucination, called love, "they best can paint them who can feel them most," then I am a fit recorder of all the errors, blunders, and mistakes that proceed from want of memory, I being as much addicted to forget names, and dates, and places—to write one word for another—to confound authorities, and misquote verse, as Mr Coningsby himself. I cannot even remember the style and title of my own geraniums, and only yesterday gave away a Magnolia seedling (as precious to a geranium-breeder as an Eclipse colt to a gentleman on the turf) mistaking it for a Lord Chamberlain. "The force of absence could no further go."

pruning-knife, or putting on his waistcoat wrong side out. Being dressed, he would prepare for his morning ride, mousing, if his groom did not happen to be in waiting, the very first four-footed animal that came in his way,—sometimes the butcher's horse, with a tray nicely balanced before—sometimes the post-boy's donkey, with the letter-bags swinging behind him—sometimes his daughter's pony, side-saddle notwithstanding; and, when mounted, forth he sallies, rather in the direction which his steed may happen to prefer than in that which he himself had intended to follow.

Bold would be the pen that should attempt even a brief summary of the mistakes committed in one single morning's ride. If he proceed, as he frequently does, to our good town of Belford, he goes for wrong things to the wrong shops, miscalls the people whom he accosts (seldom, indeed, shall he hit on the proper name, title, or vocation of any one whom he chances to address), asks an old bachelor after his wife, and an old maid after her children; and, finally, sums up a morning of blunders by going to the inn where he had not left his horse, and quietly stepping into some gig or phaeton prepared for some other person. In a new neighbourhood, this appropriation of other people's property might bring our hero into an awkward dilemma; but the man and his ways are well known in our parts, and when the unlucky owner of the abstracted equipage arrives in a fury, and demands of the astounded ostler what has become of his carriage, one simple exclamation, Mr Coningsby, sir! is at once felt by the aggrieved proprietor to be explanation enough.

Should morning calls be the order of the day, he contrives to make a pretty comfortable confusion in that simple civility. First of all, he can hardly gallop along the king's highway without getting into a démêlé with the turnpike keepers, sometimes riding quietly through a gate without paying the slightest attention to their demand for toll; at others tossing them, without dreaming of stopping to receive the change, a shilling or a sovereign, as the case may be; for, although great on the currency question (have I not said that the gentleman is a county member?) he is practically most happily ignorant of the current coin of the realm, and could hardly know gold from silver, if asked to distinguish between them. This event is a perfect godsend to the gatekeeper, who, confiding in the absolute deafness produced by his abstraction, calls after him with a complete assurance that he may be honest with impunity; and that bawl as he may, there is no more chance of his arresting his passenger than the turnpike-man of Ware had of stopping Johnny Gilpin. Accordingly, after undergoing the ceremony of offering change, he pockets the whole coin with a safe conscience. Beggars (and he is very charitable) find their account also in this ignorance; he flings about half-crowns for penny pieces, and half sovereigns for sixpences, relieving the same set a dozen times over, and gets quit of a pocketful of money (for though he have a purse, he seldom remembers to make use of it—luckily seldom—for if he do fill that gentlemanly net-work, he is sure to lose it, cash, bank-notes, and all) in the course of a morning's ride.

Arrived at the place of destination, the house at which he is to call, a new scene of confusion is pretty sure to arise. In the first place, it rarely happens that he does arrive at the veritable mansion to which his visit is intended. He is far more likely to arrive at the wrong place, inquire of the bewildered footman for some name, not his master's, and be finally ushered into a room full of strangers, persons whom he neither visits nor knows, who stare and wonder what brought him, whilst he, not very sure whether he ought to remember them, whether they be his acquaintances or not, stammers out an apology, and marches off again. (N.B. He once did this, whilst canvassing for the county, to a rival candidate, and finding only the lady of the house, intreated her, in the most insinuating manner, to exert her influence with her husband for his vote and interest. This passed for a deep stroke of finesse amongst those who did not know him—they who did, laughed, and exclaimed, Mr Coningsby!) Or he shall commit the reverse mistake, and, riding to the right house, ask for the wrong people, or, finding the family out, he shall have forgotten his own name—I mean his name tickets,—and shall leave one from his wife's or daughter's card-case, taken up by that sort of accident, which is to him second nature; or he shall unite all these blunders, and leave at a house where he himself does not visit, a card left at his own mansion by a third person, who is also acquainted with the family to which so unconsciously that outward sign and token of acquaintanceship had travelled.

Imagine the mistakes and confusion occasioned by such doings in a changeable neighbourhood, much broken into parties by politics and election contests. Sometimes it did good, as between two old country squires, who, having been friends all their lives, had

* Erratum: For is read was. "Was a county member" will do just as well, and save the talented Editor, the eminent publisher, and respectable printer of this loyal volume from any danger of being called, innocent as they are, to the bar of the House, and committed to his Majesty's goal of Newgate for breach of privilege; to say nothing of my own share of the peril. Was must be the word.

quarrelled about the speed of a greyhound, and the decision of a course, and had mutually vowed never to pass each other's door. The sight of his antagonist's card (left in one of Mr Coningsby's absent fits), so mollified the most testy elder of the two, that he forthwith returned the visit, and the opposite party being luckily not at home, a card was left there also; and either individual thinking the concession first made by himself, was emulous in stepping forward with the most cordial hand-shaking when they met casually at dinner at a third place.

But Mr Coningsby's visiting blunders were not always so fortunate; where they healed one breach, they made twenty; and once had very nearly occasioned a duel between two youngsters, lords of neighbouring manors, between whose game-keepers there was an outstanding feud. The card left was taken as a cartel—a note of defiance; and, but for the interference of constables, and mayors, and magistrates, and aunts, and sisters, and mammas, and peace-preservers of all ages and sexes, some very hot blood would inevitably have been spilt. As it was, the affair terminated in a grand effusion of ink, the correspondence between the seconds, a delicious specimen of polite and punctilious quarrelling, having been published for the edification of the world, and filling three columns of the county newspapers. It came to no conclusion; for, although the one party conceded that a card had been left, and the other that the person to whom the name belonged did not leave it, yet how the thing did arrive on that hall table remained a mystery. The servant who opened the door happened to be a stranger, and somehow or other nobody ever thought of Mr Coningsby;—nay, he himself, although taking a great interest in the dispute, and wondering over the puzzle like the rest of the neighbourhood, never once recollected his own goings on that eventful morning, nor dreamt that it could be through his infirmity that Sir James Mordaunt's card was left at Mr Chandler's; to so incredible a point was his forgetfulness carried.

If, in so simple a matter as morning visiting, he contrived to produce so much confusion, think how his genius must have expended when so dangerous a weapon as a pen got into their hands! I question if he ever wrote a letter in his life without some blunder in the date, the address, the signature, or the subject. He would indite an epistle to one person, direct it to another, and send it to a third, who could not conceive from whom it came, because he had forgotten to put his name at the bottom. But of the numerous perplexities to which he was in the habit of giving rise, franks were by very far the most frequent cause. Ticklish things are they, even to the punctual and the careful; and to Mr Coningsby the giving one quite perfectly right seemed an impossibility. There was the date to consider, the month, the day of the month, the year—I have known him to write the wrong century;—then came the name, the place, the street, the number, if in London—if in the country, the town and county;—then, lastly, his own name, which, though so simple an operation as it seems, he would contrive generally to omit, and sometimes to boggle with, now writing only his patronymic, as if he were a peer, now only his Christian name, as if a prince, and now an involution of initials that defied even the accurate eye of the clerks of the Post-Office. Very, very few can have been the franks of his that escaped paying.

Of course his friends and acquaintance were forewarned, and escaped the scrape (for it is one) of making their correspondents pay triple postage. Bountiful as he was in his offers of service in this way, (and keeping no account of the numbers, he would just as readily give fifty as one), none incurred the penalty, save strangers and the unwary. I, for my own part, never received but one letter directed by him in my life, and in the address of that, the name, my name, the name of the person to whom the letter was written, was wanting. "Three Mile Cross" held the usual place occupied by "Miss Miford."

"Three Mile Cross—
Reading,
Berks,"

ran the direction. But as I happened to receive about twenty times as many letters, and especially franked letters as all the good people of "The Cross" put together, the packet was sent first to me by way of experiment, and, as I recognised the seal of a dear friend and old correspondent, I felt no scruple in appropriating for once, like a Scottish laird, the style and title of the place where I reside. And I and the postmaster were right; the epistle was, as it happened, intended for me.

Notes would, in his hands, have been still more dangerous than letters; but from this peril he was generally saved by the caution of the two friends most anxious for his credit, his wife and the old butler, who commonly contrived, the one to write the answers to all invitations and general billets that arrived at the house, the other to watch that none from him should pass without due scrutiny. Once, however, he escaped their surveillance; and the consequence was an adventure which, though very trifling, proved, in the first instance, so uncomfortable, as to cause both his keepers to exert double vigilance for the future. Thus the story ran.

A respectable but not wealthy clergyman had been appointed to a living about ten miles off, had married, and brought home his bride, and Mr Coningsby, who as county member, called upon everybody within a still wider circuit, paid a visit in due form, accompanied by, or rather accompanying his lady, which call having been duly returned (neither party being at home), was followed by an invitation for Mr and Mrs Ellis to dine at Coningsby House. The invitation was accepted; but when the day arrived, the dangerous illness of a near relation prevented the young couple from keeping their engagement; and some time after, the fair bride began to think it necessary to return the civilities of her neighbours, by giving her first dinner party. Notes of invitation were despatched accordingly, to four families of consequence, amongst them Mr Coningsby's; but it was the busy Christmas time, when, between family parties, and London visitors, and children's balls, everybody's evenings were bespoken for weeks beforehand; and, from three of her friends accordingly, she received answers declining her invitation, and pleading pre-engagements. From Mr Coningsby only, no note arrived. But accidentally Mr Ellis heard that they were to go at Christmas on a distant visit, and, taking for granted that the invitation had not reached the worthy member or his amiable lady, Mrs Ellis, instead of attempting to collect other friends, made up her mind to postpone her party to a more convenient season.

The day on which the dinner was to have been given proved so unfavourable, that our young couple saw good cause to congratulate themselves on their resolution. The little hamlet of East Longford, amongst the prettiest of our North-of-Hampshire villages, so beautiful in the summer, from the irregularities of the ground, the deep woody lanes hollowed like water-courses, the wild commons which must be passed to reach it, and the profound seclusion of the one straggling street of cottages and cottage-like houses, with the vicarage, placed like a bird's-nest on the side of a steep hill, clothed to the very top with beech woods; this pretty hamlet, so charming in its summer verdure, its deep retirement, and its touch of wildness in the midst of civilization, was, from those very circumstances no tempting spot in mid-winter; vast tracts across the commons were then nearly impassable; the lanes were sloughs; and the village itself, rendered insulated and inaccessible by the badness of the roads, conveyed no other feeling than that of weariness and loneliness. Mr and Mrs Ellis, who, although not insensible of the inconveniences of their abode, had made up their minds to bear the evil and enjoy the good of their situation, could not help congratulating themselves, as they sat in their snug dining-parlour, after a five o'clock dinner, on the postponement of their party. The snow is above a foot deep, and the bridge broken, so that neither servants nor horses could have got to the Eight Bells; and where could we have housed them? said the gentleman. And the drawing-room smokes so, in this heavy atmosphere, that we cannot light a fire there, responded the lady; never to be sure was anything so fortunate!

And just as the word was spoken, a carriage and four drove up to the door, and exactly at half-past six (the hour named in the invitation), Mr and Mrs Coningsby were ushered into the room.

Imagine the feelings of four persons, who had never met before, in such a situation, especially of the two ladies. Mrs Ellis, dinner over, with the consciousness of the half-bottle of port and the quarter of sherry, the apples, the nuts, the single pair of mould candles, her drawing-room fire that could not be lighted, her dinner to be provided as well as cooked, and her own dark merino and black silk apron! Poor Mrs Coningsby, on the other hand, seeing at a glance how the case stood, feeling for the trouble they were giving, and sinking under a consciousness far worse to bear than Mrs Ellis's—the consciousness of being overdressed. How heartily did she wish herself at home again! or, if that were too much to desire, what would she have given to have replaced her claret-coloured silk gown, her hat with its white plumes, her pearls and her rubies back again in their wardrobes and cases!

It was a trial of no ordinary nature to the good sense, good breeding, and good humour of both parties, and each stood it well. There happened to be a cold round of beef in the house, some undressed game, and plenty of milk and eggs; the next farmer had killed a pig; and with pork chops, cold beef, a pheasant, and apple fritters, all very nicely prepared, more fastidious persons than Mr and Mrs Coningsby might have made a good dinner. The host brought out his best claret, the pretty hostess regained her smiles, and forgot her black apron and her dark merino; and, what was a far more difficult achievement, the fair visitor forgot her plumes and her satin. The evening, which began so inauspiciously, ended pleasantly and sociably; and, when the note (taken, as was guessed, by our hero from the letter-boy, with the intention of sending it by a groom) was found quietly encoined in his waistcoat pocket, Mrs Coningsby could hardly regret the termination of her present adventure, although fully resolved never again to incur a similar danger.

Of his mishaps when attending his duty in Parliament, and left in some measure to his own guidance (for, having no house in town, his family only go for about three months in the season) there is no end. Some are serious, and some are very much the reverse. Take a specimen of his London scrapes.

Our excellent friend wears a wig made to imitate a natural head of hair, which it is to be presumed that at the very best of times, it does not very closely resemble, and which, after a week of Mr Coningsby's wearing, put on with the characteristic negligence of his habits, sometimes on one end, sometimes on the other, always awry, and sometimes hind side before, assumes such a demeanour as never was equalled by Christian peruke at any time or in any country.

One day last winter, being in London without a servant, he, by some extraordinary chance, happened to look in the glass when he was dressing, and became aware of the evil state of his caxon,—a piece of information for which he had generally been indebted to one of his two guardians, Mrs Coningsby or the old butler,—and, recollecting that he was engaged to a great dinner party the ensuing evening, stepped into the first hair-dresser's shop that he passed to bespeak himself a wig; where, being a man of exceedingly pleasant and jocular manners (your oddities, with the exception of the peculiar oddity, are commonly agreeable persons), he passed himself off for a bachelor to the artificer, and declared that his reason for desiring a wig of peculiar beauty and becomingness was, that he was engaged to great party the next day, at which he expected to meet the lady of his heart, and that his fate and fortune depended on the set of his curls. This he impressed very strongly on the mind of the perruquier; who, an enthusiast in his art, as a great artist should be, saw nothing extraordinary in the fact of a man's happiness hanging on the cut of his wig, and gravely promised that no exertion should be wanting on his part to contribute to the felicity of his customer, and that the article in question, as perfect as hands could make it, should be at his lodgings the next evening at seven.

Punctual to the hour arrived the maker of perukes; and, finding Mr Coningsby not yet returned to dress, went to attend another appointment, promising to come back in half an hour. In half an hour, accordingly, the man of curls re-appeared, just in time to see a cabriolet driving rapidly from the door, at which a maid servant stood tittering.

Where is Mr Coningsby? inquired the perruquier. Just gone out to dinner, replied the girl; and a queer figure he is, sure enough. He looks for all the world like an owl in an ivy-bush.

To be sure he has not got his new wig on!—my wig! returned the alarmed artist; he can never be such a fool as that!

He's fool enough for anything in the way of forgetting or not attending, responded our friend Sally; and he has got a mop of hair on his head, whoever made it, that would have served for half-a-dozen wigs.

The article was sent home untrimmed, just as it was woven, replied the unfortunate fabricator, in increasing consternation; and a capital article it is. I came by his own direction to cut and curl it, according to the shape of his face; the gentleman being particular about the set of it, because he's going a-courting.

Going a-courting! exclaimed Sally, amazed in her turn; the Lord ha' mercy upon the poor wretch! If he has not clean forgot that he's married, and is going to commit—I don't know what you call it—to have two wives at once! and then he'll be hanged. Going a-courting! What'll Madam say! Going a-courting! He'll come to be hanged, sure enough.

Married already! quoth the perruquier, with a knowing whistle, and a countenance that spoke Benedick the married man in every feature. When! One wife at a time's enough for most people. But he'll not be hanged. The fact of his wearing my wig with the hair six inches long will save him. He must be non compos. And you that stand tittering there can be little better, to let him go out in such a plight. Why didn't you stop him?

Stop him! ejaculated the dame; stop Mr Coningsby! I should like to know how!

Why by telling him what he was about, to be sure; and getting him to look in the glass. Nobody wish eyes in his head could have gone out such a figure.

Talk to him! quoth Sally; but how was I to get him to listen? And, as to looking in a glass, I question if ever he did such a thing in his life. You don't know our Mr Coningsby, that's clear enough.

I only wish he had never come in my way, that I never had had the ill luck to have known him, rejoined the discomfited artist, if he should happen to mention my name as his wig-maker, whilst he has that peruke on his head, I am ruined—my reputation is gone for ever!

No fear of that, replied Sally, in a comforting tone, struck with compassion at the genuine alarm of the unlucky man of wig. There's not the slightest danger of his mentioning your name, because you may be certain sure that he does not remember it. Lord love you, he very often forgets his own! Don't you be frightened about that! repeated the damsel, soothingly, as she shut the door, whilst the discomfited perrier returned to his shop, and Mr Coningsby, never guessing how intirely in outward semblance he resembled the wild man of the woods, proceeded to his dinner-party, where his coiffure was, as the hairdresser had predicted, the theme of universal astonishment and admiration.

This, however, was one of the least of his scrapes. He has gone to Court without a sword; he has worn coloured clothes to a funeral, and black to a wedding. There is scarcely any conventional law of society which, in some way or other, he hath not contrived to break; and, in two or three slight instances, he has approached more nearly than becoms a magistrate and a senator to a démêlé with the laws of the land. He hath quietly knocked down a great fellow, for instance, whom he caught beating a little one, and hath once or twice been so blind or so absent, as to suffer a petty culprit to run away, when brought up for examination in virtue of his own warrant. But it is remarkable that he never, in his most oblivious moods, is betrayed into an unkind word or an ungenerous action. There is a moral instinct about him which preserves him, in the midst of his oddities, pure and unsullied in thought and deed. With all his "distractions," he never lost a friend or made an enemy. His opponents at an election are pized when they get up a handbill against him; and for that great test of amiableness, the love of his family, his household, his relations, servants, and neighbours, I would match my worthy friend, George Coningsby, against any man in the county.

SIR WALTER RALEIGH.

(Passages from the latest and best Life of him, by Patrick Fraser Tytler, Esq. No. XI. of the 'Edinburgh Cabinet Library'.)

RALEIGH'S ACCOUNT OF THE SCENERY OF CANARI, IN SOUTH AMERICA.

WHEN we ascended, says he, to the tops of the first hills of the plains adjoining to the river, we beheld that wonderful breach of waters which was precipitated down Caroli, and might from that mountain see the river how it ran in three parts above twenty miles off; there appeared ten or twelve falls in sight, every one as high over the other as a church tower, the water descending with that fury that the rebound made it seem as if it had been all covered over with a great shower of rain, and in some places we took it for a smoke that had risen over some great town. For mine own part, I was well persuaded from thence to have returned, being a very ill footman; but the rest were all so desirous to go near the said strange thunder of waters, as they drew me on by little and little into the next valley. . . . I never, he continues, saw a more beautiful country, nor more lively prospects; hills so raised here and there over the vallies; the river winding into divers branches; the plains adjoining without bush or stubble; all fair green grass; the ground of hard sand, weary to march on either for horse or foot; the deer crossing in every path; the birds towards evening singing on every tree with a thousand several tunes; cranes and herons, of white, crimson, and carnation, perching on the river's side; the air fresh, with a gentle easterly wind; and every stone that we stopped to take up promising either gold or silver by its complexion.

As Raleigh lay at St Michael's, waiting the arrival of the commander-in-chief, who was again running after some fruitless enterprise, a carrack, of eighteen hundred tons, loaded with treasure, bore in with all sail amongst his ships, mistaking them for Spaniards, at which sight he gave orders to haul down every flag, and that no one should, at the highest peril, either fire a gun or put off a boat. All lay quietly at anchor, eyeing their golden victim, which, without suspicion, was proudly advancing, and, in a few minutes retreat would have been impossible, when a loggerhead Hollander, either neglecting or mistaking the signals, discharged a shot at the stranger, who, perceiving her error, changed her course as nimbly as a frightened dove; but at the same moment the wind chopped about, and she ran aground under the town and fort. Here the rear-admiral followed in his barges, with the design of boarding; upon which, finding the danger inevitable, the Spaniards, after having set fire to her in many places at once, betook themselves to the boats that came to their assistance from the shore. Still, says Gorges, in his animated description of this incident, Raleigh and his men pursued to board and prevent loss, though not without great danger to his row-barge where he was, the surge being very outrageous. But before he could get up to her, she was all over thunder and lightning, her ordnance discharging from every port, and her whole hulk, masts, cordage, and furniture, overrun with such a thorough, yet distinct and unconfused blaze, as represented the figure of a ship more perfectly in fire than could be done by any painter with all his art and colours; and when she was consumed, even to the surface of the water, she exhaled at her last breath such clouds from her spicy entrails, as for a great way, and for many hours perfumed the air and coast around.

Lasting Traces of a Great Man.—It is a remarkable point about this eminent man, that wherever he had settled, or his influence extended even for a short period, he left some traces of his usefulness and activity. At Youghall, in the county of Cork, of which county he was mayor, and where his house and gardens are still seen, the finest potatoes ever planted in Ireland were introduced by Raleigh, who had brought them from Virginia; and he is also said to have been the first propagator of the cherry in that island, which was imported by him from the Canaries. At Lismore, which formed part of the extensive grant made to him by Elizabeth, we find a still more interesting memorial in a Free School which he founded; and the large and beautiful myrtles in his garden at Youghall, some of them twenty feet high, are associated with that love of shrubs and sweet-smelling plants, and that elegance of taste in his rural occupations, which remarkably distinguished him.

Portrait of Raleigh.—Although his person was noble and manly, his voice was weak and somewhat shrill; his long residence at Court could not conquer his strong Devonshire accent, which, with all the power of a youthful habit, clung to him to the last. His conversation and social qualities were eminently attractive; and whether he sat smoking his long silver pipe among his literary friends at the Mermaid, or talked with his royal mistress when she admitted him to the privy-chamber, or assisted with his advice and experience at the council-table, he swayed and delighted the intellects which came into contact with his superior mind. We know, from one who was no partial judge, that the queen loved his company, and esteemed his judgment as highly as his wit. In his youth, he was violent and hasty, and did not scruple to beat at a tavern Charles Charter, a loquacious and insolent fellow, who had annoyed him by his remarks; after which he laid him on his back and sealed up his upper and nether beard with hard wax. These were youthful follies. As he grew up he became an indefatigable student, and, in the judgment of Secretary Cecil, himself one of the most laborious men of his age, "would toil terribly when he was busy." Not content with his reading on shore, he carried with him a trunk of books on his voyages, and strictly economized his time. His love of science and experiment was so ardent, that his chemical pursuits and study of natural history were enthusiastically pursued at sea. Whatever corner of the world he sought, his curiosity was active, and his observations unremitting. In his last fatal voyage, when broken by disease and disappointment, his Manuscript Journal, which is preserved in the British Museum, shows the same unwearied love of science. He goes ashore with his Indian guide, "to discover the trees which yield balsamum, of which he had found a nut smelling like angelica and exceeding precious;" and on one of its blank leaves he has sketched the representation of some of the fruits of the country. Shortly before his death, in one of his conversations with Sir Thomas Wilson in the Tower, he alludes to a machine which he had invented for turning sea-water into fresh; and even in those melancholy hours he took pleasure in explaining to him a theory he had formed to account for the saltiness of the ocean. His knowledge of chemistry and medicine seems to have led him into that unhappy practice of almost daily drugging himself, which is so common a weakness amongst literary and sedentary men. In his letters to his wife from the Tower, he asks her, in the same sentence, to send him his manuscripts, and his powder of steel and duxem, with some more bitony. He was fond of music, and it seems to have been an hereditary taste in his family, Sir Carew Raleigh performed delicately on the olpharion, an instrument, probably, similar to the lute, and his grandnephews, Walter and Tom, had delicate tunable voices, playing well on the violin. In the productions of the sister-art of painting he took much delight, carrying his favourite pictures with him even on his voyages, and extending his patronage to the best artists of his time, by sitting to them himself, and employing them to paint his wife and children. He was fond also of antiquarian studies, a purchaser of ancient records and rare charts, and not only prided himself upon the rich inlaid coat of silver mail which he wore on gala days, but had collected a fine armoury. In architecture his taste was sumptuous. Durham House, where he lived during his greatness, is described by Aubrey as a noble palace; yet he left the spacious apartments to his family, and for himself preferred a small library which enjoyed an extensive view over the river. "I remember well his study," says this amusing and garrulous author, "it was a little turret that looked into and over the Thames, and had a prospect as pleasant, perhaps, as many in the world, not only refreshing the eyesight but cheering the spirits." In his best time there was an air of dignity and command about him, an "awfulness and ascendancy," as it is well expressed by Aubrey, "above other mortals," which was displeasing to many, and particularly to the King; yet by his sailors and ships' crews, as we learn from Cecil, he was wonderfully beloved. The interior of his palace was magnificent, his taste in furniture being marked by the same love of splendour which appeared in his dress. He delighted in richly carved panels, in antique chimney pieces, in decorating the walls and ceilings of his apartments with his armorial bearings, in beds with green silk hangings, and legs like dolphins, overlaid with gold. His splendid dress, his shoes and doublet studded with precious stones, have been already described. Perhaps he indulged in it to a weakness; but it was an age of magnificence, and it is to be remembered that this wealth in jewels was in Raleigh the result not of extravagance, but of the rich prizes which he had taken from the Spaniards. He glittered with the spoils of the New World; but his jewels were the insignia of his skill and bravery, the fruits not of purchase, but of honourable conquest.

POLYSYLLABIC RHYMES.

WE have but few rhymes of four syllables, and these are hardly made but by some whimsical and far-fetched expressions. Swift, who indulged himself much in these trifles, will furnish an example.

For this, I will not dine with Agmondesham;
And for his victuals, let a rydman dish 'em.

Words, accented on the fifth syllable from the end, are extremely rare, and, of course, rhymes to them nearly impossible to be found. I have met with a single instance.

Why did old Euclis take his only child,
And shut her in a cloister reparatory?
Because she was a rebel whig, and wild,
And he resolved to tame and keep her a tory.

But the verses of Swift, upon the ancient dramatic authors, exhibit the most extraordinary specimen of the sort of rhymes we are now considering, that the English language contains. He had superior abilities in rhyming, and he appears to have set himself down to this piece merely for the purpose of exerting them. The following lines are an extract:—

I went in vain to look for Eupolis Down in the Strand, just where the new pole is;
For I can tell you one thing, that I can,
You will not find it in the Vatican.
He and Cratinus used, as Horace says,
To take his greatest grandees for asses.
Poets, in those days, used to venture high;
But these are lost full many a century.
Thus you may see, dear friend, ex pede hñce,
Thy judgment of the old comedians.
Proceed to tragics; first, Euripides
(An author where I sometimes dip a-days)
Is rightly censured by the Stagirate,
Who says his numbers do not fadge aright.
A friend of mine that author despises
So much, he swears the very best piece is,
For aught he knows, as bad as Thespis's;
And that a woman, in these tragedies,
Commonly speaking, but a sad jade is;
At least, I'm well assured, that no folk lays
The weight on him they do on Sophocles.
But, above all, I prefer Eschylus,
Whose moving touches, when they please, kill us.
And now I find my muse but ill able
To hold out longer in trisyllable.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE gentleman through whose friendly letter from Scotland we had the first information of Mr Simpson's permission to make use of his book, was requested to accept our acknowledgments in a paragraph which was left for insertion last week, but which the press of matter kept out.

We learn, for the first time, that the Bradford Observer is an old friend of ours. We need not say how valuable is the repetition of its approbation after "a lapse of six months."

An accident compels us to postpone further notices to correspondents till next week, when arrears will be duly discharged.

PUT UP A PICTURE IN YOUR ROOM.

MAY we exhort such of our readers as have no pictures hanging in their room to put one up immediately? we mean in their principal sitting-room;—in all their rooms, if possible, but, at all events, in that one. No matter how costly, or the reverse, provided they see something in it, and it gives them a profitable or pleasant thought. Some may allege that they have “no taste for pictures;” but they have a taste for objects to be found in pictures,—for trees, for landscapes, for human beauty, for scenes of life; or, if not for all these, yet surely for some one of them; and it is highly useful for the human mind to give itself helps towards taking an interest in things apart from its immediate cares or desires. They serve to refresh us for their better conquest or endurance; to render sorrow unselfish; to remind us that we ourselves, or our own personal wishes, are not the only objects in the world; to instruct and elevate us, and put us in a fairer way of realizing the good opinions which we would all fain entertain of ourselves, and in some measure do; to make us compare notes with other individuals, and with nature at large, and correct our infirmities at their mirror by modesty and reflection; in short, even the admiration of a picture is a kind of religion, or additional tie on our consciences, and rebinding of us (for such is the meaning of the word religion) to the greatness and goodness of nature.

Mr Hazlitt has said somewhere, of the portrait of a beautiful female with a noble countenance, that it seems as if an unhandsome action would be impossible in its presence. It is not so much for restraint's sake, as for the sake of diffusiveness of heart, or the going out of ourselves, that we would recommend pictures; but, among other advantages, this also, of reminding us of our duties, would doubtless be one; and if reminded with charity, the effect, though perhaps small in most instances, would still be something. We have read of a Catholic money-lender, who, when he was going to cheat a customer, always drew a veil over the portrait of his favourite Saint. Here was a favourite vice, far more influential than the favourite Saint; and yet we are of opinion that the money-lender was better for the Saint than he would have been without him. It left him faith in something; he was better for it in the intervals; he would have treated his daughter the better for it, or his servant, or his dog. There was a bit of heaven in his room,—a sun-beam to shine into a corner of his heart,—however he may have shut the window against it, when heaven was not to look on.

The companionship of anything greater or better than ourselves, must do us good, unless we are destitute of all modesty or patience. And a picture is a companion, and the next thing to the presence of what it represents. We may live in the thick of a city, for instance, and can seldom go out, and “feed” ourselves thing to seeing the fields at a distance. For every picture is a kind of window, which supplies us with a fine sight; and many a thick, unpierced wall thus lets us into the studies of the greatest men, and the most beautiful scenes of nature. By living with pictures we learn to “read” them,—to see into every nook and corner of a landscape, and every feature of the mind; and it is impossible to be in the habit of these perusals, or even of being vaguely conscious of the presence of the good and beautiful, and considering them as belonging to us, or forming a part of our common-places, without being, at the very least, less subject to the disadvantages arising from having no such thoughts at all.

And it is so easy to square the picture to one's aspirations, or professions, or the powers of one's pocket. For, as to resolving to have no picture at all in one's room, unless we could have it costly, and finely painted, and finely framed, that would be a mistake so vulgar, that we trust no reader of the ‘London Journal’ could fall into it. The greatest knave or simpleton in England, provided he is rich, can procure one of the finest paintings in the world to-morrow, and know nothing about it when he has got it; but to feel the beauties of a work of art, or to be capable of being led to feel them, is a gift which often falls to the lot of the poorest; and this is what Raphael or Titian desired in those who looked at their pictures. All the rest is taking the clothes for the man. Now it so happens, that the cheapest engravings, though they cannot come up to the merits of the originals, often contain no mean portion or shadow of them; and when we speak of putting pictures up in a room, we use the word “picture” in the child's sense, meaning any kind of graphic representation, oil, water-colour, copper-plate, drawing, or wood-cut. And any one of these is worth putting up in your room, provided you have mind enough to get a pleasure from it. Even a frame is not necessary, if you cannot afford it. Better put up a rough, varnished engraving, than none at all,—or pin, or stick up, any engraving whatsoever, at the hazard of its growing never so dirty. You will keep it as clean as you can, and for as long a time; and as for the rest, it is better to have a good memorandum before you, and get a fresh one when you are able, than to have none at all, or even to keep it clean in a portfolio. How should you like to keep your own heart in a portfolio, or lock your friend up in another room? We are no friends to portfolios, except where they contain more prints than can be hung up. The more, in that case, the better.

Our readers have seen in all parts of the country, over the doors of public-houses, “Perkins and Co.'s Entire.” This Perkins, who died wealthy, a few years ago, was not a mere brewer or rich man. He had been head-clerk to Thrale, the friend of Dr Johnson; and, during his clerkship, the Doctor happening to go into his counting-house, saw a portrait of himself (Johnson) hanging up in it. “How is this, sir?” inquired Johnson. “Sir,” said Perkins, “I was resolved that my room should have had one great man in it.” “A very pretty compliment,” returned the gratified moralist, “and I believe you mean it sincerely.”

Mr Perkins did not thrive the worse for having the portrait of Johnson in his counting-house. People are in general quite enough inclined to look after the interests of “number one;” but they make a poor business of it, rich as they may become, unless they include a power of forgetting it in behalf of number two; that is to say, of some one person, or thing, besides themselves, able to divert them from mere self-seeking. It is not uncommon to see one solitary portrait in a lawyer's office, and that portrait, a lawyer, generally some judge. It is better than none. Anything is better than the poor, small unit of a man's selfish self, even if it be but the next thing to it. And there is the cost of the engraving and frame. Sometimes there is more; for these professional prints, especially when alone, are meant to imply, that the possessor is a shrewd, industrious, proper lawyer, who sticks to his calling, and wastes his time in “no nonsense;” and this ostentation of business is in some instances a cover for idleness or disgust, or a blind for a father or rich uncle. Now it would be better, we think, to have two pictures instead of one,—the judge's by all means, for the professional part of the gentleman's soul,—and some one other picture, to show his client that he is a man as well as a lawyer, and has an eye to the world outside of him, as well as to his own; for as men come from that world to consult him, and generally think their cases just in the eyes of common sense as well as law, they like to see that he has some sympathies as well as cunning.

Upon these grounds, it would be well for men of other callings, if they acted in a similar way. The young merchant should reasonably have a portrait of some eminent merchant before his eyes, with some other, not far off, to hinder him from acknowledging no merit but in riches. Or he might select a merchant of such a character as could serve both uses,—Sir Thomas Gresham, for instance, who encouraged knowledge as well as money-getting,—or Lorenzo de Medici, the princely merchant of Italy. So with regard to clergymen, to professions of all sorts, and to trade. The hosier, in honour of his calling, might set up Defoe, who was one of that trade, as well as author of Robinson Crusoe; the bookseller, may the footman, Dodsley, who was at one time a footman as well as a bookseller and author, and behaved excellently under all characters; and the tailor might baulk petty animadversions on his trade, by having a portrait, or one of the many admirable works, of the great Annibal Caracci, who was a tailor's son. It would be advisable, in general, to add a landscape, if possible, for reasons already intimated; but a picture of some sort we hold to be almost indispensably necessary towards doing justice to the habitation of every one who is capable of reflection and improvement. The print-shops, the book-stalls, the portfolios containing etchings and engravings at a penny or twopence a-piece (often superior to plates charged twenty times as much), and lastly, the engravings that make their way into the shop-windows, out of the Annuals of the past season, and that are to be had for almost as little, will furnish the ingenious reader of this article with an infinite store to choose from; and if he is as good-natured as he is sensible, we will venture to whisper into his ear, that we should take it as a personal kindness of him, and hope he would consider us as a friend assisting him in putting it up.

With pleasure of the breathing fields; but we can put up a picture of the fields before us, and, as we get used to it, we shall find it the next

THE CELEBRATED

CASE OF MARY SQUIRES AND ELIZABETH CANNING.

MARY SQUIRES, an itinerant pedlar, gipsy, and smuggler, who might have lived unnoticed, and died without remembrance, had not a prosecution for robbery, by which she was condemned to die, suddenly fixed the public eye upon her; and as prejudice or party operated, alternately rendered her a general object of detestation, pity or contempt.

Persisting with the most solemn asseveration, that she was in a distant part of the kingdom on the very day she was accused of having committed the crime, and naming a variety of persons who could prove it, the compassion of Sir Crisp Gascoyne, at that time Lord Mayor of London, was excited; by his example, several well-meaning individuals were induced to join him in examining a most perplexed and intricate business, and she was ultimately recommended as an object of mercy to the crown.

It appeared, by the declaration on oath of Elizabeth Canning, a young woman about nineteen years of age, that, in the beginning of the year 1755, having procured leave from a person with whom she lived as servant, to pass a day with her uncle at Saltpetre bank, she remained with him from eleven in the morning till nine at night; that, on her return, two lusty men in great coats met her near Bethlem Wall, Moorfields, violently assaulted, robbed her of a gown, apron, hat, and half-a-guinea in money, tied her hands behind her, and, on her struggling, gave her a violent blow on the temple, accompanied with oaths and execrations.

They then laid hands on her, one on each side, and dragged her with violence and abuse for some hours, part of which time, from fits, she was not sensible, till they arrived at the house of Susannah Wells, which she afterwards found was situated at Enfield Wash. On being forced by the two ruffians into the house, she was accosted by Mary Squires, who asked her, as if she would go their way? and if she would, that she should have fine clothes; words of which, at that time, she did not understand the import, though she replied No; but she afterwards conceived that it was nothing less than for her to submit to the odious life of a prostitute.

Elizabeth Canning further deposed, that, on her answering No, Mary Squires, with a long knife ripped up the lace of her stays, which she took from her, and, after many intimidating threats, pushed her into a back room, or hayloft, where she was confined for twenty-seven days, with no other sustenance than a slender pittance of bread, some water in a broken pitcher, and a small mixed-pie which she accidentally had in her pocket.

During the whole of the time, she declared that no human creature visited her; that, the bread and water being exhausted, she broke down a board, nailed on the inside of the window, through which she crept on a sort of pent-house, and then jumped on the ground, which, from her description, was nine or ten feet from the window.

Having quitted the house, she walked home as fast as her weak condition permitted; after so long an absence, it was natural to expect that her mother should be alarmed, by the squalid and diseased appearance of her daughter; and by her distressing account of the injurious treatment she had experienced.

A circumstance of this kind naturally excited the sympathy and resentment of the public, ever compassionately attentive to female injuries; a subscription was set on foot in favour of the young woman; Squires and Wells were taken into custody, under the most violent impressions of popular prejudice and indignation, tried at the Old Bailey, and sentence of death passed on the former.

But Sir Crisp Gascoyne perceived much contradiction in the evidence, and considered the description given by Canning of the room which she said was the place of her confinement, to be very different from the actual state and dimensions of the hayloft, in Wells's House; he was also startled by a principal witness in Canning's favour, Virtue Hall, wholly retracting her evidence, though she had positively sworn to the seeing Canning at Enfield Wash, and to a good part of the conversation said to have passed between that young woman and Squires, particularly to her ripping off the stays.

For these, and other reasons, this worthy, but at that time unpopular magistrate, presented a memorial to the king, mentioning the presumptive circumstances in favour of the old woman's innocence.

In consequence of this application, Mary Squires was respited for six weeks; the consideration of the matter was referred to the attorney and solicitor-generals, who reported, that the weight of evidence was in the convict's favour, and she ultimately received a free pardon.

If Squires was not guilty, it was impossible Canning could be innocent; her conduct, considering her years, must have been cruel and atrocious in the highest degree; combining at once the crimes of perjury and intended murder;—murder, too, of the most cruel, base, and premeditated kind, for the purpose of supporting a groundless prosecution for felony; under the colour of justice to take away the life of an innocent person, and to raise contributions on the public by a fabricated narrative.

For these, and other reasons, it was judged proper to apprehend her on a charge of wilful and corrupt perjury; she was arraigned at the bar of the Old Bailey, nearly twelve months after the trial of Mary Squires; and five days were occupied in examining a variety of witnesses, with a patience and a laborious search after truth, equally honourable to the judges on the bench, the counsel, and the jury.

It was observed, in Canning's defence, that her not flying from justice, during the long interval that elapsed between the trials, was a strong presumption of her innocence, since neither herself nor friends were bound by any recognizance.

To this it was answered, that one who had been able, for so long a time, by an artful story, to prejudice so many in her favour, and to receive such ample countenance and pecuniary support, and every prospect of evading justice by well dressed evidence, and the strong force of popular opinion; in which case, her triumph over truth would have been complete, her reputation as a species of martyr established, and her reward, in all probability, would have been splendid.

The previous and accurate description of a broken pitcher which was discovered in the room; and the hay-loft which, in some particulars, tallied with her account, though in many circumstances it failed, as she did not mention a jack-line and pulley, a broken casement over the chimney, and a chest of drawers, all of which were proved, by an accumulation of dust and cobwebs, to have been very long residents.

Yet, as the pitcher, and the description of the room and its contents, though not correct, prove some previous acquaintance with the loft, a reference to the evidence of one of Canning's witnesses (Robert Scarratt) helped to clear the mystery.

Incited by curiosity, and, according to his own account, unsolicited, Mr Scarratt had, though a perfect stranger, called at her mother's house soon after her return, and, in the course of his evidence, acknowledged having often, on former occasions, been at the house of Susannah Wells, a place not of the most creditable description, at Enfield Wash.

If we can suppose, for a moment, an iniquitous communication to have taken place between Elizabeth Canning and Robert Scarratt, whose evidence was by no means satisfactory, this difficulty vanishes, and the appearance of truth given to certain parts of the impostor's story, may be accounted for.

It was submitted to the court, that even if Squires could prove, by positive and circumstantial evidence, that she was in a distant part of the kingdom at the time laid in the indictment, it did not follow that Canning had maliciously perjured herself; it being as possible for a person to be deceived by a similitude of deformity, as well as of beauty; though the old gipsy, when the constable went with the warrant to apprehend her, said to Canning, on being charged with robbing her of her stays,—“Do you say I robbed you? Pray look at this face; if you have once seen it, it must be remembered, for I think God Almighty never made such another.”

When this part of the evidence was related, the eyes of every one present were earnestly fixed on Mary Squires, whose countenance exhibited an assemblage of features uncommon, and diabolically hideous; her portrait, as a curiosity, is preserved by some of the collectors.

The sufferings of Canning, and the evidently reduced state of her health, so much so as to be thought at first irrecoverable, were also mentioned, as convincing proofs of the truth of her allegations.

The man that hangs, or beats out brains,
The devil's in him if he feigns was quoted on this occasion; and it was asked if any person in their senses would bring themselves to the brink of death, to procure friends and contributions? Would the girl kill herself for the sake of a subscription?

The counsel in behalf of Canning strongly dwelt on the danger of allowing convictions for wilful and corrupt perjury, on the score of mere improbability of facts, which have been credited by twelve men on their oaths; he insisted that such proceedings tended to overturn the common and established forms of justice, and would at last intimidate individuals from bringing guilty persons to punishment, lest they themselves might afterwards be prosecuted.

[This doctrine was acknowledged by the court to be well worthy of attention, though in the present instance from the recantation of a principle witness, and for other important reasons, it was thought advisable to depart from a good general rule.]

On this occasion it was observed, that things seemingly impossible for human power to have performed, have been proved true, though no credit was allowed to them when first asserted; and declarations have been proved false, which had every appearance of credit and authenticity, and which at the time were thought the most unlikely to be attested, if not really true.

An improbable and unparalleled ride from London to York, in one day, on the same horse, prevented the conviction of a prisoner for a highway robbery, though he confessed himself guilty of it immediately after his acquittal.

William Harrison, a steward in the Gainsborough family, was also mentioned, who suddenly disappeared with a considerable sum of money in his charge, of which he was supposed to have been robbed and then murdered. The family were terrified and alarmed, and, after a certain time, as he said, by remorse, Edward Perry, a man residing near Camden, accused himself, the wife and sister of the absent man, of having murdered him; he added, that they had thrown the body into a certain pit in the neighbourhood, which was searched, but no body could be found; yet, as he persisted in his accusation, they were all three indicted, tried, and hanged. Harrison a few months afterwards returned, giving a particular and satisfactory account of his absence, equally shocked and perplexed by a sanguinary, but unaccountable depravity, which had thus exterminated his family.

The contradictory accounts of Canning were explained by her friends, as amounting to no more than this, that a general fact, compounded of a variety of things done and said at various places, when related on particular occasions, and at different times, had not always been told minutely and exactly the same way, a defect to which every long and complicated story must in some degree be liable.

Some allowance, they said, ought to be made for the aggravated feelings and expressions of a parent, who believed her daughter to have been treated in the manner described; and some to an injured female, under the impressions of fear, famine, an emaciated body and an agitated mind.

Several witnesses proved their having seen Mary Squires on or about the 16th, 17th, and 23rd of December, at Enfield Wash. She was observed, according to the evidence of one man, telling a person's fortune; another swore to her applying to him for leave to sleep in his barn; and a third, to her inquiring of him about a horse she had lost.

A physician and an apothecary proved the languid and reduced state of Elizabeth Canning, on her return to her mother's, and that she appeared like one who had suffered extreme hunger, thirst and cold; but they acknowledged, that a person might be as she was from other causes.

An attendant at the Stamford Hill turnpike, swore, that about the fore-end of January, but could not speak positively as to the day, he saw a girl, in company with two men, pass the gate, sobbing and crying; that they jostled her along, and used abusive language.

He described her as having a light coloured gown and apron, and that it was about eleven o'clock at night.

On this evidence it was observed that Canning could not be the woman who passed the turnpike, for she had sworn that her gown and apron were taken from her in Moorfields;—add to this, that the turnpike gate is four miles from Moorfields, and seven from Wells's House, and she swore, that she was brought to Wells's about four in the morning.

Thomas Bennett saw a miserable, poor wretch, in a ragged dirty condition, on the 29th of January, near Enfield Wash, on her way to London, and deposed, that she asked him the road. Two other witnesses swore to their meeting a girl, whom they verily believe to have been Elizabeth Canning, on the road between Enfield Wash and London, but described her as looking pale, though her hands and face were said, by herself and others, to be black and blue.

On the part of Mary Squires upwards of forty persons were called, to prove that she was upwards of 130 miles from Enfield Wash, in company with her son George, and her daughter Lucy, at the time she was accused of having committed the robbery.

On the 29th of December, according to the evidence of Mrs Hopkins, the landlady of a public house at South Perrott, in Dorsetshire, they all three lodged with her; and on the 30th they called at Winyard's Gap, an ale-house about a mile further, to take refreshment. At this last house, the frightful countenance of Squires, so remarkably attracted the notice of the daughter of the woman of the house, that she compared her to a picture of Mother Ship-ton, hanging in the room. Their appearance on the same day at Lytton, a village nine miles further on the road, was also proved by several witnesses; by James Hawkins, at whose house they slept two nights; by her son's being shaved there by Francis Gladman, and by their dining on a couple of boiled fowls; Mr Moreton observing, that this was a remarkable dinner for gipsies, George answered, that fowls at sixpence a-piece were cheaper than butcher's meat. At Abbotsbury, a small parish three miles from Lytton, they remained till Tuesday the 9th of January; were recognised by many persons, and had a dance at the house of John Gibbons, the sign of the Ship, at Abbotsbury, where William Clarke, a shoemaker, and the sweetheart of Lucy Squires, was her partner, and Melchisedech Arnold, a blacksmith, played the fiddle. John Ford, a carpenter, of Abbotsbury, saw them also on the 1st of January, shook hands with the old woman, kissed her daughter, and drank a pint of beer with George. From Abbotsbury, they were regularly traced through Portersham and Ridgway (where cash being scarce, they left a piece of nankin as a pledge for the reckoning) to Dorchester; at this place, in consequence of the excessive rains, the Fordington water was so high as to cover the causeway; the old woman and George were obliged to wade through it, but Lucy prevailed on a miller's boy to carry her behind him on horseback; to the repeated entreaties of Mary Squires that he should also take her on horseback, the little varlet replied that he "would have nothing to say or to do with such an ugly old b—h."

By a chain of credible and circumstantial evidence, they were proved to have passed through Chettle, Coombe, and Basingstoke, where Lucy, not being able to write, begged the landlady to send Clarke a few lines according to promise. The letter with the post-mark was produced in court. From Basingstoke they went to Bagshot, Brentford, Page's-green, Tottenham, and on the 24th of January took lodgings at Susannah Wells's, in Enfield Wash. On the 1st of February they were apprehended, and it was remarked that Canning immediately in coming into the room, exclaimed, pointing to Mary Squires, "That is the woman who robbed me of my stays," when it was impossible for her to see the old woman's face, from the peculiar position in which she sat. Canning had described the place of her confinement as square, dark, and little; but, on surveying the room, it measured 35 feet 3 inches by 9 feet 8; and it was far from dark, as well from the two windows, as from the light admitted between the pantries. She also said at first that she dropped from the window by a pent-house, when, on inspection, there was not a pent-house on the premises. A poor man, named Fortune Natus, proved that he and his wife slept in the room in which Canning swore she was confined, during the whole of that month, and for five or six weeks before. This part of the evidence was strongly corroborated by Ezra Whiffin, a neighbour of Susannah Wells, who, being in want of part of the work of a signboard, and hearing that she had a old one to dispose of, called to see it, and accompanied Wells into the very room in question to seek for it. They at last found it under some hay, which made part of the bed on which the wife of Natus was actually lying at the time Whiffin called, on the 18th of January. John Larney, Edward Allen, and Giles Knight, labourers, swore that they lopped several trees that grew near the window of the workshop or hayloft in question, on the 8th of January; and that, while they were employed in it, two women, Virtue Hall and Sarah Howick, appeared at the window and conversed with them for more than half an hour.

Had Canning been in the room she must have been seen, or might have called for help. She had sworn that no person of any description entered the garret or loft, during the whole of her confinement.

It was also remarked, that a night-gown and handkerchief, which she said she took to cover herself with, out of the room at Wells's, she claimed as her mother's before the Lord Mayor, and wished to take them, as well as the pitcher, into her possession. To the information before Mr Fielding she set her mark, as if unable to write her name, but afterwards wrote a fair legible hand.

After an examination of more than a hundred and twenty witnesses, the jury retired for fifteen minutes, and brought in a verdict—guilty of perjury, but not wilful and corrupt. This the recorder told them he could not receive, as they must either find her guilty of the whole indictment, or acquit her. After half an hour's consultation, they brought in a verdict—guilty of wilful and corrupt perjury.

In May, 1754, being called up to receive sentence, she addressed the court in the following words:—

"I hope your lordships will be favourable to me, for I had no intention of swearing the gipsy's life away; I am an unfortunate woman, and what I did was only in my own defence."

The recorder (Mr Moreton) then addressed her in the following words:—

"Elizabeth Canning,—You stand convicted on the clearest proof of wilful and corrupt perjury, a crime attended with the most fatal and dangerous consequences to the community, though as yet it is not punished with death."

"Your trial has taken up a great deal of time, and the several witnesses have undergone the strictest examination: I think I may venture to affirm, that there is not one unprejudiced person of the great numbers who have attended it, but must be convinced of the justice and impartiality of the verdict."

If I look back with horror on the evidence you gave at the trial of Mary Squires, whom you know to be destitute and friendless, and therefore you fixed upon her as a proper object to make a sacrifice of, at the expense of a false oath: this you preferred to the making a plain discovery to those who had the right to know where you really were those twenty-eight days of your pretended confinement in the house of Susannah Wells.

"In this imposture you were encouraged to persist by misapplied charity, and by the advice of your mistaken friends, whom you had deluded and deceived into a belief of the truth of what you had falsely sworn."

"This audacious attempt, and the calm deliberate assurance with which you formed a scheme to take away the life of one, though the most abject of the human species, together with your youth and the character you then had, as well as your seeming inexperience, imposed upon many, and gained you a credit which must have exceeded your highest expectation."

"Thus encouraged, you not only wickedly persevered, but even triumphed over those who would not suffer their judgments to be misled by so gross an imposition; but when people had a little recovered their senses, and this miraculous tale of yours came to be temperately canvassed, when your own original information was compared with the evidence you gave at the trial, and was found to vary in many material circumstances, a necessary inquiry was set on foot by a worthy magistrate, who presided in this court, which saved the life of Squires. These proceedings gave rise to the prosecution which has exposed the guilty, and ought to convince the doubtful; I hope this iniquitous conduct of yours will induce mankind not to suffer their conduct to get the better of their reason."

"It is not my wish to aggravate your guilt, or to increase that affliction which I hope you feel, but, as I attended both the trials, it may be expected that I should declare my opinion; I, therefore, in the most solemn manner affirm that I always thought your evidence false, and your witnesses grossly mistaken."

"The policy of foreign countries punishes this offence with death; but it is your happiness to have been born in a country whose code of laws are neither severe nor sanguinary; and the sentence I now pronounce is in no degree adequate to the nature of your offence. You shall be imprisoned in the jail of Newgate for one month; you shall then be transported to America for the term of seven years, and if in that period you return, or are found in any of his Majesty's dominions of Great Britain or Ireland, you shall suffer death."

Notwithstanding this decision, many people still insisted on the innocence of Canning; the newspapers and periodicals of that day are full of the subject: Henry Fielding exercised his pen in favour of, and Sir John Hill against the female impostor. In August, 1754, she was transported to New England, where she married advantageously, and one of her original supporters left her a legacy of five hundred pounds. Before her departure, not willing to lose that valuable prerogative of her sex, the last word, Canning published a declaration, which concludes in these words:—"I declare, in the most serious manner, that I am fully persuaded and well assured that Mary Squires was the person who robbed me, and that the house of Susannah Wells was the place in which I was confined twenty-eight days."

This article ought not to conclude without paying a tribute of praise to the humane zeal of Sir Crisp Gascoyne, the acute investigation of Mr Moreton, and the discriminating precision of Sergeant Dary.

—Linnæus's theory of medicine is amusing, if not instructive. He supposes the human body to consist of a cerebro-medullary (brain-marrowy) part, of which the nerves are processes; and a cortical (bark) part, including the vascular system and its fluids. The nervous system, which is the animated part, derives its nourishment from the finer fluids of the vascular system, and its energy from an electrical principle inhaled by the lungs. The circulating fluids are capable of being vitiated by acrescent putrid ferments, the former acting on the serum, and causing critical fevers; the latter on the crassamentum, and exciting phlogistic diseases. Eruptive ailments are excited by external causes, which he supposes to be animalcules. The cortical or vascular system, undergoing continual waste, requires continual reparation, which is effected by means of suitable diet. Its diseases arise from improper food, and are to be remedied by sapid (palatable) medicines; while those of the medullary system are cured by oild (nauseous) substances.—Lives of the Zoologists.

No. III.

"HOW D'YE DO?"—THE WEATHER—WHITE AND LIGHT-COLOURED GARMENTS—CLOTHING IN HOT CLIMATES—WASHERWOMEN, ETC.

THERE is an every-day common-place, which is very apt to jar upon the mind of a sensible person, and which is not leavened with even an atom of romance. It is the remark which in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred follows our very expressive salutation of "How d'ye do?"—and comes immediately in the rear of "Very well I thank e"—I mean the exclusive and important news which one party tells to another as to the state of the weather. The conversation which takes place between two acquaintances upon a casual encounter in the streets, or even in a house, is really one of the most intellectual, instructive, comprehensive, and sensible that can be imagined—"How d'ye do?" says A—. There is chemistry in this very exclamative question—Nay, start not, reader, I do not intend to drag you into the region of the acids and the alkalis, the metals and the gases. But verily there is chemistry in the salutation—inasmuch as it is a meaning clouded and hidden under a dark mode of expression—Chemio, the verb, to hide, is the supposed root of the word. The question is generally understood to refer to health, if it be in a good, or in a bad state. This is gathered from the answer, for B— either says, "Very well, I thank ye," or "Rather poorly," or "Tol-lol," or "So-so," or "Very unwell," or "Very ill." All these evidently refer to the health. "Rather poorly," has no reference to a poverty of worldly chattels or cash. "Tol-lol," does not mean that he is glorious or upstart. And "So-so," has no reference to the Schneider's trade. But, says Con, it is as reasonable to ask after a man's worldly affairs as his health. "How d'ye do?" is a very inclusive salutation, and is as perfectly applicable to health as to wealth. It means, how do your physical functions act, perform, or do, their office? How do your spirits agree with your animal state? and so on. How do you do? is applicable to all the circumstances of a man's life—his health and his wealth, his family and his friends—it is as comprehensive an expression as could be devised by any Solomon. Says Pro, I acknowledge that all that may be very fair, and very properly included, and taken into account by such a penetrating mind as yours; but, with every-day folk, the salutation has no more meaning than a sentence. And as to the Double-Dutch sentence that usually follows, telling a body what everybody in his senses is fully aware of—the state of the weather—I cannot imagine any defence for that. Were you addressing a hermit residing in a cave in a rock, to which light never penetrated, or a prisoner in a Bastille dungeon, it would be all very well, and very proper, and very novel, and very interesting to such an exclusive. But to tell a person what his sight, feeling, and perception must make him sensible of, evinces a degree of folly, which seems altogether out of character with the present advanced state of intellect.

Suppose you meet a friend muffled up in a thick Brighton beaver over-all, buttoned up to the chin as if he were afraid to lose a single particle of his natural caloric, or inspire a mouthful of the cold atmosphere, a boa round his neck, or handkerchief round his throat drawn up over his mouth, as if he feared inhaling a pestilential breeze; mayhap over his nose; or should that be left exposed, it looks for all the world as red as a Christmas holly-berry; his hands encased in thick fur gloves lined with lamb's-wool, the upper joint of his arms forming an angle of about thirty degrees from his side, and from thence let fall a perpendicular for the lower joints of his arms. He walks with his body and knees bent, as if he were carrying a heavy load—a chilly mortal—and a sudden severe frost has just set in; the very sun itself, the fountain of light and heat, is nipped with the cold till red in the face. Suppose you meet such a one, on such a day, trudging between a walk and a run to his domicile. You salute him (yourself being a hearty dread-no-weather, fig-for-the-cold kind of a fellow, that never touched flannel nor wore a great coat), "Ah! how d'y'e do? Cold day!" Pretty consolation, this for your chilly friend!—his teeth chatter out "Y—e—s;"—and afraid to give egress to another word, lest he should give ingress to a cold breath, he either stands shivering for your next question, or trudges on wishing you an ague for stopping him;—perhaps merely gives you a recognitory nod—a demi-cut—and forward with his shuffle. Then, again, suppose you meet a friend scampering along, walking as fast as if he feared the pavement would burn his toes, loaded with a carpet-bag, hurrying for fear he should be too late for the mail or the steam-boat—and his "too, too solid flesh melting and dissolving into a dew"—anything but a cool refreshing one—his hat shifted to the back of his head, and his vest merely confined with one button—he has not a hand to spare to move the perspiration from his face, both being engaged with his luggage,—the very sun, blazing above, seems to laugh at his agony, and to throw more piercing rays of heat to annoy him. You stop him with, "Ah! how d'y'e do? Hot day this! Eh?" His white inexpressibles look black at you, and his neckcloth wrinkles into a grin. He is too much knocked up to give you a verbal answer—he nods, and, accompanying it with something between a sigh and a groan, hurries on.

Though I have had the temerity thus to find fault with existing customs, I am not in such a presumptuous mood as to hazard any substitute. Perhaps you, Mr Editor, will favour us with your opinion upon the subject, and suggest some mode of salutation more consonant with the high pretensions at present made with regard to advancement in intellect, and disregard to prejudice. No doubt we shall be accused of intrenching upon vested interests, and with a desire to overturn the social customs of the country; but that should not deter us (excuse me if I include you contrary to your opinion, but, judging from your expressed sentiments on similar subjects, I take you to be on my side of the question) from doing our duty.

Talking of hot weather, I the other day met with a passage which seems to throw cold water upon another of our social customs—that of wearing light-coloured, and especially white garments during the hot months of summer; it was to the following effect: that the scorching effect on the skin which sometimes takes place by the sun's rays through semi-transparent cloth, as white linen, is prevented by the absorptive power of black cloth; and that the sun strikes through the transparent skin of a white, but is absorbed by that of a negro. If this be the case, why is it that white and light-coloured garments are in summer so much in vogue with the people of England? How is it that our fair countrywomen peril the beauty of their fair necks and bosoms by rendering them liable to be scorched and freckled by the rays of an envious sun, through the light gauze with which they are wont to veil their charms? One would have thought, too, that the kind of instructive wisdom given by nature to her children, which leads them to adopt the costume most applicable to their native climate, would have held good on this point: but are not all Eastern nations clothed in thin fabrics? We imagine the beauties of the fair Persian glowing through a garment of gauze, which the lightest gale of Zephyr would press to her faultless form, and, for a moment, give an impress of the charms beneath. Like Moore's Nora—

O my Nora's gown for me,
That floats as free as mountain breezes,
Leaving every beauty free
To sink or swell as Heaven pleases.

The Europeans in the Indies, too, clothe themselves in light cotton and nankin; the colonial planter is always represented in a white striped coat and trowsers, with broad brimmed white straw or chip hat, as are also the Americans. The negro is very fond of light and dazzling colours, such as yellow, pink, and such like; and especially does he delight to contrast his ebony skin with a pure white garment. This seems running quite foul of nature, which gave them a black skin to absorb the heat, instead of scorching and shrivelling it up, as it does the skin of the white who sojourns in a climate to which nature has not adapted him. When the sun is shining brightly on a pure white ground, it must be very injurious to the eyes; and the dazzling effect of the sun on the red coats of soldiers in British troops in hot countries, has often filled the hospitals with ophthalmic patients.

Notwithstanding all these disadvantages, it would be but a sorry change to convert the white summer frocks of our English girls and Scottish lasses into sombre black, or sad brown; nor would the beaux part with their "ducks" without a struggle. It would take the very cream from the gaiety of a holiday assemblage, and reflect a darker hue upon a collection of happy faces. It would, indeed, be a general mourning, if white garments and white curtains were expelled from the nation on the plea of expediency; and last, though not least, but by way of climax—what would our poor washerwomen do?

What is your opinion, reader, of a washerwoman? I do not mean, by washerwoman, such as keep large establishments—employ a dozen or twenty under-washers—have a covered waggon to send home, and call for the clothes, and who style themselves by the more euphonic name of "Laundress." Such an one would be quite offended if called a washerwoman—as much as a dust contractor at being called a dustman. A "Laundress" is a monopoliser—a "washerwoman" an operative. We may suppose the latter to have been a housemaid who has married a coachman—and she is now a widow, with a grown-up daughter. On her widowhood she has obtained the washing of her late mistress's family, and mayhap of her late husband's late master—this, with a shirt, a couple of neckcloths, and some pocket handkerchiefs of a bachelor or two, gives her pretty good employment. Her daughter is usually "at place," but when at home, helps her mother. Stray gowns, neckcloths, shirts, white inexpressibles, handkerchiefs, &c., are attracted to her wash-tub by a sign painted on a piece of wood, eighteen inches by twelve, or on an old lid of a fish-kittle, minus the rim—to the purport either of "WASHING TAKEN IN HERE," or, "GENTLEMEN DONE FOR." Her temper is proverbially rather sour, but a glass of comfort will soon mollify her. Her hands are usually clean, but seamed; and the points of her fingers something like a parched pea—the effects of soap, pearlash, and soda. Clad in a light figured cotton gown, a white apron, straw bonnet, with well-washed ribbons, you may meet her on a Saturday afternoon supporting one side of a basket, while her daughter, or a charity-boy to whom she has promised a halfpenny, carries the other, his end about a foot lower than hers, or else she has tied a handkerchief to her handle to accommodate their different heights. She is carrying home "the things." A great part of her earnings are spent on Sunday for a good dinner, to which she has always been accustomed. Monday is her holiday, on which she indulges with a gossip with her neighbours, or sisters of the suds.

But I must conclude; yet not without turning even from a washerwoman to poetry. In an old song, a mistress gives a lover three tasks, which she considers impossibilities; he answers her by proposing three in return—to make him a shirt without "stitches or needlework in it," and next—

Love, you must wash it in yonder well,
Lavender green, rosemary, and thyme,
Where never a drop of rain ever fell,
And then you will be a true lover of mine.

Considering the subjects of this paper, it is not with much propriety that I subscribe myself

THE WEEK.

From Wednesday the 10th to Tuesday the 16th December.

A THIRD PORTRAIT OF DECEMBER.

(From the Literary Pocket Book.)

It is now complete winter. The vapourish and cloudy atmosphere wraps us about with dimness and chilliness; the reptiles, and other creatures that sleep or hide during the cold weather, have all retired to their winter quarters; the farmer does little or nothing out of doors; the fields are too damp and miry to pass, except in sudden frosts, which begin to occur at the end of the month; and the trees look like skeletons of what they were—

"Bare ruined choirs in which the sweet birds sing."

The evergreen trees, with their beautiful cones, such as firs and pines, are now particularly observed and valued. In the warmer countries, where shade is more particularly desirable, their worth and beauty are more regularly appreciated. Virgil talks of the pine as being handsomest in gardens, and it is a great favourite with Theocritus, especially for the fine sound of the air under its kind of vaulted roof.

But we have flowers as well as leaves in winter time; besides a few of last month, there are the aconite and bellebore; two names of very different celebrity; and, in addition to some of the flowering shrubs, there is the Glastonbury thorn, which puts forth its beauty at Christmas. It is so called, we believe, because the Abbots of the famous monastery at that place first had it in their garden from abroad, and turned its seasonable efflorescence into a miracle.

The evergreens and winter flowers are like real friends, who, whatever be their peculiar disposition, whether serious or gay, will never forsake us. Even roses, with which we are so apt to associate summer weather, flourish from May to December inclusive; and during the winter months will live and prosper in apartments. We need never be without them from the first day of the year to the last; and thus, to the numerous comparisons made between roses and the fair sex, may be added this new one, as complimentary to their friendship as it is true.

We have anticipated our general observations upon winter time, and our remarks at the beginning of the year. December is in general too early a month for the fine manly exercise of skating, which, indeed, can be taken but rarely, on account of our changeable weather and the short continuance of frost. Like swimming, all the difficulty is in the commencement, at least, for the purposes of enjoyment. The graces of outside strokes and spread eagles are the work of time and ambition.

But December has one exercise in it which turns it into the merriest month of the year—Christmas. This is the holiday, which, for obvious reasons, may be said to have survived all others; but still it is not kept with anything like the vigour, perseverance, and elegance of our ancestors. They not only ran Christmas-day, New-year's-day, and Twelfth-night all into one, but kept the wassail-bowl floating the whole time, and earned their right to enjoy it by all sorts of active pastimes. The wassail-bowl, (as some of our readers may know by experience, for it has been a little revived of late) is a composition of spiced wine or ale, with roasted apples put into it, and sometimes eggs. They also adorned their houses with green boughs, which, it appears from Herrick, was a practice with many throughout the year,—box succeeding at Candlemas to the holly, bay, rosemary, and mistletoe of Christmas,—yew at Easter to box,—birch and flowers at Whitsuntide to yew,—and then bents and oaken boughs. The whole nation were in as happy a ferment at Christmas, with the warmth of exercise and their firesides, as they were in May with the new sunshine. The peasants nestled and sported on the town-green, and told tales of an evening; the gentry feasted them, or had music and other elegant pastimes; the court had the poetical and princely entertainment of masques, and all sung, danced, revelled, and enjoyed themselves, and so welcomed the new year like happy and grateful subjects of nature.

This is the way to turn winter to summer, and make the world what Heaven has enabled it to be; but, as people in general manage it, they might as well turn summer itself into winter. Hear what a poet says, who carries his own sunshine about with him:—

"As for those chilly orbs on the verge of creation,
Where sunshine and smiles must be equally rare,
Did they want a supply of cold hearts for that station,

Heaven knows we have plenty on earth we could spare.

Oh, think what a world we should have of it here,
If the haters of peace, of affection, and glee,
Were to fly up to Saturn's comfortless sphere,
And leave earth to such spirits as you, love, and me!"

Nor is it only on holidays that nature tells us to enjoy ourselves. If we were wise we should earn a reasonable portion of pleasure and enjoyment day by day, instead of resolving to do it some day or other, and seldom doing it at all. Company is not necessary for it, at intervals, except that best and most necessary company of one's family partners in life, or some one or two especial friends, really so called, who are friends for every sort of weather, winter as well as summer. A warm carpet and curtains, a sparkling fire, a book, a little music, a happy sympathy of talk, or a kind discussion, may then call to mind with unenvying placidity the very rarest luxuries of the summer time; and instead of being eternally and foolishly told that pleasures produce pains, by those who really make them do so, with their profligacy or bigotry, we shall learn the finer and manlier knowledge how to turn pain to the production of pleasure.

"Lawrence, of virtuous father, virtuous son,
Now that the fields are dank and ways are mire,
Where shall we sometimes meet, and by the fire
Help waste a sullen day, what may be won
From the hard season gaining? Time will run
On smoother, till Favonius re-inspire
The frozen earth, and clothe in fresh attire
The lily and rose, which neither sowed nor spun.
What neat repast shall feast us, light and choice
Of Attic, with wine, whence we may rise
To hear the lute well touched, or artful voice
Warble immortal notes and Tuscan air?
He who of these delights can judge, and spare
To interpose them oft, is not unwise."

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

XLVIII.—A LESSON TO VULGAR MISTAKE; OR FARCE ENDING IN TRAGEDY.

A BOOK has just appeared, intitled 'Recollections of the Eighteenth Century,' purporting to be written by the Marchioness de Créquy, an old lady of whom the startling fact is told us, that she had her hand kissed, when a child, by Louis the Fourteenth, and the same hand kissed, at the age of eighty-five, by Napoleon, when First Consul! We say that the book "purports" to be written by the Marchioness, because our lively neighbours have established a regular manufactory of pretended Biographies and Recollections, which are got up with such extraordinary tact and research, that it is often impossible to distinguish between a false book of the kind and a true. We must confess, that the present work, though it contains some piquant anecdotes, does not appear to us one of the best of its sort, whether true or false. The Marchioness is fairly "mad with aristocracy," and, instead of being the kind, elegant, and judicious personage described by the editor, and often to be found in her class of life, seems as if she had written on purpose to exhibit the class as consisting of little else but those who disgrace it, or a heap of vulgar spite, pretension, and absurdity; the book really looks as if some libellous revolutionist had composed it with that view. The following story is an exception, however, to its general character; and whether genuine as to the alleged parties, is too probable in other respects to be refused a place in our list. Such fatal absurdities, in various shapes, have too often occurred in real life.

There happened not far from Montvilliers (says Madame de Créquy) an event which I do not think useless to relate to you, were it only to warn you against some sorts of pastimes, to which persons of bad taste sometimes give themselves up in the country. I mean to speak of those sort of amusements which consist in playing tricks and in buffoonery.

Monsieur de Martainville, a young counsellor, at the parliament of Normandy, and newly married, had collected in his castle twenty persons, who were to pass the vacation there, and among the number there were several officers of the neighbouring garrisons. They bored holes in the walls and the ceiling to run through packthreads, which they had fastened to the curtains and coverlids. They dug holes in the ground and hid them with the grass, that they might trip up the horses and their riders, which must have been very agreeable to the horsemen. They put salt into your coffee, pepper into your snuff, colocynth juice at the edge of your tumbler, Burgundy peas into your shirts, and chopped horse-hair into your sheets. You may imagine that there were cray-fish and frogs in all the beds of the castle; for it is a fundamental idea in all provincial fun, and always, I have been told, the first thought which comes into the heads of these charming country wits. Others could never go and see the new married couple without their finding themselves assailed by all this vulgar fun and impertinent brutality, which made their castle a sort of receptacle for all the mischievous people in the neighbourhood. La Martainville expected at their house the widow of the intendant Alençon, who was called Madame Hérault de Séchelles, and who was going to the baths of Barge by very easy day's journeys; she had entreated permission to rest for some days at Martainville. It is right to tell you that she was recovering from an inflammation on the chest, that she had 60,000 francs a-year, and that the Martainvilles were her principal heirs. She was an old-fashioned woman, very delicate, tiresome, and susceptible to a degree. She was one of those genuine intendantes who are used to the adulation of a village, and who never take the trouble of taking up their cards at reverses; from whence the Cardinal Fleury always said to the young King, who played without ever thinking of it, "Madame l'Intendante, it is your turn to take up the cards."

"Ah now," said De Martainville to the harpies then around him, "do not play tricks during the stay of our aunt de Séchelles. Be very prudent and very serious, gentlemen and ladies; do not forget she is my relation with a succession." They had removed I do not know what president's lady, that they might prepare the best apartment for this illustrious invalid. They had placed in the chamber that they had allotted for her, all the most convenient furniture, as well as all the china and the rarest Dresden porcelain of the house. They had taken care to keep hot and dressed to a turn, a large boiled chicken, with pigeons stewed with barley, and quails with lettuces, without reckoning the fresh eggs in cold water and the Alicant wine in hot water: in short, the kitchen and the servants had remained under arms for more than a week, and yet Madame did not arrive! They began to be uneasy at it in the family, and the rest of the company to be out of patience. It is to be told also that the master of the house had never seen this aunt of his wife, and that she had not seen her old relation since she was five or six years old, which gave rise to the idea of playing a trick.

There was among this facetious band, a little Mons. de Clermont d'Amboise, who wished some years afterwards to marry me, but the gratitude I owe him cannot prevent me from telling you he was a nasty-looking, little, yellow, sneaking wretch. They thought of disguising him as an old lady; another officer was to be dressed as a lady's maid; and, above all things, they had taken care to conceal the preparations for these disguises, which were only to be known to three or four people—but which were divulged by a waiting woman to a spark of the society. They planned trick upon trick, and they concluded to mystify the mystifiers. Therefore, while they were on tenter-hooks to receive them, and bowing and cringing in the best manner, arrived the real intendante, on whom they precipitated themselves like an avalanche; they tore off her furbelowed gown, her starched frill, her mob cap, her wig; in short, they maltreated her so cruelly that it is horrible to think of! The unfortunate woman was so mortally terrified, that she could neither cry, nor utter a single word—but in what she heard there were perfidious revelations:—

"Greedy ostrich, tiresome intendante—old aunt with a succession. Ah! you wish to go to the baths to tire out your heirs. Here are mineral waters, there are shower baths." And it was blows and buckets of water which came over her whole body, in the midst of the most frightful noise and confusion.

After a quarter of an hour of such ducking, and of the worst treatment (she had sunk under the blows and lay senseless on the ground), they perceived that she gave no sign of life. They brought a light; they did not know the little de Clermont, and the result of the investigation was, that the poor woman was almost dead. Every one fled from the castle except her relations, who tore their hair, and whom she could not face without a sentiment of terror and profound horror. She died of it the third day; and as she had never made any testamentary bequests, it was found that her property naturally fell to the Martainvilles, which compromised them so much in the public opinion, and before their brethren of the robe, that they made a judicial disposition on this abominable mistake, and that Monsieur de Martainville saw himself obliged to give up his profession. As he was very honourable and his wife was delicacy itself, they would not touch any part of the succession of Madame de Séchelles, which they gave up to their collaterals. They some time after sold their fine manor of Martainville, and they even quitted the name for that of their barony of Francheville, which their family still bears. Madame de Maintenance has said that good taste always supposes good sense, and that is the moral of this anecdote.

— The Countess Colonne and Madame Mazarine, on their way through Arles, went and paid a visit to Madame de Seigné, with each a casket of jewels, but in foul linen. This lady sent each of them, in the evening, a dozen of shifts, with a jocular billet, beginning thus: "My dears, you are like the heroines in romances: jewels in abundance, but scarce a shift to their backs."

A SORROWFUL STORY.

[THIS 'Sorrowful Story,' which is from the 'New Year's Gift for 1835,' edited by Mrs Alaric Watts, deserves rather to be called a delightful story for the true virtue of its moral.]

Uncles and Aunts are very delightful people, as every child knows, most particularly on a birth-day, on which occasion they are scarcely to be found empty handed. Little Nina Musgrove, then, was a fortunate child, for she had nine of these relations besides three great aunts, who lived in a fine old-fashioned house up many steps, in a beautiful garden, with a pond full of gold fish, and rose-beds that could be almost smelt a mile off. Nina, too, was an only child—and, what was strange, with so many uncles and aunts, had no cousins; so that when the thirty-first of June came round, there was no little girl in England received so many presents as she did: such books from her uncles, William and George, in London—such dainty little work-boxes from her aunts—such toys in boxes that I do not pretend to name—such sumptuous dolls from the three Misses Fortescue, one with a powdered head, like its giver, in a sacque of old-fashioned damask, such as she used to wear. I could fill this sheet, and not tell of half the gifts which came to Nina, so I will pass by all save one,—the only gift of her "Uncle Captain," as she used to call him; but then he had brought it from the Brazils on purpose for her—and this was neither more nor less than a grey parrot.

But, then, such a parrot had never been seen in or about Ridsden before. Polly was not one of your sulky birds that prate a word or two, and either deafen you with repeating these again and again, or vex you with being stupid all day. She could talk finely, and said such strange things that it was hard to believe that it was only a bird that was talking. When she heard the baker's knock, she would cry, "Walk in, Mr Toast," without being bidden. She knew the names of every one in the family, and used to bid them good morning as a civil bird should; she could sing "I'd be a Butterfly," though sometimes that long word puzzled her; and she would then cry, "How droll!" and try again; and what Nina like better than all, could cry, "Captain, come home;" and whistle, "Hearts of Oak," and "God save the King," as well as any sailor on board the good ship Amphitrite, in which she came over.

It was no wonder that, with all these accomplishments Polly was a favourite on her own account, as well as for the sake of Nina's kind uncle. She was lodged in a lordly cage with gilt wires, and her house was duly and carefully cleaned. Her food was the daintiest; and as she could call for most things she liked, her dinner was principally of her own choosing. She was also often indulged in being hung in a corner of a pleasant court-yard, among the branches of an old vine which ran up against the house; and as there was always something going on, carts coming in or setting off, the sound of the flail in the barn, the postman with his horn, the travelling fishmonger with his ass and a bell at its collar, she was never in want of amusement; and, being a bird of observation as well as fond of company, she picked up many odd sayings and strange sounds, which she was heard practising over to herself at duller times of the day. Every one in the house liked Polly; she was cheerful and fearless, and was never guilty of biting anyone, as I have known worse tempered parrots do, and that most severely.

It was on a certain brilliant July day that Polly was taken in her gilt cage, and hung up in the "vine corner," as Nina used to call it; while that little maiden went to pay her great aunts a visit. A merry afternoon she had in their old garden, for they had invited several other children to play with her; and they swung, and told stories, and slid down the side of a hay-stack, and played at hide and seek in the large cool barn, till the little girl was quite tired, and not sorry when old Bartholomew, the butler, made his appearance to bring her home. But tired as she was, she did not forget her feathered favourite; and no sooner had she delivered her aunt's long message, than she ran hastily into the courtyard, calling out, "My poor Polly, I hope they have not forgotten to give you your dinner;" but, alas! no chirup came from the cage, no "Walk in, Miss Nina;"—she came nearer and nearer, and, oh grief, oh grief!—the door was open, and the bird gone.

Nina was not a weeper on common occasions, but she set up such a shriek when she perceived the loss of her favourite, as reached the ears of a company in the dining-room, who all got up hastily from their dessert and ran out to see what could be the matter. Poor Nina could not speak; she could only point to the empty cage and weep the more; for if she had loved one plaything above another, if she had valued one treasure above another, it had been poor Polly; and now that she was really gone, and for ever, the family shared her distress. Her mother took her upon her knee and told her she hoped her favourite would be found, her father forgot a fit of rheumatism, and put on his hat to go out and inquire if the run-away had been seen up the village; the gardener was called out of the hothouse, the footman excused from carrying up coffee, the haymakers disturbed over their supper; everything possible was done to try to recover the lost treasure of the bereaved little girl.

At length, when every one was becoming almost hopeless, and, in fact, it was growing dusk, the housekeeper, Mrs Brockley, the most puzzle-headed of all puzzle-headed women, stood stock still suddenly, as she was used to do when anything struck her, and cried out, "Dear me, why that little beggar-boy, Gilbert Rock, was here this afternoon; he may have taken the bird; I should not much wonder if he has."

"And why could you not remember that before, Mrs Brockley?" said her master: "I went up past the Cross, nearly as far as old Abby Rock's cottage, and would have gone in; let some one go immediately—one of the labourers—and she will not suspect his errand; nothing is more likely. Nina, you had no business to hang the cage in the court-yard; I always said something of this kind would happen." Poor Nina wept the more for her father's speech, for she knew he had warned her that there might be danger to her bird in so public a place as her favourite vine corner; and she knew also that if Gilbert Rock had carried away her treasure, there was little chance of her ever beholding it again. These Rocks had a bad name in the village, and had been accused, or at least suspected, of not a few small thefts. There were people too, who said that this Gilbert was not the boy who had always been with old Abby, for that, when she first came to Ridsden, the boy she used to call her son had red cheeks and curly hair, and bold blue eyes of his own; whereas this was dwarfed and puny, with rusty black hair, and staring set eyes and hollow cheeks, which had made some of the village flout him by calling him "Little Scull." How the old woman lived was a mystery to every one: a few withered apples or clay-coloured pasties did appear in the window of her hovel, it is true; but they were so seldom changed that much profit could not possibly accrue from them. Little Gilbert, too, was never seen doing anything, save lounging about in other people's farm-yards; and that day he had come up to the Musgroves for an old livery jacket, which Nina's mother, who compassionated his wretched and starved appearance, had promised him; though, as Mrs Brockley said, she might have spared herself the trouble, as old Abby was not the thrifty woman to turn it to any account, and, as it was, it would hang about the child's heels.

To the house of these suspected individuals, one of the haymakers was sent in quest of Miss's bird. Nina would have gone with him if she had been permitted, though it was now so dark that she could see nothing when she looked out, and never rested a moment while he was away: she thought he would never come back, and her mother had no little trouble to keep her impatience within any bounds. At last steps were heard in the stone hall; she sprang off her father's knee, running as fast as her feet could carry her, and crying out aloud—"Oh Simon, Simon, have you found her?"

"No, Miss," replied the man, very slowly, "but I ha' brought you her feathers, and the thief that stole her away."

Poor Nina heard no more—this termination to Simon's search she had never expected, even in her moments of most miserable fear: and by this time the inhabitants of the house were thronging round old Simon, listening, as well as her sobs would permit, to his tale—how he had found the floor of Abby Rock's cottage all strewn with the feathers, and the head under the dresser; and heard the old woman say to Gilbert (for he listened at the door a moment or two before he went in), "Thou dolt, not to bring her alive—who bade thee twist her neck round, I wonder?"—He had seized the culprit on the spot, and brought him to Mr Musgrove, who was a magistrate.

Candles were brought, and a full light thrown upon the group. The unfortunate little thief was now as doggedly still as he had struggled all the way, and the Justice thought he had never beheld a more hardened, unchild-like countenance. Heedless of Nina's cries, "I hope he will be hanged, papa," in which she seemed to find comfort, he took the culprit by the shoulder, and led him to his own study and shut the door. Presently he called for Mrs Musgrove, who returned in an instant to desire that Miss Nina might be taken to bed, as it was an hour later than her usual time, and after giving her a kiss disappeared again. There was nothing more to be heard that night it was plain, and Nina, compelled to submit, cried herself to sleep presently, and, by good luck, did not dream of her loss.

Breakfast-time came the next morning, and Nina waited eagerly till her father should come down stairs, for, though she had ceased to weep, the thought of her murdered favourite occupied her intently; and when Mr Musgrove entered the parlour, she ran into his arms, almost forgetting her morning kiss, crying—"Well, Papa, what have you done with the little thief? I hope he will be hanged!"

Nina's father put her down quietly, and gravely added—"Do not go away, my love; I want to talk to you—you cannot know what you are saying, I think; and he sat down and took her on his knee, still very serious."

"I do not wonder," continued he, "that you are sorry to have lost your favourite bird, your kind uncle's present, in so miserable a way; but to wish this wretched little boy hanged, even for such a fault, grieves me not a little."

Nina made no answer; for, as the door opened, some creaking sound in the hall made her almost fancy that she heard the well known "Good morning, Beauty—good morning, Miss Nina."

"You do not answer me, my dear," said her father. Suppose this little boy were your brother (you have often wished for a brother), and he had stolen any other little girl's bird, would you wish to have him hanged then?"

"O, papa, but to steal! Nobody—I mean—that is—nobody steal but poor people."

"And why is that, Nina? Do you think that rich and poor are not the same flesh and blood? We have taught you differently from that, my child."

"O, no, papa."

"Well, then, is it not because the poor have more temptation, and are not so well taught their duty?"

Nina made no answer, for she was thinking how hard it was that any one should steal her bird.

"I will tell you a little story to show you that rich children steal sometimes," continued her father; "a story of myself."

"O, papa, did you ever steal?" exclaimed the little girl quickly.

"You shall hear; I do not know that ever any little boy had such presents made him as I had—a great many, too many I fear; for at last I ceased to care for any they could give me; and I can well believe the story of the young Dauphin, who was dissatisfied all his birth-day because he was not allowed to go and play in the mud under the window."

"O, what was that story, papa? Pray tell me."

"Another time, my love—I remember having many such unaccountable fancies myself—one, in particular, I had for a piece of red leather that hung in a shoemaker's window."

"A piece of red leather! O, what for?" said Nina. "I cannot tell you now, but so it was. I told my father I wished for it, and he said if I could give him any good reason for wanting it, he would buy it for me. Well, I had nothing to say which satisfied him, so I was forced to get without; but this did not satisfy me. I had set my heart on a piece of red leather, and was resolved to have it."

"And what did you do, papa?"

"I am going to tell you. It happened, about two days after this, that I heard my father order the footman to call at Wicksted's, and to inquire why he had not sent home his new boots, and to bring them if they were done. Well, this was the very shop where I had seen the red leather in the window, and I was so foolish that I asked to go with James. My father gave leave—my uncle, who had heard of my fancy (I thought he might have gratified it), laughed, and said—'Are you going to order a pair of red leather shoes for yourself, George, and turn a little girl?' I was much affronted at this, but off we set."

"Well, it never occurred to me till we came within sight of the shop, that I had no money, and it was as much as a servant's place was worth in our house, if it was found out that they had lent us any. So, to make a long tale short, I did as many a thousand more have done, who are resolved to obtain what they have no means of obtaining honestly—I watched a lucky moment when old Wicksted's back was turned, seized the piece I had taken such a fancy to, thrust it into my pocket unperceived, and for a moment was content: but only for a moment, for now that I had got it, I durst show it to nobody, or make any use of it, lest I should be found out; and all the way home I well remember contriving how and where I was to hide it, and beginning to wish with all my heart that I had not done anything so wicked. I was wretchedly afraid of being in the parlour with my father, I knew not why; and still, when I was out of the room was no less afraid lest he should suspect that I had done something that made me unwilling to be near him. My love, when you grow older, you will understand that this is what is called conscience."

"But I was not careful enough, or rather too careful, for I remember well, by the agony it gave me, my uncle crying out suddenly—'Why, the lad has been after the red leather after all—stolen a bit, and has brought it home in his pocket, I declare!'"

"There was no need to ask me any more questions, I am quite sure my guilty face told what I had done, and I stood, when it was fairly understood, trembling and wretched—I hardly think that now, if I were going to be hanged, I could suffer more."

"My father always spoke most quietly, when most seriously displeased, and addressed me so gently, I expected—but nothing half so bad as what really happened. He was very sorry, he said, that his son should become a thief, and, that I might make all the reparation I could for my offence, I was to take the piece of red leather back (Oh, I hated it then!) to Wicksted, explain how I had come by it, and ask his pardon."

"Poor papa! and did you do this?"

"Yes; and my father took me himself, and made me carry it in my hand all the way. Oh, I shall never forget that day! A glorious afternoon in August it was; and how I thought every one must know what I had done, and looked at me. I would have given anything I had—everything, to have escaped, especially as we drew near the door: I grew first hot and then cold. 'Is Mr Wicksted within?' said my father in a firm voice; 'my little boy wants to speak with him.' I thought almost I must die, when—why, Nina, look up; do not cry."

But it was too late to prevent it—the child was already in tears.

"Well, my love, I have done—I only told you this to show you that it is not the poor alone who do wrong, though their temptations to some kinds of sin, the sin of theft in particular, are ten times more than that of the rich. You see I must go and steal merely from a fancy: there is many a little beggar boy and girl that is beaten by harsh parents, if they come home empty-handed, and they know this. Now this poor Gilbert Rock, I have taken means to ascertain was cruelly used by his mother, and as she makes a livelihood partly by supplying feather-workers—I see you guess what I am going to say—compare him with your own papa when he stole the red leather, and then tell me whether you wish him to be hanged."

My young readers need not be told that poor Nina's wrath was fully appeased, and that though she could not help mourning the loss of her bird, she never again breathed a word of reproach to the author of her calamity.

The old woman, Abigail Rock, well knowing that, after this affair should become public, her "occupation would be gone," prepared to decamp to a distant part of the country; and Mr Musgrove, compassionating the condition of the child of such a mother, agreed, on her departure, to place him under the charge of one of his grooms, as stable-boy, and thus give him a chance of redeeming his character. The plan fully answered: under proper training the lad became not only a good, but a faithful servant; and is at the head of the stable department in the Musgrove family at the present day.

GHOST STORIES.

[CHRISTMAS used always to have its Ghost-stories.

We give a few now, though they are of a somewhat different complexion from what they used to be. They are taken from 'Tough Yarns, a Series of Naval Tales and Sketches,' just published, enriched with the (in every sense of the word) living pencil of George Cruikshank.]

Glen. I can call spirits from the vasty deep:

Hets. Why, so can I; or so can any man;

But will they come, when you do call for them?

King Henry IV.

I wish my young readers had been acquainted with my worthy and excellent father, for he cared not a snap of the finger for ghosts and hobgoblins, and he would actually walk through a churchyard at midnight without feeling the smallest particle of fear. Now, it may be supposed that his children (of whom I was the third) were naturally as courageous as their father; but, from certain circumstances this was not the case. For whilst my worthy sire would have bidden defiance to a whole army of apparitions, myself and my brothers (there were five of us) would tremble at every noise after dusk, and, when we were in bed, bury our faces in the blankets lest something alarming should appear; nay more, not one of us would remain a moment in the dark without screaming, even if persons were in the same room; or be left alone in any place, though it was broad daylight and the sun shining in all its splendour.

I have said that my father was courageous; but then what ghost would have dared to attack him or have ventured to appear in his presence? He had fought many battles; he had braved the wind, and the storm, and the howling tempest; he had undauntedly looked death in the face, and the unrelenting tyrant had plundered him on every possible occasion, in his violent efforts to carry him off altogether. Thus the brave man had, at different times, lost an eye, and an arm, the calf of his right leg, and sundry slices and cuttings from various parts of his really handsome person; so that a thought of frightening him never could have entered the mind of any supernatural being,—at least, of any rational one. This was the opinion of us boys respecting our father,—but as to ourselves it was quite another thing. We were children, and ghosts might rub their cold nose against our faces in the night, or start up out of the ground to terrify us during the day with impunity; for that there were such things as ghosts, it would have been impossible to entertain a moment's doubt, having, as we certainly had, the undisputed authority of Susan the housemaid, backed by the matter-of-fact accounts of Jane the cook, and the whole fully authenticated by old nurse, who declared that she had actually seen a spirit; but I suspect it was at a time when spirits were pretty plentiful with her.

My parents were much out in company, and then the evenings were employed in telling the most horrible tales of murders, of sudden deaths, and of those who shortened their brief span of life, on account of disappointments in love. Oh! how often has a cold sick shuddering come upon my young heart at pictures of the diabolical cruelties of human nature, when "man became a wolf to man!" and how has terror shaken every joint in my childish frame, to hear of the restless spirit of the murdered, clothed in corporeal semblance, escaping from its cold prison-house to haunt the guilty slayer! How frequently have the tears trickled down my pale face at the hapless adventures of blighted affections! and many a time did my infantile imagination follow the retributive form that constantly haunted the wretch who had broken the vow of fidelity and truth! Nor was there wanting a good sprinkle of accurate stories about highwaymen and housebreakers, gentlemen thieves for whom young maids wept when they considered them deserving a better fate.

The house we lived in was a very ancient but strong building, and exactly the sort of place to excite superstitious feelings,—in fact, a sort of ghostery. There were some strange tales told about it; and the unaccountable noises in the chimneys which frightened the birds that built their nests there, and the hollow murmuring sounds that proceeded, particularly in windy weather, from behind the old oak panels of the rooms, all conspired to do that which my parents had little idea of, namely, to unnerve the system, and weaken the intellect.

Still I was no coward, for I would always defend myself against any boy of my size, and was ready to undertake the usual hazardous enterprises of children; but a subtle poison was working within which bade fair to render the mind imbecile, and to undermine the constitution. My parents became sensible of our altered condition, and, when it was almost beyond redemption, were made acquainted with the cause. My father, in his usual blunt manner, made use of a strong argument against ghosts. "Boys," said he, "you are a pack of fools: remember this, that those who are gone to Heaven are too happy to quit; and those who are gone to a place of torment the devil won't part with, even for a moment." Of course, a change took place among the servants, who were blamed for instilling pernicious principles into our minds, but which they could not have done had my parents used a little more watchfulness to guard against it.

I was destined for the sea, and at an early age to sea I went. But though I had risen superior to many apprehensions which once tortured me, yet there were times when I could not intirely conquer former weaknesses; and a few weeks after the frigate to which I belonged had left Plymouth, on a three month's cruise, one of the quarter-masters, of the name of Buckley, died, and, as is the usual custom, the body was sewed up in a hammock preparatory to interment. The poor fellow had expired late in the afternoon, and the committal of the corpse to the deep was to take place the following morning. Now Buckley had shown me a great deal of kindness, and taught me to knot and splice, and other parts of a seaman's duty; besides, he had always slept at no great distance from me, and both of us were in the same watch; yet I could not subdue the horror I felt in my breast, at the thoughts of passing the night near the cockpit where I supposed the dead man to be laid. I dared not mention a word of this to my messmates, lest it should have ruined my character for ever; and as I was to take the morning watch, I went early to my hammock, but not to sleep. The close proximity to the corpse excited the most sickening sensations, which I found it impossible to get rid of; horrible phantoms floated before my imagination; and if weary nature exerted her prerogative and sank into repose for a moment, I started with dread lest the cold hand of the old man should be pressed heavily on my heart. At length my mind was harrowed up beyond human endurance; the watch below had turned in: there was no light except the glimmering in the lantern of the sentry, and he sat dozing at his post. I thought I could see the spot where the corpse was extended, and faintly discern the outline of his form. To remain longer was impossible; the bell struck four, and slipping on my jacket and trousers, over which I hastily wrapped my watch-coat, but ashamed to be seen, I crept into the launch, which was between the booms, and finding a hammock, which I supposed to have been negligently left there by one of the seamen, I laid myself down upon it, and pulling over myself an old sail with which it had been covered, I was soon in a deep and refreshing slumber.

* Ten o'clock at night.

The corpse was to be committed to the deep whilst all hands were on deck, during the relief of the watch, at four o'clock in the morning; and exactly at that moment I was awake by some one shaking me rather roughly by the shoulder. In an instant I sprang up; horrid recollections rushed upon me: it was broad day-light; many eyes were staring at me, some with astonishment, others with mirth; but, oh! how can I describe the terrible thrill that ran through every vein, when, on looking at the hammock which had served me for a bed, I discovered that I had, through the whole of the night been sleeping with the dead man for my companion, the body having been removed to the launch late in the preceding evening! I could not speak; I could not shriek; but I burst into an hysterical fit of laughter, and that saved me; for the spectators, not knowing what was passing in my mind, took it for bravado. Many were the jokes respecting my attachment to old Buckley, and thus I was severely punished for my folly.

Two years passed away, during which I had occasional returns of terror and alarm, arising from my dread of non-existents, though I had been in two or three engagements, and gained some applause for my conduct. The frigate I had first joined had been laid up as unserviceable, and I was now in a beautiful eighteen-gun brig-sloop on the South American station. The tale of old Buckley was no longer the subject of amusement to others and torture to me, for the circumstance was unknown to my new messmates; and I entertained hopes, that in the course of time, I should be enabled to overcome the feelings which but too frequently oppressed me.

The sloop was attached to the expedition intended to subjugate (for any other design was futile) the city of Monte Video, in the river Plata; and, with several other vessels, we were employed to capture the island of Gorretta, in Meldonado Bay. There were three strong batteries, with long twenty-four and thirty-two pounders mounted; and these batteries were well manned with Spaniards; but they were compelled to yield to the intrepidity of our brave tars after a severe slaughter, considering the comparatively small number of men engaged. After the conflict, small parties were posted in various places round the island, to prevent a surprise, whilst the main body, with the commanding officer, occupied a large building in the centre.

Midnight came,—a dark, dreary, cold, starless midnight; and I was ordered to visit all the out-posts to see that the sentinels were alert upon their duty. The dead bodies of those who had fallen in battle remained unburied. I had looked upon many a bleeding and mangled form during the day; I had seen many a poor wretch writhing in the last pang of mortal agony; I had gazed with a sort of desperate wildness on the convulsive contortions which expiring nature had left upon the countenance; and now, in the stillness and solitude of night, to traverse the spot where they lay in promiscuous heaps as they had fallen,—my very soul was harrowed up! I would not disobey, and I did not dare to ask for assistance, lest my secret should transpire.

Alone then I departed, every nerve agitated with the commotion that shook my trembling frame. Alone I took my way to the nearest out-post, often starting aside as some stiffened corpse lay stretched across my path. The hollow moaning of the waves breaking against the rugged rocks came with a fearful sound upon the wind, which rushed past in hurried gusts, and now and then a half-stifled groan burst from some poor creature who yet survived the carnage, and was recovering sensibility. I had reached about half-way to my first place of destination, when my faculties became in a great measure paralyzed, on hearing something behind which emitted a strange and unnatural noise. I determined to face it, and turned round for that purpose. The atmosphere was dense and hazy, enveloping the earth in darkness; but, amidst the gloom, a most horrible figure kept rising up to more than mortal height, and then again sinking to scarcely half the stature of a man; two immense projections issued from its hideously-formed head, and a pair of burning eyes glared with vengeful fierceness upon me. All my old feelings returned; 'dismay crept upon my spirit, and, making one desperate effort, I ran with amazing rapidity from this terrific object. But, alas! I had not run far when I stumbled over a dead body, and fell in the midst of several others. I stretched out my hands to assist me in rising, and they rested upon the cold clammy face of a corpse! Once more upon my feet, I looked round; the monster was close to me, rising and falling as it had done before, and again I bounded away without knowing whither. A building presented itself, which I hoped was one of the out-posts, and hastily entering it, I fell about twenty feet into a space below, but sustained no bodily injury, as the floor was covered with piles of seal-skins. Here, in thick darkness and insensibility, I lay for several hours, when I was accidentally discovered by a party who had clandestinely left the main body to seek for plunder, and were attracted to the spot by seeing an enormous he-goat near the entrance to the building. By the light of the lantern which they carried I was readily recognized, and soon rescued from my uncomfortable situation. The fresh air and human voices speedily restored me to animation, and almost the first thing I saw, quietly standing amid the group of seamen, was the innocent cause of my alarm and misfortune, the great he-goat! My fall was attributed to accident; and, attended by the party, I visited the out-posts, and made my report to the commanding officer. The account of my adventure soon spread, but the occurrence was attributed to anything but the real cause, as the different tale-tellers had each a story of his own to magnify my intrepidity; and thus my weakness not only again escaped detection, but I actually obtained approbation of my courage. From that hour my determination became more and more strengthened to resist the puellianimity which, in spite of every effort, would at times attack me.

I was next employed in the capture of Monte Video, or rather the city of San Philip, which is its proper name—Monte Video being a lofty mountain on one promontory of a deep bay, as the city of San Philip stands on the extreme point of the other promontory. After the city was taken, I was stationed at night on the flat roof of a house which communicated with several others; having received orders to be very vigilant, and in case of anything material occurring to forward immediate information to the officer in command of the party, who was to dispatch the intelligence to head-quarters. The post was one of extreme importance, and had been intrusted to me on account of my apparent fearlessness. I overlooked the gates leading to the shores of the bay, which, though in our possession, were frequently visited by guerilla bands, who secretly dealt death to the incautious sentinels. I had been about one hour on the look out, and had suppressed the rising sensations of terror which had more than once attacked me; when, to my great surprise, a large empty earthen-ware crate, that stood in the corner of the next flat, began to move slowly along the roof. I had been leaning over the parapet of the house with my back towards the crate, but the slight rustling made by the movement caused me to glance over my shoulder without appearing to turn my head. The motion ceased; but I could not doubt the fact, for the crate was not in the situation where I had first seen it. I still remained in my position without stirring, but kept my eyes directed by a side-long glance towards the object. Again it moved, but so slowly and noiselessly that, by a person possessing a mind of any other stamp than mine, it would have passed unheeded, and consequently unheeded. In vain I struggled to repress my emotion—trembling imbecility was rapidly creeping upon my system—all my former terrors were reviving, when, at that moment, the devices of the guerillas recurred to my recollection, and cocking the lock of a pistol, I stood in perfect readiness. Again the crate moved, so as to get more into my rear; but a picket-guard passing through the street below, I called to the officer, and instantly sprang over the breast-work that divided the two roofs, and ran to that part which was most likely to cut off a retreat, if the crate had been moved by human agency—of which, I confess, I entertained strong doubts. These, however, were soon dispelled, for I had scarcely reached my station, when the crate was thrown up, and the tall gaunt figure of a guerilla was for an instant seen against the dim light of the sky. But it was only for an instant; our pistols seemed to be discharged at the same moment of time. I heard his ball whistle by my ears, and it left a tingling sensation that indicated how very close it had passed to my head; the smoke hindered me from seeing more, but I felt the sharp point of a knife graze down my breast,—I heard a heavy fall into the street below,—a fire of musketry succeeded;—then followed a wild shriek, and the guerilla was a corpse. His knife had been intended for my heart; but a backward step on my part saved me; the skin was slightly scratched, and the instrument remained in my coat without doing further injury.

In what manner the desperado had gained the roof I could not then divine, and I felt certain that he was not under the crate on my first taking the post, as I had carefully examined it. I had afterwards an opportunity of witnessing the mode by which he had accomplished it, and it was simply through the efforts of a number of men, who were raised up successively on each other's shoulders. His design was assassination and plunder. For my share in this transaction, I obtained the approval of Sir Horne Popham, and was raised in temporary rank.

The next trial of my nervous system was at Sierra Leone. I was then in a frigate, and as fears were entertained that the French were about to make a descent upon some part of the encampment (a French squadron having been seen hovering off the coast), the free negroes were armed and enrolled as volunteers. To effect this, at a village about six miles from the interior, I was dispatched with proper orders, and the boat landed me at the nearest point to my destination. It was late in the evening before my duty was completed; and as I was particularly desirous to return to the ship, and make my report, an officer of the York Rangers lent me a beautiful and spirited horse, which I mounted, though not without a few misgivings, which were much increased, when I was jocosely requested not to fall in love with the "ghost" on my road. On the wayside stood a lone and uninhabited house, where a trafficker in human flesh had murdered his wife; and, ever since, the lady, or her apparition, had presented herself after dark before the gate. Beyond the house were the remains of a negro village, which previously to colonization had been attacked by slave dealers and burned. The aged inhabitants were massacred, the young were borne to slavery; and now it was asserted that the former visited their old habitations, and called aloud for vengeance to redress their wrongs. Such tales were not calculated to inspire composure; but I strove to laugh at the jokes passed on me, and started off at full speed, declaring that "the ghosts should have a long chase if they felt inclined to sport."

The empty boast still faltered on my heart, and my tremulous hand could scarcely hold the rein, when the house of death, all desolate, appeared in view. Striking the spurs into the sides of the generous animal, he sprang forward on his way, and passed the dreadful spot, without my witnessing anything to excite horror.

Although the moon was up, yet storms were on the wind, and heavy clouds obscured her light. Often in imagination did I hear shrieks of the slaughtered negroes as they came howling on the gale, whilst I rapidly approached the ruined village which had been the terrific scene of blood. A black thick cloud with darkness overshadowed the picture, and spread a gloomy wildness over every object. The horse buried his hoofs deep in the sand, and, like an arrow from a bow, continued his fleet career; when in a moment he stopped, threw out his fore legs and reared upon his haunches, while steaming foam issued from his nostrils. It was with considerable difficulty that I retained my seat; and as the creature refused to proceed, I rode back a short distance, and again made an effort to pursue my direct road, but in vain; the animal stopped at the same spot, and flew from side to side of the highway, nor could the whip and spur urge him to advance.

Several times did I repeat the same attempt; and though a chilling awe crept through my veins and made my blood run cold, yet nothing had presented itself to my sight, though it was evident that the eyes of the horse were fixed upon something supernaturally terrific.

At length the moon shed her dim light through a fleecy cloud, and then with horror and amazement I beheld the cause of terror, for right in the middle of the road appeared a long black coffin, and the pale beams of the moon glanced on the white escutcheon fixed on the top. Every feeling of the soul was racked to the extreme; every fibre of the heart was nerved to desperation: and, mustering all my breath, I uttered the great and awful name to which both quick and dead must pay obedience. The lid of the coffin was thrown up, a figure slowly raised itself and gazed upon me, whilst my whole existence seemed quivering on the verge of eternity. The horse pawed the ground with uncontrolled fury; the howling of the gale seemed more dreadful;—when a hollow voice, with distinct utterance, vociferated, "Don't be alarmed,—'tis only Uncle Joey!—So, so, poor fellow! So, so!"

The horse, hearing a well-known sound, became pacified; and then I ascertained that Uncle Joey, a corporal in the newly-raised volunteers, had been to town to fetch an arm-chest, which had been made by a carpenter to deposit the muskets in. Having, however, drank rather freely, he had found himself drowsy on his way back; so, getting into the chest, (which was painted black with a tin plate on the lid,) and shutting himself in, he had enjoyed a comfortable nap, till the snorting of the animal and my shouting brought about his resurrection.

I hardly need say how much my heart was lightened by this explanation, and that I parted with Uncle Joey and his shell in much better spirits than had attended our meeting. Since that time I have had occasional returns of panic, but they have gradually diminished, and I am now almost as daring as my late excellent father, and, except during fits of nervous relaxation, care neither for ghost nor goblin; and I trust, that whilst my readers who are parents will keep a watchful eye that servants do not instil pernicious feelings into the breasts of their offspring, my young readers will rest satisfied on the assurance of an old man, that all ghosts are in reality mere Uncle Jokeys.

Books the Conferrers of Immortality.—The men by whom literature was chiefly encouraged and protected in the age of Augustus, were all of them rich and powerful—consuls, statesmen and warriors,—yet now they are only known to us, or at least are only objects of interest, as the persons from whom Virgil obtained the restoration of a few acres of land, of which he had been unjustly deprived, and to whom Horace fled destitute and trembling from the field of Philippi.—Dunlop's History of Roman Literature.

FINE ARTS.

[It is our intention, in future, to give regular weekly notices of the Fine Arts and Music, provided occasion be furnished us.]

Gallery of Portraits, No. XXX.—Charles Knight.

THE portrait of Murillo (from a picture by himself) for solidity and painter-like effect, we are inclined to think, exceeds anything we have seen of Scriven's, excellent as he is in these respects. The countenance of the painter is not such as his works would lead us to expect; there is a weight and melancholy about it that would seem to belong rather to the painter of Gaspar Poussin's austere landscapes, or Caravaggio's gloomy scenes; not to the immortalizer of merry flower-girls and laughing beggar boys. Not that such were his only subjects, but in them lay the strength and peculiarity of his genius. His portrait reminds us of Molière, whose face was perhaps of a still graver cast. The portrait of Cervantes, being copied from an old and quaint engraving, must not be taken as a faithful image of the Spanish Shakespeare. Engravings of Cervantes, from different pictures, are not unfrequently to be met with; but they all belong to the earlier periods of engraving, while the art was yet imperfect, and its productions rude and unshapely. Is there no original picture to which the engravers of the day might refer? We say this out of no spirit of discontent with the conductors of the 'Portrait Gallery,' who give us the best that is to be procured; but as a hint to artists who visit Spain, and who should keep their eyes about them, and endeavour to supply the readers of Don Quixote with a better knowledge of the aspect of its immortal author. A portrait of Frederick II completes the number.

The Comic Almanac; or, Illustrations of the Months, by George Cruikshank.—Tilt.

A little book inscribed with Cruikshank's well-known, grotesque, bold autograph, embordured with phantasies of zodiacal inference, such as would have killed Phaeton with nothing worse than laughter, indorsed with an effective allegory of the seasons! It is put into your hands, and you grin. The text of the book consists of the usual calendar, with a chronological table, chiefly commemorating modern events. The illustrations in verse are not quite so good as those in figures; so let us turn to the etchings at once. The general spirit of each month is concentrated in one characteristic scene. January shows us cart-loads of ice coming to the pastry-cook's, who now supplies hot soups, but in July must furnish his languishing customers with cooling ices. 'In the middle of the street is a troop of "frozen-out gardeners;" in the gutter, sliding boys; beyond them, a motley crowd seeking warmth and comfort in a "gin palace." How head the drinkers! how scrambling the sliders, with the butcher-boy distributing the contents of his tray! how creeping, abrunken, wretched, bawling, the gardeners! how hurrying, shovelling, horse-urging the ice-carters! how muffled up and scornful the gentleman in the box! but above all, how unhoused the pastry-cook. He has just emerged from the warm shop, sleek, slipped, night-capped, to superintend the cellaring of the ice. One of the carters is asking him for directions, touching his hat with a swelled, benumbed fist (for his fingers are bound together with cold); the man of tarts can scarcely attend to him, so much is he absorbed in impatience to be back to the fire, so tottering with cold; his hands pocketed, his knees together, his eye wandering back to the shop. February is a scene of swampy, melted, refrozen, remelted snow, with many a slip and slide. How true to our every-day experience the woman reading the direction of the letter she has received, the postman that of the next he is to deliver, while the twopence that is to pass between them, for which the woman is diving in her pocket, is too much a matter of course to merit the exercise of attention from either. We must cut short our expressions of admiration; Cruikshank is too rich in fun for us to cram it all, or much of it, into a paragraph full of description. Think of March winds treated by his etching needle, of April-fools, and April-showers! He had a better Jack-in-the-Green in his 'Political Showman' than this in May,—that was more ungainly, top-heavy—was endowed with more "serious lightness"—the recollection of it injures this in our eyes. Still it is full of humour; so is the Exhibition—Vauxhall, and all the Months, till we come to the crowning Christmas dinner, warm, jolly, comfortable, with plenty of wine, joke, beef, and pudding.

The Amulet for 1835.—Westley.

The illustrations of the 'Amulet' this year possess a higher interest, we think, than those of any of the preceding volumes. There is more originality, and less of the pseudo-sentimental, a weakness into which the ultra-refinement of these exquisitely among books (the Annals) are apt to fall. The hotpressing, blind-tooling, and gilding seem to suffocate the artist's fancy with petty sweets and prettinesses, and like another Ruggiero, he melts into an effeminate slavery under the meretricious blandishments of the drawing-room enchantress of the day, Fancy Stationery. 'The Lily,' by Eastlake, and the 'Proposal,' by Wyatt, are not exempt from the influence of the false Fay. Not so Inskipp's little 'Lace Maker'; nor his maid servant 'Going to Service'—going forth with all the buoyancy of youth and health, to make the cheerless experiment of a new service. The engraver of the 'Lace Maker' has hardly accomplished the difficult task of rendering Inskipp's free and careless pencilling into the more definite style necessary to a print. The other engraving is a more successful imitation of his manner. 'The Gipsy Mother' is a striking head, handled in a masterly style, but something opaque in the shadow, and, though probably a veritable gipsy, not very characteristic of the race—it is a Scotch Gipsy. Our favourite in the book is Uwins's 'Madonna de Fiori,' a group in a procession of young girls carrying flowers to offer before the Virgin. The girl in the middle is fair and slender as a lily, as graceful, and as simply gentle and tender. Round her is a fine glow of youth and colour. These are not all the plates; but we have not room to notice more than such as most call for remark. A neat little cut, however, of the Duck-billed Platypus, inserted in the article on that living riddle, interested us extremely, being the first picture we had seen of that singular individual, alive, and in his natural sphere.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

DELTA's question has reminded us, that when we extracted, some weeks ago, the interesting account of the death of Barbara, Queen of Poland, headed "Poisoning at a Feast," we were careless enough to omit the name of the work to which we were indebted for it. It is a new novel called the 'Court of Sigismund Augustus.'

The paper of a fair and friendly correspondent, headed 'A Stile' (a good subject), shall have our best attention.

VERUCUS the first opportunity.

W.'s lines to his Fire are not uncreditable to him; but they are not a "Sonnet," being sixteen lines instead of fourteen. A Sonnet is always confined to fourteen lines, unless it be of the comic order, when it may run to what length it pleases, after discharging its regular duties in that respect.

S. G. is justly grateful to his "Pen," though his acknowledgments are hardly peculiar enough to be made public.

The vindicator of Johnson, in the matter of the "City-Club," shall have insertion as soon as possible. Is his signature W.? It is not so legible as the rest of his communication.

We cannot, at the moment we are writing this, refer to the past numbers of our Journal; but surely we noticed the communication mentioned by "Un Lecteur qui a soif!" At all events, his messenger was not in fault; for we received it.

We fear we must have mislaid the papers mentioned by our very kind friend, J. M. C. They shall be searched for immediately.

The Northern Herald (Belfast) is requested to accept our most grateful acknowledgments.

We are quite ashamed at having delayed so long with the manuscripts of Mr. G. F. His verses, just sent us, shall be considered forthwith. We fear we cut a bad figure altogether with our Correspondents this week; and we must complete it with an awkward confession; which is, that instead of being able to fetch up our arrears to them, as promised last week, the key of the closet which contained their papers has been fairly walked off with, and will not return to us till too late for the press. We make this explanation, because the vague mention of "accident" a second time, might have looked still more awkward; and truth is the best resource under a scrape, if it cannot always help us out of it.

IMPROVEMENTS OF THE 'LONDON JOURNAL' FOR THE ENSUING YEAR.

As all Periodicals, at the commencement of a new year, must desire to obtain fresh readers, and show regard to old ones, by as much improvement or novelty as they can devise, and as we have no inclination to be behind-hand with our contemporaries in evincing either our zeal or gratitude, we hereby give a fortaste of our proper Journal pretensions, by setting modesty utterly aside; and do fairly acknowledge, that on Wednesday, the 7th of January next, we mean to be extremely brilliant and astonishing.

It is of no use to mince the matter. If we have been good hitherto, we mean to be twenty-fold better then. If people (particularly those of a lofty five-shilling turn of mind) have been hitherto astonished how we could sell our weekly stores of knowledge and entertainment for the unmentionable sum of three half-pence, they shall then be amazed beyond endurance. Men shall be found, with our Journal in their hands, staring and immovable, under peril of a locked-jaw; while the fair sex, with a sweeter access of frenzy, and agreeably to their more patient endurance of a transport, yet not knowing withal how to express their satisfaction, shall be tempted literally to devour our pages,—perhaps in a sandwich, as Miss Catharine Fisher, out of a less exalted feeling, did the bank-note.

Good heavens! if all our contemporaries improve as we do, what a periodical literature we shall have! The old 'Gentleman's Magazine,' their father, will be so very old and very gentlemanly, that nothing will ever have been seen so venerable, not even his churches. 'Blackwood' will be so intense, that there will be no distinguishing him from the woods and fountains he speaks of. His magazine, coming to us, overshadowing, will be like a visit from the clouds and mountain tops of the primeval world; or of Greece with all its isles. 'Tait' and the 'Monthly Repository' will blow such notes of advancement, that we shall all of a sudden be living in the twenty-first century, all thriving and merry, our days cut beautifully in two betwixt work and leisure. 'Fraser' will bring English orthodoxy so well acquainted with Irish and French vivacity, that all three shall be astonished at finding themselves shaking hands over Rabelais' 'Oracle of the Bottle.' The 'New Monthly' shall be so very polite and "distinguished," that men shall put a leaf of it into their button holes instead of myrtle. The 'Metropolitan' shall begin a new novel once a month, and render us so jolly and maritime that, like the drinkers in the 'Naufregium Joculare,' we shall take our room for a ship; and begin tossing the furniture out of window to lighten her. Then the orthodox 'Dublin University Magazine' shall more and more delight the "candid reader" by praising Whigs who write about forest-trees, and Radicals who can relish claret. All war, in short, shall become, in a manner, all peace,—the war being only a sort of robust joviality,—a Donnybrook fair, —to relish the peace with; and peaceful magazines shall, of course, have a prodigious deal to do. Mr Loudon, with his 'Architectural,' 'Gardening,' and 'Naturalist's' Magazines, shall build all our houses for us, plant all our gardens, and illustrate all our fields.

[From the Steam-Press of C. & W. RYNNELL, Little Pultney-street.]

By the way, what have we done, that the 'Monthly Repository' has not been sent us, ever since we made an extract from it? And how is it, that 'Tait' and 'Blackwood' are not sent, as they used to be when we wrote in another Journal? Our universalities, we are sure, do not offend them. They are too much in earnest themselves. And, agreeably to the insolence of our companionship, we must remind them of an anecdote in Boswell. Johnson dined one day in company with Wilkes, at Dilly's, the bookseller in the Poultry. There was a coldness at first; but wine, wit, and natural humanity, fused all parties together before dinner was over; and Wilkes, leaning back in his chair, and speaking to some one behind Johnson's back, said, in a stage-whisper, "I understand Dr Johnson has written a very fine book (the 'Lives of the Poets'); but I am a poor patriot, and have not been able to see it." "Mr Dilly," said Johnson, smiling with benignity, (as Boswell says,) "be good enough to send a copy of the 'Lives' to Mr Wilkes." Now we have no ambition to compare ourselves with Wilkes, except inasmuch as he desired the public welfare (if he did); but we may be allowed, without any immodesty, to measure our inability to buy books with an Alderman and Member of Parliament; and "candid readers" are deserving the consideration of good editors.

To return to our subject;—we propose, in our next year's Journal, in addition to most of the features of the year past, to give regular notices of the Fine Arts and Music; a Memoir (every week) of some eminent person, taken from some good author; regular extracts from good books of Travels, so that the reader may go round the world with us in the course of the twelvemonth; specimens, also (we hope) of the best English Poets; and a sprinkle of more original matter, generally. And the proprietors of 'Mr Hazlitt's Characters of Shakspeare's Plays' (which are out of print) have kindly permitted us to promise one of them for every successive week, till the series be completed.

SHAKSPEARE AND CHRISTMAS, AND MR LANDOR'S NEW WORK.

SHAKSPEARE and Christmas! How naturally the idea of Shakspeare can be made to associate itself with anything which is worth mention! Christmas is coming; Shakspeare is always at hand; a man of genius has just written a book upon him; and the two ideas, or all three, fall as naturally and seasonably together, as festivity, and heart and soul. So you may put together "Shakspeare and May," or "Shakspeare and June," and twenty passages start into your memory about spring and violets. Or you may say "Shakspeare and Love," and you are in the midst of a bevy of bright damsels, as sweet as rose-buds; or "Shakspeare and Death," and all graves, and thoughts of graves, are before you; or "Shakspeare and Life," and you have the whole world of youth, and spirit, and Hotspur, and life itself; or you may say even "Shakspeare and Hate," and he will say all that can be said for hate, as well as against it, till you shall take Shylock himself into your Christian arms, and tears shall make you of one faith.

As it is true that "extremes meet," so do we verily hold that extreme greatness and extreme goodness

(as far as man can have either) meet in the same individual; and being extremely good, Shakspeare, for all his greatness, or rather, by reason of it, must needs have been a good fellow; and being a good fellow, it follows that he must have been a good hand at Christmas. There have, undoubtedly, been bad great men; but, inasmuch as they were bad, they were not great. Their greatness was not intire. There was a great piece of it omitted. They had heads, legs, and arms, but they wanted hearts; and thus were not whole men. Besides, men of this kind, like Polyphemus, have but one eye; for bad men see but half; and their palates are poor, one-tasted things,—callous except to great excitements. They could not even partake of a dinner off a cut-apple with a child, without calling to mind their dignity, or their brandy, or some such thing; and how could such unhappy persons have a true relish of Christmas? Now Shakspeare, who manifestly saw everything that could be seen, and relished everything that had a taste, great and small, could not, and would not, (God and good health willing) have refused to join any festivity that had a heart in it; and he could neither have been the man he was, nor the poet he was, nor the "player-man" he was, nor have led the life he did, nor have had such good-humoured knowledge of country and town pastimes, of sheep-shearings, and taverns, and "good men's feasts," and Falstaff, and Sir Toby, and Twelfth-Night (mark you that!)—if he had not been in request at Christmas, and (to use his own phrase) often "set the table in a roar." Nobody talks so well of such things, without having had a relishing experience of them; and there is reason to believe that, like the thoroughly-discerning man he was, Shakspeare, through all that he had seen, had come to the conclusion that there was nothing better on earth than love and good-fellowship; for this is not only the conclusion, abstractedly speaking, which the logic of the question might bring him to, but it is understood, and is most highly credible, that Twelfth-Night, with Viola and Christina in it, was the last play he wrote.

But we must hasten, this week, to let a writer speak of Shakspeare, who has spoken of him as writer has never yet spoken in England, and we have had eloquent utterers to that matter too; nay, he has dared to make Shakspeare himself speak, and shown that he had a right to dare it.

It was said by a candid saint, in a fit of the phraseology of this world, "Deuce take those who have said our good things before us!" (Perant male qui ante nos nostra dixerunt.) We add, Deuce take those who quoted the saying before us;—but above all, Deuce take him who wrote the article on Mr Landor's book (for it is of this book we speak) in the 'Examiner' of the week before last:—and Deuce particularly take him for having said our good things so well, that it becomes a matter of modesty with us not even to claim them. Hard is it to practise that saintly virtue of candour; but out the truth must come,—and the truth is, that the nicety of the critical feeling in that article is worthy of the book it criticises; and after what we have said of the book, the reader may judge of its review.

Our only comfort is, as all our friends will testify to whom we spoke of the book, that we hailed and trumpeted it to every body in private the moment we got it, and before we had time to speak of it publicly. So if two men think alike upon the general merits of a subject, and one of them anticipates the other, we cannot help but we shall simply proceed to act as our friend the wit would have done on the like occasion, and with an impudence becoming our love and veracity (for extremes meet, and there is nothing so daring as your perfect innocence), extract the whole of the article from our columns. Yes, the whole;—for though this ‘Examiner’ is a paper as celebrated as it is witty and argumentative, yet its price (moderate as it is), and its partizanship (however sincere) may keep it out of hands into which the LONDON JOURNAL goes. The article, therefore, will have additional readers; those who have read it before will be glad to read it again (we beg to say that we were the inventors of that useful piece of assertion); and, finally, we cannot help taking every bit of it for our own satisfaction. We might omit the first two paragraphs, but there is capital talk about Shakespeare in them, and this present unworthy article of ours is about Shakespeare as well as Mr Landor. We have omitted only one passage, of a few lines; because, however justifiable it is in its own place, it would not be equally so in a paper which professes to be a neutral ground, set apart from everything hostile or controversial. Next week, we shall give some extracts from Mr Landor’s book, which are not to be found in the article of our contemporary.

Citation and Examination of William Shakespeare, Euseby Treen, Joseph Carnaby, and Silas Gough, clerk, before the Worshipful Sir Thomas Lucy, Knight, touching Deer-stealing, on the 19th day of September, in the year of Grace 1582, now first published from Original Papers. To which is added, a Conference of Master Edmund Spenser, a Gentleman of Note, with the Earl of Essex, touching the State of Ireland, A.D. 1595. Saunders and Osley, 1834.

This is a book of remarkable genius—an honour to the age. High wit, imagination, and the sweetest pathos, are its least distinguished characteristics. It is steeped in the deepest waters of humanity. It would have been called a gentle book when that term meant all that was noble as well as mild and wise. It deserves to have its dwelling-place near the loved and everlasting name of Shakespeare, and we are very sure that posterity will find it there.

For ourselves, we have adopted it as the faithful record of some authentic pages in the life of the young poet. Of these, we have “alas! too few”—and we cannot see why so excellent a romance should not stand for a piece of reality. How strange it is that so little should be known of the personal history of Shakespeare! Was it that the radiance of his genius quenched the paler light of his life? Had his contemporaries in literature lost their sense of his personal identity in the universal character of his fame? Ben Jonson’s learning, the weight of Marlowe’s mighty line, the dark gloom of Ford, streaked with its moonlight gleams of pathos, the domestic prose-poetry of Heywood, the terrible graces of Webster and of Decker, the earnestness and precision of Middleton, the comprehensive thought of Massinger, and the sweetness of Fletcher—all these have an individual character, which is stamped on the admiring love with which we regard the memories of the men. They never published anything that did not remind each other of their own personal existence. Not so with Shakespeare. When Falstaff succeeded his Hamlet, and Lear followed Falstaff, who ever thought of him? He might be seen, we presume, at the Globe or the Mermaid; he might win hearts there by his flowing facility or wit or fancy—by his brave notions and gentle expressions; but never, we dare be sworn, did he excite there, or in his time, a tithe of the reverent and loving admiration we pay to the Creator of a World. His genius was, in short, too large and universal to be referred to himself, sitting in the common ranks of men. His companions never could associate them—never dreamt of them as of mutual and reciprocating interest—and never fancied, therefore, that a later posterity would. Surely, had they done so, they would have gathered together for us some records of his personal career, and marked out for us more distinctly, as a shrine for pilgrimage, the tomb of the man. But, no—his works, they said, would be a “monument without a tomb.” They were to be associated with no sense of mortality—nor could we now have had the definite certainty that their author was not, in truth, the demigod that they express him, but for our chance possession of that “key,” which, while it “unlocks his heart,” proves it to be mortal. Thanks to the bookseller who scraped together the sonnets of Shakespeare! There the immortal poet pours out his mortal sorrows. There we feel with him on the common ground of life; there we see him laying on his heart the low-liberties; there we follow him through the conflicts of duty and passion, and through a sea of troubles, discontents, and sorrows; there we find that the web of his life, too, was a mingled yarn, and that he, the so potent master, at whose feet the world of spirits and of nature laid their richest treasures, might to mortal sources of truth and beauty and delight were open, could yet be baffled by the unknown of his fellow-men: could see them join against him with the “spite of fortune”; and, troubled and despairing, “desiring this man’s art, and that man’s scope”—could, at last, in the bitterness of his anguish, “look upon himself, and curse his fate.” But, for all that, what a humane and generous world is that of Shakespeare! He, who felt its wrongs, felt also the allowances to be made for them. He knew, let what would betide, that “beautiful usages were remaining still, kinder affections, radiant hopes, and ardent aspirations.” He knew that “there is in the blood of man, as in the blood of animals, that which giveth the temper and disposition, and that these require nurture and culture.” He chose the nobler part, therefore, of cherishing and cultivating these; and for him, in grief or in gladness, we are surely always kinder and happier. The words we have quoted are words from the volume before us. They call us back to it from our dreams of Shakespeare.

This book is something better than a dream. Concealed in the dress of fiction, its purpose is the assertion of truth. A most exalted moral aim is the “heart of its mystery.” The youth, William Shakespeare, is brought before Sir Thomas Lucy on the charge of deer-stealing. The persons present at the examination are the knight’s chaplain, Silas Gough—his clerk, the quaint and trust-worthy Ephraim Barnett, whose report the book purports to be—and two countrymen, who bear witness against Shakespeare. The whole conduct of the thing is admirable. We have Sir Thomas Lucy before us in his large, comfortable, easy chair, a portly theologian, and, in his own conceit, a great poet, very stately at first, but gradually relaxing under the influence of the wonderful culprit he has before him, until, at last—fairly subdued by the stream of wit, eloquence, poetry, reason, and religion, poured out upon him by the stealer of his deer—he lies back in his chair in his very easiest attitude, opens his ears to their widest stretch, and tells “honest Willy” to “go on” with his sermons. He throws in a word or two here and there to secure his own dignity and superiority, but it is easy to see who has the upper hand. He is led by the nose, by the eyes, and by the ears—no faculty of him can withstand the fascination of Shakespeare!

“I am not ashamed to avouch that it goeth against me to hang this young fellow, richly as the offence in its own nature doth deserve it, he talketh so reasonably; not indeed so reasonably, but so like unto what a reasonable man may listen to and reflect on. There is so much, too, of compassion for others in hard cases, and something so very near in semblance to innocence itself in that airy swing of light-heartedness about him. I cannot fix my eyes (as one would say) on the shifting and sudden shade-and-shine, which cometh back to me, do what I will, and mazes me in a manner, and blinks me.”

This exquisite aside is addressed to his chaplain; but Sir Silas Gough is an ill-natured person who doesn’t like Shakespeare’s religion, who doesn’t “relish such mutton-broth divinity, making him sick in order to settle his stomach,” who somewhat “smokes” the youth’s object besides, and who, moreover, has grown very impatient during the examination, for, says honest Ephraim Barnett—

“He had ridden hard that morning, and had no cushion upon his seat as Sir Thomas had—and I have seen, in my time, that he who is seated on beechwood hath very different thoughts and moralities from him who is seated on goose-feathers under deerskin”—and so the said chaplain proposes he may be committed at once, and afterwards sentenced to death or not, for “the penalty of the law may be commuted, if expedient, on application to the fountain of mercy, in London.” Then answers the humanity which lurks behind the dignity of Sir Thomas, in these beautiful words:—

“May be, Silas, those shall be standing round the fount of mercy who play in idleness and wantonness with its waters, and let them not flow widely, nor take their natural course. Dutiful gallants may encompass it, and it may linger among the flowers they throw into it, and never reach the parched lip on the way-side. These are homely thoughts—thoughts from a field, thoughts for the study and housekeeper’s room. But whenever I have given utterance to them, as my heart hath often prompted me with beating at the breast, my hearers seem to bear towards me more true and kindly affection than my richest fancies and choicest phraseologies could purchase.”

But we are getting on too fast. Let us go back a little. Our next extract shall be from the evidence of Joseph Carnaby, who watched the deer-stealers at their night-work. Mark how finely this passage shadows out the thoughts of the young poet, lightly and darkly thrown from him in the night; and what a capital picture he, and his strange vagaries, and his wandering companions, and their unlawful business, make! The witness himself, Joseph Carnaby, while he is delivering his evidence, cannot get rid of the awe the scene had thrown over him as he listened, and he looks more guilty-like than the Strange Thief. “Willy stands there,” says the recording Ephraim, “with all the courage and composure of an innocent man; and, indeed, with more than what an innocent man ought to possess in the presence of a magistrate.” Now hear the evidence:—

“At this moment one of the accomplices cried ‘Willy, Willy! prythee stop! enough in all conscience! first, thou divertedst us from our undertaking with thy strange vagaries; thy Italian girl’s nursery sighs; thy Fucks and pinchings, and thy Windsor whimsies. No kitten upon a bed of marum ever played such antics. It was summer and winter, night and day, with us within the hour; and with such religion did we think and feel it, we would have broken the man’s jaw that gossamed it. We have slept with thee under the oaks in the ancient forest of Arden, and we have wakened from our sleep in the tempest far at sea. Now art thou for frightening us again out of all the senses thou hadst given us, with witches and women more murderous than they.’ Then followed a deeper voice; ‘Stouter men and more resolute are few; but thou, my lad, hast words too weighty for flesh and bones to bear up against. And who knows but these creatures may pop amongst us at last, as the wolf did sure enough, upon him, the noisy rogue, who so long had been crying wolf! and walf!’”

Some papers are found in the young Thief’s pocket, and read out in the Justice-room. Here is one of them, called the ‘Maid’s Lament,’ and in pathos we never felt anything beyond it. The reader will take it to his heart for ever:—

“I loved him not; and yet, now he is gone,
I feel I am alone.
I check’d him while he spoke; yet could he speak,
Alas! I would not check.
For reasons not to love him, once I sought,
And wearied all my thought,
To vex myself and him: I now would give
My love could he but live
Who lately lived for me, and, when he found ‘Twas vain, in holy ground
He hid his face amid the shades of death!
I waste for him my breath
Who wasted his for me! but mine returns;
And this lorn bosom burns
With stifling heat, heaving it up in sleep,
And waking me to weep
Tears that had melted his soft heart; for years
Wept he as bitter tears!
‘Merciful God!’ such was his latest prayer,
‘These may she never share!’
Quieter is his breath, his breast more cold
Than daisies in the mould,
Where children spell, athwart the church-yard gate,
His name and life’s brief date.
Pray for him, gentle souls, whoe’er you be,
And oh! pray, too, for me!”

Whereupon Sir Thomas Lucy, Knight, passeth the following acute criticism:—

“Of all the youths that did ever write in verse, this one verily is he who hath the fewest flowers and devices. But it would be loss of time to form a border, in the fashion of a kingly crown, or a dragon, or a Turk on horseback, out of buttercreps and dandelions. * * The wench herself might well and truly have said all that matter without the poet, bating the rhymes and metre.”

Let the reader take this to his heart too:—

“This is the only kindness I ever heard of Master Silas towards his fellow-creatures. Never hold me unjust, Sir Knight, to Master Silas. Could I learn other good of him, I would freely say it; for we do good by speaking it, and none is easier. Even bad men are not bad men, while they praise the just. Their first step backward is more troublesome and wrenching to them than the last forward.”

We have said that the purpose of this book is one of a very lofty kind. Its wit and pathos, its humour, fancy, and imagination, are only made subservient to the most exalted expression of morality, to the embodiment of the subtlest and most profound spirit of humanity. Shakespeare, observing the Knight’s theological turn, launches forth into sundry disquisitions, moral and religious, gleaned, as he says, from the discourses of a certain Doctor Glaston of Oxford. And though the worthy Justice sometimes seems to yearn for an authority, for something doctrinal—though he has a sort of half-longing for a thread or two from the coat of an apostle—is thirsty, it may be, for a smack of Augustin—or hankereth after the perfume of a sprig from Basil—still he lieth back, as we fancy, in his great easy chair, twirls (perhaps) his thumbs over each other as easily as he can for the gout, and urges “Willy” to go on. The reader may pardon this defalcation from doctrine and the fathers, when he observes the light that leads astray. It is light indeed—a full beam of generous truth—of the rays of Heaven.

But first observe Shakespeare's introduction to this pretended Dr Glaston, and the true philosophy of the passage:—

"What may thy name be, and where is thy abode?" William Shakespeare, of Stratford-upon-Avon, at your service, sir. And welcome, said he; thy father, ere now, hath bought our College wool. A truly good man we ever found him; and I doubt not he hath educated his son to follow him in his paths. There is in the blood of man, as in the blood of animals, that which giveth the temper and disposition. These require nurture and culture. But what nurture will turn flint stones into garden mould? or what culture rear cabbages in the quarries of Hedington Hill? To be well-born is the greatest of all God's primary blessings, young man, and there are many well-born among the poor and needy. Thou art not of the indigent and destitute, who have great temptations; thou art not of the wealthy and affluent, who have greater still. God hath placed thee, William Shakespeare, in that pleasant island, on one side whereof are the syrens, on the other the harpies, but inhabiting the coasts on the wide continent, and unable to make their talons felt, or their voices heard by thee. Unite with me in prayer and thanksgiving for the blessings thus vouchsafed. We must not close the heart when the fingers of God would touch it. Enough if thou sayest only 'My soul, praise thou the Lord.'

We trust none of our readers may take offence at the notion of this said Doctor Glaston, being neither Bishop, nor Bishop's Ordinary, presuming to propose a catechism to priests themselves. He does this in the following, and how finely!

"Let us preachers, who are sufficiently liberal in bestowing our advice upon others, inquire of ourselves whether the exercise of spiritual authority may not be sometimes too pleasant, tickling our breasts with a plume from Satan's wing, and turning our heads with that inebriating poison which he hath been seen to instil into the very chalice of our salvation. Let us ask ourselves in the closet, whether, after we have humbled ourselves before God in our prayers, we never rise beyond the true standard in the pulpit; whether our zeal for the truth be never overheated by internal fires less holy; whether we never grow stiffly or sternly pertinacious at the very time when we are reproving the obstinacy of others; and whether we have not frequently so acted as if we believed that opposition were to be relaxed and borne away by self-sufficiency and intolerance. Believe me, the wisest of us have our catechism to learn; and these, my dear friends, are not the only questions contained in it. No Christian can hate: no Christian can malign: nevertheless, do we not often hate and malign those unhappy creatures who are insensible to God's mercies? And I fear this unchristian spirit swells darkly, with all its venom, in the marble of our hearts, not because our brother is insensible to these mercies, but because he is insensible to our faculty of persuasion, turning a deaf ear unto our claim upon his obedience, or a blind or sleepy eye upon the fountain of light, whereof we deem ourselves the sacred reservoirs."

Then Sir Thomas hearing this, and secretly delighted, nevertheless thinks it due to his theology that he should get up some little quarrel with this pleasure, and peradventure crieth out from his great chair, "Reasonable enough! nay, almost too reasonable!" "But where are the Apostles? Where are the Disciples? Where are the Saints? Where is hell fire? Well, well," soothing himself, and falling back again for another delicious dream, "patience! we may come to it yet. Go on, Will!" and on Will goes accordingly. Here is the history of priesthood, and the antidote against it, which has, in all ages, had, in pure hearts, its chosen depositaries. In this he leaves Dr Glaston, and pretends to quote some book he had been reading:—

"Those cunning men who formed to themselves the gorgeous plan of universal dominion, were aware that they had a better chance of establishing it than brute ignorance or brute force could supply, and that soldiers and their paymasters were subject to ether and powerfuller fears than the transitory ones of war and invasion. What they found in heaven they seized; what they wanted they forged. And so long as there is vice and ignorance in the world, so long as fear is a passion, their dominion will prevail; but their dominion is not, and never shall be, universal. Can we wonder that it is so general. Can we wonder that anything is wanting to give it authority and effect, when every learned, every prudent, every powerful, every ambitious man in Europe, for above a thousand years, united in the league to consolidate it? The old dealers in the shambles, where Christ's body is exposed for sale in convenient marketable slices, have not covered with blood and filth the whole pavement. Beautiful usages are remaining still—kinder affections, radiant hopes, and ardent aspirations."

But here, the Doctor speaks again in an admirable piece of just and acute criticism. It satisfies an old grudge of ours against the Romans:—

"William, I need not expatiate on Greek with thee, since thou knowest it not, but some crumbs of Latin are picked up by the callowest beaks. The Romans had, as thou findest, and have still, more taste for murder than morality, and, as they could not find heroes among them, looked for gladiators. Their only very high poet employed his elevation and strength to dethrone and debase the Deity. They had several others who polished their language and pitched their instruments with admirable skill; several who glared over their thin and flimsy gaberdines many bright feathers from the wide spread downs of Ionia, and the richly cultivated rocks of Attica."

What follows is a truly splendid passage. How noble in its exhortation to effort!

"Young gentlemen! Let not the highest of you, who hear me this evening, be led into the delusion, for such it is, that the founder of his family was originally a greater or a better man than the lowest here. He willed it, and became it. He must have stood low; he must have worked hard; and with tools, moreover, of his own invention and fashioning. He waived and whistled off ten thousand strong and importunate temptations; he dashed the dice-box from the jewelled hand of Chance, the cup from Pleasure's, and trod under foot the sorceries of each; he ascended steadily the precipices of Danger, and looked down with intrepidity from the summit; he overawed Arrogance with Sedateness; he seized by the horn and overleaped low Violence; and he fairly swung Fortune round. The very high cannot rise much higher; the very low may; the truly great must have done it. This is not the doctrine, my friends, of the silkenly and lawnly religious; it wears the coarse texture of the fisherman, and walks uprightly and straightforward under it."

Who will not acknowledge the truth of what Shakespeare subsequently puts into the mouth of Doctor Faustus, quoting, as it were, from the book that made the devil think it worth his while to deal with him?

"Faustus was not your man for fancies and figments; and he tells us that, to his certain knowledge, it was verily an owl's face that whispered so much mischief in the ear of our first parent. One plainly sees it, quoth Doctor Faustus, under that gravity which in human life we call dignity, but of which we read nothing in the Gospel. We despise the hangman, we detest the hanged; and yet, saith Duns Scotus, could we turn aside the heavy curtain, or stand high enough a-tiptoe to peep through its chinks and crevices, we should, perhaps, find these two characters to stand justly among the most innocent in the drama. He who blinketh the eyes of the poor wretch about to die, doeth it out of mercy; those who preceded him—bidding him, in the garb of justice, to shed the blood of his fellow-man—had less, or none."

The more incidental sketches of feeling and character in the book are of a subtle and exquisite kind. Ethelbert, a young poet, struck by the hand of consumption, is exceedingly touching. He speaks to his more impatient friends:—

"Be patient! From the higher heavens of poetry, it is long before the radiance of the brightest star can reach the world below. We hear that one man finds out one beauty, another man finds out another, placing his observatory and instruments on the poet's grave. The worms must have eaten us before it is rightly known what we are. It is only when we are skeletons that we are boxed and ticketed, and priced and shown. Be it so! I shall not be tired of waiting."

But the highest point of pathos in the book is reached in the description we are about to quote. We never read anything finer. Young Wellerby, a ripe and promising scholar at the University, broken in spirit by an unfortunate passion, flies to the relief of poetry, and abandons his severer toil. He has a mother. The master of his college has remonstrated with her concerning her son. Doctor Glaston and she now speak, the Doctor being supposed to repeat what passed:—

"I sated him, told him I was poor, and he knew it. He was stung, and threw himself upon my neck and wept. Twelve days have passed since, and only three rainy ones. I hear he has been seen upon the knoll yonder, but hither he hath not come. I trust he knows, at last, the value of time, and I shall be heartily glad to see him after this accession of knowledge. Twelve days, it is true, are rather a chink than a gap in time; yet, O, gentle sir! they are that chink which makes the vase quite valueless. There are light words which may never be shaken off the mind they fall on. My child, who was hurt by me, will not let me see the marks. 'Lady,' said I, 'none are left upon him. Be comforted! Thou shalt see him this hour. All that thy God hath not taken, is yet thine.' She looked at me earnestly, and would have then asked something, but her voice failed her. There was no agony, no motion, save in the lips and cheeks. Being the widow of one who fought under Hawkins, she remembered his courage, and sustained the shock, and said calmly, 'God's will be done! I pray that he find me as worthy as he findeth me willing to join them.' Now, in her unearthly thoughts, she had led her only son to the bosom of her husband; and in her spirit (which is often permitted to pass the gates of death with holy love) she left them both with their Creator. The curate of the village sent those who should bring home the body; and some days afterwards he came unto me, beseeching me to write the epitaph. Being no friend to stone-cutters' charges, I entered not into biography, but wrote these few words. 'Joannes Wellerby, Literarum quasiit gloriam, Videt Dei.'"

In the conference of Master Edmund Spenser with the Earl of Essex, we have evidences of the same fine genius. Spenser laments his domestic calamities,—"none in any season, none in any place, like mine." Essex beautifully answers:—

"So say all fathers; so say all husbands. Look at any old mansion-house, and let the sun shine as gloriously as it may on the golden vases, or the arms recently quartered over the gateway, or the embayed window, and on the happy pair that haply are toying at it; nevertheless, thou mayest say that, of a certainty, the same fabric hath seen much sorrow within its chambers, and heard many wallings; and each time was the heaviest stroke of all. Funerals have passed along through the stout-hearted knights upon the wainscot, and amidst the laughing nymphs upon the arras. Old servants have shaken their heads, as if somebody had deceived them, when they found that beauty and nobility could perish. Edmund! the things that are too true pass by us as if they were not true at all; and, when they have singled us out, then only do they strike us."

Here we must suddenly close. We have, perhaps, outrun our limits in a desire to do justice to this remarkable book. It is an honour to its author; it does honour to English literature; it is an addition to the rare list of books that will live. The man who could write it knows this, and smiles, of course at the reception it has hitherto met with. We have not been fortunate enough to see it praised anywhere!

It is clear, from the internal evidence, that the book is by Mr Walter Savage Landor.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

XLIX.—HISTORY OF FELIX PERETTI.

FELIX PERETTI, the son of a peasant at Montalto, a village in the Papal territory of Ancona, discovered at an early age quick parts and a retentive memory: but the poverty of his parents obliged them to part with him when only nine years old; and he was placed in the service of a neighbouring farmer.

In this situation, Felix did not satisfy his employer. He was perpetually finding fault with the lad for his unhandiness in husbandry work, and observing that corrections served only to augment his apparent stupidity, he dismissed him from the house, the barn, and the stable, to what was considered as a more servile and degrading species of occupation;—the taking care of a number of hogs on an adjoining common.

In this solitary place, deserted and forlorn, his back still smarting with repeated stripes, his eyes overflowing with tears, he was surprised by a stranger at his elbow, inquiring which was the nearest way to Ascoli.

This person was a Franciscan, who, travelling to that place, had lost his way; in fact, the poor boy was so absorbed in grief, that he did not observe any one approaching till he heard the voice of the friar, who had spoken to him several times before he could procure an answer.

Affected by his melancholy appearance, he naturally asked the cause, and received an account of his hopeless condition related in a strain of good sense and vivacity (for, on speaking to him, he resumed his natural cheerfulness), which surprised the holy father, when he considered his age and wretched appearance.

"But I must not forget that you are going to Ascoli," said Felix, starting nimbly from the bank on which he was sitting, then, pointing out the proper road, he accompanied the friar, who was charmed at finding so much untaught politeness in a little rustic.

Considering himself as sufficiently informed, he thanked the boy, and would have dismissed him with a small present, but he still continued running and skipping before him, till Father Michael asked, in a jocular way, if he meant to go with him quite to the town.

"Not only to Ascoli, but to the end of the world," said Felix, unwilling to quit his companion. "Ah, sir!" continued the lad, after a short pause, in a tone of voice, and with one of those looks which make their way at once to our hearts, "Ah, sir! if you or any other worthy gentleman would but get me the place of an errand boy, or any other employment in a convent, however laborious, where I could procure a little learning, and get away from these filthy hogs and the owner of them, who is little better, I would try to make myself useful, and should be bound to pray for and bless you as long as I live."

"But you would not take the habit of a religious order?" said the Franciscan. "Most willingly," replied Felix.

"You are little aware of the hardships, the fastings, the toll, the watchings, and the labour which you would undergo."

"I would endure the pains of purgatory to become a scholar," was the boy's singular reply.

Finding him in earnest, and surprised at his courage and resolution, he permitted the stripling to accompany him to Ascoli, where he introduced him to the society of Cordeliers he was going to visit, informing them at the same time of the circumstance which first introduced him to this new acquaintance.

The superior sent for the boy, put many questions to him, and was so well pleased, that he immediately admitted him. He was immediately invested with the habit of a lay-brother, and appointed to assist the Sacristan in sweeping the church and lighting the candles. In return for these and other services he was taught the responses and instructed in grammar.

In acquiring knowledge, the little stranger was found to unite a readiness of comprehension with unceasing application; his progress was so rapid that, in 1534, being then only fourteen years old, he entered on his noviciate, and, after the usual time, was admitted to make his profession.

On taking deacon's orders, he preached his first sermon to a numerous congregation, it being the Feast of the Annunciation, when he soon convinced his hearers that the man who was instructing them possessed no common share of abilities.

The service being concluded, a prelate then present thanked Felix publicly for his discourse, encouraged him to persist diligently in his studies, and congratulated him, as well as the society of which he was a member, on the fairness of his prospects.

He was ordained a priest in 1545, took the degrees of bachelor and doctor with considerable credit, and, being chosen to keep a divinity act before the whole chapter of his order, father Montalto (that being the name he now assumed) so distinguished himself, that he secured the esteem, and afterwards enjoyed the patronage and protection of two cardinals, Carpi and Alexandrino.

The time, indeed, was now come when a friend was necessary to defend him against the numerous enemies his acrimonious violence had created; for, as Montalto advanced to notice and celebrity, impetuosity of temper and impatience of contradiction became prominent features in his character; his air and manners were predominating and dictatorial.

At this period of his life he is described (by a contemporary, who, I suspect, had felt his reproof) as one of those troublesome people, who, presuming on what I have called the aristocracy of intellect and the insolence of good design, fancy they can set the world to rights, and consider themselves as authorised to censure without respect of persons, and to amend, without regard to consequences, whatever they see amiss in church or state.

It cannot be denied that, at the time of which I speak, the reins of government, ecclesiastical as well as civil, were held with a careless and slackened hand; that public and private morals were notoriously corrupt and profligate through the whole extent of the Papal dominions; that Rome was a nest and a place of refuge for everything base and villainous in Italy; that the roads and even the streets of the great city could not be passed after night, without incurring the danger of robbery and murder.

But men in public stations, however culpable their dereliction of duty, when they recollected that the present reformer of abuse, less than twenty years before, was a poor peasant, an object of charity and commiseration, could not prevail on themselves to submit to his censures without resistance and indignation. But the hour was rapidly approaching when Montalto possessed the power, as well as inclination, not only to reprove, but to punish evil doers.

By the interest of Cardinal Alexandrino, who saw and understood the unbending sternness of his disposition, he was appointed to an office which seemed congenial with such a temper,—Inquisitor General at Venice.

But the unqualified harshness of his manners, and the peremptory violence with which he executed his duty, soon raised a storm in that jealous republic, and he would have suffered personal violence from the enraged Venetians, had he not saved himself by a precipitate flight.

A few months after, he visited a country sensible of the value of such a character, and where such zeal was duly appreciated: Cardinal Buon Compagno, being appointed Legatus a latere, in plain English, Ambassador from the Pope to his Catholic Majesty, Montalto accompanied him into Spain, as his chaplain and inquisitorial consultant.

In this capacity he was received at Madrid with great cordiality, and gave such proofs of the warmth of his zeal, that, on the Cardinal's recall, ecclesiastical honours and preferment were repeatedly offered, if he would establish himself in that country; but the palace of the Vatican, the city on seven hills, Imperial Rome, was the object on which the shepherd of Ancona had fixed an unaverted eye.

The Legate Buon Compagno had quitted Spain only a few hours, when he met a messenger despatched from Rome with news of the Pope's death; this was John de Medici, who governed the church almost seven years under the title of Pius IV.

Montalto was strongly interested in this intelligence, as he had every reason to expect that his patron, Cardinal Alexandrino, would be elected Pontiff.

In this hope he was not disappointed, and on his arrival at Rome, his friend, now exalted to an ecclesiastical throne, under the name of Pius V, received him with kindness, and immediately appointed him general of his order, a post in which Montalto did not forget to punish those whom he had before admonished.

In less than four years from the elevation of Cardinal Alexandrino he was made a bishop, received a competent pension, and was ultimately (1570) admitted into the College of Cardinals.

Being now arrived within a short distance of the mountain top, which, for more than forty years he had been arduously and laboriously attempting to climb, he found a firm and safe resting place on which to rest his foot.

It cannot be denied that his reflections on this occasion must have been in the highest degree solacing and triumphant; from poverty, contempt, and oppression, from a life of labour unrequited, and with an ardent thirst for knowledge, which, at a certain time, it seemed impossible for him ever to gratify, he was suddenly placed at the fountain head of learning and information; the treasures of ancient and modern literature were displayed before his eyes, he was raised to personal, and, what was still more flattering, to an intellectual eminence, which was generally acknowledged and felt; he was exalted to a post, which, in those days placed him on an equality with kings.

But with so many rational sources of exultation, with so much to hope, there was still much to fear; his new associates, generally speaking, were men of talents; well educated, and with the proud blood of the Medici, the Caraffa, the Farnese, the Colonna, and the Frangipani families, swelling their veins; many of them not only of illustrious descent, but endowed with a considerable share of deep political sagacity as statesmen; and all alike wishing for, yet anxiously concealing their wishes, to succeed to the chair of St Peter.

With competitors of this description it must be confessed that Montalto had a difficult and trying part to act. Being convinced that a severe assuming character was not likely to succeed, he gradually suppressed every angry passion, and artfully disguised the foibles and imperfections of his temper under a convenient mask of mildness, affability, and unconcern.

One of his nephews, on a journey to Rome, to see his uncle, being murdered, the Cardinal, now a new man, instead of aiding in the prosecution of the offender, interceded for his pardon; he did not encourage visits from his relations, several of whom hearing of his advancement, repaired to Rome, but lodged them at an inn, and dismissed them the day after their arrival, with an inconsiderable present, strictly charging them to return to their families, and trouble him no more, for that he now found his spiritual cares increasing every day, that he was dead to his relations and the world; but as old age and infirmities came on, he perhaps might send for one of them to wait upon and nurse him.

On the death of his friend, Pius the Fifth, he entered the conclave with the rest of the cardinals, but did not appear to interest himself in the election; and on being applied to by any of the candidates or their friends, replied, "that the sentiments of so obscure and insignificant a man as he was, could be of no importance; that having never before been in a conclave, he was fearful of making a false step, and left the affair to his brethren, who were persons of great weight and experience, and all of them such worthy characters, that he was quite at a loss which to vote for, and wished only he had as many voices as there were members of the sacred college."

Cardinal Buon Compagno being elected, and having assumed the name of Gregory the Thirteenth, the subject of our present article did not forget to pay court to him, but soon found he was no favourite, having offended his holiness when Legate in Spain, by refusing to remain at Madrid as he desired.

Montalto now became a pattern of meekness, modesty and humility; he lived frugally in a small house, without ostentation; this best species of prudence and economy, which enabled him to feed the hungry and clothe the naked by retrenching his own superfluities procured him the character of a friend to the poor; he also submitted patiently to every species of injury or indignity, and was remarked for treating his worst enemies with tenderness, condescension, and forgiveness.

In the meantime he had so far deceived the majority of the cardinals, that they considered him as a poor, weak, doating old fellow, incapable of doing either good or harm, and, by way of ridicule, they called him the Ass of La Marca,—the district round Ancona, to a certain extent, being called the Marsh of Ancona. An evident alteration took place in the appearance of his health; he felt, or affected to feel, violent internal pains, which, not being always accompanied with external appearances, afford no positive proof of the existence of disease to the senses, and we are generally obliged to take the word of those who say they feel them.

He applied for advice to medical men in various quarters of the city, describing what he felt, which (having secretly gathered the information from books) they described as alarming symptoms produced by causes which, in all probability would shorten his days; public prayers were offered up for his recovery, and the intercession of all devout Christians and good men earnestly requested.

At intervals he would appear in a state of convalescence, but considerably changed; of a pale countenance, thin, bent in body, and leaning painfully on his staff; by a few persons, who suspected the duplicity of his conduct, these untoward appearances were said to be produced by the frequent use of nauseating medicines, nocturnal watchings, and rigid abstinence.

But with all his apparent sufferings, and affected indifference to public men and public measures, his eyes and ears were open and intent on every transaction, public as well as private; by means of apt emissaries, many of whom were domestics, with Cardinals and Ambassadors, he made himself acquainted with every event either directly or remotely connected with his ambitious views.

Considering auricular confession as a convenient instrument to forward political intrigue, and his reputation as a learned divine being firmly established, he attended, whenever his health would permit, to hear confessions, and was resorted to by crowds of all ranks.

In this post he procured great help towards his aggrandisement, and is said to have extracted secrets on which he afterwards grounded many judicial punishments.

At this propitious moment (1585), and at a time when the College of Cardinals was torn by opposite interests and divided by contending factions,—at this auspicious moment died Gregory the Thirteenth.

Montalto accompanied the Cardinals into the conclave, and, immediately shutting himself in his chamber, was scarcely spoken to, or thought of; if at any time it was necessary as a matter of form, or for the purpose of calculating numbers, to consult him, his door was found fast, and a message was sent that he would wait on their eminences the moment his coughing and violent pain were abated; but earnestly entreated them to proceed to business, as the presence of so insignificant a person as himself could not be necessary, and he hoped they would not disturb a man sinking under disease, whose thoughts were placed on another world.

At the end of fourteen days, three powerful parties, each of whom had considered themselves as certain of choosing their own Pope, found their views defeated in consequence of the votes being equally divided.

Impatient of delay, and hoping that a vacancy would soon take place, if they elected the old Ass of La Marca, whom every man thought he could manage as he pleased, they unanimously concurred in electing him.

The moment he was chosen, Montalto threw away the staff on which he had hitherto supported himself, then suddenly raised his head, and expanding his chest, he surprised everyone present by appearing at least a foot taller.

Coming forward with a firm step, an erect and dignified air, he thanked them for the high honour they had conferred upon him, the duties of which, with God's good grace, he would to the utmost of his power conscientiously perform.

As he passed from the conclave, the people exclaimed "Long live the Pope—Plenty, Holy Father, Plenty—Justice and large Loaves." "Pray to God for Plenty, and I will give you Justice," was his answer.

Impatient to exercise the rights of sovereignty, he ordered his triple crown to be immediately produced, and placed it on a velvet cushion in the room where he sat; he was also desirous of being immediately crowned and enthroned; but being informed that his authority and prerogatives were in every respect as firmly established and as extensive before as after the ceremony of coronation, he reluctantly consented to a short delay, for the necessary preparations.

The humility and complaisance he had for so many years assumed, immediately vanished; those predominating passions, which had been suppressed by interested views and political dissimulation, regained their ascendancy, and burst forth with augmented fury. So great an alteration in his conduct and manners, as well as health, was a bitter disappointment to those Cardinals who, to serve their own purposes, had assisted in the elevation of Montalto, who now assumed the name of Pope Sixtus the Fifth.

It was not merely his refusing them the least share or appearance of authority; it was not only the loss of patronage and influence they had to lament; but the mortification of being over-reached and defeated by the old man who for more than fourteen years had been the object of their ridicule and contempt;

he had met them on their own ground, and conquered them with their own weapons.

If at any time they hesitated in concurring with the vigorous and salutary measures of his government, and ventured to expostulate and represent the inconsistency of his former conduct and professions, he instantly silenced them, and observed: "That feeling himself much improved in health and spirits, he was able, by God's assistance, and would endeavour to govern the Church without their help or advice; that he was their sovereign, and would be obeyed."

The day before his coronation, the governor of Rome and the keeper of the castle of St Angelo waited on Sixtus to inform him that it had been the custom for every new Pope to grant an universal jail delivery, and a free pardon to all offenders; they wished to know his pleasure.

He eagerly asked for a list of the malefactors in custody; they gave him a paper filled with names, as, on these occasions, expecting what would take place, the prisons were crowded with a number of miscreants, who, in consequence of murder, robbery, and other crimes, had the sword of the law hanging over their heads.

By surrendering themselves, they all hoped and expected, according to long-established custom, to procure indemnity for past offences, and security, on being released, for persevering in their criminal courses.

"Mercy on us!" exclaimed his Holiness "what a nest of villains have we here! but are you not aware, Mr Governor, and you, Mr Jailer, of the glaring impropriety of your conduct in pretending to talk of pardon and acts of grace; leave such matters to your sovereign. Depending on your never repeating this impertinent interference with my powers and prerogatives, I, for once, will pardon it; but instantly go back to your charge and see that good care be taken of those you have in prison, for, as I hold my trust from God, if one of your prisoners escape, I will hang you on the highest gibbet I can procure."

"It was not to protect delinquents, and encourage sinners that Divine Providence placed me in the chair of St Peter; to pardon men notoriously and flagrantly wicked, who glory in their crimes and only wait for liberty that they may again practice their enormities, would be to share their guilt."

"I see you have four criminals under sentence of death for abominable crimes, and in whose favour I have applications and petitions from all quarters; their friends, I have no doubt, think they are doing right, but I must not forget my duty."

"It is therefore my pleasure," continued Sixtus in an elevated tone, and with a severe look, "it is my will and pleasure that to-morrow, at the hour of my coronation, two of them suffer by the axe, and two of them by the halter, in different quarters of the city; we shall then do an act of justice pleasing to the Almighty, and take off many of those idle and disorderly people who, at public ceremonies, generally occasion so much riot and confusion."

His orders on this occasion were literally obeyed.

The day after the ceremony, many of the nobility and gentry waited on the Pope, to congratulate him, but he said, "his was a post of toil and duty—that he had not time for compliments," and with these words he was on the point of retiring, but a master of the ceremonies informed him that a crowd of cardinals, nobles, ambassadors, senators, and wealthy citizens demanded an audience.

The greater part of them having relations, friends, or dependents, who, in consequence of their crimes, had fled from justice and joined banditti, but had lately surrendered themselves on the prospect and probability of a general and universal liberation; their expectations in this respect were disappointed as the Pope had positively declared that not a single offender should be pardoned.

The deputation represented to Sixtus in strong language the indecency of so sanguinary a proceeding, at a season which had been generally devoted to mirth and rejoicing, and were proceeding to further arguments in the hope of prevailing on him to retract his resolution.

But the person they addressed could restrain himself no longer; commanding silence on pain of his displeasure, he thus addressed them with angry looks and in a loud voice:

"I am surprised at the insolence of your representations, and your apparent ignorance of the obedience which ought, in all cases, to be paid to the orders of a sovereign prince. When the government of our holy Church was committed to Saint Peter by Christ, it surely was not his design that the successors of the holy apostle should be tutored and directed by their subjects."

"But if you do not, or will not do your duty, I am resolved to practise mine; I hope and trust that I shall not, like my predecessors, suffer law and justice to sleep; by which means the ecclesiastical states have been rendered, and are notoriously become, the most debauched, and, in every respect, the wickedest spot on the surface of the globe—a by-word to the scorner and the heretic—a reproach to the faith we profess."

"Retire (raising his arm and voice as he repeated the word, seeing the cardinals did not appear to move),—retire, and instead of wishing to obstruct law and justice, endeavour to co-operate with me in cleansing this filthy Augean stable; for, as to the criminals in question, no motive of any kind shall ever induce me to pardon one of them; each offender shall undergo, without fear, favour, partiality, or resentment, the punishment attached by law to the crime he has committed, and I shall make strict inquiry after all those who have patronised and encouraged them, whom I cannot but consider as participators in their guilt, and will also punish. The different prisoners suffered the sentence of the law. They departed in silent dismay; and a few months after, as his Holiness was repairing to St Peter's on the day of a public festival, a crowd, as was customary, assembled to see him pass; the people on this occasion were so numerous, and pressed so closely, that the Swiss guards, who always attend the Pope, were under the necessity of making way with their halberds."

Among the multitude, there happened unfortunately to be the son of a Spanish Grandee, who having arrived only that morning at Rome, had not time nor opportunity to secure an unmolested spot for viewing the procession.

This gentleman, standing foremost, was pushed back somewhat rudely. The enraged Spaniard, following the poor Swiss into the church, murdered him as he fell on his knees at the foot of the altar, and endeavoured to fly for refuge to the house of the Spanish Ambassador; he was pursued by two comrades of the deceased, and taken into custody.

Intelligence of this barbarous and sacrilegious act quickly reached the ears of Sixtus. After the service of the day was concluded, the Governor of Rome also waited on his Holiness, as he was going to his coach, to know his pleasure, and wait for instructions how to proceed.

"Well, sir," said Sixtus, "and what do you think ought to be done in a case of flagrant murder, thus committed before my face, and in the house of God?"

"I have given orders," said the officer, "for informations being taken, and a process being commenced."

"A process!" replied the Pope; "what occasion can there be for processes in a crime like this, committed before hundreds of witnesses?"

"I thought your Holiness would choose to observe due form of law," answered the Governor; "particularly in this instance, as the criminal is the only son of a person of consideration, in high favour with his Catholic Majesty, and under the protection of his Ambassador."

"Say not a word to me of consideration and protection. Crime levels every distinction; his rank and education should have taught him better. It is our pleasure that he shall be hanged before we sit down to dinner."

The trial of the prisoner being soon gone through, and a gallows erected in the interval, on a spot where the Pope could see it from the saloon in which he was sitting, he did not quit the apartment till he saw the Spaniard brought forth and suspended; he then retired from the window and went to dinner, repeating with a loud voice a favourite passage from the Psalms:—"I shall soon destroy all the ungodly in the land, and root out evil-doers from the city of the Lord."

Such was the conduct of the little peasant of Ancona when elevated to supreme power. He became a rigid but impartial censor of public defaulters and private transgressors. He ordered the public functionaries throughout his dominions to send him, each of them, a list of every person in their neighbourhood who was notorious for debauchery, drunkenness, or other vicious habits; first, inquiring into the truth of their information, he sent for and privately reprimanded them; but if this warning was not attended to, he severely punished the offender. Having deeply impressed a conviction of his inexorable regard to justice, persons exercising authority under him performed the duties with scrupulous exactness.

The various remarkable instances in which this extraordinary man exerted his powers in suppressing vicious enormity, would, if introduced in this place, extend our present article to a length inconsistent with the nature of this publication.

With respect to women, a violation of their chastity, by force or by fraud, with or against their consent, he never pardoned; and even a slight deviation from public decorum did not go unpunished; a subsequent marriage, on either of these occasions, he did not consider as a satisfaction to justice.

This delicacy so scrupulously severe, he carried to an excess in many instances, inconsistent with human infirmity, or the wishes and often the happiness of the injured women, who in several instances had their husbands torn from their embraces and committed to the galleys for follies and indiscretions committed before marriage, in the furious licentiousness of stimulating passion.

He determined to put a stop to a depraved custom then generally prevalent in his dominions among the elevated and wealthy classes of society; that of marrying a mistress to a dependent, for the purpose of procuring an ostensible parent for their illegitimate offspring, and carrying on securely an adulterous intercourse.

The first example of this kind was that of a person from whom his Holiness had experienced many acts of kindness, before he was created a Cardinal. After a momentary struggle he sent for his former friend privately, and warmly censuring him for his conduct, he warned him of the consequence of persevering in the unlawful connexion; and assured him that his duty as a magistrate was paramount to his feelings as a friend, and advised him either to remove the female or to quit his dominions. A few months after, Sixtus ordered secret spies to watch the parties, and finding that the person he had reproved still continued the criminal attachment, probably presuming on the indulgence of former friendship, he ordered the offender, the husband and wife, to be hanged without delay; three domestics, acquainted with the illicit proceeding, he ordered to be publicly whipped, for not giving information.

It had been usual for the people to exclaim "Long live the Pope" whenever he passed, but finding that this mode of acclamation prevented his dropping in unexpectedly at the courts of justice and public offices, he forbade the custom; on two unlucky rogues who, from obstinacy or inadvertency, disobeyed this injunction, he ordered the strappado to be inflicted immediately on the spot; this effectually prevented a repetition.

Assassinations and duels had disgraced the reigns of all his predecessors, and rendered Rome and Italy unsafe.

To arrest, and, if possible, remove an evil productive of public danger and private distress, he published an edict, forbidding, on pain of death, any persons, whatever their rank, drawing a sword or even having in their possession any instrument of death as they passed the streets, except his own magistrates and officers. Bystanders who did not prevent, and seconds who encouraged duelling, he instantly sent to the galleys. A few instances of rigid severity effectually removed the grievance.

Anything like revenge or bearing malice he would not endure. A barber quarrelling with one of his neighbours, held up his hand in a threatening manner, and, with a significant motion of his head, had been heard to say, "If ever he comes under my hands I will do his business." This being repeated to the Pontiff, he ordered the speaker of the obnoxious words to be taken into custody, then directing all the barbers in Rome to be collected in one of the squares, the offender underwent a long and severe whipping before them.

His Holiness observing that tradesmen suffered seriously and often became bankrupts, in consequence of long credit and bad pay, to the great injury of commerce, and frequently of the public revenue, he quickly produced an important reformation on a point which loudly calls for amendment in Great Britain and Ireland.

A hint to his officers that he wished to collect information on the subject was sufficient. A tradesman, in all probability previously instructed, made complaint, that having applied to a person of distinction for payment of a debt which had been long due, and of which he stood in urgent need, the debtor had violently resented it, withdrawn his own custom from the poor man's shop, and persuaded many others to do the like, telling the person he injured, in an insolent manner, "That gentlemen paid their debts only when they pleased."

Sixtus sent for both parties, ordered the money to be instantly paid, with interest from the time of its being due, and committed the fraudulent debtor to prison.

At the same time a proclamation was issued, directing all the merchants and tradesmen to send his Holiness a list of their book debts, with the names of those from whom the money was due; he directly paid the whole, taking the debts on himself, which, in consequence of the general alarm, were quickly discharged.

It is scarcely necessary to observe, that the subject of our present article exercised a rigid and inexorable despotism; but exerting it in most instances with impartial justice, and for salutary purposes, his power was submitted to with less reluctance: he is called, by a writer of that period, a terror and a scourge; but it was to evil doers, to the profligate, the incorrigible, and the corrupt. Most rational men, I believe, would prefer living under an absolute monarch of such a cast, than under the easy sway of a lax moralist, a generous libertine, or one of those devilish good kind of fellows who are commonly described as no man's enemy but their own; a character which cannot exist,—as it is impossible he can be a friend to others who is in a state of constant hostility with himself. At all events the great interests of society's public happiness and private peace are most effectually preserved by a prince like Montalto.

In his transactions with foreign princes, Sixtus uniformly preserved a dignified firmness, from which he never relaxed. Very early in his reign, he was involved in a dispute with Philip the 11th, King of Spain, who, though the most superstitious of bigots to the Catholic faith, was a constant object of the Pope's hostility, while the heretic Elisabeth, Queen of England, was a character he warmly admired, and never mentioned without enthusiastic admiration.

Speaking of her, on a certain occasion, to an English Catholic who visited Rome, he observed, "a Queen like yours deserves to reign; she governs her kingdom with energy and wisdom; respected abroad, and loved or feared at home, her subjects enjoy the benefits of a vigorous and successful administration. If such a woman were to become my wife, we might people the world with a race of Scipios, Cæsars, and Alexanders."

Yet, in his public capacity, as head of the Catholic church, he found it necessary to publish a bull of excommunication against Elisabeth, when Philip meditated an invasion of England with his invincible Spanish Armada.

At the same time, he privately informed her of the proceedings and intrigues of Philip against her, earnestly recommending her Majesty to prepare for a vigorous defence.

The subsequent defeat and disappointment of the Spanish King in this attempt, commenced with so much threatening arrogance, and carried on at so enormous an expence, is known to most readers, and was highly gratifying to Sixtus.

The imprisonment and execution of Mary, Queen of Scots, an event which produced a strong and universal sensation through Europe, has, in modern times, excited a long and animated controversy. Various have been the opinions on the justice of Elisabeth's proceedings.

As weak states, in contests of a more important kind, find it necessary sometimes to call in the aid of powerful allies, I may be permitted to observe, that the Pontiff Sixtus was often heard to say, "Had I been King of England, I would have acted precisely in the same manner."

When he was first informed that the unfortunate Mary was beheaded, he rose suddenly from his seat, and traversed the apartment in much apparent agitation, but not the agitation of regret, for, throwing himself into a chair, he exclaimed, "O happy Queen of England! how much art thou to be envied, who hast been found worthy of seeing a crowned head prostrate at thy feet!"

These words were evidently spoken with reference to Philip King of Spain, whose name was never mentioned in his presence without producing angry looks.

Sixtus could never submit with patience to a ceremony annually performed by the Spanish Ambassador; this was the presenting a Cenet to his Holiness by way of acknowledgment that his master held the kingdom of Naples of the Pope.

On one of these occasions, rising hastily from his throne, he said in a loud voice, to Count Olivarez, "Our predecessors must certainly have been in a very complaisant mood, when they agreed to accept from your master's ancestors a poor pitiful hack, in return for a rich and flourishing kingdom. I hope soon to put an end to this mummary, and to visit the kingdom of Naples as its lawful sovereign."

But circumstance and situation were not favourable to his executing this purpose, which was the fond wish of his heart.

Such was Sixtus the Fifth, who directed the officers of his palace to give audience on every occasion to the poorest man in his dominions; who listened with condescension to the unfortunate, the widow, and the orphan; but punished with inexorable severity criminal delinquency, respecting neither person, rank, nor wealth; who was moderate in his enjoyments, of pure morals, and correct in private life. The revenues of the state, almost annihilated by the rapacious anticipation of his predecessors, he restored to more than double their former nominal amount. In the public treasury, which was exhausted at the time of his election, his successor found five millions in gold; his personal expenses were trifling, but his private charities amounted every year to a considerable sum; on these occasions he sought for and generally found patient, meek, and unassuming merit struggling with adversity; the perverse and importunate mendicant who begged by day and thieved at night, he ordered out of the city with reproof and frequently with stripes; so salutary were his edicts, and so undeviating and rigid the impartiality with which he enforced them, that his judges and police officers confessed that their places were become sinecures. Such was Sixtus the Fifth who, if the qualities we describe are the first and most indispensable duties of a monarch, deserves to be classed with the first and most glorious of kings, and to be numbered with the greatest benefactors of mankind.

He was deficient it must be confessed in the mild acts of gentle persuasion; he was a stranger to the suaviter in modo; but to such a pitch was the wickedness and enormity of his subjects carried, that a governor of a mild character would have been disobeyed and despised. But he possessed a qualification more essential and exactly calculated for the times in which he lived, the fortiter in re; an eagle-eyed acuteness to search after and to see criminality and fraud, however concealed or disguised, together with unabating energy and an unconquerable resolution to resist and punish them.

THE WEEK.

From Wednesday the 17th to Tuesday the 23d December.

MUMMING, AN OLD CHRISTMAS SPORT.

As Christmas is coming, and we intend on many accounts not to let it pass without notice, we thought we might as well anticipate its arrival by some previous instructions, and, among others, by an extract or two from good old holiday books. We do not recollect whether Mr Hone, in one of his many zealous and entertaining volumes, has given the following passages from 'Brand's Popular Antiquities.' Most probably he has; but if the noticers of such subjects avoid all which he has taken, we hardly know what would be left them; and repetition, like that of the sports themselves, is excusable in due season.

The latest notice of Mummung that we are aware of, is in the memoirs of the most jolly and holiday-making Pepys, who, in the Diary which he kept with so extraordinary a mixture of preciseness and anti-preciseness, recordeth that, at some Christmas meeting (we forget the place), he and some friends of his, male and female, played all sorts of pranks, after the fashion recorded in our extract, and, among other things, "did black their faces like devils."

Mummung (says Mr Brand) is a sport of this festive season, which consists in changing clothes between men and women, who, when dressed in each other's habits, go from one neighbour's house to another, partaking of Christmas cheer, and making merry with them in disguise.

Mummer signifies a masker, one disguised under a vizard; from the Danish Mumme, or Dutch Momme. Lipsius tells us in his 44th Epistle, Book III, that mornar, which is used by the Scillians for a fool, signifies, in French, and in our language, a person with a mask on. See Junij Etymolog. in verbo.

It is supposed to have been originally instituted in imitation of the Sigillaria, or Festival Days added to the ancient Saturnalia, and was condemned by the Synod of Trullus, where it was agreed that the days called the Calends should be entirely stripped of their ceremonies, and that the faithful should no longer observe them; that the public dances of women should cease, as being the occasion of much harm and ruin, and as being invented and observed in honour of the gods of the heathens, and therefore quite averse to the Christian life. They therefore decreed that no man should be clothed with a woman's garment, nor any woman with a man's.

The author of the 'Convivial Antiquities,' speaking of Mummung in Germany, says, that in the ancient Saturnalia, there were frequent and luxurious feasts among friends: presents were mutually sent, and changes of dress made; that Christians have adopted the same customs, which continue to be used from the Nativity to the Epiphany: that feasts are frequent during the whole time, and we send what are called New Year's Gifts; that exchanges of dress, too, as of old among the Romans, are common; and neighbours, by mutual invitations, visit each other in the manner which the Germans call Mummung. He adds that, as the Heathens had their Saturnalia in December, their Sigillaria in January, and the Lupercalia and Bacchanalia in February,—so, amongst Christians, these three months are devoted to feasting and revellings of every kind.

Stowe has preserved an account of a remarkable Mummung, A.D. 1377, made by the citizens of London, for disport to the young Prince Richard, son to the Black Prince.

"On the Sunday before Candlemas, in the night, one hundred and thirty citizens, disguised, and well horsed, in a Mummenie, with sound of trumpets, sackbuts, eornets, shalmes, and other minstrels, and innumerable torch-lights of wax, rode to Kennington, beside Lambeth, where the young Prince remayned with his mother. In the first ranke did ride forty-eight, in the likeness and habit of esquires, two and two together, clothed in red coats and gowas of sey, or sandall, with comely visors on their faces. After them came forty-eight knights in the same livery. Then followed one richlie arrayed, like an emperor; and after him some distance, one stately tyred, like a pope, whom followed twenty-four cardinals; and, after them, eight or ten with black visors, not amiable, as if they had been legates from some forrain princes.

"These maskers, after they had entered the manor of Kennington, alighted from their horses, and entered the hall on foot; which done, the Prince, his mother, and the Lords, came out of the chamber into the hall, whom the Mummers did salute, shewing, by a paire of dice upon the table, their desire to play with the young Prince, which they so handled, that the Prince did alwaies winne when he caste them.

"Then the Mummers set to the Prince three jewels, one after another, which were a boule of gold, a cup of gold, and a ring of gold, which the Prince wonne at three castes. Then they set to the Prince's mother, the Duke, the Earls, and the other Lords, to every one a ring of gold, which they did also winne. After which they were feasted, and the music sounded, the Prince and Lords daunced with the Mummers on the one part, which did also dance; which jollitie being ended, they were againe made to drinke, and then departed in order as they came."

"The like," he says, "was donne to King Henry the Fourth, in the second year of his reign, hee then keeping his Christmas at Eltham; twelve aldermen and their sonnes rode a Mumming, and had great thanks."

We read of another mumming, in Henry the Fourth's time, in 'Fabyen's Chronicle,' edit. Pynson, 1516, fol. 169, "in winche passe tyme the Dukys of Amnarle, of Surrey, and of Excester, with the Erllys of Salesbury and Gloucestyr, with other of their affynte, made provysion for a Dysguysynge or a Mummynge to be shewed to the Kyng upon Twelfethe Nyghte, and the tyme was nere at hande, and all thinge readie for the same. Upon the sayde Twelfethe Daye came secretlye unto the Kyng the Duke of Amnarle, and shewyd to him, that hee, wyth the othere lordys aforesayd, were appoynted to sle hym in the tyme of the froe sayd Dysguysynge." So that this Mummung, it should seem, had like to have proved a very serious jest.

In the tract intitled 'Round about our Coal-fire, or Christmas Entertainments,' 8vo. Lond., I find the following;—"Then comes mumming or masquerading, when the Squire's wardrobe is ransacked for dresses of all kinds. Corks are burnt to black the faces of the fair, or make deputy-mustachios, and every one in the family, except the Squire himself, must be transformed."

This account further says:—"The time of the year being cold and frosty, the diversions are within doors, either in exercise or by the fire-side. Dancing is one of the chief exercises, or else there is a match at blindman's buff, or puss in the corner. The next game is 'Questions and Commands,' when the commander may oblige his subjects to answer any lawful question, and make the same obey him instantly, under the penalty of being omitted, or paying such forfeit as may be laid on the aggressor. Most of the other diversions are cards and dice."

SISTERS OF CHARITY.

We extract the following notice of this admirable institution from the 'New Year's Gift for 1835,' edited by Mrs Alaric Watts, a very attractive number of that periodical. We regret we cannot give the plate which accompanies it, presenting a Sister in the costume of the Society; but all who can afford to purchase the book should get it for their children, were it only for the plate and this article; and there are very good things in it besides. We had the pleasure of seeing a few of the Sisters of Charity once, in passing through the city of Lyons, albeit the glimpse presented us with little more than the skirts of their dress, for they were turning the corner of a street, we believe, in procession. We have nevertheless treasured up the sight in our memory, as a moral counterpart to that of the shining and heavenly top of Mont Blanc, which we saw from a road in the neighbourhood. Both sights seemed the nearest heaven of any we ever beheld.

"Oh! what a singular dress that young lady has on, and how thoughtful she looks," was the observation of Blanche Wilson, a lovely girl of ten years old, as she drew from a portfolio the engraving which may be seen on the opposite page.

"That lady, my dear," replied her mother, "belongs to a community whose lives are past amidst scenes of suffering and distress. It would not therefore be surprising if sympathy with the afflicted should have given a sedate expression to features lovely as those before you."

"Oh! do tell me her history," exclaimed the little girl eagerly, "where you first saw her, and why she wears that singular costume? I long to know all about her."

"I will answer your query first," replied her mother. "She wears that dress simply because it is the habit of the charitable order of which she is a member—an institution peculiar to the Roman Catholic Church, at once its highest boast and its greatest ornament."

"But what are the particular duties of these charitable Sisters?" inquired the little girl.

"Those of the Samaritan of old, my dear; to visit the sick poor, both at their own houses and at the public hospitals; to nurse and administer medicines, and to afford them the consolations of religion. These are the occupations of a Sister of Charity; duties simple in their enumeration, difficult in their fulfilment, but boundless in their importance and extent."

"But, mamma, if their object is so praiseworthy, why have not we Sisters of Charity as well as the Roman Catholics?" inquired the little girl.

"That is a question, Blanche," replied Mrs. Wilson, "that I have often put both to myself and others, but to which I have never received any satisfactory reply. I cannot believe that we have less benevolence amongst us than our Gallic neighbours. I am therefore bound to suppose, either that the idea has never occurred to the influential or humane, or that hitherto no ladies have been found of sufficient nerve to brave the misrepresentation and ridicule which would, in the first instance, attach to a Protestant Sisterhood."

"But, mamma," interrupted Blanche, "how often have I heard you yourself say, that—

'Evil and good report, if undeserved,
Is soon lived down.'

Think how different would have been the lot of hundreds of unhappy convicts, if Mrs Fry had been deterred from attempting to better their condition from the mere dread of ridicule and misrepresentation."

"That is most true, my dear; nor do I yet despair of seeing among us, at some future day, an establishment very similar to the one founded by Vincent St Paul some two hundred years ago. Meantime I am happy to inform you, that at this very period a house is erecting between St Leonard's and Hastings for a community of these Charitable Sisters, who, in addition to the duties before enumerated, propose taking upon themselves the further responsibility of educating and fitting for domestic servants, as many of the destitute poor as the funds of the institution will permit. In this labour of love, to use their own words, they 'neither make distinction of sect nor creed, nor accept nor expect any remuneration whatever.'"

"Oh! how very kind," interrupted Blanche, "but have they always been equally liberal in the distribution of their charity?"

"Always; from its first foundation. The benevolence of its projector was of too diffusive a character to limit his wishes of relieving distress to the members of his own church; and this truly Christian spirit is a distinguishing feature of the society to the present day. To the unwearied care of the Sisters are many hundreds of English wives and mothers indebted for the very existence of those they love. Thousands of British subjects, while languishing as prisoners in the hospitals of France, have borne witness how literally these daughters of Pity fulfil the injunction of their Divine Master, 'If thine enemy hunger, give him bread; if he thirst, give him drink.' Many of our fellow-countrymen are there at this moment, who can adopt the words of Scripture, and say, '—I was hungry, and ye gave me bread; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink; I was sick, and in prison, and ye visited me; I was a stranger, and ye took me in!'"

Tears filled the eyes of the child as she continued her mother's quotation, and repeated the reply of our Lord to the query of his disciples, of ("when they had ministered unto him,") "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto the least of my people, ye have done it unto me."

Both parent and child were silent for a few minutes, after which the former then continued the conversation.

"The Order of the Sisters of Charity was established by Vincent St Paul in the year 1629, assisted by the counsel and co-operation of a lady of rank, named Le Grés. This benevolent individual not only bestowed her whole fortune for the establishment of the institution, but took upon herself an active part in its management and labours. Thus, while the worthy pastor was travelling from town to town, and from village to village, preaching in aid of the funds of the Society, she remained at Paris, inciting the charitable of her own sex to become the dispensers of this bounty thus collected."

"On its first commencement, when hospitals were unhappily more scarce than they have since become, the afflicted poor were received into the houses of this community; but, alas! it was soon evident, that however ample the funds of the society might be, they were inadequate for a temporary maintenance of even half the unhappy claimants that presented themselves; the Sisters were therefore under the necessity of attending the least destitute poor at their own houses; and this excellent method of ascertaining the wants of the afflicted, as well as the best means of alleviating them, is pursued to the present day."

"But, mamma," inquired Blanche, "are not the Sisters of Charity obliged to take upon themselves some vows which are thought objectionable by Protestants?"

"The vows of the Sisters of Charity are simply these—'Poverty, obedience, and service to the poor.' These vows are limited to one year, although many continue their labours for a long life. During this period, their vow of 'poverty' prevents their enjoying property individually; neither can they marry; their 'obedience' consists in an adherence to the regulations of the Society; and their 'service to the poor' in relieving the distressed, without distinction of creed or country."

"But, mamma," interrupted Blanche, "I do not see what could be objected to in anything you have named,—the vows are so simple, and for so short a period."

"It would detain us too long to enter minutely into that question," replied her mother; "but there can be no doubt that the arrangement might be so modified as to meet the scruples of the most timid; and it would be well for us all to bear in mind, that, even in its existing form, it is an institution of humanity. It does not measure its members within stone walls—it sends them forth into the world in all the beautiful energy of benevolence; and, when the calls on their labour of love have ceased, not cramped by indolence, or soured by austerity, but glowing with the wholesome fatigue of good work, to enjoy peaceful repose, until the dawn of another day calls them to minister to the affliction it brings with it."

"But the dress, mamma—the dress—how came they to choose so strange a costume? It is very unbecoming."

"I fancy, my dear, that persons who voluntarily take upon themselves the duties I have enumerated, would not be very solicitous on that head. The dress, with the exception of the head, is exactly similar to the one which the first sister, Madame Le Grés, is represented to have worn. It consists of a black stuff petticoat, with the body made jacket-wise; a blue apron; with stockings of the same colour; a white collar and cap, the latter modelled from the form which a handkerchief took for a moment, as it fell from the head of Louis the Fourteenth on the head of one of the Sisters."

"How strange! But did the King accidentally drop his handkerchief?" inquired Blanche.

"No," replied her mother; "the Sister whom the King chanced to encounter happened to be very lovely, and his Majesty remarked, that 'she needed a veil to conceal her loveliness from vulgar eyes,' and, suiting the action to the word, invested her with the embroidered handkerchief he held in his hand. This is the origin of the only very singular part of their costume. But we will resume their history on some future occasion, when I trust to be able to narrate to you a series of anecdotes illustrative of their benevolence, which will greatly enhance the interest of the sketch on which our present conversation has originated."

FINE ARTS.

The Literary Souvenir. Hodgson, Boys, and Graves.

THE 'Literary Souvenir' does great credit to its class of publications this year, so far as we know it, namely, as to its plates. There is great variety, novelty, and interest, in the major part of the illustrations; and in many of them great beauty. To the 'Storm in Harvest,' however, we cannot concede the attribute of novelty; nor can we, unassisted by any enlightening text, divine the occasion of its being introduced in an Annual, at this time of day. It has certainly many points of merit; but it loses much by being in so confined a space; and, at the best, is not a very expressive design; the subject is not suited to Westall; the artificiality and superciliousness of his style are totally unfit for rustic subjects, or the representation of powerful feelings. The best bit in the thing, is the girl hiding her face in the young man's breast. We cannot altogether pass over the defects in the series, some of which are very conspicuous. What is there of Diana Vernon, in the so-called female? still greater difficulty is there in discerning aught of the 'Italian Peasant' in Mr Pickersgill's picture. There is a striking family likeness in all that artist's productions, and they are all most unequivocally English, be they called Spanish, Greek, or Italian. Still farther from all mark or likelihood is the gentlewoman who bears the name of 'Gulnare.' Where is the beauty, the voluptuousness, the passion? We know the artists are not always answerable for these impropriations; artists are sometimes thrust upon their unlucky offspring, who are forced to disown their honest name, and shame their parents. This is cruelty! But oftentimes the artists themselves are so conscious of working at random, that they are glad if any stranger will decide upon the nature and meaning of what they have executed—are willing that any editor, or publisher, give their "airy nothing a local habitation and a name."

In these Annuals are various fantastic relationships devised; sometimes a design is made to illustrate prose or verse; sometimes prose or verse, by an inverse process, is made to suit the picture; and sometimes are text and design, equally innocent of all share in each other's being, total strangers till they meet at the publisher's, are sewed up side by side, and are made to pass for the nearest relations, friends by birth. We do not apply these remarks to the Annual before us, but to the class generally. It is an abuse that has many excuses, and there are many difficulties in the way of its avoidance; but it is not the less an abuse, and it were as well got rid of. Has not some such act of illegitimation been passed upon Skothard's picture, which is here called 'The Vintage?' There are grapes truly, and one out of the half-dozen figures is plucking them;—but what are the rest about? How do the close-packed group, the inactive postures of the figures, the total absence of bustle, or general vivacity, portray a vintage? Is it not rather an impersonation of the Seasons? The young woman to the right is Spring;—the maturer female, with the children, is genial Summer, the brown-skinned man is Autumn, the old crone, Winter. There is, no doubt, from the clearest internal evidence, that such is the original design, at whose door soever the misappropriation is to be laid, even should it be traced to the artist himself. As 'The Vintage,' beautiful as the individual figures are, it were tame, formal, and fantastic; as an allegory of the Seasons, it is beautifully expressive and simple, and the grouping graceful and appropriate. The tone and colouring are charming, and charmingly rendered by the engraver, J. Goodwyn. There are two capital pieces of nature contributed by Collins, 'The Haunts of the Sea Fowl,' and 'Prawn Fishers,' the former is rather blackly engraved. The broad bit of solid green in the foreground, so real and so pleasing in the picture, has become heavy in the print, and the distance does not know its place so well. The 'Ancient Garden,' (sunset,) by Danby, is a striking picture; a little artificially made up, perhaps, but it has a fine, solemn, melancholy effect. 'Euphrosyne' by Skothard, has scarcely the semblance of mirth,—"heart easing,"—she looks gentle, and even cheerful, but she is not "mirth"; she lacks animal spirits; the head, considered as that of a beautiful girl, merely, is fine; in a certain graceful and epic simplicity, it is truly worthy of the English Raphael. There is a Bonington, 'Interior of the Abbey of St Ouen,' not one of the best by that artist, but effective; and a striking composition by Roberts, 'Rain—Sunset,' one of the very best we have seen of his; less mannered, but not less striking. The flower of the bunch, however, is 'Dorothea,' by Middleton. Cervantes's sweet description of the injured Dorothea has struck the fancy of many a painter, and numerous have been the attempts it has inspired; but never have we seen an attempt so completely successful as this of Middleton's. We do not remember to have seen this gentleman's name before, which possibly is our inadvertency; if he be a young man, we shall hope to see many more such creations. How truly lovely is the first glimpse we obtain of Dorothea in reading Don Quixote! What a mixture of beauty and mystery; of engaging helplessness, of a certain voluptuous negligence; how picturesque and touching is the accident, as a painter would call it, of her having her feet in the water; how it tells her weariness; what a natural and pretty restorative; and how it links the gentle, natural girl, with the elements and peacefulness of the scene around her. The young girl has wandered from her home, disguised as a boy; wearied with travel and her anxious thoughts, and, trusting to the solitude she is in, she sits down by a rivulet, and, slaking her weary little feet in the cool water, she abandons herself to her fatigued reflections, quite forgetting her disguise. What a subject for a picture; and here it is,—thanks to Mr Middleton. The figure is exceedingly elegant and womanly; the attitude expressive and graceful; the countenance tender, pensive, lovely, and sweet-natured. There is another production of Middleton's in the book, of a less interesting subject, but highly creditable to his talents in the execution. The rest of the engravings (there are five-and-twenty in all) are of various interest and merit; we have mentioned the most remarkable. They are generally carefully and skilfully executed; and the getting up of the work is altogether handsome.

Elegy written in a Country Church-yard: by Thomas Gray. John Van Voorst.

Is Mr John Martin who signs the preface, the Mr Martin? "We merely ask for information," and that we may know to whom we are to be obliged for a very elegant and interesting edition of this popular poem. Every stanza is illustrated with an appropriate wood-cut, and many of the designs are truly beautiful, particularly the 'Sunset,' by Copley Fielding; the 'Dawn,' by Constable; the 'Father's Return,' by Steadman, though not of his best, is very pleasing; the little 'Village Hampden,' by Calloot is good; Mulready's 'Young Author,' waiting in the hall of his rich patron, is truly excellent—with the milliner, all trimming and cap-box, the sleeping porter, the "pampered menial" lounging insolently at the door. The book is not without defects, but the only one of any magnitude is a ludicrous misconception on the part of a Mr F. Howard of his author's meaning. It is in illustration of the stanza beginning "Here rests his head upon the lap of earth"—accordingly, we see a genteel young man in black, dressed like Mr Charles Kemble in Romeo, reclining by a rivulet, whereas the lines speak of a man who has received decent Christian burial.

BENTHAM ON ANGER.

[FROM his posthumous work, intitled 'Deontology,' from which so many excellent passages have been extracted in the LONDON JOURNAL.]

LET the passion of anger be analysed, and its consequences traced. When under its influence a man is suffering pain—pain produced by the contemplation of the act which has excited the passion, an immediate consequence is, a desire to produce pain in the breast of the party who has excited the anger. Anger, then, has in it two constant ingredients,—pain suffered by the angry man, and a desire to give pain to the person by whom he has been made angry.

And now to the question of virtue and vice. As there is no anger without pain, the man who draws pain upon himself without the compensation of a more than equivalent pleasure, violates the law of prudence.

Next comes the desire to produce pain in the breast of the object of anger. This desire cannot be gratified without malevolence and maleficence. Here is an obvious violation of the law of benevolence. And here we have an exemplification of the relationship between passion and pain and pleasure; between passion and virtue and vice.

Cannot anger then be indulged without vice in both its shapes, without imprudence and without maleficence?

It cannot! It cannot, at least, whenever it rises to the height of passion. And here a more remote but more mischievous result presents itself to view, as a violation of the law of self-regarding prudence. The passion cannot be gratified but by the production of pain in his breast by whom the anger has been excited, and pain cannot be produced there without a counter desire to retaliate the pain or greater pain on him who has produced it. To the pain in the breast of the angry man there is a termination, and most commonly a speedy termination, but to the remote pain, which may be considered a third link in the chain of causes and effects, who can put a limit? Anger may have had what is called its revenge, but the exercise of that revenge may have created the durable passion of enmity, to whose consequences it is impossible to affix a boundary.

Since anger cannot exist without vice, what is to be done? Can a man exist without anger? Without anger can injuries be averted, can self-defence, can self-preservation be provided for?

Certainly not without the production of pain to him who has inflicted the injury. But to the production of this pain anger is not necessary. Anger is no more necessary than to the surgeon by whom, to save suffering or life, a painful operation is performed. No anger is excited in his breast by the view of the agony he inflicts, or by the contemplation of the greater evil which would follow but for his interference. That anger should never have place is not possible: it is not consistent with the structure of the human mind. But it may be said, and that on every occasion, and without any exception, that the less there is of it the better; for whatever pain is needful to the production of the useful effect, that pain will be much better measured without the passion than by it.

But, it may be said, there are circumstances in which not only pain—the natural effect of anger—pain purposely produced, but anger itself, the passion of anger, is useful and even necessary to the existence of society, and that these circumstances in our own country, extend over the whole field of penal jurisprudence. I have been robbed—the offender, on conviction, will be capitally punished, or transported in a state of servitude. Shall I prosecute him? Not if self-regarding prudence is alone to be my counsellor; for her counsel would be—Add not to the loss inflicted by the robbery, the further loss inflicted on you by the prosecution. Not if I consult benevolence, for she would say—The punishment is too great for the offence. And such is the response which, in the knowledge of everybody, and especially when the punishment of death is menaced, frequently determines a man's conduct.

But, were the matter rightly considered, the response, it might be said, would be—Yes, prosecute; for the good of the community requires that neither the suffering of the offender in the shape of punishment, nor the suffering of yourself, the prosecutor, in the shape of vexation and expence, should be grudged. Good! But I can ill afford it: the pecuniary burden to me will be greater than that uncertain, unestimated, and remote benefit which will grow out of the prosecution and its results. Again, the responses of benevolence have no influence with me. Be they ever so decisive, they have not a preponderant weight in my mind.

In this case, neither prudence nor benevolence will produce action; and yet, if action were not produced, the security of society would suffer a serious shock—a shock serious in proportion to its frequency; and, if constant, security would be wholly destroyed, and the general ruin of property would immediately follow. The supposed virtue in both its forms is sufficient to preserve society, and anger, however dissocial its character, is indispensably necessary.

TABLE TALK.

Exquisite Rhyme.—(Butler, speaking of an apothecary):—

Stored with deleterious medicines,
Which whosoever took is dead since.

—POETRY, PHILOSOPHY, RELIGION, are united in the spirit of Love. By that spirit, expanded and elevated, Intellect and Imagination create within themselves conceptions and emotions of the sublime and beautiful, the spiritual and the everlasting. Poetry is the produce of Love in its delight—Philosophy of Love in its wonder—Religion of Love in its gratitude—and thus, in all higher moods, the Three are One. Love broods on the wonders of its own delight, and Poetry is solemnized into Philosophy. Love is instructed in the first cause, and Philosophy is sanctified into Religion. Then sings the philosophical pious Poet his hymns and odes on Nature and Nature's God, and the tongues of men are as Angels.—Essays on Spenser in Blackwood's Magazine.

A Secret of Longevity.—Admiration and light contemplation are very powerful to the prolonging of life; for they hold the spirits in such things as delight them, and suffer them not to tumultuate or to carry themselves unquietly, and waywardly. And therefore all the contemplators of natural things which had so many and so eminent objects to admire (as Democritus, Plato, Parmenides, Apollonius,) were long lived; also Rhetoricians which tasted but lightly of things, and studied rather exornation of speech than profundity of matter, were long lived (as Gorgias, Protagoras, Isocrates, Seneca,) and certainly, as old men are, for the most part, talkative, so talkative men do often grow old: for it shews a light contemplation; and such as does not much strain the spirits, or vex them. But subtil, and acute, and eager inquisition shorten life; for it tireth the spirit, and wasteth it.—Bacon's History of Life and Death.

The Poor of England.—The poor deserve all the attention we can give them; they are grateful and respectful to their superiors, and most kind to one another. Contempt, or neglect, they will resent it, and they have a right to do so; but let any one manifest an interest in their concerns, address them kindly, assist them with discrimination, refuse, when necessary, with mildness, and reprove with temper, and he will never find reason to complain. As the almoner of public charities, I have been brought into contact with thousands of them of all grades, from the respectable artizan down to the imprisoned felon. I have never been treated with disrespect; and have far more frequently had reason to blush at the excess of their gratitude, than to reproach them for unthankfulness. Their kindness to one another in their distresses is most exemplary and affecting. When pleading for a neighbour, they will indeed urge the absence of every claim upon themselves, and their inability to afford any assistance; but after the aid they have been soliciting has either been obtained or denied, they will cheerfully divide their morsel, and perform voluntarily and gratuitously every service. Their faults are on the surface, and are often nothing more than that coarseness of manner which belongs to their station; but whoever will study them thoroughly will be compelled to admire their general character, and will feel it an enviable privilege to be enabled to relieve distresses in which it is impossible not to sympathize, and to place them generally in circumstances which shall afford scope and encouragement to their virtues.—Mr Osler, in Communications to the Poor-Law Commissioners.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

F., who writes to us on a point in our Supplement connected with Northumberland House, shall have an explanation in our next. He is quite mistaken respecting the intention of the passage.

The Sonnet to F. M. W. will be inserted with pleasure.

ALANNENSIS and C. P. J. have our best thanks; but they will have seen that their communication was anticipated.

We respect J. D. for the way in which he consoles his misfortunes.

We congratulate A. N. on his happiness.

Eva shall be attended to, as soon as we have done our duty to 'Christie's Will.'

A READER has obliged us in pointing out to our attention the book he speaks of, connected with city history. We shall procure a sight of it.

The Tales mentioned by H. H. have a promising title; but we presume it would better suit his purpose to publish them elsewhere.

The verses of W. S. S. have good points, but are very unequal.

A communication from our friend, "The Hans Sachs of Dover," shall appear the first opportunity.

The elegant selection of French poetry, intitled Fleurs de Poesie Moderne, published by Messrs Chapman and Hall, has been received, and will have further notice.

W. H. C. appears to have a genuine taste for Poussin.

The kind recommendation of our Bristol friend shall be duly considered.

We had the pleasure of receiving both the letters of our friend W. H. S.

The question between A. CONSTANT READER and his friend, respecting our non-notice of Mr Braham in other periodicals, is easily settled. We have had the pleasure of recording our admiration of him (so to speak) a thousand times.

We will make a point of seeing the articles mentioned by Mr A. C., and of taking his proposal into consideration.

The use of the word "domestic" in a national sense, as opposed to "foreign," is certainly not correct in the abstract, since, taken literally, it applies only to dowms or the house; yet as all the internal politics of a nation affect people more or less in their domesticities, and may be said, literally as well as metaphorically, to "come home to men's business and bosoms," and as a strong sense of this identification of national and household interests is shown in a variety of phrases in use, such as "home-consumption," "at home and abroad," meaning out of doors merely, or in another country, &c., it appears to us that custom (a great warrant in itself) has justly determined the question so politely referred to our judgment by Mr C. R.

The 'Horrors of Atheism,' a Vision from Jean Paul Richter, shall appear speedily.

☺ We should be happy to encourage the ingenious studies of E. N. who translates from Schiller; but can he not find some shorter passage?

We are obliged to ONE OF THE MILLION for his kind expressions. The edition alluded to is not an edition already existing, but one contemplated. Perhaps ONE OF THE MILLION will find the point in question satisfactorily noticed in an article which will appear in the LONDON JOURNAL next Wednesday.

The communication of our friend BOOKWORM next week. His wishes with regard to the printing shall be attended to.

MR TEAR'S 'One Step Further in Stenography' shall be noticed forthwith.

PRICE THREE HALFPENCE.

TO THE PUBLIC.

For the convenience of those who may like to begin a new purchase with a new year, as well as for the fitness of the thing in itself, the volume of the LONDON JOURNAL for 1834, though its first number appeared in April, will close with the 31st of December, and the volume for 1835 commence with the first week of January. A title page and index to the present year's volume, for binding up with sets that have been kept by the readers, will appear without delay; and complete volumes may be had of the publisher, Mr Hooper, or by order on any other bookseller.

CHRISTMAS EVE AND CHRISTMAS DAY.

THE Almanack has been very accommodating to us this year, in enabling us to publish a Journal on the eve of the three great annual holidays; for May-Day Eve, Christmas Eve, and New Year's Eve, all fall on a Wednesday; so that we can prepare for a day of merriment with our readers, right upon the coming of the day itself, without interfering with it when it comes.

Of these three holidays, Christmas Day is, for many reasons, the greatest; and one reason among others is, that it stands out of the winter-time, the first and warmest of them. It is the eye and fire of the season, as the fire is of Christmas and of one's room. We have always loved it, and ever shall; first, (to give a child's reason, and a very good one, too, in this instance,) because Christmas Day is Christmas Day; second, (which is included in that reason, or rather includes it, for it is the greatest,) because of a high argument, which will, more properly, stand by itself at the close of this article; third, because of the hollies and other evergreens which people conspire to bring into cities and houses on this day, making a kind of summer in winter, and reminding us that "The poetry of earth is never dead;" fourth, because we were brought up in a cloistered school, where carols had not gone out of fashion, and used to sit in circles round huge fires, fit to roast an ox, making inconceivable bliss out of cakes and sour oranges; fifth, because of the fine things which the poets and others have said of it; sixth, because there is no business going on,—"Mammon" is suspended; and, seventh, because New Year's Day and Twelfth Day come after it; that is to say, because it is the leader of a set of holidays, and the spirit is not beaten down into common-place the moment it is over. It closes and begins the year with cheerfulness.

We have collected, under the head of 'The Week,' some notices of the other principal points connected with Christmas. Most of them are now losing their old lustre, only to give way, we trust, by and by, to better evidences of rejoicing. The beadle we can dispense with, and even the Christmas-boxes; especially as we hope nobody will then want them. And the 'Bellman's Verses' shall turn to something nobler, albeit, we have a liking for him; ay, for his very absurdities; there is something in them so old, so unpretending, and so reminiscent about him. As long as the bellman is alive, one's grandfather does not seem dead, and his cocked-hat lives with him. Good 'Bellman's Verses' will not do at all. There have been some such things of late, "most tolerable and not to be endured." We have even seen them witty, which is a great mistake. Warton and Cowper unthinkingly set the way to them. You may be child-like at Christmas; you may be merry; you may be absurd,—in the worldly sense of the term; but you must write with a faith, and so redeem your old Christmas reputation somehow. Belief in something great and good preserves a respectability, even in the most childish mistakes; but it feels that the company of banter is unworthy of it. The very absurdity of the 'Bellman's Verses' is only bearable, nay only pleasant, when we suppose them written by some actual doggerel-poet in good faith. Mere mediocrity hardly allows us to give our Christmas-box, or to believe it now-a-days in earnest; and the smartness of your cleverest worldly-wise men is felt to be wholly out of place. No, no; give us the good old decrepid 'Bellman's Verses,' hobbling as their bringer, and taking themselves for something respectable like his cocked-hat, or give us none at all. We should not like even to see him in a round hat. He would lose something of the old and oracular by it. If in a round hat, he should keep out of sight, and not contradict the portrait of himself at the top of his sheet of verses, with his bell and his beadle's staff. The pictures round the verses may be new; but we like the old better, no matter how worn out, provided the subject be discernible; no matter what blots for the eyes, and muddiness for the clouds. The worst of these old wood-cuts are often copied from good pictures; and, at all events, they wear an aspect of the old sincerity.

Give us, in short, a foundation of that true old Christmas sincerity to go upon (no matter under what modification of belief, provided it be of a Christian sort), and like the better sort of Catholics, who go to church in the morning and to their dance in the evening, we can begin the day with a mild gravity of recollection, and finish it with all kinds of forgetful mirth,—forgetful, because realizing the happiness for which we are thoughtful. It is a pernicious mistake among persons who exclusively call themselves religious, to think they ought never to be cheerful, without calling to mind considerations too vast and grand for cheerfulness; thereby representing the object of their reverence after the fashion of an officious and tyrannical parent, who should cast the perpetual shadow of his dignity over his children's sports. Those sports are a part of the general ordinance of things. Man is a laughing as well as a thinking creature; and "there is a time," says the wise man, "for all things." Formal set times for being religious and thoughtful are, to be sure, not the only times; but a perpetual formality is merely the same mistake rendered thorough-going and intire! It might be thought unnecessary to touch upon this point now-a-days, and a violation of our own inculcations of seasonableness to notice it in the present article; but, for a reason which we shall mention presently, a periodical writer who is in earnest is much hampered by certain inconsistencies in the demands of some of his readers; and what we feel, we express.

To have a thorough sense, then, of Christmas, grave and gay, and to reconcile as much as possible of its old times to the new, one ought to begin with Christmas Eve, to see the log put on the fire, the boughs fixed somewhere in the room, and to call to mind what is said by the poets, and those beautiful accounts of angels singing in the air, which inspired the seraphical strains of the Handel and Corelli. Those who possess musical instruments should turn to these strains, or procure them, and warm their imaginations by their performance. In paintings from Italy (where the violin, on account of its greater mastery, and the enthusiasm of the people, is held in more esteem than with us), we often see choral visions of angels in the clouds, singing and playing on that instrument as well as the harp; and certainly, if ever a sound which may be supposed to resemble them, was yet heard upon earth, it is in some of the harmonies of Arcangelo Corelli.* And the recitative of Handel's divine strain, 'There were shepherds abiding in the fields,' is as exquisite for truth and simplicity as the cheek of innocence. See what Milton has sung of these angelic symphonies, in the Ode extracted into our present Number. Shakspeare has touched upon Christmas Eve with a reverential tenderness, sweet as if he had spoken it hushingly.

*Some say, that ever 'gainst that season comes,
Wherein our Saviour's birth is celebrated,
The bird of dawn singeth all night long.
And then, they say, no spirit dare stir abroad;
The nights are wholesome; then no planets strike,
No fairy takes, nor witch hath power to charm;
So hallowed and so gracious is the time.*

Upon which (for it is a character in Hamlet who is speaking) Horatio observes, in a sentence remarkable for the breadth of its sentiment as well as the niceness of its sincerity (like the whole of that apparently favourite character of the poet, who loved a friend),

So have I heard, and do in part believe it:
that is to say, he believed all that was worthy, and recognized the balmy and Christian effect produced upon well-disposed and sympathetic minds by reflections on the season.

The Waits, that surprise us with music in the middle of the night, evidently originated in honour of the heavenly visitation. They are, unfortunately, not apt to be very celestial of their kind. There is a fellow in particular, that plays the bass, who seems to make a point of being out of tune. He has two or three notes that are correct enough, that enable him to finish in a style of grandeur and self-satisfaction, but his "bye-play," for the most part, is horrible. However, the very idea of music is good, especially in the middle of the night; and a little imagination and Christian charity, together with a consideration of his cold fingers, will help us to be thankful for his best parts, and slip as we can over his worst. When the English become a more musical people, zealous amateurs will volunteer their services on fine nights, and, going forth with their harps and guitars, charm their friends and neighbours with strains rendered truly divine by the hour and the occasion,—

Divinely warbled voice
Answering the stringed noise.

(See Milton's ode, as above-mentioned.)

Soft: stillness and the night
Become the touches of sweet harmony.

Merchant of Venice.

A Christmas Day, to be perfect, should be clear and cold, with holly-branches in berry, a blazing fire, a dinner, with mince-pies, and games and forfeits in the evening. You cannot have it in perfection, if you are very fine and fashionable. Neither, alas! can it be enjoyed by the very poor; so that, in fact, a perfect Christmas is impossible to be had, till the progress of things has distributed comfort more equally. But when we do our best, we are privileged to enjoy our utmost; and charity gives us a right to hope. The completest enjoyer of Christmas (next to a lover who has to receive forfeits from his mistress), is the holiday school-boy, who springs up early, like a bird, darting hither and thither, out of sheer delight, thinks of his mince-pies half the morning, has too much of them when they come (pardon him this once), roasts chestnuts and cuts apples half the evening, is conscious of his new silver in his pocket, and laughs at every piece of mirth with a loudness that rises above every other noise. Next day what a peg-top will he not buy! what string! what nuts! what gingerbread! And he will have a new clasp-knife, and pay three times too much for it. Sour oranges also will he suck, squeezing their cheeks into his own with staring eyes; and his mother will tell him they are not good for him—and let him go on.

A Christmas evening should, if possible, finish with music. It carries off the excitement without abruptness, and sheds a repose over the conclusion of enjoyment.

A word respecting the more serious part of the day's subject alluded to above. It is but a word, but it may sow a seed of reflection in some of the best natures; especially in these days of perplexity between new doctrines and old. It appears to us, that there is a point never enough dwelt upon, if at all, by those who attempt to bring about a reconciliation between belief and the want of it. It is addressed only to the believers in a Providence, but those who have that belief, if they have no other, are a numerous body. The point is this,—that Christianity, to say the least of it, is a GREAT EVENT. It has had a wonderful effect on the world, and still has, even in the workings of its apparently unfilial daughter,

Modern Philosophy, who could never have seen what she is, but for the doctrine of boundless Deity, grafted upon the elegant self-reference of the Greeks, and the patriotism of the Romans, which was so often a mere pretext for the most unadvisedly injurious. Now so great an event must have been in the contemplation of Providence,—one of the mountain tops of its manifestation; and, if we say, even of a Shakespeare and a Plato, (and not without reason,) that there is something "divine" in them, that is to say, something partaking of a more energetic and visible portion of the mysterious spirit breathed into mankind, how much more, and with how much more reverential awe, ought we not to have a divine impression of the nature of Him, who drew the great line between the narrowness of the old world, and the universalities of the new, and uttered to the earth, through the angelical organ of his whole being, life, and death, that truly celestial doctrine "Think of others!"

In saying this, we have no intention of begging the question in favour of any species of false Christianity, either such as is dishonourable to heaven by its bigotry and other melancholy inconsistencies, or pernicious to man by its disingenuousness and worldly use. In thorough and spotless sincerity do we say it. Would we were as free from blemish in other respects! But we add this protestation in order to disrepute our opinion from those who make "artificial" or "theatrical" ones of a show of Christian belief, very much, we think, to be deprecated, and such as the 'Athenæum' pointed at the other day in some excellent remarks on a French book. And the editor of the 'Kent Herald' will have the kindness to take it as a reply to his handsome comment on our notice of his poetical address to us, published a few weeks ago in this Journal, under the head of a 'Remonstrance and an Answer:' for it is he, it seems, who honoured us with the verses; and some perplexity in connexion with the present subject was, we suspect, at the bottom of them. We intended to say more, especially for the sake of the correspondent who writes to us under the signature of ONE OF THE MILLION; but a dread of violating our anti-controversial system hinders us, as well as some other considerations; and we should apologize for its introduction on this holiday occasion, did not the holiday itself warrant an alternation of the liveliest and most serious moods. Luckily, be serious as we may, there is nothing, thank heaven, ponderous or gloomy in our seriousness. Our notions of Christianity are as universal as the skies, and as happy as childhood; and our emblem of it, if we were a painter, and could paint it in one figure, would be a child with the forehead of a man,—the meeting of the extremes of innocence and wisdom.

All Great Poets Good Men. — False philosophy, false poetry, and false religion—all arise from self-willed ignorance, or misconceptions of the intimations Nature gives us of her own laws. "Truth and pure delight" are inseparable, because, cognate; but impure pleasure obscures and confuses those intimations which in their settled brightness are intuitives. Hence all great poets have been good men. In all cases where the physical has disturbed or oppressed the spiritual, poetry in that man's being has languished and died, or shown, by fits and starts, a convulsive strength tenacious of troubled life. And so has it ever fared with philosophy and religion—in the decay, or extinction of "pure delight," whether wrought by prideful reason rushing into the dark, or by polluted novel impatient of the ideal, philosophy degenerating into scepticism, and religion into superstition.—Esays on Spenser, in Blackwood's Magazine.

THE SONG OF THE CAT.

[We have taken a liberty with our esteemed correspondent, Bookworm, in publishing the following private communication, by way of preface to the good old song with which he has favoured us, but, to say nothing of the commendation with which he sets out, and of which we are willing to avail ourselves, it will save us the necessity of noticing one or two points in other words; and there is something to us so pleasant and straightforward in his style, that we could not help pointing the whole of it.]

"DEAR SIR,

"Your admirable anti-demonic article, 'The Cat by the Fireside,' put me in mind of a Scotch song, supposed to be the ruminations of a cat (albeit she is not a ruminating animal), while basking in the sun of a comfortable fire. I have written it down from memory, and transmit it to you, thinking it may perhaps be worthy a place in your Journal. If you deem that it is so worthy, please give directions that it be 'set up' by a compositor who is a Scotchman, that the Scottish spelling may be attended to. I hope you will excuse this interference, but I have often been vexed with the blunders made by Englishmen in such cases.

"The burthen of the 'sang'—'Three threads an' a thrum'—is the translation given to the sound of the cat's purring by the Scotch, I suppose from the similarity which exists between it and the 'birring' of a spinning-wheel, to which 'Three threads an' a thrum' evidently refers.

"In the 'Hints for Table Talk' which you have, will you be so kind as correct the following error. Talking of 'chemistry being in the very salutation,' I have derived it from amoo (I think), please alter that to amoi, the sound of the Arabic word signifying to conceal. Excuse this trouble, and believe me yours truly.

"Dec. 6. 1834."

AULD BAWTHRENS' SANG,
AT A SCOTCH INGLE SINE.

The gudewife birrs wi' the wheel a'day,
Three threads an' a thrum,
Three threads an' a thrum,
A walth o' wark, an' sma' time for play,
Wi' the lint sae white, and worster grey,
Work fu' hard she maun, while sing I may
Three threads an' a thrum,
Three threads an' a thrum.

The gudewife rises frae out her bed,
Three threads an' a thrum,
Three threads an' a thrum,
Wi' her cooey nicht-matth sound her head,
To steer the fire to a blaze sae red;
Her feet I rub wi' welcome glad,
Three threads an' a thrum,
Three threads an' a thrum.

I daunder round her wi' blythesome birr,
Three threads an' a thrum,
Three threads an' a thrum,
An' rub on her legs my sleek warm fur;
Wi' sweeps o' my tail I welcome her,
An' round her rin, wherever she stir,
Three threads an' a thrum,
Three threads an' a thrum.

The men-folks' time for rest is gye sma',
Three threads an' a thrum,
Three threads an' a thrum,
They're out in sunshine, an' out in snaw;
Tho' cauld winds whistle, or rain should fa',
I, i' the ingle, dae nought ava',
Three threads an' a thrum,
Three threads an' a thrum.

I like the gudeman, but loe the wife,
Three threads an' a thrum,
Three threads an' a thrum,
Days mony they've seen o' leil and strife;
O' sorrow human hours are rife;
Their haud's been mine a' the days o' my life,
Three threads an' a thrum,
Three threads an' a thrum.

Auld Hawthrens gray, she kith'd me here,
Three threads an' a thrum,
Three threads an' a thrum,
An' wha was my sice I naer did speir;
Blithers an' sisters senew'd i' the weir;
Left me alane to my nither dear,
Three threads an' a thrum,
Three threads an' a thrum.

An' syne she loe'd me muskle mair,
Three threads an' a thrum,
Three threads an' a thrum,
For want o' her weans, near a' t'en-frae 't,
Her only kitten she couldna spare,
I a healing was to her heart sae sair,
Three threads an' a thrum,
Three threads an' a thrum.

As I grew a cat, wi' look sae douse,
Three threads an' a thrum,
Three threads an' a thrum,
She learnt me to catch the piff'in' mouse;
Wi' the thief-like rottoms I had nae truce,
But banish'd them frae the maister's house,
Three threads an' a thrum,
Three threads an' a thrum.

Mither got fashonless, auld; an' blin',
Three threads an' a thrum,
Three threads an' a thrum,
The bluid in her veins was could an' thir;
Her claws were blunt, an' she couldna rin,
An' t' her forbears was sune gather'd in,
Three threads an' a thrum,
Three threads an' a thrum.

Now I sit hunklin' aye i' the aye,
Three threads an' a thrum,
Three threads an' a thrum,
The queen I am o' that cozie place;
As wi' ilka paw I dieht my face,
I laing an' purr, wi' mickle grace,
Three threads an' a thrum,
Three threads an' a thrum.

ACCOUNT OF THE SINGULAR ANIMAL.

THE DUCK-BILLED WATER-MOLE.

(From the 'Anulet' for 1835,—an excellent number.)

It was on a beautiful evening in the month of October, the commencement of summer in southern latitudes, that we arrived in a district lying to the south-west of Sydney, and distant about two hundred miles from that of the Colonial Government, I approached the banks of the Yas river, in the interior of Australia. The scenery here is of the most picturesque description: the open forest country and wooded hills; the neat cottage and garden, with the grain of a vivid green just bursting into ear: the tranquillity around being only occasionally disturbed by the lowing of cattle, bleating of sheep, or the gay and blithesome notes of the feathered tribe. The silver stream of the Yas continued its silent course, its banks adorned by the beautiful pendulous acacias, which, at that season, were profusely covered by their rich golden and fragrant blossoms; while the lofty and majestic gum-trees, the graceful manna, or the dark "swamp oak," added to the variety and beauty of the landscape.

The sun was near its setting, when, at a more quiet part of the river, I sought the burrows of those shy animals the "water-moles," the ornithorynchus paradoxus of naturalists, known also as the platypus, or duck-billed animal.

Those only who are accustomed to view and investigate the varying productions of nature—whether in the peculiar forms and habits of the animal, or the brilliant and animating varieties of the vegetable world—can appreciate the true feelings of enjoyment experienced on seeing in their native haunts creatures which before were known merely from vague description.

Perhaps no animal, on its first introduction into Europe, gave rise to greater doubts as to its being a production of nature, or excited deeper interests among naturalists respecting its habits and economy, than this paradoxical creature, which, from its external appearance, as well as internal anatomy, may be correctly described as forming a connecting link between the bird and the quadruped.

The animal, when seen in a living state, running along the ground, conveys to the spectator an idea of something supernatural, and its unusual form produces terror in the minds of the timid: even the canine race (except those accustomed to bring them out of the water when shot) stare at them with erect ears, and the feline race avoid them; still, although of such a "questionable shape," it is an animal of perfectly harmless, although restless disposition.

Among the colonists in Australia, it is known by the name of "water-mole," from some resemblance it bears to the common European mole. By the aboriginal tribes at Bathurst, Goulburn Plains, Yas, Murrumbidgee and Tumut countries, it is designated by the two names callangong and cambress, the latter being more in use with them than the former.

The body is depressed like the otter, mole, and beaver. It is covered by long and thick dark brown hair, underneath which is a short and very soft fur, resembling the two distinct kinds found on the seal and otter. On the abdomen, breast, and throat, the fur and hair is of much finer quality, and more silky in its nature. In young specimens, the under-surface of the tail is covered by hair of a beautiful silvery white; this is lost, however, in the adult; the under-surface of the tail, in such, having merely a few coarse hairs scattered over it. This circumstance induced many to suppose that the animal used its tail as a trowel, in a manner similar to the beaver; but from an examination of their burrows, I have no doubt that the hair is rubbed off by the friction of the tail on the surface of the ground. The tail is flat, broad, and inclining on each side abruptly off at the termination, beyond which the long hairs project. The hair on the upper part of the tail is of a dark colour, long, and coarse, and destitute of the peculiar glossy appearance of the other parts of the body.

There was no variation in the colour of the fur in all the specimens I have seen; the under short fur is of a greyish line. The whole of the under surface of the body is of a ferruginous colour, varying in intensity according to age. The legs are short, feet pentadactyle, webbed, and in the fore-feet the web extends a short distance beyond the claws, is loose, and falls back when the animal burrows. The head is flat; and from the mouth, two lips or mandibles project, resembling the beak of a Shoveller duck; the lower mandible is short and narrower than the upper, and its internal edges are channelled with numerous striae, resembling, in some degree, those seen in the bill of a duck. The colour of the superior mandible above, when seen in an animal recently taken out of the water, is of a dull, dirty, greyish black, covered with innumerable minute dots, and the cartilaginous continuation around the mandible is uniformly smooth and soft. The eyes are very small, but brilliant, and of a light brown colour; they are situated rather high up the head. The external orifice of the ear is situated at the upper part of the external angle of the eye; the orifice is easily discovered when a living specimen is examined, as the animal is then seen frequently to open and close it; but remaining collapsed in dead specimens, it is not easily perceived by persons unacquainted with its exact situation. From this orifice a semicircular cartilaginous canal is continued, which terminates at the base of the skull, and probably increases the intensity of sound, giving the animal an acute auditory power. The size varies; but the males are usually found to be, in a small degree, larger than the females, the average length being from eighteen to twenty inches.

It was at a tranquil part of the Yas river, which the colonists call "ponds," on the surface of which numerous aquatic plants grew, that I first beheld these animals. It is in places of this description that the water-moles are most commonly seen, seeking their food among the aquatic plants, whilst the steep and shaded banks afford them excellent situations for excavating their burrows.

Readily recognizing their dark bodies just appearing level with the water, the head slightly raised, by the circles made around them from their paddling motions. It is necessary at this time for the spectator to remain perfectly stationary, as the slightest noise or movement will cause the timid creatures instantly to disappear; and they seldom re-appear when frightened, so acute are their sight and hearing. But, if the spectator remain quiet while the animal is paddling about, he will have an excellent view of its movements; it, however, seldom remains longer than one or two minutes, but dives, and re-appears a short distance above or below the stream from the place at which it was observed to descend. Although the animal may rise close to the spot on which the sportsman patiently waits, it is useless to level the gun, as the action would cause its instant disappearance. Preparations must be made to discharge the gun on its re-appearance at the surface, which, when the animal descends unfrightened, is almost certain to take place in a short time. A new shot is requisite, a distant one being almost useless.

When the fur is wet, the animal has a soiled and far from attractive appearance, resembling more a lump of dirty weeds which are often seen floating about the rivers than any production of the animal kingdom; it would therefore often escape observation but for its paddling motion in the water; such was its appearance, when lying dead on the surface, or when drifted by the stream against the stump of a tree, or among the reeds and bulrushes growing profusely near and upon the banks of the river.

The animals are seen in the Australian rivers at all seasons of the year, but are most abundant during the spring and summer months; and I think a query may arise whether they do not hibernate. The best time for seeing them is very early in the morning, or late in the evening; during floods and freshes they are frequently perceived travelling up and down the rivers. When going down, they appear to allow themselves to be carried by the force of the stream without making any exertion; but when swimming against the stream, all their muscular power is exerted to the utmost to stem the force of the current. The opinion that so generally prevails, that these animals must be shot instantly dead, otherwise they will sink and not re-appear, I did not find correct in practice; if missed, this is likely to occur, but if the animal is wounded, although it sinks, it almost invariably afterwards ascends to the surface of the water, some distance from the place at which it had dived. Some require several shots before they are killed, or before they are so severely wounded as to secure their capture, which they frequently evade, even when wounded, by diving; and oftentimes, unless the sportsman is very vigilant, in rising they may come up amongst reeds and rushes (which are plentiful in some parts, extending out from the banks of the river), and thus escape observation altogether.

When the ornithorynchus is captured, it makes great efforts to regain its liberty, and its loose integuments cause it to be retained with difficulty, for the animal feels as if it was contained in a thick fur bag, under which are very powerful cutaneous muscles. During its struggles to escape it makes no attempt to bite, but occasionally emits a low, growling noise. The aborigines use them for food. The methods employed in their capture are by digging them out of the burrows, or by spearing them. They dig up the burrows at certain seasons of the year, when the young are nearly full grown, and at the time they consider them excellent eating, and often capture the old animal at the same time. One morning I accompanied a native to inspect the burrow of one from which, the preceding summer, he told me the young had been taken.

We availed ourselves of his assistance in seeking for the burrows. On a steep bank near that part of the Yas river where I first had the gratification of seeing these animals, and which I have before described as abounding in river weeds, and the banks decorated by overhanging acacias in full bloom, strewing the surface of the water with their golden blossoms shaken off by the wind, our keen-sighted guide pointed out to our uninitiated eyes the tracks of the animals on the moist earth close to the water; these tracks being followed up the bank, at a distance varying from two to five feet, the entrance of the burrows, concealed by the long grass and shrubs which grew profusely and luxuriantly in these situations, was soon discovered, and the tracks had evidently a very recent appearance. Following the same method he had adopted on similar occasions, the native placed his hand within the burrow, and took from its lower surface pieces of clay, on which impressions of the animals' feet were distinctly marked. From the situation of these burrows, and from being so concealed by shrubs and long grass, as well as the height and steepness of the bank, I regarded it as next to impossible to explore them.

Some of the burrows on this bank had also a second entrance under the water, communicating with the principal or largest entrance above it. Although this second entrance was found in several, we could not discover it in all. Often during this our first excursion of the kind, we mistook the holes of water-rats and other animals for those of the ornithorynchus, but our more experienced tawny companion always told us what they were, at the same time kindly pointing out the difference, so that, under such able guidance, there is but little doubt that, in course of time, we might have become expert "water-mole" hunters. Besides seeking for the habitation, we kept also an occasional look-out for the owners of these grassy dwellings.

Very late in the evening we perceived two paddling about in a small pond of the river, but they eluded all our endeavours to get a sufficiently near shot at them. I frequently heard a splash in the water at one particular part of the bank, whenever I approached it, as if the animal had retreated to the bank, but, unable to gain the burrow in time, had, on my approach, taken again to the water. As this occurred several times about the same place, and as darkness was setting in rapidly, I marked the situation of the spot.

On the following morning, whilst the horses were saddling for a ride to Mount Lavinia, the farm and residence of Mr. Henry O'Brien, on Yas plains, we went down, accompanied by the native, Darga, to that part of the river at which I had supposed the water-mole to have been attempting to regain its burrow. I was right in my conjecture, for, near the spot, tracks of one were very distinctly visible, and were traced up the bank, when, amongst some long grass, the entrance was discovered; the tracks continuing on the under surface of the interior, was sufficient to determine its being inhabited, which our black companion, Darega, consented to. The situation was one admirably calculated for digging up the burrow, as the bank gradually sloped, and was neither very high nor steep; so I came to the determination to explore it, not with the expectation of meeting with any young, for my dissected specimens induced a contrary opinion, but from a desire of examining the internal construction of the burrows themselves. Spades were consequently sent for.

The entrance was large, particularly when compared to its size in the continuation, measuring one foot three inches in depth, and one foot one inch in breadth. Instead of laying the burrow intirely open from the entrance to the termination, which would have been a laborious undertaking, holes were opened at certain distances in its direction, according to the method adopted by the aborigines. The depth of these burrows beneath the surface of the earth may be from one foot to one foot and a half, but gradually tending towards the surface as it proceeds up the bank, so that the termination or nest is nearly superficial with the earth's surface. This burrow, as it receded from the entrance, became narrow, being about the usual size of the animal when uncontracted.

We had traced the burrow for the distance of ten feet four inches, and had just dug a pit down upon it, and saw it still continuing its course up the bank, when the well-known beak and head of a water-mole was seen protruding for an instant from the upper part, as if it had been disturbed from its repose, and had, therefore, come down to see what we were about with its habitation. It did not remain an instant, however, appearing not to fancy our captivating physiognomies; for, as soon as it beheld us, it thought we could be there making such a noise for no very benevolent purpose, for it immediately turned up to take refuge in that part of the burrow not yet explored; but in turning it was seized by the hind leg, and secured as a lawful prisoner of the chase. It proved to be a full-grown female. When I held the unfortunate platypus in my hands, its little bright eyes glistened, and the orifices of the ears were expanded and contracted alternately, as if eager to catch the slightest sound; its little heart palpitating violently with fear and anxiety. After it had been retained in the hands some time it became more reconciled to its situation.

The animal certainly appeared very much astonished when it was hauled out of its subterraneous dwelling. It uttered no sound when first captured, nor attempted to bite; in its struggles for liberty, the hind claws being sharp, would scratch the hand, but not sufficiently to be regarded.

The ornithorynchus was placed in a cask, with grass, mud (taken from the river), and water, and all that could make it comfortable under existing circumstances. It ran round its place of confinement, scratching and making great efforts to get out; but finding them useless, it became quite tranquil, contracted itself into a small compass, and was soon buried in sleep. At night, however, it was very restless, and made great efforts to escape, going round the cask with its forepaws raised against the sides, the web turned back, scratching violently with the claws of the forefeet, as if to burrow its way out. In the morning, I found the animal fast asleep, the tail being turned inwards, the head and beak under the breast, and the body contracted into a very small compass. When disturbed from its sleep, it utters a soft growling noise, something like the growl of a young dog, but in a softer and more harmonious key. Although quiet most of the day, its efforts to escape continued with a growling noise during the night. The animal seemed a great curiosity to the Europeans about Yas, who had not before had an opportunity of seeing one alive. Although they have long been known to be burrowing animals, yet I believe this to be the first burrow explored, and the first living animal captured by an European.

The female gives birth to from one to four young ones at a time, the usual number being two. The mother first suckles, but when her offspring are sufficiently old, feeds them with comminuted insects mingled with mud, until they are capable of taking to the water and providing for themselves.

Another burrow, which we afterwards explored, near Goulburn Plains, continued up the bank in a serpentine form, and was very long; after a laborious task, from the hardness of the ground, the termination was attained at a distance of thirty-five feet from the entrance to the inhabited part; they have been found to extend even a distance of fifty feet.

The arrival at the termination of this very extensive burrow was made known by a growling being very distinctly heard to issue forth; this, at first, I thought proceeded from the old one, which I now expected of having an opportunity of viewing with her young; but recollecting, under similar circumstances, that the old one had forsaken her progeny, and during the course of laying open the burrow we had not seen her come down to ascertain why we destroyed her habitation, I could not tell what to think of it, more especially when at its termination the fur of the animal or animals was seen; and what then surprised me was, that although there was abundance of growling, yet there was no attempt of the animals to escape. On being taken out, they were found to be full-furred young ones, coiled up asleep, which growled exceedingly on being exposed to the "broad light of noon-day." There were two, a male and female, of the dimensions of ten inches from the beak to the extremity of the tail.

These animals had a most beautiful sleek and delicate appearance, when compared with those of larger growth, and seemed never to have left the burrow. The nest, if it may be so termed, consisted of dry river weeds, the epidermis of reeds, and small dry fibrous roots of some kinds of plants, all strewn on the floor of the cavity, which was of sufficient size to contain the mother and her young. When awake and placed on the ground, they would move about, but not make the wild attempts at escape we had perceived in the old ones when caught. Indeed, it was rather a subject of surprise that we did not capture, or, at all events, see the old one escape; but, not long after, the black captured a female on the bank not far distant from the burrow, which, there is no doubt, was the mother of the young we had just taken, which had escaped in the intermediate spaces of the burrow which were left, when all were busily engaged in exploring its long and tedious windings. The old specimen was in a ragged and wretchedly poor condition, the fur was abraded in several places, the hind claws were also rubbed and wounded and she seemed to be in a miserable and weak state.*

In the young animals, the beak above was of a similar colour to the same organ in the old specimens, but on their under surface it was a beautiful pink, from the minute blood vessels being distinctly seen through the delicate epidermis, like the bloom of rosy health on the cheeks of the infantile portion of our race; the legs, close to the feet, were fringed with fine silvery hairs, and the whole of the under surface of the tail had a similar covering, but coarser; the fur on the back, although of a more delicate nature, was similar in colour, as was also the under part of the chest and abdomen, but of a lighter tinge than that observed in full grown specimens.

The young animals sleep in various positions, sometimes extended and often rolled up, like a hedge-hog, in the form of a ball. They formed an interesting group in the box in which I placed them, seemingly happy and content. One lay curled up like a dog, keeping its beak warm with the flattened tail brought over it; another stretched on its back, the head resting, by way of a pillow, upon the body of the old one, which lay on its side, the back resting against the side of the box, all fast asleep. At another time, one would be seen lying on the back, with outstretched paws, another on its side, and the third coiled or rolled in the form of a ball. They lie in various positions, shifting them as they may feel fatigued; but the most favourite position of the young animals is rolled up like a ball: this is effected by the fore paws being placed under the beak, the head and mandible bent down towards the tail, the hind paws crossed over the mandibles, and the tail being turned up to complete the rotundity of the figure.

Although furnished with a good thick coat of fur, they seem particularly about being kept warm and comfortable.

They would permit me to smooth their fur, but if the mandibles were touched, they darted away immediately, those parts appearing to be remarkably sensitive. The young I permitted to run about the room, as they pleased, but the old specimen was so restless, and damaged the walls of the rooms so much by attempts at burrowing, that I was obliged to keep her a close prisoner in the box, where during the day she would remain quiet, but at night was very restless, and eager to escape from her place of confinement. The food I then gave them, and afterwards continued, was bread soaked in water, chopped egg, and meat minced very small; although, at first, I presented them with milk, they did not seem to prefer it to water. The young were very tranquil; as they were not confined in the night, I heard them growling, and they seemed as if they were fighting, the saucer containing their food being upset in the scuffle; but, on the following morning, they were quietly rolled up fast asleep, side by side, in the temporary nest I had formed for them.

The little animals often appeared to dream of swimming, as I have seen their little paws in movement as if in the act. If I placed them on the ground during the day, they ran about seeking some dark corner for repose; but if I placed them in a dark corner or box, they huddled themselves up, as soon as they became a little reconciled to the place, and went to sleep. I found they would go to sleep on a table,

* It has been observed with those curious birds, the penquins, that the parents become thin, and in a low condition, when feeding and rearing their young; which become very fat. Thus it was with the young moles, they were "cobbling fat," and in a plump condition, whilst the old one was miserably thin.

sofa, or, indeed, any place, but, if permitted, would resort to that in which they had been accustomed to repose, but, although for days together they would sleep in the place made up for them, yet, on a sudden, from some unaccountable cause, they would seek repose behind a box, or some dark corner, in preference to their former habitation. They usually reposed side by side, like a pair of furred balls; and awful little growls issued from them when disturbed, but, when very sound asleep, they were handled and examined without any hint of the kind.

At first, I was inclined to consider them night animals; but I found that the time of their leaving the burrow was exceedingly irregular, both during the day and night; but they seemed more lively and more disposed to ramble about the room after dark, commencing about dark; yet all their movements in this respect were so very irregular that no just conclusions could be drawn, further than that they were both night and day animals, preferring the cool and dusky evenings to the heat and glare of noon. This habit was not confined to the young specimens, for the old ones were just as irregular, sometimes sleeping all day, and lively at night, and sometimes the reverse. I have often found them asleep and running about at the same periods of the day, the male leaving the burrow alone, the female remaining asleep; he returns, curls himself up and sleeps, and then the female leaves. At this time, having fed from the saucer of food placed before them, they would paddle round the room, and return to their usual sleeping-place. Although they frequently left alternately, yet at other times they would suddenly go out together. One evening, when both were running about, the female uttered a squeaking noise, as if calling her companion, which was in some part of the room behind the furniture, and was invisible. He immediately answered her in a similar note, and, noting the direction the answer to her signal came from, she went to the place where he had secreted himself.

It is very ludicrous to see these uncouth animals open their mandible-like lips and yawn, stretching out the fore-paws, and extending the web of their fore-feet to their utmost expansion. Although this was natural, yet, not being in the habit of seeing a duck yawn, it had the semblance of being perfectly unnatural.

It often surprised me how they contrived to reach the summit of a book-case, or any other elevated piece of furniture. This, at last, was discovered to be effected by the animal supporting the back against the wall, and placing the feet against the book-case, and then, by aid of the strong cutaneous muscles of the back, and the claws of the feet, they contrived to reach the top very expeditiously. They perform this mode of climbing often, so that I had many opportunities of witnessing the manner in which it was done.

When running, they are exceedingly animated; their little eyes glisten, and the orifices of the ears contract and dilate so as to catch the slightest sound; they struggle very much to escape, if taken up at this time for examination. Their eyes being placed so much above the head, they do not see objects well in a straight line, and consequently run against everything in the room, and spread "dire confusion" among all the light and easily overturnable articles. I have seen them now and then elevate the head, as if to regard the objects round or above them; but they more usually run head-foremost, without looking on one side or the other. Sometimes I have been able to play with them by scratching and tickling them with my finger; they seemed to enjoy it, for they opened their mandibles, biting playfully at the finger, and moving about in the same manner as we see a young dog enjoy similar treatment.

As well as combing their fur to clean it, when wet, I have also seen them often peck it (if the term may be allowed) with the beak, as a duck would clean its feathers. What with this, and the combing of the hind feet, it is a curious sight to view them engaged in the occupation of the toilette. When I placed the animals in a pan of deep water, they were eager to get out; but, when the water was shallow, with a turf of grass placed in one corner, they enjoyed it exceedingly; they would sport together, attacking one another with their mandibles, and rise one against the other with their fore feet, as if in mock combat, and roll over in the water in the midst of their gambols; they then retired, having had a plenitude of fun, to the turf, where they would lie combing themselves, from which process their fur had an additional bright and sleek appearance; this they appeared to enjoy exceedingly, lying on the back, and in various positions, for the purpose of bringing the hind claws into action over every part of the body. It was most ludicrous to observe the uncouth looking little beasts running about, overturning and seizing one another with their mandibles in "sportive gaiety;" and then, in the midst of their fun and frolic, coolly incline to one side, and scratch themselves in the gentlest manner imaginable. After the cleaning operation was concluded, they would perambulate the room for a short time, and then seek repoes. It is seldom they remain longer than ten or fifteen minutes in the water at a time.

One evening both the animals came out about dusk, went and eat food from the saucer, and then commenced playing like two puppies, attacking with their mandibles, and raising their fore-paws against each other. In the scuffle one would get thrust down, and when the spectator would expect it to rise again, the animal would commence scratching itself; its antagonist looking on, and waiting for the other to rise and renew the combat.

Some time after, to my great regret, my little favourites became meagre; their coats lost the sleek and beautiful appearance which before caused them to be so much admired, and they ate very little; yet they ran about, and appeared lively. But these external symptoms were much against their being in a state of health. When wet, their fur became matted, and never appeared to dry so readily as before; the mandibles, and, indeed, every part of the animals, indicated anything but a condition of health. How different was their appearance now from the time I removed them from the burrow; then, their plump and sleek appearance excited even the apathetic blacks, now, the poor creatures could only excite commiseration for their reduced condition. The female died on the 29th of January, 1833, and the male on the 2nd of February, having been kept by me during the space of nearly five weeks. Thus my expectations of conveying them to England were frustrated.

THE WEEK.

From Wednesday the 24th to Tuesday the 30th December.
CHRISTMAS CUSTOMS.

SELECTED FROM BRAND, FOSTER, AND HONE.

Singular Devonshire Customs on Christmas Eve.—A superstitious notion prevails, in the western parts of Devonshire, that at twelve o'clock at night, on Christmas Eve, the oxen in their stalls are always found on their knees, in an attitude of devotion; and that (which is still more singular), since the alteration of the style, they contrive to do this only on the Eve of old Christmas Day. An honest countryman, living on the edge of St Stephen's Downs, near Launceston, Cornwall, informed me, October 28th, 1790, that he once, with some others, made a trial of the truth of the above, and watching several oxen in their stalls at the above time, at twelve o'clock at night, they observed the two oldest oxen only fall upon their knees, and as he expressed it in the idiom of the country, make "a cruel moan, like Christian creatures;" I could not but with great difficulty keep my countenance: he saw, and seemed angry that I gave so little credit to his tale, and, walking off in a pettish humour, seemed to "marvel at my unbelief." There is an old print of the Nativity, in which the oxen in the stable, near the Virgin and Child, are represented upon their knees, as in a suppliant posture. This graphic representation has probably given rise to the above superstitious notion on this head.

Christmas Day, in the primitive Church, was always observed as the Sabbath-day; and, like that, preceded by an Eve, or Vigil, hence our present Christmas Eve. On the night of this, our ancestors were wont to light up candles of an uncommon size, called Christmas Candles, and lay a log of wood upon the fire, called a Yule Log, or Christmas Block, to illuminate the house, and, as it were, to turn night into day. This custom is, in some measure, still kept up in the North of England. [And in the South say others. In truth, it is a custom lingering, or revived, more or less, in all parts of the country.]

Old English Hospitalities.—A writer in the 'Gentleman's Magazine' for February, 1795, p. 110, gives the following account of a custom which takes place annually, on the 24th of December, at the house of Sir Holt, Bart., of Aston Jureta, Birmingham:—"As soon as supper is over, a table is set in the hall; on it is placed a brown loaf, with twenty silver threepences stuck on the top of it, a tankard of ale, with pipes and tobacco; and the two oldest servants have chairs behind it, to sit as judges if they please. The steward brings the servants, both men and women, by one at a time, covered with a winnow-sheet, and lay their right hand on the loaf, exposing no other part of the body, the oldest of the two judges guesses at the person, by naming a name, then the younger judge, and lastly, the oldest again. If they hit upon the right name, the steward leads the person back again; but if they do not, he takes off the winnow-sheet, and the person receives a threepence, makes a low obeisance to the judges, but speaks not a word. When the second servant was brought, the younger judge guessed first and third; and this they did alternately, till all the money was given away. Whatever servant had not slept in the house the preceding night, forfeited his right to the money. No account is given of the origin of this strange custom, but it has been practised ever since the family settled there. When the money is gone, the servants have full liberty to dance, sing, and go to bed when they please."

Christmas Boxes or Presents.—The custom of annual donations at Christmas and on New Year's Day is very ancient, being copied by the Christians from the Polytheists of Rome, at the time the public religion was changed. These presents, now-a-days, are more commonly made on the morrow of Christmas. From this circumstance, the festival of St Stephen has got the nick-name of Christmas Boxing Days, and, by corruption, Boxing Days.

In London, and in many other parts of Europe, large families and establishments keep regular lists of tradesmen's servants, apprentices, and other persons who come about making a sort of annual claim on them for a Christmas Box on this day. This practice, however, is declining; and, in many places, is now confined to children. The parish boys and children at schools bring about their samples of writing, and ask for money; and the Bellman, the Watchman, the Waits, and the Church-Band, still repeat their wonted annual calls on the hospitable feeling with which a smoking Christmas board of turkey, plum-pudding, and minced-pies, inspires the pious head of an old fashioned family mansion.

We are told in the 'Athenian Oracle,' vol. 1, p. 360. that the Christmas Box money is derived from hence: The Romish priests had masses said for almost everything. If a ship went out to the Indies, the priests had a box in her, under the protection of some saint; and for masses, as their cant was, to be said for them to that saint, &c. the poor people must put something into the priests' box, which was not opened till the ship's return. The mass, at that time, was called Christ-mass; the box, called Christ-mass box, or money gathered against that time, that masses might be made by the priests to the saints to forgive the people the debaucheries of that time; and from this, servants had the liberty to get box-money, that they, too, might be enabled to pay the priest for his masses, knowing well the truth of the proverb,—"No Money, no Pater Noster."

Christmas Carols.—Bishop Taylor observes, that the 'Gloria in Excelsis,' the well-known hymn sung by the angels to the shepherds at our Lord's Nativity, was the earliest Christmas Carol. Bourne cites Durand, to prove that, in the earlier ages of the churches, the bishops were accustomed, on Christmas Day, to sing Carols among their clergy. He seems perfectly right in deriving the word carol from cantare, to sing, and vola, an interjection of joy. This species of pious song is undoubtedly of most ancient date.

"From a carol (says Mr Hone) called 'Dives and Lazarus,' I annex an amusing extract. However whimsical this may appear to the reader, he can scarce conceive its ludicrous effect when the metre of the last line is solemnly drawn out to its utmost length by a Warwickshire chaunter, and so solemnly listened to by the well-disposed crowd, who seem without difficulty to believe that Dives sits on a serpent's knee. The idea of sitting on the knee was, perhaps, conveyed to the poet's mind by old wood-cut representations of Lazarus seated in Abraham's lap. More anciently, Abraham was frequently drawn holding him up by the sides, to be seen by Dives in hell. In an old book now before me they are so represented, with the additions of a devil blowing the fire under Dives with a pair of bellows. On the continent (continues the same inquiring and sincere writer) the custom of carolling at Christmas is almost universal. During the last days of Advent, Calabrian minstrels enter Rome, and are to be seen in every street saluting the shrines of the Virgin mother with their wild music, under the traditional notions of charming her labour-pains on the approaching Christmas. Lady Morgan observed them frequently stopping at the shop of a carpenter. In reply to questions concerning this, the workman who stood at the door said, that it was done out of respect to St Joseph! I have an old print of this practice. Two Calabrian shepherds are represented devoutly playing, at Christmas, in a street of Rome, before a stone shrine containing a sculpture of the Infant Jesus in the Virgin's arms, lighted up by candles, with a relief under it of supplicating souls in purgatorial fire, inscribed Dile Ave Maria. A young female, with a rosary, is praying on her knees before the sculpture. The shepherds stand behind and blow the bagpipes and a clarinet. If one there be, who has proceeded until now without tiring, he will know how much pleasantness there is in pursuits like these. To him who inquires of what use they are, I answer, that I have found them agreeable recreations at leisure moments. I love an old MS. and a ballad in print, and I know no distance that I would not travel to obtain Autolyceus's—

"Ballad of a fish that appeared upon the coast, on Wednesday the fore-score of April, forty thousand fathoms above water, and sung this ballad against the hard hearts of maids."

I can rarely tell why collectors have almost overlooked Carols as a class of popular poetry. To me they have been objects of interest, from circumstances which occasionally determine the directions of pursuits. The wood-cuts round the annual sheets, and the melody of "God rest you, merry Gentlemen," delighted my childhood; and I still listen with pleasure to the shivering carolists' evening chaunt towards the clean kitchen window, decked with holly, the blazing fire showing the whitened hearth, and reflecting gleams of light from the surfaces of the dresser utensils.

Since this sheet was at the printer's, Gilbert Davis, Esq., F.R.S., F.A.S., &c. has published eight Ancient Christmas Carols, with the tunes to which they were formerly sung in the west of England. This is a laudable and successful effort to rescue from oblivion some carol melodies, which in a few years will be no more heard."

Mr Davies says that, "On Christmas Day these carols took the place of psalms in all the churches, especially at afternoon service, the whole congregation joining; and, at the end, it was usual for the parish clerk to declare, in a loud voice, his wishes for a merry Christmas and a happy new year."

A sentiment similar to that of the parish clerk's in the West of England, was expressed last year in a way that leaves little doubt of its former general adoption at the same season. Just before Christmas Day, I was awakened in London, at the dead of the night, by the playing of the waits: on the conclusion of their solemn tunes, one of the performers exclaimed aloud, "God bless you, my masters and mistresses, a merry Christmas to you, and a happy new year."

We conclude our "Week" with the finest Christmas Carol ever written by Englishman. It is an Ode or Hymn of Milton's, on the Nativity, written when he was a youth,—not, of course, one of his best, but with almost as fine things in it here and there as he ever produced, particularly in stanzas 4, 19, 20, 21, 23, 24, and many of the closing lines in the others. Milton was always Milton. The stature of his mind was lofty from the first.

THE HYMN.

I.

It was the winter wild
While the heaven-born child
All meanly wrapt in the rude manger lies.
Nature, in awe to him,
Had doffed her gaudy trim,
With her great Master so to sympathize.
It was no season then for her
To wanton with the sun, her lusty paramour.

II.

Only with speeches fair
She wooes the gentle air,
To hide her guilty front with innocent snow;
And on her naked shame,
Pollute with sinful blame,
The saintly veil of maiden white to throw;
Confounded that her Maker's eyes
Should look so near upon her foul deformities.

III.

But he her fears to cease,
Sent down the meek-eyed Peace:
She, crown'd with olive-green, came softly sliding
Down through the turning sphere,
His ready harbinger,
With turtle wing the amorous clouds dividing.
And waving wide her myrtle wand,
She strikes an universal peace through sea and land.

IV.

Nor war or battle's sound,
Was heard the world around:
The idle spear and shield were high up hung;
The hooked chariot stood
Unstained with hostile blood:
The trumpet spake not to the armed throng;
And kings sat still with awful eye,
As if they surely knew their sovran Lord was nigh.

V.

But peaceful was the night,
Wherein the Prince of light
His reign of peace upon the earth began:
The winds, with wonder whist,
Smoothly the waters kist,
Whispering new joys to the wild ocean:
Who now hath quite forgot to rave,
While birds of calm sit brooding on the charmed wave.

VI.

The stars with deep amaze
Stand fixed in steadfast gaze,
Bending one way their precious influence;
And will not take their flight
For all the morning light,
Or Lucifer that often warned them hence,
But in their glimmering orbs did glow,
Until their Lord himself bespake, and bid them go.

VII.

And, though the shady gloom
Hath given day her room,
The sun himself withhold his wanted speed,
And hid his head for shame
As his inferior flame.
The new-enlightened world no more should need.
He saw a greater sun appear
Than his bright throne or burning axle-tree could bear.

VIII.

The Shepherds on the lawn,
On the point of dawn,
Sat simply chatting in a rustic row;
Full little thought they then
That the mighty Pan
Was kindly come to live with them below;
Perhaps their loves, or else their sheep,
Was all that did their silly thoughts so busy keep.

IX.

When such music sweet
Their hearts and ears did greet,
As never was by mortal singer strook,
Divinely warbled voice
Answering the stringed noise,
As all their souls in blissful raptures took.
The air, such pleasure loth to lose,
With thousand echoes still prolongs each heavenly close.

X.

Nature, that heard such sound
Beneath the hollow round
Of Cynthia's seat, the airy region thrilling,
Now was almost won.
To think her past was done,
And that her reign had here its last fulfilling;
She knew such harmony alone
Could hold all heaven and earth in happier union.

XI.

At last surrounds their sight
A globe of circular light
That with long beams the shame-fac'd night
array'd;
The helmed Cherubim
And sworded Seraphim
Are seen in glittering ranks with wings displayed,
Harping in loud and solemn quire,
With unexpressive notes, to heaven's new-born heir.

XII.

Such music as 'tis said,
Before was never made,
But when of old the sons of morning sung,
While the Creator great
His constellations set,
And the well-balance'd world on hinges hung;
And east the dark foundations deep,
And bid the weltering waves their oozy channel keep.

XIII.

Ring out, ye crystal spheres,
Once bless our human ears,
If ye have powers to touch our senses so;
And let your silver chime
Move in melodious time;
And let the bass of Heaven's deep organ blow;
And with your nine-fold harmony,
Make up full consort to the angelic symphony.

XIV.

For, if such holy song
Enwrap our fancy long,
Time will run back, and fetch the age of gold;
And speckled Vanity
Will sicken soon and die,
And leprous Sin will melt from earthly mould,
And Hell itself will pass away,
And leave her dolorous mansions to the peering day.

XV.

Yes, Truth and Justice then
Will down return to men,
Orb'd in a rainbow; and, like glories wearing,
Mercy will sit between,
Thron'd in celestial sheen,
With radiant feet the tissue'd clouds down steering,
And heaven, as at some festival,
Will open wide the gates of her high palace hall.

XVI.

But wisest Fate says no,
This must not yet be so,
The babe yet lies in smiling infancy,
That on the bitter cross
Must redeem our loss;
So both himself and us to glorify;
Yet first, to those ychain'd in sleep,
The wakeful trumpet of doom must thunder through the deep.

XVII.

With such a horrid clang
As on Minerva's shrine rang,
While the sad sea and mouldering clouds out broke:
The aged earth aghast,
With terror of the blast,
Shall from the surface to the centre shake;
When, at the world's last session,
The dreadful Judge in middle air shall spread his throne.

XVIII.

And then at last our bliss
Full and perfect is,
But now begins, far from this happy day.
The old Dragon, under ground
In straiter limits bound,
Not half so far casts his usurped sway;
And, wrath to see his kingdom fall,
Swinges the scarily horrors of his fouled tail.

XIX.

The oracles are dumb;
No voice or bidding hum
Runs through the ashed roof in sounds deceiving;
Apollo from his shrine
Can no more divine,
With hollow shrieks the steep of Delphos leaving.
No nightly trance, or breathed spell
Inspires the pale-eyed priest from the prophetic cell.

XX.

The lonely mountains o'er,
And the resounding shore,
A voice of weeping heard and loud lament;
From haunted spring and dale,
Edg'd with poplar pale,
The parting Genius is with sighing sent;
With flower-inwoven tresses torn,
The Nymphs in twilight shade of tangled thickets mourn.

XXI.

In consecrated earth,
And on the holy hearth,
The Laræ and Lemures moan with midnight
plaint;
In urns and altars round
A cheer and dying sound
Affrights the Flamens at their service quaint;
And the obdurate marble seems to sweat,
While each peculiar Power foregoes his wonted seat.

XXII.

Peor and Baalim
Forsake their temples dim,
With that twice-batter'd God of Palestine;
And moaned Astarteoth,
Heaven's queen and mother both,
Now sits no girl with tapers' holy shine;
The Lybick Hammon shrinks his horn;
In vain the Tyrian maids their wounded Tammuz mourn.

XXIII.

And sullen Moloch, fled,
Lies left in shadows dread
His burning idol all of blackest hue;
In vain with cymbals ring,
They call the gristy king,
In dismal dance about the furnace blue:
The brutish Gods of Nile as fast,
Iris, and Orus, and the dog Anubis haste.

XXIV.

Nor is Osiris seen
In Memphis' grove or green
Trampling the unshowered grass with lowings loud;
Nor can he be at rest
Within his sacred chest;
Naught but profoundest hell can be his shroud.
In vain with timbrelled anthems dark
The stable-stoled soverers bear his worshipp'd ark.

XXV.

He feels from Judah's land
The dreaded Infant's hand;
The rays of Bethlehem blind his dusky eyne;
Nor all of the Gods beside
Longer dare abide;
Not Typhon huge ending in snakey twine:
Our Babe, to show his Godhead true,
Caa in his swaddling bands control the damned crew.

XXVI.

So, when the sun is bed,
Curtain'd with cloudy red,
Pillows his chin upon an orient wave,
The fleeking shadow pale
Troops to the infernal jail;
Each scatter'd ghost slips to his several grave,
And the yellow-skirted Fates
Fly after the night steeds, leaving the moon-lov'd maze.

XXVII.

But see! the Virgin bless
Hath laid her babe to rest;
Time is our tedious song should here have ending;
Heaven's youngest-teen'd star,
Hath fixed her polish'd car,
—Her sleeping Lord with handmaid lamp-attending;
And all about the courtly stable
Bright-harnessed angels sit in order servicable.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

NO. I.—MYSTERIOUS OCCURRENCE AT THE MAURINUS.

[FROM 'Recollections of Seven Years' Residence at the Maurinus, by a Lady,'—a truly feminine book, full of natural feeling and description, and evincing a liberal spirit of allowance for other countries in spite of party education.]

A young married gentleman lived on an estate in a very retired and lonely part of the country, at a great distance from towns. At that time the island was covered with thick forests and impenetrable jungles. Estates were far apart and divided from each other by deep ravines, high mountains, rapid rivers, or pathless woods; communication was very difficult in consequence; narrow footpaths, and deviant tracts over the mountains and along the brink of precipices were the only medium of intercourse between the inhabitants, instead of the fine broad roads over which the carriages of the English now roll so smoothly. This gentleman's family consisted only of his wife, her sister, and himself; both the ladies were very beautiful and attractive. It happened, unfortunately, that some troops were stationed in the neighbourhood of the estate, commanded by a man of the most infamous character. The army of revolutionized France was of a very different order from that which Condé and Turenne had led into the field; and of that army the regiments stationed at the colonies were the worst specimens, and composed of the most abandoned characters. The colonel of the military party stationed near this estate, was of this description, but had plausible manners and handsome features; yet it was said that there was a certain fearful expression in his eyes which seemed to tell of evil passions and wicked deeds.

It was the misfortune of the young Madame B.—to attract the attention of this bad man; he soon took an opportunity of declaring his sentiments to her. Shocked and alarmed, she shrunk with horror from the passion she had inspired in this desperate and daring man, of whom she always had an unconquerable dread. After his declaration she shunned his presence, but refrained from mentioning his declaration to her husband, fearing that the impetuosity of his feelings would hurry him to a meeting with the colonel, which would doubtless prove fatal to him, and thereby throw her completely in the power of their mutual enemy.

The colonel continued to visit at the estate, and was always attended by a junior officer, who, being the professed admirer of this lady's sister, became a frequent guest, and it was not considered extraordinary that the colonel should accompany his friend. The unhappy lady, in the meantime, endured great uneasiness of mind, and confided to an elderly female friend, who sometimes came to visit her, the cause of her disquiet; adding, that she had a presentiment of some approaching evil which she could not banish from her mind.

Some urgent business obliging her husband to go to town for a day or two, the lady, alarmed at the thought of being at the estate without him, expressed a wish that she and her sister should accompany him. His strongly opposed her desire, alleging that the fatigue of the journey would be injurious to her, as she was then expecting to be a mother. In vain she urged her entreaties; he at first laughed at her extraordinary wish to visit the town, and then felt surprised at the more than common grief she evinced at parting for so short a time. Bidding her keep up her spirits, he gaily bade her adieu, and, as he told his friend afterwards, saw her, on turning his head to look back, weeping bitterly where he had taken leave of her.

When his swift-footed bonnet had borne him through the avenue of trees, and turned into the narrow road he was so travel along, he looked back at her for the last time—it was indeed the last time—he never saw her again.

On the evening of his departure she was particularly anxious and uneasy, and started at every sound (as her favourite maid afterwards related), and expressed a desire that the house should be shut up at a much earlier hour than usual, and that every one should retire to bed, requesting her sister to sleep with her that night. As she was not naturally fearful, her restlessness and evident terror that evening excited the surprise of her sister and her maid. On being rallied on her timidity, she burst into tears, saying, that a great calamity, she was sure, was hanging over her, and she should never see her husband again. All these terrors and forebodings were attributed to weakness of nerves, and the delicacy of her situation at the time, and it was agreed that they should go to bed; before she retired to her room, however, she carefully examined every door and window, to be sure of all being secured.

Towards the morning of the following day, the blacks on the estate, aroused by the outcry of the watchman, beheld their master's house a 'blaze of flames, and, by sunrise, a heap of ruins alone was seen where that happy dwelling once stood. All efforts to extinguish the fire had been in vain; it had been burning too long, and had too surely penetrated into every part of the mansion before it was discovered, for any endeavour to prevail against it. A slave was despatched to town with the dreadful tidings for the master, whose anguish at hearing the misfortune that had befallen him may be more easily imagined than described. It was at first supposed that the fire had accidentally happened, and that the two ladies had been burned to death in the house; but a small silk shoe, which was at once recognised as belonging to Madame, having been found in a narrow path leading to the river, it was then conjectured that some horrible act of violence had been perpetrated, and that the two females had been murdered in some part of the ground. Search was made for the bodies, but they were never found.

After a careful investigation of the matter, it was discovered that the waiting-maid, who slept in the room adjoining her mistress's apartment, had admitted a soldier into the house, who was immediately followed by two other men, wrapped up in cloaks. The woman, not expecting the two latter, and seeing them approach her lady's room, was about to scream out, when the soldier seized her, and throwing a thick great coat over her head, prevented her from moving or speaking, and hurried her into the house. When at length he released her from his grasp, she saw the building in flames. Such was her account; she protested that she had no knowledge of the intentions of the men who accompanied the soldier, and expressed the greatest grief at the catastrophe. Her assertions, however, were not credited, and she was taken into custody: the soldier was also taken up, and confessed having entered the house at the command of Colonel —, who, with another officer, had accompanied him. The colonel denied the charge, but the man most solemnly declared the truth of what he affirmed, at the same time acknowledging his guilt, and expressing great contrition for what he had done in obedience to his officer's commands. No doubt of the colonel's guilt remained in the minds of any; so much evil was known, and so much more suspected of him, that all were ready to believe the evidence against him; yet, such was the general fear entertained of the military, and so little was justice understood or attended to, that this man was acquitted, and the far less guilty accomplice of his crime was executed, calling on heaven to testify to the truth of his allegation, and accusing the colonel of having drawn him into sin, and then leaving him to his fate: the woman also suffered death. Finding the law did not punish the author of his misfortunes as he deserved, the unhappy husband challenged his enemy to combat, and, as was to be expected in so unequal a combat, he fell beneath the blows of the practised swordsman.

The mystery of this transaction has never been cleared up, and it remains unknown how the unfortunate females met their death.

AN HONEST CHRISTMAS CAROL.

BY AN OLD CRICKETER AND HIS YOUNG KENSMAN.

"Without the door let Sorrow lie:—

And if of cold it hap to dye,

We'll bury't in a Christmas pye:—

And evermore be merrie!"

Wilder's Juvenile.

Join merry hearts in merry vows]

To keep old customs up,—

To dress the house with holly boughs,

And drain the Wassail cup!

We'll hold the mirth the season brings,

With all its jovial folly,

As firmly as the ivy clings

Around the sprig of holly.

Oh holly! 'tis a sight as rare

As Summer's gaudy scene,

To see both hall and hovel wear

Thy livery of green;—

To see in spite of Winter's nips,

Thy little bright red berry,

Reminding us of ruby lips

That bid all hearts be merry!

Bright Vesta, hail! Housewrenky Carn!

Evaporate in fog!

Look on our little Summer there

Where burns the bright Yule Log.

Christmas and these are not of kin—

He waxes there, base sojourner!

There is no place for thee within

His cheerful chimney-corner!

Welcome the midnight Minstrel's lay—

That simple rustic pray!—

That, like the fabled elfin fay,

Steals lightly through the air—

Welcome the soft unsexed new

'What art can paint its whiteness?

Or can Spring's sweetest dew bestow

The icicle's pure brightness?

Now Mally innocently trips

Beneath the Mistletoe,—

And if Ralph pounces on her lips

How can she say him "No"?

To quarrel with so fair a kin,

Were little short of treason;

And frowns at such a time as this

Were sadly out of Season!

Now Youth with dance and mirthful song

Seems feels the minutes fly;

Joy mingles with the merry throng

And lightens every eye:

Some ardent play the changeable game—

'Fit type of life's beginning—

When all hearts join the chase for Fame,

And all are sure of winning!

And old age loves the lively noise—

Each happy youthful face

Appears to speak of by-gone joys;

That memory may trace:—

He too has had his early prime,

His eye has beam'd as brightly,

His voice has join'd the cheerful chime,

His feet have tripp'd as lightly!

—Come, pass the Wassail bowl about!

The merry feast begin,

He cares not for the cold without

Whose heart is warm within!

Hail, rosy Bacchus!—graver cares

We in thy goblet bury;

Let him be dismal now who dares—

Our Christmas shall be merry!

FINE ARTS AND MUSIC.

Tough Yarns, by the Old Sailor, illustrated by George,] Cruikshank.

Fox the illustration of jest and droffery, there is none going like George Cruikshank; his etching-needle brings before us the scenes we read of, as fresh, as lively, as real as when they first occurred. What can be more full of life and character than the smoking party of Greenwich pensioners? Cruikshank hits a nice point; in his best things, the action and expression are highly seasoned, to the verge of caricature; but, though eccentric and grotesque, his faces have the character of portraits, from their exceeding truth and reality. So every one of the old gentlemen before us has a distinct and exclusive identity—we should know him again, if we met him in the streets. The sailor misreading the custom-house officer is, in the spirit of nautical adventure, a headlong scramble for life and death, between jest and earnest. The fat sailing-master, Old Soundings, driving the three dismounted French dragoons before him is admirable; it is an excellent specimen of that power of drawing in which Cruikshank need yield to no one; and the individual character of the man so sailorly, respectable, fat, waddling, puffing, and commanding, so flustered in person, so cool in courage—is another of his idealities that are as real to us as flesh and blood. The kicking pas de deux, between Captain Treebridge and the cowardly Neapolitan Count, is highly comic: so are Old Mike and Mrs Rowley Uncle Joey, and Mother Mount's sons. The picturesque land crab carrying off the head of the dead corporal, to the utter astonishment of the two Jack Tars, which they mistake for the Corporal's own skeleton, playing 'St Dennis, is a glorious confusion of things—a riddle substantiated.

This concluding volume of the complete and most explanatory edition of Burns yet published, contains a view of the Harbour and Town of Ayr, and of Leith Pier and Harbour, both from the pencil of Mr D. O. Hill. We could wish that they had been more clearly and distinctly engraved; but they are good, handling, trafficking, sailor-frequented portraits of these places. Leith, the only one of the places we have seen, we recognised immediately. How many anxious, how many hopeful, encouraging friends did we see coming down the pier, following the parting steamer, as far as they might into the strange waters,—keeping company with its hundred passengers to the last extent of land,—trying, perhaps, to persuade themselves that they were going part of the way!

There is a great improvement which the more recent views of towns present; and that is a due attention to the degree of population peculiar to the place. In the older views, the streets of London were deserted,—a pointing man with his arm projecting at right angles from his hips, and his hand on a stick, looking like a humiliated B, a gawky woman in a parasol, were all that were necessary to represent the souls of the place; a dog was a gratuitous gift; a child running by the woman showed the artist to be a liberal man; a man and horse, was a prodigality; a coach added a shilling to the price. Now-a-days, a view in London would be considered very meagre and trivial, that did not convey also an idea of the bustle, and crowding, that gives life and character to the scene, more than the mere shapes of the buildings.

The Musical Library, Part IX. Charles Knight.

It is now some time since we suggested to a young musician, who had opened a music-warehouse, that the increased demand for music called for a cheaper and more general supply; that now it was not only the more affluent who required music, but the poorer portions of the middle classes, and even others still poorer than those, felt the want of it, and that a reduction in the price of music would amply repay the speculator, by an increase of sale. He admitted the reasoning; but was afraid of the jealousy of the trade. Sixpence was the minimum charge, according to the orthodox rules. It has been reserved for speculators out of the trade to anticipate the market that exists for cheap music. Books had grown cheap; prints had proved the advantage of many small, over fewer and larger profits—music alone held back, and measured its price according to the demand for it in former times. It was out of all proportion with the advance in other articles of refinement, and many a piece of music has mouldered unbought upon the shelves, or straggled forth in small, uncertain numbers, of which a large sale, at a small price, would have better paid the music-seller, have redounded to the advantage of the composer, and, by aiding to spread the public taste, have added still farther to a demand for fresh publications. The musical taste, such as it is, among our countrymen, exists in spite of many difficulties; possessing naturally a less degree of capacity for it than many of our continental neighbours, obliged to devote a greater portion of their time to labour, and obliged to pay an enormous tax for its gratification. In spite of these difficulties do musical professors obtain large salaries; and the practice of music in domestic parties is everywhere gaining ground; and yet the trade, who should supply these private parties with music, held back from accommodating the price to the means of all, the only way in which a general supply can be afforded.

These things are beginning to be amended. The 'Musical Library' has broken the ice; other works,

VII.

And, though the shady gloom
Hath given day her room,
The sun himself withhold his wanted speed,
And bid his hand, for shame,
As his inferior flame.
The new-enlightened world no more should need.
He saw a greater sun appear
Than his bright throne or burning ardours could bear.

VIII.

The Shepherds on the lawn,
On the point of dawn,
Sat simply chatting in a rustic row;
Full little thought they then
That the mighty Pan
Was kindly come to live with them below;
Perhaps their loves, or else their sheep,
Was all that did their silly thoughts so busy keep.

IX.

When such music sweet
Their hearts and ears did greet,
As never was by mortal singer strook,
Divinely warbled voice
Answering the stringed noise,
As all their souls in blissful raptures took.
The air, such pleasure loth to lose,
With thousand echoes still prolongs each heavenly close.

X.

Nature, that heard such sound
Beneath the hollow round
Of Cynthia's seat, the very region thrilling,
Naw was almost won.
To think her past was done,
And that her reign had here its last fulfilling;
She knew such harmony alone
Could hold all heaven and earth in happier union.

XI.

At last surrounds their sight
A globe of circular light
That with long beams the shame-fac'd night
array'd;
The helmed Cherubim
And sworded Seraphim
Are seen in glittering ranks with wings displayed,
Harping in loud and solemn quire,
With unexpressive notes, to heaven's new-born heir.

XII.

Such music as 'tis said,
Before was never made,
But when of old the sons of morning sung,
While the Creator great
His constellations set,
And the well-balance'd world on hinges hung;
And east the dark foundations deep,
And bid the weltering waves their oozy channel keep.

XIII.

Ring out, ye crystal spheres,
Once bless our human ears,
If ye have powers to touch our senses so;
And let your silver chime
Move in melodious time;
And let the bass of Heaven's deep organ blow;
And with your nine-fold harmony,
Make up full consort to the angelic symphony.

XIV.

For, if such holy song
Enwrap our fancy long,
Time will run back, and fetch the age of gold;
And speckled Vanity,
Will sicken soon and die,
And leprous Sin will melt from earthly mould,
And Hell itself will pass away,
And leave her dolorous mansions to the peering day.

XV.

Yes, Truth and Justice then
Will down return to men,
Orb'd in a rainbow; and, like glories wearing,
Mercy will sit between,
Thron'd in celestial sheen,
With radiant feet the tissued clouds down steering,
And heaven, as at some festival,
Will open wide the gates of her high palace hall.

XVI.

But wisest Fate says no,
This must not yet be so,
The babe yet lies in smiling infancy,
That on the bitter cross
Must redeem our loss;
So both himself and us to glorify;
Yet first, to those ychain'd in sleep,
The wakeful trump of doom must thunder through the deep.

XVII.

With such a horrid clang
As on Mount Sinai rang,
While the red fire and moulder'd clouds out break:
The aged earth aghast,
With terror of the blast,
Shall from the surface to the centre shake;
When, at the world's last session,
The dreadful Judge in middle air shall spread his throne.

XVIII.

And then at last our bliss
Full and perfect is,
But now begins; far from this happy day.
The old Dragon, under ground
In straiter limits bound,
Not half so far casts his usurped sway;
And, wrath to see his kingdom fall,
Swinges the scaly herring of his fabled tail.

XIX.

The oracles are dumb;
No voice or hideous hum
Runs through the arch'd roof in sounds deceiving;
Apollo from his shrine
Can no more divine,
With hollow shrieks the steep of Delphos leaving.
No nightly trance, or breathed spell
Inspires the pale-eyed priest from the prophetic cell.

XX.

The lonely mountains o'er,
And the resounding shore,
A voice of weeping heard and loud lament;
From haunted spring and dale,
Edg'd with poplar pale,
The parting Genius is with sighing sent;
With flower-inwoven tresses torn,
The Nymphs in twilight shade of tangled thickets
mourn.

XXI.

In consecrated earth,
And on the holy hearth,
The Laræ and Lemures moan with midnight
plaint;
In urns and altars round
A cheer and dying sound
Affrights the Flamines at their service quaint;
And the chill marble seems to sweat,
While each peculiar Power foregoes his wonted seat.

XXII.

Peor and Baalam
Forsake their temples dim,
With that twice-batter'd God of Ebalstine;
And moaned, Astartoth,
Hesper's queen and mother both,
Now sit no-girt with tapers' holy shine;
The Lybick Hammon shrinks his horn;
In vain the Tyrian maids their wounded Thammoz mourn.

XXIII.

And sullen Molech, fled,
Has left in shadows dread
His burning idol all of blackest hue;
In vain with cymbals ring,
They call the grisly king,
In dismal dance about the furnace blue:
The brutish Gods of Nile as fast,
Iris, and Orus, and the dog Anubis haste.

XXIV.

Nor is Osiris seen
In Memphian grove or green
Trampling the unshowered grass with lowings loud;
Nor can he be at rest
Within his sacred chest;
Neught but profoundest hell can be his shroud.
In vain with timbrelled anthems dark
The stable-stol'd sorcerers bear his worshipp'd ark.

XXV.

He feels from Judah's land
The dreaded Infant's hand;
The rays of Bethlehem blind his dusky eyes;
Nor all of the Gods beside
Longer dare abide;
Not Typhon huge ending in snakey twine:
Our Babe, to show his Godhead true,
Can in his swaddling bands control the damned crew.

XXVI.

So, when the sun in bed,
Curtain'd with cloudy red,
Pillows his chin upon an orient wave,
The flaking shadows pale
Troop to the infernal jail;
Each scatter'd ghost slips to his several grave;
And the yellow-skirted Fates,
Fly after the night steeds, leaving the moon-lov'd
maze.

XXVII.

But see! the Virgin-blast
Hath laid her babe to rest;
Time is our tedious song should here have ending;
Heaven's youngest-teenaged son,
Hath fixed her pollack'd car,
Her sleeping Lord with handmaid lamp-attending;
And all about the country stable
Eight harnessed angels sit in order serviceable.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

NO. I.—MYSTERIOUS OCCURRENCE AT THE MAURIMUS.

[From Recollections of Seven Years Residence at the Maurimius, by a Lady,—a truly feminine book, full of natural feeling and description, and evincing a liberal spirit of allowance for other countries in spite of party education.]

A young married gentleman lived on an estate in a very retired and lonely part of the country, at a great distance from town. At that time the island was covered with thick forests and impenetrable jungles. Estates were far apart and divided from each other by deep ravines, high mountains, rapid rivers, or pathless woods; communication was very difficult in consequence; narrow footpaths, and deviant tracts over the mountains and along the brink of precipices were the only mediums of intercourse between the inhabitants, instead of the fine broad roads over which the carriages of the English now roll so smoothly. This gentleman's family consisted only of his wife, her sister, and himself; both the ladies were very beautiful and attractive. It happened, unfortunately, that some troops were stationed in the neighbourhood of the estate, commanded by a man of the most infamous character. The army of revolutionized France was of a very different order from that which Condé and Turenne had led into the field; and of that army the regiments stationed at the colonies were the worst specimens, and composed of the most abandoned characters. The colonel of the military party stationed near this estate, was of this description, but had plausible manners and handsome features; yet it was said that there was a certain fearful expression in his eyes which seemed to tell of evil passions and wicked deeds.

It was the misfortune of the young Madame B. to attract the attention of this bad man; he soon took an opportunity of declaring his sentiments to her. Shocked and alarmed, she shrank with horror from the passion she had inspired in this desperate and daring man, of whom she always had an unconquerable dread. After his declaration she shunned his presence, but refrained from mentioning his declaration to her husband, fearing that the impetuosity of his feelings would hurry him to a meeting with the colonel, which would doubtless prove fatal to him, and thereby throw her completely in the power of their mutual enemy.

The colonel continued to visit at the estate, and was always attended by a junior officer, who, being the professed admirer of this lady's sister, became a frequent guest, and it was not considered extraordinary that the colonel should accompany his friend. The unhappy lady, in the meantime, endured great uneasiness of mind, and confided to an elderly female friend, who sometimes came to visit her, the cause of her disquiet; adding, that she had a presentiment of some approaching evil which she could not banish from her mind.

Some urgent business obliging her husband to go to town for a day or two, the lady, alarmed at the thought of being at the estate without him, expressed a wish that she and her sister should accompany him. His strongly opposed her desire, alleging that the fatigue of the journey would be injurious to her, as she was then expecting to be a mother. In vain she urged her entreaties; he at first laughed at her extraordinary wish to visit the town, and then felt surprised at the more than common grief she evinced at parting for so short a time. Bidding her keep up her spirits, he gayly bade her adieu, and, as he told his friend afterwards, saw her, on turning his head to look back, weeping bitterly where he had taken leave of her.

When his swift-footed bonnet had borne him through the avenue of trees, and turned into the narrow road he was so travel along, he looked back at her for the last time—it was indeed the last time—he never saw her again.

On the evening of his departure she was particularly anxious and uneasy, and started at every sound (as her favourite maid afterwards related), and expressed a desire that the house should be shut up at a much earlier hour than usual, and that every one should retire to bed, requesting her sister to sleep with her that night. As she was not naturally fearful, her restlessness and evident terror that evening excited the surprise of her sister and her maid. On being rallied on her timidity, she burst into tears, saying, that a great calamity, she was sure, was hanging over her, and she should never see her husband again. All these terrors and forebodings were attributed to weakness of nerves; and the delicacy of her situation at the time, and it was agreed that they should go to bed; before she retired to her room, however, she carefully examined every door and window, to be sure of all being secured.

Towards the morning of the following day, the blacks on the estate, aroused by the outcry of the watchman, beheld their master's house a blaze of flames, and, by sunrise, a heap of ruins alone was seen where that happy dwelling once stood. All efforts to extinguish the fire had been in vain; it had been burning too long, and had too surely penetrated into every part of the mansion before it was discovered, for any endeavour to prevail against it. A slave was despatched to town with the dreadful tidings for his master, whose anguish at hearing the misfortune that had befallen him may be more easily imagined than described. It was at first supposed that the fire had accidentally happened, and that the two ladies had been burned to death in the house; but a small silk shoe, which was at once recognised as belonging to Madame, having been found in a narrow path leading to the river, it was then conjectured that some horrible act of violence had been perpetrated, and that the two females had been murdered in some part of the ground. Search was made for the bodies, but they were never found.

After a careful investigation of the matter, it was discovered that the waiting-maid, who slept in the room adjoining her mistress's apartment, had admitted a soldier into the house, who was immediately followed by two other men, wrapped up in cloaks. The woman, not expecting the two latter, and seeing them approach her lady's room, was about to scream out, when the soldier seized her, and throwing a thick great coat over her head, prevented her from moving or speaking, and hurried her into the house. When at length he released her from his grasp, she saw the building in flames. Such was her account; she protested that she had no knowledge of the intentions of the men who accompanied the soldier, and expressed the greatest grief at the catastrophe. Her assertions, however, were not credited, and she was taken into custody: the soldier was also taken up, and confessed having entered the house at the command of Colonel —, who, with another officer, had accompanied him. The colonel denied the charge, but the man most solemnly declared the truth of what he affirmed, at the same time acknowledging his guilt, and expressing great contrition for what he had done in obedience to his officer's commands. No doubt of the colonel's guilt remained in the minds of any; so much evil was known, and so much more suspected of him, that all were ready to believe the evidence against him; yet, such was the general fear entertained of the military, and so little was justice understood or attended to, that this man was acquitted, and the far less guilty accomplice of his crime was executed, calling on heaven to testify to the truth of his allegation, and accusing the colonel of having drawn him into sin, and then leaving him to his fate: the woman also suffered death. Finding the law did not punish the author of his misfortunes as he deserved, the unhappy husband challenged his enemy to combat, and, as was to be expected in so unequal a combat, he fell beneath the blows of the practised swordsman.

The mystery of this transaction has never been cleared up, and it remains unknown how the unfortunate females met their death.

AN HONEST CHRISTMAS CAROL.

BY AN OLD CRICKETER AND HIS YOUNG KENSMAN.

"Without the door let Sorrow lie—
And if of cold it hap to dye,
We'll bury't in a Christmas pye—
And evermore be merrie!"
Wilder's Juvenilia.

Join merry hearts in merry vows!
To keep old customs up,—
To dress the house with holly boughs,
And drain the Wassail cup!
We'll hold the mirth the season brings,
With all its jovial folly,
As firmly as the ivy clings
Around the sprig of holly.

Oh holly! 'tis a sight as rare
As Summer's gaudy scene,
To see both hall and hovel wear
Thy livery of green;—
To see in spite of Winter's nips,
Thy little bright red berry,
Reminding us of ruby lips
That bid all hearts be merry!

Bright Vesta, hail! Huzza, huzza, huzza!
Ere you're in fog!
Look on our little Summer there
Where burns the bright Yule Log.

And frowns at such a time as this

Eighth and last Volume of 'Cunningham's Burns.'

This concluding volume of the complete and most explanatory edition of Burns yet published, contains a view of the Harbour and Town of Ayr, and of Little Pirn and Habbro, both from the pencil of Mr D. O. Hill. We could wish that they had been more clearly and distinctly engraved; but they are good, handling, trafficking, sailor-frequented portions of these places. He admitted the reasoning; but was afraid of the jealousy of the trade. Sixpence was the minimum charge, according to the orthodox rules. It has been reserved for speculators out of the trade to anticipate the market that exists for cheap music. Books had grown cheap; prints had proved the advantage of many small, over fewer and larger profits—music alone held back, and measured its price according to the demand for it in former times. It was out of all proportion with the advance in other articles of refinement, and many a piece of music has mouldered unbought upon the shelves, or straggled forth in small, uncertain numbers, of which a large sale, at a small price, would have better paid the music-seller, have redounded to the advantage of the composer, and, by aiding to spread the public taste, have added still farther to a demand for fresh publications. The musical taste, such as it is, among our countrymen, exists in spite of many difficulties; possessing naturally a less degree of capacity for it than many of our continental neighbours, obliged to devote a greater portion of their time to labour, and obliged to pay an enormous tax for its gratification. In spite of these difficulties do musical professors obtain large salaries; and the practice of music in domestic parties is everywhere gaining ground; and yet the trade, who should supply these private parties with music, held back from accommodating the price to the means of all, the only way in which a general supply can be afforded.

These things are beginning to be amended. The 'Musical Library' has broken the ice; other works, in which the trade are coyly dabbling, have followed its example; and doubtless, in these days of reform, the musical world will be purified of its exclusiveness, and the works of musicians become as open to every one as those of writers and painters. Mozart's 'Don Giovanni' is now puplshing in threepenny numbers, arranged by Mr Barnett; this is a good beginning. We hope the intire works of Paesiello, Winter, Gluck, Rossini, and other great German and Italian writers will follow. Meantime good selections are the most desirable, and effect a more rapid spread of a knowledge of good music. It was lucky that the first work that set the example of suiting its price to the means of the public was good, and has stood its ground; otherwise the failure of the thing might have been looked upon as a proof of the fallacy of the reasons that led to the attempt. The 'Musical Library' is cheap, beautifully got up, and selected with taste and discrimination. Every part has something of the best in it; something for likings exclusively English, something for the lovers of the truly Italian style, something for those who delight in the profundity of the modern German school. A supplement of letter-press accompanies the monthly parts, with comments on the music they contain, and notices of musical occurrences of the day. We would object, generally, that, in the arrangements for the 'Musical Library,' too much is sacrificed to exceeding facility of execution, which makes the accompaniments sometimes less full than they might be: we could also wish, for our own parts, that a little more concerted music from the dramatic Italian and German writers were introduced. There are many of Mozart's finest pieces, many among Rossini's best performances, that are not at all too difficult to enter into a selection for the most general uses. And may we entreat speedily for a few specimens of Gluck and Winter, particularly some of the latter's affecting compositions in the 'Ratto di Proserpina,' which is an easy straightforward work, and most beautiful? The current Number of the 'Musical Library' contains, among the instrumental music, an Air and Variations by Beethoven in his most original manner. It reminds us of the Theme and Variations in his 'Septuor;' the two things are very different, but obviously by the same master hand;—three of Handel's finest choruses arranged for the pianoforte; and the wonderful overture to 'Don Giovanni.' 'What a pity that the still more wonderful introduction into which it should run, which finishes with that beautiful trio for three basses, could not have been given us with it. It is difficult, perhaps, but not impossible; and its beauty would pay for any amount of difficulty. Among the vocal music is a pleasing ballad by Arne, and a sweet glee by Spofforth, the sweetest of glee writers. The tenderness and beauty of this one are not to be surpassed in anything of the kind. It was written, we believe, in C, for a counter-tenor, tenor, and two basses; but, for more general convenience it has been re-arranged, in A three sharps, for two trebles, alto, and bass; it goes very well so, and is certainly better suited to family parties; by this arrangement the ladies are not excluded, and that is the chief thing. A memoir of the composer is in the Supplement.

SONNET.

TO MY FIRE.

My little chirping fire, companion gay,
Whose merry gambols make me less alone,
A blessing on thy glee! Be ever known
At evening hour, when just the dying day
Hath made light sad.—Thou hast a pleasant way
Of muttering low, in many a little tone,
Quaint syllables—that scarcely from his own
The cricket knows, as pausing mid his play.

Sweet is thy precept in that listening hour;
Thou seem'st to tell me with thy quiet mirth
How good is hope—regret how little worth:—
And perfect is thy love;—if Fate but lower
The cold world leaves us,—thou, with kindlier turn,
When sharpest frost impends dost merriest burn.

THE LANCASHIRE WITCHES.

[FROM Mr Godwin's 'Lives of the Necromancers,' just published. As the chimney-corners at Christmas sometimes love to vary their mirthful stories of old times with melancholy, we here give them a very sad one, which we may end, however, with this cheerful reflection, that true Christianity has at length put an end to such absurdities. The flower has outgrown the husk.]

A more melancholy tale does not occur in the annals of necromancy than that of the Lancashire witches in 1612. The scene of this story is in Pendlebury Forest, four or five miles from Manchester, remarkable for its picturesque and gloomy situation. Such places were not sought then as now, that they might afford food for the imagination, and gratify the refined taste of the traveller. They were rather shunned as infamous for scenes of depredation and murder, or as the consecrated haunts of diabolical intercourse. Pendlebury had been long of ill repute on this latter account, when a country magistrate, Roger Nowel by name, conceived about this time that he should do a public service by rooting out a nest of witches who rendered the place a terror to all the neighbouring vulgar. The first persons he seized on were Elizabeth Demdike and Anne Chattox, the former of whom was eighty years of age, and had for some years been blind, who principally subsisted by begging, though she had a miserable hovel on the spot which she called her own. Anne Chattox was of the same age, and had for some time been threatened with the calamity of blindness. Demdike was held to be so hardened a witch that she had trained all her family to the mystery, namely, Elizabeth Devise, her daughter, and James and Alison Devise, her grandchildren. These, together with John Balcock, and Jane his mother, Alice Natter, Catherine Hewitt, and Isabel Roby, were successively apprehended by the diligence of Nowel, and one or two neighbouring magistrates, and were all of them by some means induced, some to make a more liberal, and others a more restricted confession of their misdeeds in witchcraft, and were afterwards hurried away to Lancaster Castle, fifty miles off, to prison. Their crimes were said to have universally proceeded from malignity and resentment; and it was reported to have repeatedly happened for poor old Demdike to be led by night from her habitation into the open air, by some member of her family, where she was left alone for an hour to curse her victim, and pursue her unholy incantations, and was then sought and brought back again to her hovel. Her curses never failed to produce the desired effect.

The poor wretches had been but a short time in prison, when information was given that a meeting of witches was held on Good-Friday, at Malkin's Tower, the habitation of Elizabeth Devise, to the number of twenty persons, to consult how, by infernal machinations, to kill one Lovel, an officer, to blow up Lancaster Castle, deliver the prisoners, and to kill another man of the name of Lister. The last was effected; [the other plans, by some means, we are not told now, were prevented.

The prisoners were kept in jail till the summer assizes; and, in the meantime, it fortunately happened that the poor blind Demdike died in confinement, and was never brought up to trial.

The other prisoners were severally indicted for killing by witchcraft certain persons who were named, and were all found guilty. The principal witnesses against Elizabeth Devise were James Devise and Jennet Devise, her grandchildren, the latter only nine years of age. When this girl was put into the witness box the grandmother, on seeing her, set up so dreadful a yell, intermixed with dreadful curses, that the child declared that she could not go on with her evidence, unless the prisoner was removed. This was agreed to, and both brother and sister swore that they had been present, when the devil came to their grandmother, in the shape of a black dog, and asked her what she desired. She said the death of John Robinson; when the dog told her to make an image of Robinson in clay, and after crumble it into dust, and as fast as the image perished, the life of the victim should waste away, and in conclusion the man should die. This testimony was received; and upon such testimony, and testimony like this, ten persons were led to the gallows, on the twentieth of August, Anne Chattox, of eighty years of age among the rest, the day after the trials, which lasted two days, were finished. The judges who presided on the trials were Sir James Altham and Sir Edward Bromley, barons of the exchequer.

From the whole of this story it is fair to infer that these old women had played at the game of commerce with the devil. It had flattered their vanity to make their simpler neighbours afraid of them. To observe the symptoms of their rustic terror, even of their hatred and detestation, had been gratifying to them. They played the game so long that in an imperfect degree they deceived themselves. Human passions are always to a certain degree infectious. Perceiving the hatred of their neighbours, they began to think that they were worthy objects of detestation and terror, that their imprecations had a real effect, and their curses killed. The brown horrors of the forest were favourable to visions, and they sometimes almost believed that they met the foe of mankind in the night. But, when Elizabeth Devise actually saw her grandchild of nine years old placed in the witness-box, with the intention of consigning her to a public and ignominious end, then the reveries of the imagination vanished, and she deeply felt the reality, that, where she had been somewhat imposing on the child in devilish sport, she had been whetting the dagger that was to take her own life, and dig her own grave. It was then no wonder that she uttered a preternatural yell and poured curses from her heart. It must have been almost beyond human endurance to hear the cry of her despair, and to witness the curses and agony in which it vented itself.

Twenty-two years elapsed after this scene, when a wretched man of the name of Edmund Robinson, conceived, on the same spot, the scheme of making himself a profitable speculation from the same source. He trained his son, eleven years of age, and furnished him with the necessary instructions. He taught him to say that one day in the fields he had met with two dogs, which he urged on to hunt a hare. They would not budge; and he in revenge tied them to a bush and whipped them; when suddenly one of them was transformed into an old woman and the other into a child—a witch and her imp. This story succeeded so well that his son had an eye that could distinguish a witch by sight, and he took him round to the neighbouring churches, where he placed him standing on a bench after service, and bade him look round and see what he could observe. [The device, however clumsy, succeeded, and no less than seventeen persons were apprehended at the boy's election, and conducted to Lancaster Castle. These seventeen persons were tried at the assizes and found guilty; but the judge, whose name has unfortunately been lost, unlike Sir James Altham and Sir Edward Bromley, saw something in the case that excited his suspicion, and, though the juries had not hesitated in any one instance, respited the convicts, and sent up a report of the affair to the government. Twenty-two years, on this occasion, had not elapsed in vain. Four of the prisoners were, by the judge's recommendation, sent for to the metropolis, and were examined, first by the king's physician, and then by Charles the 1st, in person. The boy's story was strictly scrutinized. In fine, he confessed that it was all an imposture; and the whole seventeen received the royal pardon.

TABLE TALK.

Bad Translations.—Madame de la Fayette (authoress of some of the 'French Fairy Tales') used to compare a bad translation to a footman sent with a compliment from his mistress; what she had directed him to say in the most polite terms, he quite murders by his bungling rusticity in delivering it; and the more delicate the message is the more it is sure to suffer from the ignorance of such a messenger.

Involuntary Trip to the West Indies.—A frigate, returning from a cruise, came off Plymouth, and the Captain invited a few friends to dine on board, promising them a sail, as it was a fine day. They went and enjoyed it much; but as they were tacking to return to port, a cutter came up with an order from government, for him to sail instantly to the West Indies, with some sealed packets to the Admiral on that station. There was nothing to be done, therefore, but to take his company with him, and give them such a view of the West Indies as they neither expected nor wished to have.—The Ship.

Ancient Reform Schedule.—In old times people used to put a written schedule of their sins under the cloth which covered the altar of a favourite saint, accompanied by a donation; and, in a day or two after, re-examined the schedule, which the virtues of the saint converted to a blank.—Fosbrooke's British Monachism.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Our Correspondents will excuse us this once. It is Christmas time, and good friends make allowances. Several articles have been delayed by the press of immediate matter till next week, when we shall bring up all arrears remaining at the end of 1834.

To one Correspondent, however, a Lady, we cannot help making our acknowledgments for the letter received from Wales, accompanied with apologies no less needless in themselves than welcome and delightful for the spirit that dictated them.

PRICE THREE HALFPENCE.

THE EDITOR having been accidentally prevented from seeing the proof sheets of last week's Journal, requests the reader to correct an error of the press in the first article, which is of importance to the writer's meaning. It is in the passage where Christianity is spoken of as a "GREAT EVENT." This event, says the passage as it stands in print, "has had a wonderful effect on the world, and still has, even in the workings of its apparently unfilial daughter, Modern Philosophy, who could never have been what she is, but for the doctrine of boundless Deity, grafted upon the elegant self-reference of the Greeks, and the patriotism of the Romans, which was so often a mere pretext for the most unneighbourly injustice. Now so great an event must have been in the contemplation of Providence," &c.

Instead of the word "Deity" in this passage, it should have been sympathy.

In the same article, instead of "the Handel and Corelli," read "Handel and Corelli."

NEW YEARS' DAY. NEW YEAR'S GIFTS. THE WASSAIL-BOWL.

ALL the Christmas holidays have, or may have, if they please, some things in common, such as mince-pies, plum-puddings, holly-boughs, and games of play; but the three principal ones have each their indispensable accompaniment,—Christmas Day its log on the fire—New-Year's Day its wassail-bowl—Twelfth Night its cake. Every man may think he begins a New Year purely by entering into the 1st of January; but he is mistaken. The New Year is no more to him than the old one—the 1st of January nothing different from the 31st of December. The poor man walks in error. People, if they could, have a right to hustle him back again into the preceding week, and ask him what business he has out of his twelve-month.

Formerly, everybody made presents on New-Year's Day, as they still do in Paris, where our lively neighbours turn the whole metropolis into a world of cakes, sweetmeats, jewellery, and all sorts of gifts and greetings. The Puritans checked that custom, out of a notion that it was superstitious, and because the heathens did it; which was an odd reason, and might have abolished many other innocent and laudable practices—eating itself, for one—and going to bed. Innumerable are the authorities which (had we lived in those days) we would have brought up in behalf of those two customs, in answer to the New-Year's-Day-knocking-down folios of Mr Prynne, the great "blasphemer of eustard." Unfortunately, if the Puritans thought gift-giving superstitious, the increasing spirit of commerce was too well inclined to admit half its epithet, and regard the practice as, at least, superfluous—a thing over and above—and what was not always productive of a "consideration." "Nothing's given for nothing now-a-days," as the saying is. Nay, it is doubtful whether next to nothing will always be given for something. There are people, we are credibly informed, taken for persons "well to do" in the world, and of respectable characters, who will even turn over the pages of the LONDON JOURNAL, and narrowly investigate whether there is enough wit, learning, philosophy, lives, travels, poetry, voyages, and romances in it, for three half-pence.

This must be mended, or there will be no such thing as a New Year by and by. Novelty will go out: the sun will halt in the sky, and prudent men sharply consider whether they have need of common perception.

Without entering into politics, something is to be said, now-a-days, for an Englishman's being averse to making presents; and, as it behoves us to make the best of a bad thing, reasons might be shown also, why it is not so well to have a formal and official sort of day for making presents, as to leave them to more spontaneous occasions. Besides, if every body gives, and everybody receives, where, it may be asked, is the compliment? and how are people to know whether they would have given or received anything, had it not been the custom?

How are they to be sure, whether a very petty present is not a positive insult, till they compare it with what has been received by others? And how are men in office and power to be sure that in the gifts of their inferiors there is anything but mere self-seeking and bribery? It was formerly the custom in England to load princes and ministers with New-Year's Gifts. Queen Elizabeth, who had the soul of a mantua-maker as well as of a monarch, received whole wardrobes of gowns and caps, as well as caskets of jewellery. What a day must she have passed of it, with all the fine things spread out before her! And, yet with all her just estimation of herself, and her vanity to boot, bitter suspicions must occasionally have crossed her, that all this was but so much self-interest appealing to self-love. But suppose a Duke or an Earl did not send a gift good enough. Here was ground for anger and jealousy, and all the pleasure-spoiling self-will which sees no good in what is given it, provided something be wanting. Dryden addressed some verses on New Year's Day to Lord Chancellor Hyde (Clarendon), which he begins as follows:—

My Lord,
While flattering crowds officiously appear
To give themselves, not you, a happy year,
And, by the greatness of their presents, prove
How much they hope, but not how well they love, &c.

Here was a blow (not very well considered perhaps) at the self-complacency induced by the receipt of "great presents!" Suppose Lord Chancellor Lyndhurst, or Lord Chancellor Brougham, had similar presents sent them on the like occasion. How could the one be sure that his great legal knowledge, or the other, that even his great genius, and tact for all knowledge, had anything to do with the compliment? or that it was not as mere a trick for court-favour, as any thing which they would now despise? We grant, that (where there is any right to bestow it at all) a present is a present; that it is an addition to one's stock, and, at all events, a compliment to one's influence; and influence is often its own proof of a right to be complimented; as want of influence is sometimes a greater. But, for the sake of fair play among mankind, every advantage must have its drawback; and it is a drawback on the power to confer benefits, that it cannot always be sure of the motives of those who do it honour. If a day is to be set apart for such manifestations of good will, the birth-day would seem better for them than New-Year's Day. The compliment would be more particular and personal; others might not know of it, and so would not grudge it; and real affections would thus be indulged, not mere ceremonies.

We own that we think there is something in that distinction. Yet our sprightly-blooded neighbours would no doubt have replies to all these arguments; and, for our part, we are for cutting the knot of the difficulty thus:—Make us all rich enough, and then we could indulge ourselves both on the New-Year's Day and the birth-day, both on the general occasion, and the particular one. For, to say the truth, we people who are not rich, and who, therefore, have nothing perhaps worth withholding, are long in coming to understand how it is that rich people can resist these anniversary opportunities of putting delight into the eyes of their friends and dependents, and distributing their toys and utilities on all sides of them. Presents (properly so called) are great ties to gratitude, and therefore great increasers of power and influence, especially if they are of such a kind as to be constantly before the eye, thus producing an everlasting association of pleasant ideas with the giver. They tell the receiver that he is worth something in the giver's eyes; and thus the worth of the giver becomes twenty-fold. Nor do we say this sneeringly, or in disparagement of the self-love which must of necessity be, more or less, mixed up with everyone's nature; for the most disinterested love would have nothing to act upon without it; and the most generous people in the world, such as most consult the pleasure of others before their own, must lose their very identity and personal consciousness, before they can lose a strong sense of themselves, and, consequently, a strong desire to be pleased.

Oh, but rich people, it will be said, are not always so rich as they are supposed to be; and even when they are, they find plenty of calls upon their riches, without going out of their way to encourage them. They have establishments to keep up, heaps of servants, &c.; their wives and families are expensive; and then they are cheated beyond measure.

Making allowances for all this, and granting in some instances that wealth itself be poor, considering the demands upon it, nevertheless for the most part real wealth must be real wealth; that is to say, must have a great deal more than enough. You do not find that a rich man (unless he is a miser) hesitates to make a great many presents to himself,—books, jewels, horses, clothes, furniture, wines, or whatever the thing may be that he cares most for; and he must cease to do this (we mean of course in its superfluity) before he talks of his inability to make presents to others.

Allow us to add a few maxims for those who make presents, whether on New-Year's-day or birth-day.

If the present is to be very exquisite indeed, and no mortification will be mixed up with the receipt of it, out of pure inability to make an equal one, or from any other cause, the rule has often been laid down. It should be something useful, beautiful, costly, and rare. It is generally an elegance, however, to omit the costliness. The rarity is the great point, because riches itself cannot always command it, and the peculiarity of the compliment is the greater. Rare present to rare person.

If you are rich, it is a good rule in general to make a rich present; that is to say, one equal, or at least not dishonourable to your means; otherwise you set your riches above your friendship and generosity; which is a mean mistake.

Among equals, it is a good rule not to exceed the equality of resources; otherwise there is a chance of giving greater mortification than pleasure, unless to a mean mind; and it does not become a generous one to care for having advantages over a mind like that.

But a rich man may make a present far richer than can be made him in return, provided the receiver be as generous and understanding as he, and knows that there will be no mistake on either side. In this case, an opportunity of giving himself great delight is afforded to the rich man; but he can only have, or bestow it, under those circumstances.

On the other hand, a poor man, if he is generous, and understood to be so, may make the very poorest of presents, and give it an exquisite value; for his heart and his understanding will accompany it; and the very daring to send his straw, will show that he has a spirit above his means, and such as could bestow and cherish the costliest present. But the certainty of his being thus generous, and having this spirit, must be very great. It would be the miserablest and most despicable of all mistakes, and, in all probability, the most self-betraying too, to send a poor present under a shabby pretence.

With no sort of presents must there be pretence. People must not say (and say falsely) that they could get no other, or that they could afford no better; nor must they affect to think better of the present than it is worth; nor, above all, keep asking about it after it is given,—how you like it, whether you find it useful, &c.

It is often better to give no present at all than one beneath your means;—always, should there be a misgiving on the side of the bestower.

One present in the course of a life is generosity from some: from others it is but a sacrifice made to avoid giving more.

To receive a present handsomely and in a right spirit, even when you have none to give in return, is to give one in return.

We must not send presents to strangers (except of a very common and trifling nature, and not without some sort of warrant even then), unless we are sure of our own right and good motives in sending it, and of the right and good motives, too, which they would have to permit themselves to receive it; otherwise we pay both parties a very ill compliment, and such as no modest and honourable spirit on either side would venture upon. There might, it is true, be a state of society in which such ventures would not be quite so daring; and it is possible, meanwhile, that a very young and enthusiastic nature, in its ignorance of the perplexities that at present beset the world, might here and there hazard it; but probably a good deal of self-love would be mixed up with the proceeding. The only possible exception would be in the case of a great and rare genius, who had a right to make laws to itself, and to suppose that its notice was acquaintance sufficient.

For present-making, then, upon New-Year's Day, the case must stand as it may happen. It is no longer a sine-gua-non. People may make them or not, either on this day or birth-days, without, of necessity, proving their generosity or the want of it—always provided they exhibit the present-making capability somehow or other in the course of their lives. But we cannot consent to rank ourselves among those who would let the day pass over without some distinctive mark of old times; especially as we trust that better days are in store for all the world, and will bring the best of old customs round again; and, therefore, one virtue we hold to be incumbent upon all thinking and social people on the 1st of January, and that is the having a Wassail-bowl. We have done something in our time towards restoring the use of this venerable jollity in the metropolis, and have reason to know that we succeeded in many quarters; and we hereby enjoin such of our readers as are not yet acquainted with it, but have sense and good-humour enough to deserve the acquaintance, to set about preparing one forthwith. They may see, in the course of the next article ('The Week'), how it is made; but it is a good-natured bowl, and accommodates itself to the means of all classes, rich and poor. You may have it of the costliest wine, or the humblest malt-liquor (we fancy we see several pleasant faces instantly, over this paper, looking their resolution to have it—some in porcelain and some in common ware); but, in no case must the roasted apples be forgotten; they are the sine-gua-non of the Wassail-bowl, as the Wassail-bowl is of the day—and very pleasant they are, provided they are not mixed up too much with the beverage,—balmy, comfortable, and different,—a sort of meat in the drink,—but innocent withal, and reminding you of the orchards. They mix their flavour with the beverage, and the beverage with them, giving a new meaning to the line of the poet:—

"The gentler apple's winy juice;"

For both winy and "gentler" have they become by this process. Our ancestors gave them the affectionate name of Love's Wine; for we cannot help thinking (in spite to what is intimated by one of our authorities) that this term applied more particularly to the apples, and not so much to the bowl altogether; though, if it did, it shows how indispensably necessary to it they were considered.

Throw off your reserves, then, dear people, and be merry and wise, with the courts of kings, if you are Tories (for they used to have the Wassail-bowl, as you may see in our 'Week'); with Addison and Steele, if you are Whigs (jovial as well as moral fellows in their time); with the most radical revolutionaries and thoroughgoing reformers, if you are

Radicals; and cry one and all with the poet whom Shakspeare pronounced the "wisest," or with his translator who has hit the passage off like a proper was-sailer,—

If pray thee by the Gulls above,
Give me the mighty Bowl I love,
And let me sing, in still delight,
I will, I will be mad to-night.

THE WEEK.

From Wednesday the 31st December, to Tuesday the 5th of January.

NEW YEAR'S EVE AND NEW YEAR'S DAY

NEW-YEAR'S DAY AT A HOUSE IN D—SHIRE. ¶
SIR,—I am one who have formerly read with great delight your essays on Christmas and other holiday-keeping; and the approach of this time-honoured season is beginning to stir up within me many hopes and wishes that you would not let it pass by, without resuming so interesting and inspiring a subject.

[Our correspondent, whose recollections are very flattering to us, will see that we have done what he wished.]

I humbly hope that you may be gratified by the following description of a New-Year's morning which I witnessed at a house in D—shire, where the door has not been barred upon good old customs, and where Old Christmas is still welcomed and supported by a remnant of sincere and affectionate retainers.

I am, sir,
Your constant reader and admirer,
OLD SOCIAL.]

N. B. This pleasing little masque was principally enacted by the children of the family:—

NEW-YEAR'S MORNING AT E—, 1831.

As the clock struck nine in the morning of New-Year's-day, the doors of the drawing-room were thrown open, and the family and friends entered, followed by the household. A most pleasing surprise seized upon all: at the farther end of the apartment appeared a group of allegorical personages. Janus, on a pedestal, with an altar before him smoking with incense; Aurora, on his left, with the "bright morning-star, day's harbinger," and on his right, winged, and bearing a rural crown, stood, smiling in youthful beauty, the Angel of Peace.

Now entered a train of villagers, gaily and tastefully decorated, preceded by a banner, inscribed—

"WE WISH YOU A HAPPY NEW-YEAR."

The baskets of the villagers were filled with gifts, which, elevating as they approached the altar, they offered to Janus, and addressed him in an appropriate hymn, accompanied by music. At the conclusion, Janus, after having been crowned, descended, and hand in hand, with the "Rosy Aurora," was seen to approach, led forward by the Angel of Peace, who, with the beamy smile of benevolence, extended her olive branch as she advanced. Janus, bearing a vase of fragrant and emblematical herbs and flowers, addressed the master of the mansion, as he presented them, in the following lines:—

Fair Venus sends the myrtle bough,
Young Cupid cropped the rose,
That Love and Beauty still may deck
Thy couch of soft repose.

Old Saturn sends his hoary sprig,
Twined with Minerva's age;
So shall thy years with wisdom dwell,
Companion of thy age.

Ceres presents the golden ear,
By summer suns embrowned;
And harvest o'er thy smiling lands,
With plenty shall be crowned.

Gay Bacchus laughing-bared his brow,
Of ivy wreathed with vine,
That high thy generous cup may flow,
With rosy sparkling wine.

Hygea sends her healing balm,
(The richest boon yet giv'n)
That health may sweeten all thy joys,
And bid them taste of Heaven.

The master then received the baskets of New-Year's Gifts. Each was accompanied with a billet, containing the name of the person for whom it was intended, and of the one who presented it; the billet also contained some wish or compliment, poetically expressed, and the gifts were distributed to the guests as directed.

NEW-YEAR'S DAY IN GERMANY.

(From 'Goethe's Memoirs of Himself'.)

It was in the beginning of the new year—a day on which the general bustle, occasioned by the visits of congratulation, set the whole city in motion. To us children this day always afforded a pleasure long and eagerly wished for at our grandfather's house, where we used to assemble by break of day, to hear a concert performed by all the musicians belonging to the town, the military bands, and all who had any pretensions to handle flute, clarinet, and haut-boy. We were intrusted to distribute new-year's gifts to the people of the ground story: the number of receivers and the crowd of visitors hourly increased. Relations and confidential persons came first; functionaries and people in subordinate situations came next; and even the members of the senate would not fail to pay their respects to their pretor. A select party used to sup in the evening in the dining-room, which was scarcely ever opened again during the remainder of the year. We were particularly delighted, as will easily be believed, with the tarts, biscuits, macaroons, and sweet wines distributed on the occasion. In short, on this anniversary we enjoyed, on a small scale, everything that is usual on the celebration of more pompous festivals.

PASSAGES ON NEW-YEAR'S EVE, AND NEW-YEAR'S DAY.

(From Brand's 'Popular Antiquities'.)

There was an ancient custom, which is yet retained in many places, on New Year's Eve: young women went about with a Wassail bowl of spiced ale, with some sort of verses that were sung by them as they went from door to door. Wassail is derived from the Anglo-Saxon waes hal, be in health. "The Wassail Bowl," says Warton, "is Shakespeare's gossip's bowl, in the 'Midsummer's Night's Dream,' Act I. Scene I. The composition was ale, nutmeg, sugar, toast, and roasted crabs or apples. It was also called Lamb's Wool."

It appears from Thomas de la Moore ('Vita Edw. II.') and old Havillan (in 'Architen.' Lib. 2.) that was-hail and drinc-hell were the usual ancient phrases of quaffing among the English and synonymous with the "Come, here's to you," and "I'll pledge you," of the present day.

It was unnecessary to add, that they accepted little presents on the occasion from the houses at which they stopped to pay this annual congratulation.

The learned Selden, in his 'Table-Talk,' (article 'Pope'), gives a good description of it. "The Pope," says he, "in sending relics to Princes, does as wenches do to their Wassails at New Year's tide; they present you with a cup, and you must drink of a stoney stuff—but the meaning is, you must give them money, ten times more than it is worth."

Verstegan gives the subsequent etymology of Wassail:—"As was is our verb of the preter-imperfect tense, or preter-perfect tense, signifying have been, so was, being the same verb in the imperative mood and now pronounced wase, is as much as to say grow, or become; and wassail, by corruption of pronunciation, afterwards came to be wassail."—'Restitution of Decayed Intelligence,' edit. London, 1653, 8vo. p. 101.

Ben Jonson personifies it thus: "Enter Wassail like a neat somster and songster, her page bearing a brown bowl drest with ribbands and rosemary before her."

In the 'Antiquarian Repertory,' vol. i. p. 283, edit. 1775, is a woodcut of a large oak beam, the ancient support of a chimney-piece, on which is carved a large bowl, with this inscription on one side, "Wassail."

The ingenious remarker on this representation observes, that it is the figure of the old Wassail-Bowl, so much the delight of our hardy ancestors, who on the vigil of the New Year, never failed to assemble round the glowing hearth with their cheerful neighbours, and then, in the play Wassail-Bowl (which testified the goodness of their hearts), drowned every former animosity, an example worthy modern imitation."

"As the vulgar," says Browne, "are always very careful to end the old year well, so they are no less solicitous of making a good beginning of the new one. The old one is ended with a hearty commotation; the new one is opened with the custom of sending presents, which are termed New Year's Gifts, to friends and acquaintances." He resolves both customs into superstitions, as being observed that the succeeding year ought to be prosperous and successful.

The poet Naogeorgus is cited by Hospinian, as telling us, that it was usual in his time for friends to present each other with a New Year's Gift; for the husband to give to his wife; parents to their children; and masters to their servants, &c.; a custom derived to the Christian world from the times of Gentileism. The superstition condemned in this by the ancient fathers, lay in the idea of these gifts being considered as omens of success for the ensuing year. In this sense also, and in this sense alone, could they have answered the benevolent compliments of wishing each other a happy New Year.

Dr Morison tells us, that in Scotland, it was in his time the custom to send New Year's Gifts on New Year's Eve, but that on New Year's Day they wished each other a happy day, and asked New Year's Gifts.

I believe it is still usual in Northumberland for persons to ask for a New Year's Gift.

In the 'Statistical Account of Scotland,' Edinb. 1793, 8vo., vol. vii., p. 488, Parishes of Cross, &c., County of Orkney, New Year's Gifts occur under the titles of "Christmas Presents," and as given to servant-maids by their masters. Ibid, p. 489, we read; "There is a large stone, about nine or ten feet high, and four broad, placed upright in a plain, in the isle of North Ronaldshay; but no tradition is preserved concerning it, whether erected in memory of any signal event, or for the purpose of administering justice, or for religious worship. The writer of this (the parish priest) has seen fifty of the inhabitants assembled there on the first day of the year, and dancing in the moonlight with no other music than their own singing."

NO. LI.—HER IMPERIAL HIGHNESS MADAME D'AUBAND.
(From 'Recollections of Seven Years in the Mauritius'.)

CHARLOTTE CHRISTINA SOPHIA DE WOLFFSBUTTEL, wife of Czarovitz Alexis, son of Peter I, was unfortunately an object of aversion to her husband, although beautiful and amiable. In a fit of passion, he gave her one day a blow which caused her to be prematurely confined with a dead child. The Countess of Konnismark, who attended on the princess, being aware that if she recovered she would only be exposed to further acts of violence, determined to declare that she had died. The Czarovitz, to whom this was agreeable news, ordered her immediate interment; couriers were dispatched to inform the Czar of the event, and all the courts of Europe went into mourning. The princess escaped to America with an aged domestic, who passed for her father, and a female attendant. While she was living in privacy in Louisiana, an officer of the name of D'Auband, who had seen her in Russia, recollected her, and made her an offer of his services. Soon after they heard that the Czarovitz was dead, and D'Auband then engaged to conduct the princess back to Russia; but she found herself happier in a private station, and declared her intention of remaining in retirement. The old domestic dying about this time, she was without any protector, and D'Auband, who had been long attached to her, offered her his hand;—she accepted it. Thus she, who had been destined to wear the imperial diadem, became the wife of a lieutenant of infantry.

The princess had no reason to regret her second marriage;—happy in the affection of a man she had wedded from choice, she lived in uninterrupted peace and comfort ten years, without a wish to mingle again in the splendid scenes where she had known only misery; but D'Auband fell into ill health, and his wife, anxious above all things for his recovery, proposed that they should go to France to procure the best medical advice, and to try the effect of a change of climate. They accordingly embarked for his native land, and soon after he was restored to health. He then solicited an employment in the Isle of France, where he was appointed Major. The princess, however, previous to quitting France, had been recognized by the Marshal de Saxe, who, after having called on her, and heard the story of her adventures, informed his king of the discovery he had made. His Majesty desired his Minister of Marine to write to the Governor of the Mauritius, directing that every mark of distinction should be showered on Monsieur and Madame D'Auband, and that they should always be treated with the highest consideration. These orders, we are told, were punctually obeyed; the princess lived in tranquil happiness in that island until 1747, when her beloved husband died; she then returned to Paris, where she lived to a great age. What a change of fortune did this lady experience! and how exactly the reverse was the change of Madame de Maintenon, who, from the condition of a private individual, a desolate widow, became the first female at the brilliant court of Louis XIV, and, eventually, was elevated to the dignity of Queen, although not publicly acknowledged such! She, who was born in a prison, and whose early years were passed in poverty and obscurity, was afterwards the dispenser of honours and emoluments!—to whom statesmen, generals, authors, applied for places and for pensions! She, too, passed part of her life in a distant colony, but that was before she had known splendour and rank. The Russian princess went into exile, after having experienced the insufficiency of exalted station to confer happiness; the mourning of her days passed amidst the glitter of a court where she was miserable;—peaceful and happy was her decline in the privacy she had chosen. Madame de Maintenon, in all the plenitude of her power, and the magnificence which surrounded her, perhaps had reason to look back with regret on the time when she was the poor but distinguished widow of Scarron; distinguished by her talents, not by her station;—in the evening of her life, she acknowledged that she had never known real happiness, whilst she was supposed to have attained the summit of earthly felicity.

A STILE.

BY MRS. J. HARTWELL

(LATE EMMA LOUISA SARGENT.)

For the London Journal.

"It looks so old,
In truth you'd find it hard to say
How it could ever have been young."

WORDSWORTH.

A STILE. The very word, short and insignificant as it appears, brings before us, with the rapid movement of imagination's wand, one of nature's sweetest scenes. There it stands, in its aged awkwardness, the only way of egress from the narrow pathway. Fields, waving like the restless ocean, rise on every side, crowned with woods, or bounded by the nettley hedges. There stands the cottage of the labourer in the hollow, and there the tiny brook comes gurgling, though stealthily, along; but none of these can be approached until this frail barrier be surmounted. We wonder not, then, at the air of importance which the mouldering, dilapidated stile is apt sometimes to assume.

"There are the fields, the woods, the rivulet, the cottage hearth," it would seem to say, as, leaning forward its aged summit, it appears to render all further progress impracticable; "go to them by some other outlet, or despise not the useful stepping-stone over which you pass." Nor is the request without its reasonable foundation, for it is not the beauty of the stile, nor its convenience, which you have taken so long a walk to contemplate; the ripe meadows around, the rich woods beyond, the bright heavens above, all call forth ejaculations of delight, whilst the stile—the poor, the decayed, the insignificant stile is stepped over in silence, or merely observed, to call forth exclamations against its age, its awkwardness, and its "stupidity." Alas! there are stepping-stones in this world of ours, whose

"Shape is human, and whose soul's immortal."

"But, it may be said, would not open spaces answer the same purpose? For thy convenience, dear reader, perchance they might (though, if thou art a true lover of the country, thou couldst not but grieve at the demolishing of so rustic and picturesque a feature in her beauty), yet what would not the owners of the land suffer from the absence of this useful incumbrance? What would prevent strange cattle from invading their pastures, or their own from straying from the meadow to the corn-field or the neighbouring road? At least so thought one of them, who was once a near neighbour of ours. The land he owned was considerable, and all but one small portion of it was left to him undisturbed. Now this small portion, dear reader, lay immediately below our little village; indeed, a path through it led to a few picturesque habitations which stood in its suburbs. About midway between the two stood a stile (methinks I behold it at this moment, so many have been the anxious glances cast towards it as we hastened on to satisfy our impatient hopes), and a stile it was of most formidable pretensions; nay, we even came to the conclusion, when obliged to clamber over its summit, that, of all awkward stiles, it was, assuredly, the most awkward. Now this fact appeared to me universally admitted, for rarely did a morning dawn but an opening had been made beside it, through the adjoining hedge, for the convenience of the passenger, at the expense of him who was its rightful owner. Again to replace the broken and dilapidated barrier became at length impossible. What was to be done? The proprietor of this most unaccommodating accommodation was by no means a man to put up with injury and encroachments upon his property, and it was therefore not long ere a pile of huge stones leant against its massive post; but what was the consequence? morning dawned, and the hedge was surrounded by its former protectors; evening, and all was again secure: once more the sun arose, and once more the barrier was pulled down. Once more the sun descended, and once more the fortification was erected, but to no avail; it seemed as though that luminary itself undermined its foundation, for, with its appearance, there it continually lay prostrate and unavailing, without offering one clue to the offender.

That stile has been the cause of many a laugh of lightness. It was there that a young friend of ours, descending the opposite hill one delicious moonlight night, humming one of his fresh-from-London airs, and endeavouring to clear it a bound, dashed into a deep pool of mud which had collected at its foot;—it was there that another took refuge from the fancied pursuit of some ladies he imagined following, who, from particular causes, he wished not to meet, to find that it was his own party he was so assiduously avoiding;—it was there that the stile-leaper was put to the test;—it was there that the most dexterous assistance was necessary to the timid girl who ventured to encounter it;—it was the stile of stiles, yet we all loved it, for to what a prospect did it lead! It was the entrance-gate to nature's own chamber, where she had collected with truest taste something of everything that was beautiful on earth.

I have loved a stile ever since I first saw my venerable and beloved parent spring one, to the shame and astonishment of my then youthful brothers. Well do I remember it. We had all spent the day in that most delightful of employments, nutting, and were returning triumphant, followed by the produce of our exertions, when a stile presented itself before us: "For shame!" exclaimed my father, perceiving my elder brother preparing leisurely to mount it, "For shame! leap it at once." The attempt was made, but in vain; his companion assayed it also, but with as little success. "Stand back," said my father, in his own deep, sonorous voice, and the next moment he was some paces on the other side. My brothers laughed (it was all they could) and scrambled over. "Ah," sighed my father, walking on, "you should have seen me in my young days;" and he smiled from delightful recollections. Since that hour I have never passed a stile unnoticed, and seldom without thinking of him.

Then, again, how many are the reminiscences of rustic lovers connected with some favourite stile! there have they met; there parted; there sat for hours in conversation, or lingered, bidding a long adieu; there the initials of many a dear name are rudely carved; there many have been joyously, blushing and unexpectedly recognized by their fair owners. There we could believe even declarations of attachment to have been unpremeditatedly made, when the maiden, all smiles and timidity, is ashamed of "giving so much trouble," it comes as a thing of course from the lips of one who fondly loves to declare, with a gentle pressure of the hand he holds, that it would be the greatest happiness of his life to be "so troubled," in protecting her from every danger through hers, and then she would spring down at all hazards, forgetful of the danger, and cough and hurry on. Then, too, how delightful, especially to the pent-up Londoner, is a stile, with a book! how convenient the resting-place it offers, and how picturesque the prospect it commands! Stands it upon an eminence, to what advantage is the scenery around beheld whenever your eye turns from the page you are perusing! (How preferable to the view of the narrow foggy street which your study window presents!) Is it in a hollow lane? welcome the shade of the surrounding hills; or midway across a narrow lane, how strong is the sense of retirement which you experience! I cannot say I love your up-and-down-stair stiles so often to be found in the vicinity of our metropolis. Accommodating they certainly are; but their formal, uncountryfied appearance deteriorates greatly from the beauty of the scene. The more awkward, the more picturesque; and I, for one, would gladly put up with the former for the sake of the latter; and yet I must own, in common with most of my sex, when the moment of trial is at hand, I have inwardly rejoiced at the facility which the steps attached to it offer. I stand not at one now, or, perchance, I might alter my opinion.

But I have sometimes seen large masses of stone placed on either side, which are equally convenient and far more romantic in their appearance; indeed, in some parts of the country, such stones compose the barrier itself.

And now, dear reader, adieu! I have said that the stile is oftentimes the witness of farewell scenes, and there shall ours take place. Perchance, thou art tired of so long and dull a dissertation; but despise not the subject, I entreat thee, though thou shouldst the handler of it; and if thou art thus weary, sit thee down to rest upon it, whilst I pursue my way. Adieu!

FINE ARTS.

Arboretum Britannicum; or Portraits to a Scale of a Quarter of an Inch to a Foot, of all the Trees which endure the Open Air in Britain of Ten Years' Growth, drawn from existing Trees within Ten Miles of London, with Botanical Specimens of the Flowers and Fruit, or Seeds of each Tree, to a Scale of Two Inches to a Foot, &c. &c.

MR. LOUDON, whose zeal in the cause of domestic and rural economy seems inexhaustible, has projected a work for the promotion of planting, and, with an energy the most spirited, draws from all quarters, far and near, the necessary materials. He has, he says in his prospectus, communicated "in French, German, and Italian," with "all the botanic gardens of Europe; and in English" with "North America, and upwards of a thousand country-seats in Great Britain and Ireland." Energy like this deserves success, and, we should think, commands it too.

The title explains the nature of the work. One of its chief objects is to prove that planting does not necessarily benefit posterity alone, but that the planter himself may look forward to the reasonable satisfaction of enjoying the result of his own labour. This is to be done by showing the extraordinary growth trees may attain, if properly planted, in the space of ten years, the facts all being drawn from easily accessible authorities.

To judge from the specimen plate before us, we should imagine everyone interested in planting would find the 'Arboretum Britannicum' the best of guides in that absorbing pursuit. Here we have the features of the tree in detail, in representations of the fruit and leaves, very clearly and judiciously engraved, while we see the figure the whole tree will cut in a full-length portrait on a smaller scale. Making a fixed scale, too, for all the engravings, perfects the idea of such a work, as thus a just impression may be got of the proportion of the sizes of the various plants.

Mr Loudon was one of the first, if we mistake not, to set the example of making large demands on the resources of the artist to enforce the descriptions in the text; these verbal descriptions must ever be vague and uncertain; a mere portrait of a thing tells us little of its nature or innate properties; if these two are joined, we know all about it at once. The practice is gaining ground considerably.

Prudent Sensibility.—The relations of a Dutch heiress, who had run away with an Englishman, addressed an advertisement to her in the papers, requesting, that if she would not return to her disconsolate parents, she would at least send back the key of the tea-chest, which she had carried away with her.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SEVERAL articles and letters have been unavoidably delayed for the last two weeks. Among them is a notice of Miss Landon's new novel, 'Francesca Carrara,' a production full of interesting remarks for reflection. Several other interesting books have been received, and will be duly noticed.

We are sorry that the above reason has also forced us to postpone the conclusion of Mr Simpson's Chapter on 'Education' till the new year; but it will very well stand by itself, as a separate article, for new readers; and we have more extracts to make from his book. OLD CRONY's letter on the 'Modern System of Education' shall, if possible, accompany the conclusion of Mr Simpson's Chapter.

LA REVENGE in our next.

UN JEUNE MARIE speedily. And the 'Birth of Poesy,'—the receipt of which we ought to have acknowledged before; but we hoped to have before inserted it.

We are thankful for the honour done us by the inscription of the 'Fall of the Fairies' in the 'Greenock Intelligencer,'—a poem with dainty bits in it.

We have, unfortunately, mislaid the contribution forwarded to us by our friend of the Amici Club; but shall no doubt recover it.

The 'Country Churchyard' would have been inserted, but it waited for the conclusion promised us by the writer.

The remarks 'On Scandal' are very true, but hardly novel enough for publication.

R. F. E. shall be attended to.

We thank J. W. A.; but he is mistaken in thinking that we were desirous of receiving translations already published.

'The Death of the Year' and 'The Song of the Fairies' are creditable to the feeling and fancy of the writers; but we have so many verses sent us of a like merit, that we are often obliged to deny ourselves the pleasure of gratifying the authors by their insertion, because we cannot do equal justice to all. With regard to the flattering request made us in one of the letters, circumstances will not at present allow us to insert the whole of it; but if the book in question be sent us, addressed to our Publisher, we will do what we can.

We should be happy to notice the book mentioned by GRONOX H., but have not received it.

Our young friend who writes on the 'Eleusinian Mysteries,' cannot do better than continue his studies, but his remarks have not yet sufficient interest for publication.

TWELFTH NIGHT.

A STREET PORTRAIT. SHAKESPEARE'S PLAY. RECOLLECTIONS OF A TWELFTH NIGHT.

CHRISTMAS goes out in fine style,—with Twelfth Night. It is a finish worthy of the time. Christmas Day was the morning of the season; New Year's Day the middle of it, or noon; Twelfth Night is the night, brilliant with innumerable planets of twelfth-cakes. The whole island keeps court; nay, all Christendom. All the world are kings and queens. Everybody is somebody else, and learns at once to laugh at, and to tolerate, characters different from his own, by enacting them. Cakes, characters, forsaits, fights, theatres, merry rooms, little holiday faces, and last not least, the painted sugar on the cakes, so bad to eat but so fine to look at, useful because it is perfectly useless except for a sight and a moral,—all conspire to throw a giddy splendour over the last night of the season, and to send it to bed in pomp and colours, like a Prince.

And not the least good thing in Twelfth Night is, that we see it coming for days beforehand, in the cakes that garnish the shops. We are among those who do not like "a surprise," except in dramas. We like to know of the good things intended for us. It adds the pleasure of hope to that of possession. Thus we eat our Twelfth-cake many times in imagination, before it comes. Every pastry-cook's shop we pass, flashes it upon us.

Coming twelfth-cakes cast their shadows before;

if shadows they can be called, which shade have none; so full of colour are they, as if Titian had invented them. Even the little ragged boys, who stand at those shops by the hour, admiring the heaven within, and are destined to have none of it, get, perhaps, from imagination alone, a stronger taste of the beatitude, than many a richly-fed palate, which is at the mercy of some particular missing relish,—some touch of spice or citron, or a "leettle more" egg.

We believe we have told a story of one of those urchins before, but it will bear repetition, especially as a strong relish of it has come upon us, and we are tempted to relate it at greater length. There is nothing very wonderful or epigrammatic in it, but it has to do with the beatific visions of the pastry shops. Our hero was one of those equivocal animal-spirits of the streets, who come whistling along, you know not whether thief or errand-boy, sometimes with bundle and sometimes not, in corderoys, a jacket, and a cap or bit of hat, with hair sticking through a hole in it. His vivacity gets him into scrapes in the street, and he is not ultra-studious of civility in his answers. If the man he runs against is not very big, he gives him abuse for abuse at once; if otherwise, he gets at a convenient distance, and then halloo out "Eh, stupid!" or "Can't you see before you?" or "Go, and get your face washed." This last is a favourite saying of his, out of an instinct referable to his own visage. He sings "Hokee-Pokee" and a "Shiny Night," varied occasionally with an uproarious "Rise, gentle Moon," or "Coming through the Rye." On winter evenings, you may hear him indulging himself, as he goes along, in a singular undulation of yowl;—a sort of gargle,—as if a wolf were practising the rudiments of a shake. This he delights to do more particularly in a crowded thoroughfare, as though determined that his noise should triumph over every other, and show how jolly he is, and how independent of the ties to good behaviour. If the street is a quiet one, and he has a stick in his hand (perhaps a hoop-stick), he accompanies the howl, with a run upon the gamut of the iron rails. He is the nightingale of mud and cold. If he gets on in life, he will be a pot-boy. At present, as we said before, we hardly know what he is; but his mother thinks herself lucky, if he is not transported.

Well; one of these elves of the pavé—perplexers of Lord Mayors, and irritators of the Police,—was standing one evening before a pastry-cook's shop-window, flattening his nose against the glass, and watching the movements of a school-boy who was in the happy agony of selecting the best bun. He had stood there ten minutes before the boy came in, and had made himself acquainted with all the eatables lying before him, and wondered at the slowness, and apparent indifference, of jaws masticating tarts. His interest, great before, is now intense. He follows the new-comer's eye and his hand, hither and thither. His own arm feels like the other's arm. He shifts the expression of his mouth and the shrug of his body, at every perilous approximation which the chooser makes to a second-rate bun. He is like a bowler following the nice inflexions of the bias; for he wishes him nothing but success; the occasion is too great for envy: he feels all the generous sympathy of a knight of old, when he saw another within an ace of winning some glorious prize, and his arm doubtful of the blow.

At length the awful decision is made, and the bun laid hands on.

"Yah! you fool," exclaims the watcher, bursting with all the despair and indignation of knowing boyhood, "you have left the biggest!"

Twelfth-cake and its king and queen are in honour of the crowned heads who are said to have brought presents to Jesus in his cradle—a piece of royal service not necessary to be believed in by good Christians, though very proper to be maintained among the gratuitous decorations with which good and poetical hearts willingly garnish their faith. "The Magi, or Wise Men, are vulgarly called (says a note in 'Brand's Popular Antiquities,' quarto edition by Ellis, p. 19.) the three kings of Collen (Cologne). The first, named Melchior, an aged man with a long beard, offered gold; the second, Jasper, a beardless youth, offered frankincense; the third, Balthaser, a black or moor, with a large spreading beard, offered myrrh." This picture is full of colour, and has often been painted. The word Epiphany (Επιφάνια, superapparitio, an appearance from above), alludes to the star which is described in the Bible as guiding the Wise Men. In Italy, the word has been corrupted into Beffania, or Beffana, (as in England it used to be called Piffany); and Beffana, in some parts of that country, has come to mean an old fairy, or Mother Bunch, whose figure is carried about the streets, and who rewards or punishes children at night by putting sweetmeats, or stones and dirt, into a stocking hung up for the purpose near the bed's head. The word Beffa, taken from this, familiarly means a trick or mockery put upon anyone—to such base uses may come the most splendid terms. Twelfth Day, like the other old festivals of the church of old, has had a link of connexion found for it with Pagan customs, and has been traced to the Saturnalia of the ancients, when people drew lots for imaginary kingdoms. Its observation is still kept up, with more or less ceremony, all over Christendom. In Paris, they enjoy it with their usual vivacity. The king there is chosen, not by drawing a paper as with us, but by the lot of a bean which falls to him, and which is put into the cake; and great ceremony is observed when the king or the queen "drinks;" which once gave rise to a jest, that occasioned the damnation of a play of Voltaire's. The play was performed at this season, and a queen in it having to die by poison, a wag exclaimed with Twelfth Night solemnity, when her Majesty was about to take it, "The queen drinks." The joke was infectious; and the play died, as well as the poor queen.

Many a pleasant Twelfth-Night have we passed in our time; and such future Twelfth-Nights as may remain to us shall be pleasant, God and good-will permitting; for even if care should be round about them, we have no notion of missing these mountain-tops of rest and brightness, on which people may refresh themselves during the stormiest parts of life's voyage. Most assuredly will we look forward to them, and stop there when we arrive, as though we had not to begin buffetting again the next day. No joy or consolation that heaven or earth affords us, will we ungratefully pass by; but prove, by our acceptance and relish of it, that it is what it is said to be, and that we deserve to have it. "The child is father to the man," and a very foolish grown-boy he is, and unworthy of his sire, if he is not man enough to know when to be like him. What! shall he go and

"ulk in a corner, because life is not just what he would have it? Or shall he discover that his dignity will not bear the shaking of holiday merriment, being two fragile and likely to tumble to pieces? Or lastly, shall he take himself for too good and perfect a person to come within the chance of contamination from a little ultra life and Wassail-bowl, and render it necessary to have the famous question thrown at his stately and stupid head—

"Dost thou think, because thou art virtuous, there shall be no more cakes and ale?"

This passage is in Twelfth-Night, the last play (but never forgotten) which Shakspeare is understood to have written, and which shows how in his beautiful and universal mind the belief in love, friendship, and joy, and all good things, survived his knowledge of all evil,—affording us an everlasting argument against the conclusions of misers men of the world, and enabling the meanest of us to dare to avow the same faith.

Here is another lecture to false and unseasonable notions of gravity, in the same play,—

"I protest (quoth the affected steward Malvolio) I take these wise men, that crow so at these set kind of fools, no better than the fools' smites."

"O (says the Lady Olivia), you are sick of self-love, Malvolio, and taste with a distempered appetite. To be generous, guileless, and of free disposition, is to take those things for bird-bolts, that you deem cannon-bullets."

This is the play in which are those beautiful passages about music, love, friendship, &c., which have as much of the morning of life in them as any that the great poet ever wrote, and are painted with as easy and wet a pencil:—

"If music be the food of love," &c.

"Away before me to sweet birds of flowers;
Love thoughts lie dead when smothered with flowers."

"She never told her love,

But let concealment, like a worm i' the bud,
Feed on her damask cheek," &c.

"I hate ingratitude more in a man
[says the refined and exquisite Viola]
Than lying, vainness, babbling, drunkenness,
Or any taint of vice, whose strong corruption Inhabits our frail blood."

And again,

"In nature there's no blemish, but the mind
[that is to say, the faults of the mind];
None can be call'd deform'd but the unkind."

The play of Twelfth Night, with proper good taste, is generally performed, at the theatres, on Twelfth Night. There is little or nothing belonging to the occasion in it, except that there are a set of merry-makers who carouse all night, and sing songs enough to "draw three souls out of one weaver." It is evident that Shakspeare was at a loss for a title to his play, for he has called it, 'Twelfth Night, or What You Will;' but the nocturnal revels reminded him of the anniversary which, player and humorist as he was, and accustomed, doubtless, to many a good sitting-up, appears to have stood forth prominently among his recollections of the year. So that it is probable he kept up his Twelfth Night to the last:—assuredly he kept up his merry and romantic characters, his Sir Tobies and his Violas. And, keeping up his stage faith so well, he must needs have kept up his home faith. He could not have done it otherwise. He would invite his Stratford friends to "king and queen," and, however he might have looked in face, would still have felt young in heart towards the budding daughters of his visitors, the possible Vindes perhaps of some fine story of their own, and not more innocent in "the last recesses of the mind" than himself. But see what Mr Hazlitt has said on this play in the criticism in our present JOURNAL.

We spent a Twelfth Night once, which, by common consent of the parties concerned, was afterwards known by the name of the Twelfth Night. It was doubted among us, not merely whether ourselves, but whether anybody else, ever had such a Twelfth Night;

"For never since created oak,
Met such aspiring fœces, as named with these Could merit more than that small infantry,
Which goes to bed betimes."

The evening began with each tea as is worth mention, for we never knew anybody make it like the maker. Dr Johnson would have given in his placidest growl of approbation. Then, with piano-forte, violin, and violoncello, came Handel, Corelli, and Mozart. Then followed the drawing for king and queen, in order that the "small infantry" might have their due share of the night, without sitting up too too-late (for a reasonable "too-late" is to be allowed once and away). Then games, of all the received kinds, forgetting no branch of Christmas customs. And very good extempore blank verse was spoken by some of the court (for our characters imitated a court), not unworthy of the wit and dignity of Tom Thumb. Then, came supper, and all characters were soon forgotten but the feasters' own; good and lively souls, and festive all, both male and female,—with a constellation of the brightest eyes that we had ever seen met together. This feat was so striking, that a burst of delighted assent broke forth, when Moore's charming verses were struck up;—

"To ladies' eyes a sound, boys,
We can't refuse, we can't refuse;
For bright eyes so abound, boys,
'Tis hard to choose, 'tis hard to choose."

The bright eyes, the beauty, the good humours, the wine, the wit, the poetry (for we had celebrated wits and poets among us, as well as charming women), fused all hearts together in one unceasing round of fancy and laughter, till breakfast,—to which we adjourned in a room full of books, the authors of which might almost have been waked up and embodied, to come among us. Here, with the bright eyes literally as bright as ever at six o'clock in the morning (we all remarked it), we merged one glorious day into another, as a good omen (for it was also fine weather, though in January); and as luck and our good faith would have it, the door was no sooner opened, to let forth the ever-joyous visitors, than the trumpets of a regiment quartered in the neighbourhood struck up into the morning air, seeming to blow forth triumphant approbation, and as if they sounded purely to do us honour, and to say "You are as early and untired as we."

We do not recommend such nights to be "resolved on," much less to be made a system of regular occurrence. They should flow out of the impulse, as this did; for there was no intention of sitting up so late. But so genuine was that night, and so true a recollection of pleasure did it leave upon the minds of all who shared it, that it has helped to stamp a seal of selectness upon the house in which it was passed, and which, for the encouragement of good-fellowship and of humble aspirations towards tree-planting, we are here invited to point out; for by the same token the writer of these papers planted some plane-trees within the railway the garden-gate (selecting the plane, in honour of the Genius of Domesticity, to which it was sacred among the Greeks); and anybody who does not disdain to look at a modest monument for the sake of the happy hours that have been spent in it, may know it by those trees, as he passes along the row of houses called York Buildings, in the New Road, Marylebone. A man may pique himself without vanity, upon having planted a tree; and, humble as our performance has been that way, we confess we are glad of it, and have often looked at the result with pleasure. The reader would smile, perhaps sigh (but a pleasure would or should be at the bottom of his sigh), if he knew what consolation we had experienced in some very trying seasons, merely from seeing those trees growing up, and affording shade and shelter to passengers, as well as a bit of leafiness to the possessor of the house. Every one should plant a tree who can. It is one of the cheapest,* as well as easiest, of all tasks; and, if a man cannot reckon upon enjoying the shade much himself (which is the reason why trees are not planted everywhere), it is surely worth while to bequeath so pleasant and useful a memorial of himself to others. They are green footsteps of our existence, which show that we have not lived in vain.

"Dig a well, plant a tree, write a book, and go to heaven," says the Arabian proverb. We cannot exactly dig a well. The parish authorities would not employ us. Besides, wells are not so much wanted in England as in Arabia, nor books either; otherwise we should be two-thirds on our road to heaven already. But trees are wanted, and ought to be wished for, almost everywhere; especially amidst the hard brick and mortar of towns; so that we may claim at least one-third of the way, having planted more than one tree in our time; and if our books cannot wing our flight much higher (for they never pretended to be anything greater than birds singing among the trees), we have other merits, thank Heaven, than our own to go upon; and shall endeavour to piece out our frail and most imperfect ladder, with all the good things we can love and admire in God's creation.

* Young trees from nursery-grounds are very cheap, and cost less than flowers.

Appearance of Louis the Fifteenth when an Infant.—The King's dress was a little plaited jacket, with hanging sleeves of violet colored cloth. He wore a purple cap of velvet trape, which appeared to be lined with cloth of gold. He had on leading strings which fell behind to the bottom of his robe. But this was only to mark his age, for it was well known that he walked alone and could run swiftly. His Majesty's leading strings, which were in cloth of gold instead of being of the same stuff as his robe, crossed on the shoulders, and I think Madame de Ventadour had decided that leading strings should always appear as an ornament only in the dress of the King. From his cordon blue was suspended the cross of St. Louis with that of the Holy Ghost, and his beautiful brown hair, curling naturally, fell on his shoulders in flowing ringlets. He was strikingly handsome, and you may hear from all who have ever known him that they could not flatter him in his pictures.—Recollections of the Eighteenth Century.

HINTS FOR TABLE TALK.

NO. IV.

CHRISTMAS, COMING, AND GONE—CAROLLING TABLE-TALK—DAY-DREAMING—ANOTHER 'NOW'—READING IN BED—SOMNUS, MORPHEUS, AND THE MUSES—DANGEROUS SITUATION—READING AT MEALS.

"CHRISTMAS is coming!"—ay, and before this appears in the pages of the LONDON JOURNAL, fingers will have been burnt at snap-dragon, the roast beef will have been eaten, and the plum-pudding will be nearly done, all but an end, "hard as the remainder biscuit after a voyage," which nobody thinks worth eating, and neither the cat nor dog being an epicure in respect of that dish, 'twill lay about the pantry till some shivering beggar receives it as gymnastics for his jaws—and Christmas will have gone. Christmas is always coming, the bustle and hurry of the time, will never give us a moment's leisure to say, "it is here." It is almost as complete an ignus fatuus as "to-morrow," which, saith the proverb, never comes. The full twelve days may have passed ere we can soberly settle down, and think of Christmas. Indeed it is not a season favourable at all for thinking; we are too busy in action—either friends with us, or we with friends—extra children at home to be amused, or ourselves to amuse for want of them. It is after Christmas that we begin to think about it—and then—"Christmas is coming." It may be nearly a twelve-month off, but still it is coming, and nearer than the one that has just passed over.

I have, no doubt, but that you, Mr Editor, will have preceded me with far more appropriate, pleasing and happy remarks upon the season, as is your wont. But this morning as I was brushing my hat at my parlour window, in ancient merry Islington, a little old woman, in a dirty straw bonnet and red cloak, with her hand just peeping between the folds, as red with the cold as the cloak itself, and from the hand depending sundry (barring a pun and tant-d-coutre, they were wet with the humid atmosphere) broad sheets, and, with a shiver, she emitted sounds from a cracked voice, which reminded me of Milton's line,—

"Schreech'd upon their wretched reeds of scannel straw!"

I, however, recognized the commencing salutation,—

"God save you, merry gentlemen," with its tail, "said or sung," to a tune as monotonous as the Devil's Tatoo. Thinks I, this is one of the signs of the times—"Christmas is coming,"—and, thinks I, further, my 'Hints for Table Talk' must be seasonable. Thinks I, again, if a table could talk,—this sturdy old oaken piece of furniture, for instance, with its twisted legs and shining face, mayhap, could tell us of the gastronomic exploits of some of our ancestors, at dinner-times, on Christmas days, for "hundred years or so. I began to think a little—the ditty of the carol-singer at the window, by dint of its monotony and in spite of its harshness, lulled me into a day-dream—the shining face of the table gathered animation—a pair of eyes gradually appeared, twinkling with mirth,—a nose,—and a mouth;—and the mouth opened and spake thus:—"Gently!—gently!—whither so fast?" cries I to myself—"Did you not find fault with this very manner of proceeding, this sham day-dreaming, in your first 'Table Talk?' and do you now presume to make use of the very style you condemned, or at least censured, in the face of such censure? Oh, Consistency! in what obscure corner art thou now to be found?" Myself is quite abashed at this philippic, but still endeavours to justify himself to his companion, I. "The circumstances were so suitable, so tempting, the convenience so snug, and the inclination so treacherous, that I could not resist the temptation. Besides, it is but human nature to 'preach one thing, and practise another.' Moreover, every rule has an exception, and if there is no other loop-hole to escape by, I must declare that there is an exception in the case of Christmas, and shining oaken tables!" "Well, but," says I, "you might have done this thing in a neater manner. A much better idea would have been to have made a misty cloud suffuse the polished wood—that cloud should gradually disperse, and a venerable old man, clad in ancient garb, should appear; or else, gazing intently on the table, you should have imagined a speck to have appeared on the shining surface, which should advance, becoming larger and larger, till it resolves itself into the form of a pigmy man. Still advancing, it should at last assume the image of the very John Bull of our imagination. You should have made him about to address you, when something should interrupt you, dispel the vision, and you should discover that it was only the reflection of your own image in the glass-like surface of the table." Myself, of course, acknowledges the superiority of I's idea, but asserts that he did not intend to be interrupted at all, until the apparition had delivered a fine flowing oration upon the gastronomic Christmas performances of the various generations of his existence, and have drawn a striking parallel, or rather contrast, between a Christmas now and a like festivity two hundred years ago. But I have forgotten all that I was going to make the cidolon say—not a fabric of the vision remains behind—the ideas are spilt as water upon the dry ground, which cannot be gathered up—so I shall leave Christmas in a pet, and not say anything more about it.

Still I will be seasonable. There is one Now, Mr Editor, which you forgot to expatiate upon in your nuncupative oration (thanks that it is not your nuncupative will). It is one that very nearly concerns me, and, I have no doubt, many of your readers. It is not one of the pleasures, but one of the uncomfortableables of the season. Now, sir (pray do not frown, gentle reader, I am not going to say how dare you do such a thing, or call you to account for leaving undone such another. I have not set in array, like some would-be-benefactor, all the benefits I have conferred, and then say, "Now, young man, how could you be guilty of such ingratitude?" Neither have I just concluded an elaborate train of argument, and about to draw the conclusion with an ipse dixit, "Now Sir, since such and such is the case, so and so must be the consequence." Now for the Now.) Now the weather is so cold, that I cannot read in bed with comfort. Instead of keeping my shoulders out, I am half inclined to cover my very head with the blankets. When I read in bed, one end of the curtains must of course be tucked up to admit light, and a draught is sure to come with it; there is sure to be some inlet for the burglarious wind. It either blows under the door, down the chimney, or through some crevice somewhere about the window sash; a room can never be perfectly air-tight; and, moreover, I have an aversion to boarding up the fire-place, because it is very unwholesome. Everybody knows, now-a-days, what would have been a very exclusive piece of knowledge a hundred years ago or so, that, in every mouthful of air we inhale, we consume the oxygen it contains, and reject the nitrogen; now, if a bed-room were air-tight we should soon consume all the oxygen in the air, and our lungs would starve for want of food; thus we see that the oxygen may be called the flesh, and nitrogen the bones of the air. But to return to reading in bed. You thus perceive that, what with the cold, and the wind, and the love for one's lungs, critical reading is out of the question. After various fruitless trials, I have been obliged to give it up, at least for a time, and that not until I got a delightful rheumatism in my right shoulder. I have endeavoured to keep all under the clothes but the hand with which I held the book; but being obliged occasionally to uncover, in some degree, to get freedom to turn over the page, the cold air would come pouring in like a bucket of water, or a blast from a forge-bellows, so this would not do, and with reluctance I have "doused the glim;" and turned to woo the companion gods, Somnus and Morpheus. Had I been an ancient Pagan, a believer in the Roman Polytheism, with Hook's Pantheon for my creed, I might easily have attributed all such difficulties and annoyances to the anger of these deities, jealous that their rights and prerogatives should be encroached upon by any or either of the Muses, their authority contemned in their own dominions, and their influence set at naught within the very walls of their palace. Their godships, as everyone read in mythological lore knows, are not of a nature to stand tamely by while their rights are trampled on or usurped; and in this case of reading in bed, a jury of celestials would, without doubt, decide in favour of Morpheus and Somnus. Is not the chamber their territories, the couch their palace, and the curtains their fortresses? and is it not an insulting presumption for one who, by entering their dominions, makes himself liable to their established government, and voluntarily surrenders himself to their will, to hold friendship with, and pay court to, rival powers? 'Tis as bad as courting Shela, while your head is "pillowed on your Nora's breast,"—high treason against the downy gods, the due punishment of which would be the deprivation of their favours for a few nights,—a true lover's revenge. I warrant you the fickle swain would not be long under such a ban, without beseeching and imploring for a return of their smiles. Sleep to weary limbs is as soothing and delightful as the love-drawn sighs of a mistress, and the one is as necessary to the life of the man as the other is to the existence of the lover. The Muses do very well to flirt with, but Somnus and Morpheus are the persons to take for better or for worse. I must apologize for this last paragraph; two terrible blunders are committed in it; I have unsexed two gods, and supposed bigamy!

But I have a reserve army of arguments against myself, as to reading in bed. The objections just stated are all flummery in comparison to the one consideration—the danger there is of setting the house on fire. Many times and oft have I received cautions and warnings and admonitions to that effect from persons of all ages, and of both sexes, with whom I have domesticated; and, in nine cases out of ten, they have been accompanied with a prophecy that I would have the house burnt about my ears some night. I have the pleasure of rejoicing that they have all been (as yet) false prophets. I certainly was a little staggered in my obstinacy, and the pertinaciousness of my adherence to an old custom a little softened by a circumstance which happened not long since. I was, according to custom, reading LEIGH HUNT'S LONDON JOURNAL in bed; whether the article I was perusing was particularly soporific—or whether Somnus made unusual efforts to conquer me that night, I know not—but this I know, that the drowsy God succeeded in wooing me to his arms. (What a pity there is not a god of sleep of the softer sex!) When I awoke in the morning, the black ashes of the JOURNAL were lying on the chair before my bed—a blanket and the counterpane a little singed—but no other damage done. I attribute my preservation to the thickness and weight of the counterpane, the non-inflammable nature of wool, to the curtains being tucked up, and to the instantaneous consumption of the open sheet of paper. I at that time determined to give up my favourite indulgence—and kept my determination for a week or so. I then ventured, with a great deal of caution, to read for a few minutes, and gradually returned to my custom, and am now as venturesome as ever.

Metinks I hear some incredulous Mr Burchell announce the annoying monosyllable, "Fudge!" after reading this relation;—nay, Sir Infidel, believe it or disbelieve it as you list; but it is not only founded on fact, but fact, clad in a garment of the thinnest tissue gauze.

Why, then, do I continue such a dangerous practice, it may be asked, and at the same time argue against it? To this, I acknowledge I can give no satisfactory answer. The custom is so deep set, that I can no more sleep without it than a gentleman without his bottle of wine, the bachelor without his glass of grog, or the workman without his pipe and pint. I own that I am in the wrong, and mean to leave off the custom some day. It is not at all uncommon for one to undergo with calmness a danger which he would shudder to see another undergo. So I would advise all to abstain from reading in bed, as a custom fraught with danger; but, for myself, I must lament that now it is so cold that I cannot read in bed with comfort.

Ay, Mr Editor, and not only do I read in bed, but am such a devourer of books that I read at breakfast, at tea, and at supper—I can't manage it at dinner. Dinner is a meal at which you have to work, before you eat—or rather, while you eat; especially when the cutlery is not keen; both hands are requisite in this necessary operations of this carnivorous meal. At breakfast, you can sip your coffee, and eat your toast with the help of one hand only, while the other is left free for the book. With tea and bread and butter, or Sally Lunna, you can do the same. I have become such an adept at the practice, that I never soil a book is the least. The plague-spots of grease, and stamps of buttered fingers never disgrace books of my perusal; at the same time, I never like to lend my books to anyone whom I know to be a reader at meals. It is not to be expected that everybody should be as clever in that respect as your humble servant. I have, moreover, ancient and classical precedent and authority in this case; the Romans had slaves to read aloud to them during meals; but, as slaves cannot exist in our atmosphere of freedom, I am obliged to perform the duty myself.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

NO. LII.—GOETHE'S ADVENTURE WITH HIS DANCING-MASTER'S DAUGHTERS.

(From his Autobiography.)

GOETHE is charged with having given too self-complacent an account of the various attachments to him when he was young; and, what is less easy to be excused, with having encouraged, and then broken them up, with a little too much facility, and like a man of the world. His admirers say, on the other hand, that all this only fell within the natural course of events in the life of such a man; and that, whatever weakness may have been mixed with it at the time, it was turned to better account by him ultimately than could have been done by others, and became part of that universality of experience which made him so great a writer. We leave the readers of his Autobiography to judge for themselves, being equally loth to speak lightly of what might have caused much distress to others, and to offend the laurels of a head which grew old in wisdom and renown, not, in all probability, without its sufficient portion of regret, as well as self-reconciliation. In the tragic-comic instance before us, whatever may be the poet's self-complacency in relating the adventure at all, the case does not appear to tell against him as in others; and, where there is a doubt, the charitable conclusion is much oftener the just one, than prejudice is willing to suppose.

"Whilst I employed myself in various studies and researches, I did not neglect the pleasures incident to youth. At Strasburg, every day and hour offers to sight the magnificent monument of the Minster, and to the ear the movements and music of the dance. My father himself had given my sister and me our first lessons in this art. We had learned the grave minuet from him. The solos and pas-de-deux of the French theatre, whilst it was with us at Frankfort, had given me a greater relish for the pleasures of dancing; but from the unfortunate termination of my love affair with Margaret, I had intirely neglected it. This taste revived in me at Strasburg. On Sundays and holidays, joyous troops, met for the purpose of dancing, were to be seen in all directions. There were little balls in all the country-houses, and nothing was talked of but the brilliant routs expected in the winter. I was therefore apprehensive of finding myself out of my element in company, unless I qualified myself to figure as a dancer; and I accordingly took lessons of a master recommended by one of my friends. He was a true French character, cold and polished. He taught with care, but without pedantry. As I had already had some practice, he was not dissatisfied with me.

He had two daughters who were both pretty, and the elder of whom was not twenty. They were both good dancers. This circumstance greatly facilitated my progress, for the awkwardest scholar in the world must soon have become a passable dancer with such agreeable partners. They were both extremely amiable; they spoke only French. I endeavoured to appear neither awkward nor ridiculous to them, and I had the good fortune to please them. Their father did not seem to have many scholars, and they lived very much alone. They several times asked me to stay and converse after my lesson, which I very readily did. I was much pleased with the younger one; the manners of both were very becoming; the elder, who was at least as handsome as her sister, did not please me so much, although she took more pains to do so. At the hour of my lesson she was always ready to be my partner, and she frequently prolonged the dance. The younger, although she behaved in a friendly manner towards me, kept a greater distance, and her father had to call her to take her sister's place.

One evening, after the dance, I was going to lead the elder to the apartment, but she detained me. "Let us stay here awhile," said she, "my sister, I must own to you, is at this moment engaged with a fortune-teller, who is giving her some intelligence from the cards respecting an absent lover, a youth extremely attached to Emily, and in whom all her hopes are placed. My heart," continued she, "is free; I suppose I shall often see the gift of it despoised." On this subject I paid her some compliments. "You may," said I, "consult the oracle, and then you will know what to expect. I have a mind to consult it likewise: I shall be glad to ascertain the merit of an art in which I have never had much confidence." As soon as she assured me the operation was ended, I led her into the room. We found her sister in good humour, she behaved to me in a more friendly manner than usual. Sure, as she seemed to be, of her absent lover, she thought there was no harm in showing some attentions to her sister's, for in that light she regarded me.

We engaged the fortune-teller, by the promise of a handsome recompense, to tell the elder of the young ladies and me our fortunes also. After all the usual preparations and ceremonies, she shuffled the cards for this beautiful girl; but, having carefully examined them, she stopped short, and refused to explain herself. "I see plainly," said the younger of the girls, who was already partially initiated into the mysteries of this kind of magic, "there is something unpleasant which you hesitate to tell my sister." The other sister turned pale, but, recovering herself, entreated the sibyl to tell her all she had seen in the cards without reserve. The latter, after a deep sigh, told her that she loved, but was not beloved in return; that a third stood between her and her beloved; with several other tales of the same kind. The embarrassment of the poor girl was visible. "Let us see whether a second trial will be more fortunate," said the old woman, again shuffling and cutting the cards, but it was still worse this time. She wished to make a third trial, in the hopes of better success, but the inquisitive fair one could bear it no longer, and burst into a flood of tears. Her beautiful bosom was violently agitated. She turned her back on us and ran into the next room. I knew not what to do; inclination retained me with her sister, compassion urged me to follow the afflicted one. "Console Lucinda," said the former; "go to her." "How can I console her," said I, "without showing her the least signs of attachment? I should be cold and reserved. Is this the moment to be so? Come with me yourself."—"I know not," replied Emily, "whether my presence would be agreeable to her." We were, however, going in to speak to her, but we found the door bolted. In vain we knocked, called, and intreated Lucinda; no answer. "Let us leave her to recover herself," said Emily; "she will see no one." What could I do? I paid the fortune-teller liberally for the harm she had done us, and withdrew.

I durst not return to the two sisters the next day.

On the third day Emily sent to desire me to come to them without fail. I went accordingly. Towards the end of the lesson, Emily appeared: she danced a minuet with me; she never displayed so much grace, and the father declared he had never seen a handsomer couple dancing in his room. After the lesson, the father went out, and I inquired for Lucinda. "She is in bed," said Emily, "but do not be uneasy; when she thinks herself ill, she suffers the less from her afflictions: and whatever she may say, she has no inclination to die, it is only her passion that torments her. Last night she declared to me that she should certainly sink under her grief this time, and desired that, when she should be near her end, the ungrateful man who had gained her heart, for the purpose of ill-treating her, should be brought to her." "I cannot reproach myself with having given her any reason to imagine me in love with her," I exclaimed; "I know one who can very well testify in my favour on this occasion." "I understand you," answered Emily. "It is necessary to come to a resolution to spare us all much vexation. Will you take it ill if I entreat you to give over your lessons? My father says you have now no further occasion for them; and that you know as much as a young man has occasion to know for his amusement." "And is it you, Emily, who bid me banish myself from your presence?" "Yes, but not merely of my own accord. Listen to me: after you left us the day before yesterday, I made the fortune-teller cut the cards for you; the same fortune appeared thrice, and more clearly each time. You were surrounded by friends, by great lords,—in short, by all kinds of happiness and pleasure; you did not want for money; women were at a certain distance from you: my poor sister, in particular, remained afar off. Another was nearer to you, and I will not conceal from you that I think it was myself. After this confession you ought not to take my advice amiss. I have promised my heart and hand to an absent friend, whom I have hitherto loved above all the world. What a situation would be yours, between two sisters, one of whom would torment you with her passion, the other with her reserve; and all this for nothing—for a momentary attachment; for even had we not known who you are, and the hopes you have, the cards would have informed us. Farewell," added she, leading me to the door; "and since it is the last time we shall see each other, accept a mark of friendship which I could not otherwise have given you." At these words she threw her arms round my neck and gave me a kiss in the most tender manner.

At the same instant, a concealed door opened, and her sister in a pretty morning undress, rushed towards us, and exclaimed, "You shall not be the only one to take leave of him." Emily let me go. Lucinda embraced me, and held me closely to her bosom. Her beautiful black hair caressed my face. She remained some time in this situation, and thus I found myself between the two sisters in the distressing predicament that Emily had warned me of. At length Lucinda, quitting her hold of me, fixed her eyes on me with a serious air, then walked up and down the room with hurried steps, and at length threw herself upon a sofa. Emily approached her, but Lucinda pushed her back. Then commenced a scene which I still recollect with pain. It was not a theatrical one,—there was but too much truth in the passion of this young and lively Frenchwoman.

Lucinda overwhelmed her sister with reproaches. "This," said she, "is not the first heart favourably disposed towards me that you have deprived me of. It was the same with that absent friend whom you drew into your snares before my eyes! You have now robbed me of this one, without relinquishing the other. How many more will you take from me? I am frank and artless; people think they know me well, and therefore they neglect me. You are calm and dissembling; they think to find something wonderful in you; but your outward form covers a cold and selfish heart, which only seeks victims."

Emily had seated herself near her sister, she remained silent. Lucinda, growing warmer, entered into particulars to which it did not become me to listen. Emily endeavoured to pacify her, and made me a sign to retire. But jealousy has the eyes of Argus; and this sign did not escape Lucinda's notice. She arose, came towards me, looked me in the face with a pensive air, and said: "I know you are lost to me. I renounce all pretension to you: but as to you, sister, he shall no more be yours than mine. Saying this, she embraced me again, pressed my face to hers, and repeatedly joined her lips to mine. "And now," she cried, "dread my malediction. Woe on woe, eternal woe to her who shall first press those lips after me! Embrace him now if you dare. I am sure that Heaven has heard me. And you, sir, retire without delay."

I did not wait for a repetition of the command: and I left them with a resolution never more to set foot in a house where I had innocently done so much mischief."

THE WEEK

From the 7th to the 14th of January. With a Retrospect of the Week preceding.

VARIOUS causes have induced us to wish to give something of an Almanac in our present year's JOURNAL, not of the kind more properly so called, but on the side of the ornamental part of utility; and we should be glad of any suggestions that would enable us to improve what is here done. We began a series of Birth-days in our first volume, but were tempted to notice them at too great length for our convenience. In our new mode of handling them, we trust that our endeavours to be brief as well as characteristic, will enable us both to continue to the end and to be more numerous; but the week before us augured a bad beginning, for it supplies us with no birth-days at all!—at least none that we are aware of, worth mention; especially as our main object, in these lists, is to remind people of names that have greatly influenced the world, or for some other reason carry a degree of enthusiasm with them, and incite us to recall them as those of friends and benefactors,—perhaps to toast them as immortals, whose birth-days we still keep. We, therefore, thought it best to violate our usual prospective plan this once, and look back to the week that is past; and we have done this the more willingly, because, in fact, our year will thus be complete; which it otherwise would not, as our first Wednesday in January falls so late as the 7th. We have not, as in the former instance, taken the trouble of calculating the chronological variation occasioned by the change of the Calendar in the year 1752. We leave that to such as may think it necessary. The great point is to have a day of recollection for an eminent name; and there is something in the sound of the old date which has an advantage, if we choose to be content with it. It was the one to which he and his friends were accustomed.

As we propose, in addition to Birth-days, to notice such Holidays or Saints'-days as retain an interest with the lovers of old times and books.

And we have added a monthly Flower-Garden, or notices of such plants as flower in this country in the open air, and could be cultivated by any one of very moderate resources, so as to furnish his homestead with the perpetual presence of sweet odours and colours all the year round. Our list is grounded on that in the 'Household Almanac; as that of our Birth-days is upon the authorities furnished by the 'British Almanac.'

BIRTH-DAYS AND OTHER ANNIVERSARIES.

January 1. Lorenzo de' Medici, 1448, of a rich mercantile family, founder of the Ducal race of Tuscany. A princely man of the world, with a poetical faculty; which would have been greater, had his position been less.

—Edmund Burke, 1790, it is doubtful whether at Cork or Dublin. A writer of great eloquence and intuition, almost as deep as he was universal; but turned from lasting purposes by a passionate love of present effect, and a jealousy of whatever did not emanate from himself.

2. General Wolfe, 1727, at Westerham, in Kent, the conqueror of Canada, and reputed author of the fine song beginning—

"Why, soldiers, why,
Whose business 'tis to die,
Should we be melancholy, boys?"

The story of his death, which gave rise to West's celebrated picture, has been contradicted. Not so a saying attributed to George the Second, who upon being told that Wolfe was a madman, exclaimed, "I wish he would bite all my other generals."

3. Cicero, 107, Before Christ. The great Roman special pleader—the lawyer of antiquity—the child of the old age of Roman virtue, when words began to be taken for things—the only great man ever made by vanity. Mr Bentham, in his latest work, says, that from his earliest years he was shocked with the "baseness" of Cicero's character (we think those are his words, for we have not the passage at hand to refer to). The censure is harsh, and early judgments are apt to be rash; but it is awkward where they remain the same in old age. Certainly it is impossible not to feel a salutary disgust at the insincerity and worldliness exhibited in much of Cicero's conduct, even as recorded by himself; in his 'Letters,' for instance, where he will recommend an acquaintance in one letter, and abuse him and undo the recommendation in the next. Yet vanity itself often made this insincere man in earnest; and, in spite of his timidity and time-serving, he was sometimes a bold patriot. We confess we cannot like him.

6. Twelfth Day, Old Christmas Day, or the Epiphany. (See our first Article.) It is called Twelfth Day, because of its so dating from Christmas Day.

—Joan of Arc, 1402, at Domremi, near Vaucouleurs, on the borders of Lorraine; called the Maid of Orleans from her compelling the English to raise the siege of that city,—the first of a series of successes, originating in her belief that she had a divine mission, and ending in her capture by the enemy, and her pitiable death at the stake for a witch. Joan was a genuine enthusiast, of a noble and trusting nature; and her death was a disgrace to all parties,—to the enemy for its revenge, and to her friends for their desertion of a benefactress. A complete history of her appeared not long since in two volumes, with interesting documents which throw the clearest light on her character.

—Pietro Metastasio, 1693, at Rome. The poet of the serious opera,—of a courtly and no very great genius, but fit for his task; a good writer for music, with occasional tenderness and pathos.

7. St Distaff's Day, when the holidays are reckoned to be over, and maids in old times resumed their spinning. But our ancestors went to work again by liberal degrees:—

"Partly work and partly play,
You must on St Distaff's Day," says Herrick in one of his poems.

JANUARY GARDEN PLANTS IN FLOWER.

Laurustinus (Viburnum Tinus). We are not sure of the etymologies of these words.

The shrub is well known, with its leaves not very like laurel, and its pretty red and white bunches of flowers. It is not certain, what species of viburnum Virgil means, when he speaks of "inter viburna cupressi;"—the cypresses amidst the viburnas; but the image suggests an agreeable picture of tall trees amidst underwood.

Bearsfoot (Helleborus foetidus, Ill-scented Hellebore; said to be called Hellebore, from two Greek words, implying to catch the breath, or suffocate, in the eating. But the derivation appears very forced).

Green flowers. This plant, "from its green and finely divided leaves," says Mr Loudon's 'Encyclopædia,' "forms a most ornamental evergreen bush for the shrubbery."

Garden Anemone (Anemone hortensis — Garden

Wind-flower, the word Anemone coming from a Greek word signifying the wind. The accent is properly on the o, Anemōne, but custom has made the popular pronunciation the right one. Some say the flower is so called, "because it opens only when the wind blows; others, because it grows in situations much exposed to the wind."—Flora Domestica.

Colours, red, blue, or white. It may be had in bloom every month, if planted every month. The poets have attributed the colour of the Anemone to the blood of Adonis, and the tears, or nectar, of Venus. Moschus calls upon it to mourn with him for the death of his brother poet, Bion:—

Ανδρα νυν συγγισιν απεινειοιτε κορυμβοις.
Νυν ῥοδα φοιτισσας τα παιδιμα, νυν ανιμωνα.
Νυν υακινθς λαλει τα σα γραμματα, και πλειον αι αι
Λαμβανε σοις πταλοισι' καλος τιθνακι μελικτας.

"Ah now, ye flow'rs, turn your sweet breaths to sighs;

Ye roses now, and ye, anemonies,
Gloom with your reds, as though there were no sun;

And more than ever now, O hyacinth, shew
Your written sorrows;—the sweet singer's dead.

There was a little lawny islet,
By anemone and violet,
Like Mosaic, paven."

Beginning of a fragment by Shelley.

Christmas Rose (Helleborus Niger, Black Hellebore).

Rose-colour, varying in depth. This is the "black hellebore" of Spenser's Garden of Proserpina; in which, amidst the poisonous and sleepy flowers, he put "a silver seat,"—thus intimating the riches and delicacy of the involuntary goddess of the lower regions, who was compelled to recreate herself in such a place, instead of her flowery Sicilian vallies.

There mournfull cypresse grew in greatest store;
And trees of bitter gall; and heben* sad;
Dead sleeping poppy; and black hellebore;
Cold coloquintida,† and tetra‡ mad;
Mortall samuitis;§ and cicuta|| bad,
With which th' unjust Athenians made to die
Wise Socrates, who, thereof quaffing glad,
Pour'd out his life and last philosophy
To the fair Critias, his dearest belamy.

"Pour'd out his life and last philosophy." How beautiful, and true!

The Garden of Proserpina this hight:
And in the midst thereof a silver seat,
With a thick arbour goodly over dight,
In which she often used from open heat
Herself to shroud, and pleasures to entreat,—
Next thereunto did grow a goodly tree,
With branches broad dispredd, and body great,
Clothed with leaves that none the wood mote see,
And loaden all with fruit as thick as it might bee.

Their fruit was golden apples, glistening bright.

Hence the Golden Apples of the Hesperides, of Atalanta, of Acontius and Cydippe, and the Apple of Discord which Paris presented to Venus, and which brought death upon Troy. This Garden of Proserpine would make a fine, deep-toned subject for a painter.

Yellow Hellebore (Eranthis Hyemalis, Winter Earth-flower); commonly called Winter-Arconite.

Sweet Coltsfoot (Tussilago fragrans, sweet-smelling Tussilage or Cough-plant).

"Best kept in pots," says Mr Loudon in his 'Encyclopædia of Plants,' "because it is apt to run." It is occasionally used as a remedy for coughs.

Snow Drop (Galanthus Nivalis, Snowy Milk-flower).

The word "drop" beautifully expresses its pensile

* Alluding to the marks on the ancient hyacinth (the turk's-cap lily), which sometimes form themselves into shapes like the words ai, ai, and were supposed to utter those exclamations of mourning for the death of Hyacinthus, whom Apollo accidentally slew with a quoit.

† Ebony. ‡ Bitter Gourd. § Deadly nightshade.
§ Supposed Sabine or Savine-tree. || Hemlock.

and overlooking delicacy; and "snow" expresses its colour and season, but not the green with which it is so exquisitely touched. It is curious that so cold-looking, and yet flowery a flower, as delicate as if it was bred in a hot-house, should come at a time, when a more glowing one would seem more welcome. But there is a beauty in similarity, as well as in contrast.

Japan Quince (Cydonia Japonica; more commonly known as Pyrus Japonica, or Japan Pear). Flowers of a rich crimson.

Japan Allspice (Chimonanthus fragrans, Sweet-smelling Winter-flower). Yellow and red flowers, variegated.

China Rose (Rosa Indica, the Indian Rose; and Rosa Semperflorens, Ever-flowering Rose).

The first pink, the second crimson. Of both these species there are roses called monthly; and they appear accordingly in the monthly lists; but in point of fact, is it true that the monthly roses flourish all the year round in the open air?—It is a charming sight to see China Roses covering the front of a cottage in winter-time. It looks as if we need have no winter, if we chuse, as far as flowers are concerned; and, in fact, as the reader may see by the above list, it is possible to have both a beautiful and fragrant garden in January, especially if the flowers are cultivated in good lumps of each, and not sparingly. There is a story in Boccaccio, of a magician who conjured up a garden in winter-time. His magic consisted in his having a knowledge beyond his time; and magic pleasures, so to speak, await on all who chuse to exercise knowledge after his fashion, and to realize what the progress of information and good taste may suggest.

Even a garden six feet wide is better than none. Let the possessor show his "magic" by making the most of it, and filling it with colour.

CHARACTERS OF SHAKESPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

[REPRINTED, by leave of the proprietors, from the second edition of the work as intitled; and so to be continued in the LONDON JOURNAL, till complete. The present criticism does not stand first in the list; but has been selected, on account of fitness for the season.]

NO. I. TWELFTH NIGHT; OR, WHAT YOU WILL.

This is justly considered as one of the most delightful of Shakspeare's comedies. It is full of sweetness and pleasantry. It is, perhaps, too good-natured for comedy. It has little satire, and no spleen. It aims at the ludicrous rather than the ridiculous. It makes us laugh at the follies of mankind, not despise them, and still less bear an ill-will towards them. Shakspeare's comic genius resembles the bee rather in its power of extracting sweets from weeds or poisons, than in leaving a sting behind it. He gives the most amusing exaggeration of the prevailing foibles of his characters, but in a way that they themselves, instead of being offended at, would almost join in to humour; he rather contrives opportunities for them to show themselves off in the happiest lights, than renders them contemptible in the perverse construction of the wit or malice of others. There is a certain stage of society in which people become conscious of their peculiarities and absurdities, affect to disguise what they are, and set up pretensions to what they are not. This gives rise to a corresponding style of comedy, the object of which is to detect the disguises of self-love, and to make reprisals on these preposterous assumptions of vanity, by marking the contrast between the real and the affected character as severely as possible, and denying to those, who would impose on us what they are not, even the merit which they have. This is the comedy of artificial life, of wit and satire, such as we see it in Congreve, Wycherley, Vanbrugh, &c. To this succeeds a state of society from which the same sort of affectation and pretence are banished by a greater knowledge of the world, or by their successful exposure on the stage; and, which, by neutralising the materials of comic character, both natural and artificial, leaves no comedy at all,—but the sentimental. Such is our modern comedy. There is a period in the progress of manners anterior to both these, in which the follies and foibles of individuals are of nature's planting, not the growth of art or study; in which they are, therefore, unconscious of them themselves, or care not who knows them, if they can but have their whim out; and in which, as there is no attempt at inspection, the spectators rather receive pleasure from humouring the inclinations of the persons they laugh at, than wish to give them pain by exposing their absurdity. This may be called the comedy of nature, and it is the comedy which we generally find in Shakspeare. Whether the analysis here given be just or not, the spirit of his comedies is evidently quite distinct from that of the authors above-mentioned, as it is in its essence the same with that of Cervantes, and also very frequently of Moliere, though he was more systematic in his extravagance than Shakspeare. Shakspeare's comedy is of a pastoral and poetical cast. Folly is indigenous to the soil, and shoots out with native, happy, and unchecked luxuriance. Absurdity has every encouragement afforded it; and nonsense has room to flourish in. Nothing is stunted by the churlish, icy hand of indifference or severity. The poet runs riot in a conceit, and idolizes a quibble. His whole object is to turn the meanest or rudest objects to a pleasurable account. The relish which he has of a pun, or of the quaint humour of a low character, does not interfere with the delight with which he describes a beautiful image, or the most refined love. The clown's forced jests do not spoil the sweetness of the character of Viola; the same house is big enough to hold Malvolio, the Countess, Maria, Sir Toby, and Sir Andrew Ague-cheek. For instance, nothing can fall much lower than this last character in intellect or morals; yet how are his weaknesses nursed and dandled by Sir Toby into something "high fantastical," when, on Sir Andrew's recommendation of himself for dancing and fencing, Sir Toby answers—"Wherefore are these things hid? Wherefore have these gifts a curtain before them? Are they like to take dust like mistress Moll's picture? Why dost thou not go to church in a galliard, and come home in a coranto? My very walk should be a jig! What dost thou mean? Is this a world to hide virtues in? I did think by the excellent constitution of thy leg, it was framed under the star of a galliard!" How Sir Toby, Sir Andrew, and the Clown afterwards chirp over their cups, how they "rouse the night-owl in a catch, able to draw three souls out of one weaver?" What can be better than Sir Toby's unanswerable answer to Malvolio, "Dost thou think because thou art virtuous there shall be no more cakes and ale?" In a word, the best turn is given to every thing, instead of the worst. There is a constant confusion of the romantic and enthusiastic, in proportion as the characters are natural and sincere; whereas, in the more artificial state of comedy, every thing gives way to ridicule and indifference, there being nothing left but affectation on one side, and incredulity on the other. Much as we like Shakspeare's comedies, we cannot agree with Dr Johnson that they are better than his tragedies; nor do we like them half so well. If his inclination to comedy sometimes led him to trifle with the seriousness of tragedy, the poetical and impassioned passages are the best parts of his comedies. The great and secret charm of Twelfth Night is the character of Viola. Much as we like catches and cakes and ale, there is something that we like better. We have a friendship for Sir Toby; we patronise Sir Andrew; we have an understanding with the Clown, a sneaking kindness for Maria and her rogueries; we feel a regard for Malvolio, and sympathise with his gravity, his smiles, his cross garters, his yellow stockings and imprisonment in the stocks. But there is something that excites in us a stronger feeling than all this—it is Viola's confession of her love.

"DUKE. What's her history?

VIOLA. A blank, my Lord, she never told her love: She let concealment, like a worm i' th' bud Prey on her damask cheek; she pin'd in thought, And wish a green and yellow melancholy She sat like patience on a monument Smiling at grief. Was not this love indeed? We men may say more, swear more, but indeed Our shows are more than will; for still we prove Much in our vows, but little in our love.

DUKE. But died thy sister of her love, my boy?

VIOLA. I am all the daughters of my father's house, And all the brothers too;—and yet I know not."

Shakspeare alone could describe the effect of his own poetry.

"Oh it came o'er the ear like the sweet south That breaths upon a bank of violets, Stealing and giving odour."

What we so much admire here, is not the image of Patience on a monument, which has been generally quoted, but the lines before and after it. "They give a very echo to the seat where love is throned." How long ago it is since we first learned to repeat them—and still, still they vibrate on the heart, like the sounds which the passing wind draws from the trembling strings of a harp left on some desert shore! There are other passages of not less impassioned sweetness. Such is Olivia's address to Sebastian, whom she supposes to have already deceived her in a promise of marriage:—

"Blame not this haste of mine: if you mean well Now go with me, and with this holy man, Into the chantry by: there before him, And underneath that consecrated roof Plight me the full assurance of your faith, That my most jealous and too-doubtful soul May live at peace."

We have already said something of Shakspeare's songs. One of the most beautiful of them occurs in this play, with a preface of his own to it.

"DUKE. O, fellow, come; the song we had last night. Mark it, Cesario, it is old and plain. The spinsters, and the knitters in the sun, And the free maids that weave their thread with bones, Do use to chaunt it: it is silly, 'sooth, And defies with the innocence of love Like the old age."

SONG.

Come away, come away death,
And in sad cypress let me be laid;
Fly away, fly away, breath;
I am slain by a fair cruel maid.
My shroud of white, stuck all with yew,
O prepare it!
My part of death no one so true
Did share it.

Not a flower, not a flower sweet
On my black coffin let there be strown;
Not a friend, not a friend greet
My poor corpse, where my bones shall be thrown:
A thousand thousand sighs to save,
Lay me, O! where
Sad true love never find my grave,
To weep there."

Who after this will say that Shakspeare's genius was only fitted for comedy? Yet, after reading other parts of this play, and particularly the garden-scene, where Malvolio picks up the letter, if we were to say that his genius for comedy was less than his genius for tragedy, it would perhaps only prove that our own taste in such matters is more saturnine than mercurial.

"Enter MARIA.

SIR TOBY. Here comes the little villain:—How now, my nettle of India?

MARIA. Get ye all three into the box-tree: Malvolio is coming down this walk: he has been yonder i' the sun, practising behaviour to his own shadow this half hour: observe him, for the love of mockery! for I know this letter will make a contemplative idiot of him. Close, in the name of jesting! Lie thou there; for here comes the trout that must be caught with tickling.

[They hide themselves. MARIA throws down a letter and exits.]

Enter MALVOLIO.

MALVOLIO. 'Tis but fortune; all is fortune. Maria once told me, she did affect me; and I have heard herself come thus near, that, should she fancy, it should be one of my complexion. Besides she uses me with a more exalted respect than any one else that follows her. What should I think on't?

SIR TOBY. Here's an overweening rogue!

FABIAN. O, peace! Contumacious makes a mere turkey-cock of him; how he juts under his advanced plumes!

SIR ANDREW. 'Slight! I could so best the rogue.

SIR TOBY. Peace, I say.

MALVOLIO. To be Count Malvolio;—

SIR TOBY. Ah, rogue!

SIR ANDREW. Pistol him, pistol him.

SIR TOBY. Basse, peace!

MALVOLIO. There is example for't; the lady of the Stanchy married the yeoman of the wardrobe.

SIR ANDREW. Fie on him, Jasebel!

FABIAN. O, peace! now he's deeply in; look, how imagination blows him.

MALVOLIO. Having been three months married to her, sitting in my chair of state,—

SIR TOBY. O for a stone bow, to hit him in the eye.

MALVOLIO. Calling my officers about me in my branched velvet gown; having come from a day-bed, where I have left Olivia sleeping.

SIR TOBY. Fire and brimstone!

FABIAN. O, peace, peace!

MALVOLIO. And then to have the humour of state: and after a durance travel of regard,—telling them, I know my place, as I would they should do theirs,—to ask for my kinsman Toby.

SIR TOBY. Bolts and shackles!

FABIAN. O, peace, peace, peace! now, now.

MALVOLIO. Seven of my people, with an obedient start, make out for him. I frown the while; and, perchance, wind up my watch, or play with some rich jewel. Toby approaches; curtsies there to me.

SIR TOBY. Shall this fellow live?

FABIAN. Though our silence be drawn from us with ears, yet peace!

MALVOLIO. I extend my hand to him thus, quenching my familiar smile with an austere regard of controul.

SIR TOBY. And does not Toby take you a blow o' the lips then?

MALVOLIO. Saying—Cousin Toby, my fortunes have cast me on your niece, give me this prerogative of speech;—

SIR TOBY. What, what?

MALVOLIO. You must amend your drunkenness.

FABIAN. Nay, patience, or we break the sinews of our plot.

MALVOLIO. Besides you waste the treasure of your time with a foolish knight.—

SIR ANDREW. That's me, I warrant you.

MALVOLIO. Ome Sir Andrew—

SIR ANDREW. I know 'twas I; for many do call me fool.

MALVOLIO. What employment have we here?

[Taking up the letter.]

The letter and his comments on it are equally good. If poor Malvolio's treatment afterwards is a little hard, poetical justice is done in the uneasiness which Olivia suffers, on account of her mistaken attachment to Cesario, as her insensibility to the violence of the Duke's passion is atoned for by the discovery of Viola's concealed love of him.

THE AMERICAN LOCUST.

[Query—Is not this animal the same as the Cicada of the South of Europe,—Acanth's Grasshopper, —the Cicada of the Latins?—En.]

MR. EDITOR,—America offers few objects of greater curiosity for the entomologist than the insect commonly called "the locust." This insect makes its appearance only once in seventeen years. The inhabitants of the middle States look for it, in its regular periods, of emerging, as naturally as they expect the vicissitudes of the seasons. Some assert that it is always seen, for the first time, on the 25th of May. I cannot vouch for the truth of this observation, since, having witnessed the occurrence but twice, I was so very young on the first occasion as to remember little about it. It was not, however, until the 25th of May 1833, that I had an opportunity of seeing it for the second time in my life. Going into the fields, on that day, I observed the ground everywhere perforated with innumerable little holes, near some of which were lying the shells of locusts which had emerged during the night; other shells were hanging, attached by sharp pointed claws, to the leaves of the surrounding bushes upon which the insects had crawled previously to coming forth. These shells (about the size of a large hornet) are of a semitransparent yellow, very thin, and so nicely adapted to the forms they enclose as to exhibit the development of the minutest fibre. The aperture through which the insect emerges (a straight slit in the back) extends about half the distance between the neck and the extremity of the tail. Its first colour is white; and, when about half protruded, it remains attached to the shell, until the action of the air in drying and strengthening its wings (which in that state resemble slim pieces of thin wet paper) enables it in a short time to burst away. The rising sun soon gives it strength to fly to the nearest tree, where it perches and makes a long, monotonous noise, produced by the vibration of a little membrane under each of its wings. Some of them (but it is not known, with certainty, whether the male or female) are destitute of this harmonious organ, and doomed to remain in total silence. Reasoning from analogy, however, I should hardly suppose this to be the female locust. Neither is it ascertained with certainty whether it ever partakes of any other food than that which may be afforded by the air. It carries under its body a sharp pointed instrument, the extremity of which resembles the point of a spear, by means of which it perforates the bark of fruit trees to deposit its eggs. Its wings are transparent like those of the wasp, although much larger and more fibrous. There is a vulgar superstition that, if the letter P is visible upon the wing, the country will enjoy peace until its next return, but that the letter W is portentous of war. The wings of all that I observed, this year, were inscribed very distinctly with a W. The longest period of its existence is said to be only forty days. The swarms are so numerous that millions of them are every where to be seen, every tree is covered with them, and the whole country is vocal with their long-sounding, monotonous clamour.

If, sir, you may think that the following verses, written shortly before leaving my native country, and addressed to one of these little insects, are not unworthy of insertion in your journal, they are perfectly at your service.

TO A LOCUST.

I.

SWEET little visitor, all hail!—
Whether thy notes with mournful wail
Or fraught with gladness, load the gale,
Still art thou welcome, here;
Thou might'st the septial couch regale,
Or solemnize the bier.

II.

The tuneful age is rare with thee,
Emblem of human minstrelsy!
The age of song we seldom see E'en amid Reason's sons:
'Twixt bards there's many a century
That intervening runs.

III.

Whole ages fled from Moner's lyre,
Till Virgil wak'd the epic wire:
The Italian 'Three with breath of fire
Emerg'd—then plung'd in night:
Last, Milton, from the angelic choir,
Snatch'd his bold tramp of night.

IV.

Hail, little warbler! once again,
That with a childhood-waking strain,
Singest a song of joy and pain,
Lugubrious and glad,
Evoking memories to the tunin,
So pleasing, yet so sad!

V.

With youth these cheeks were crimson red,
Soft auburn locks adorn'd this head,
These eyes from Heaven's height stars were fed,
When first I heard thy throat;
And manhood's shell I almost shed,
Once more to hear its note.

VI.

But, ah! those sounds the truth recall
With every wild, each mournful fall!
Now, childhood's joys are vanish'd all,
These bright eyes diam'd with care
And darken'd almost to a pall,
That soft and auburn hair.

VII.

Thou sang'st my infant lullaby!
Perchance, when next thou sing'st to me,
These looks may scander, whither be!
Perchance, that dismal slave
May be the only elegy
To mourn my early grave!

W. M. W.

* The little membrane, by means of which the insect produces a sound, is situated very near what we may suppose to be its throat.

FINE ARTS.

Gallery of Portraits. No. XXXII. Charles Knight.

THE new number of the 'Portrait Gallery,' contains portraits of Des Cartes, Spenser, and Hugo Grotius. Grotius looks a proper Dutchman; but with more vivacity in his face than we are apt to allow the composed Hollander. What a singular fate, was his, after an eventful life, to fall a victim to an impudent attempt of Christine of Sweden to keep him in her service, volens volens; even sending for him back when he had got away without a passport. It was characteristic of the wilfulness and recklessness which she afterwards so audaciously exhibited. The portrait of Des Cartes is clearly and vigorously engraved; though the shadows are perhaps a little opaque. The hair is excellent; it comes very near to oil painting. The countenance is a singular one; there is a striking expression of thoughtful abstraction about the eyes—he seems to be "looking at nothing," as the saying is—and of bland good-nature about the mouth, which accords with the character which he bore, of an industrious thinker, and a good and amiable man. The portrait of Spenser is a fine specimen of chalk engraving: the eyes—the eyebrows,—the flesh, blending in the hair,—the ear, and its tender shadows,—the laced ruff,—are instances of exquisite delicacy and finish; while the excellent keeping preserved throughout the whole, the justness of the tone of the lights and shades, and the beauty of the expression, leave nothing wanting in point of force and effect. The commonly received portrait of Spenser is from a picture in Pembroke Hall, Cambridge; between that and the present one there is no point of resemblance; they represent two different individuals. There is, we believe, no positive proof of the authenticity of either. The one before us, however, is evidently an actual portrait of some one at least; the other bears no obvious traces of having been taken from any living original; it has nothing in itself to disprove its being an invention.

Curious Fact.—Few of the Latin authors were Romans by birth. The only men of which the capitol can boast, are those of Lucretius, Cæsar, and Varro.—Dunlop's Roman Literature.

Both are, therefore, traditional, but internal evidence is in favour of the Kinnoull picture. The face, too, is better suited to the poet. The Cambridge picture is more ideal, and perhaps more accordant with our general notions of the head of a poet, as to a certain picturesque bearing; but this other exhibits more refinement of feeling, more suffering, suitable to the gentle Spenser, the friend of Sidney, the inventor and painter of that lovely world of Faery, the man who struggled with calamity, and died in poverty and despair. In the Earl of Tyrone's rebellion, in 1598, he was plundered and deprived of his estate. No direct or authentic account of the circumstances attending this calamity has come down to us; but among the heads of a conversation between Ben Jonson and Drummond, at Hawthornden, given in the works of the latter, Jonson, after saying that neither Spenser's stanzas pleased him nor his matter, is stated to have given the following appalling description of his misfortune: "That his goods were robbed by the Irish, and his house and a little child burnt; he and his wife escaped, and after died for want of bread in King street, Westminster." Jonson, however, adds a circumstance, the strangeness of which throws suspicion over the former part of the story: "He refused twenty pieces sent him by my Lord Essex, and said he was sure he had no time to spend them." But whether these particulars be true or not, it is certain that he died in London, ruined, and a victim to despair, according to Camden, in 1596, but, according to Sir James Ware, who wrote the 'Preface to the View of the State of Ireland,' in 1599. Sir James, after having given a high character of his poetry, says, "with a fate peculiar to poets, Spenser lived in a continual struggle with poverty: he was driven away from his house and plundered by the rebels: soon after his return in penury to England, he died. He was buried in Westminster Abbey near Chaucer, at the expense of the Earl of Essex; the poets of the time, who attended his funeral, threw verses into his grave." In order to account for the inaccuracy of the dates on the monument, it is alleged that the inscription had been defaced, perhaps by the puritans in revenge for the descriptions of the Blatant Beast; and that, on its renewal, the carver (the year of his birth being illegible) put ten at a venture, and ninety-six, instead of ninety-eight, or ninety-nine."

CHARLES LAMB.

To the great regret of his friends, and the loss of the lovers of wit and fine writing, Mr Lamb has just died, suddenly. There was a brief but happy mention of him in the 'Times' of Monday, which we regret to say we accidentally missed copying, and cannot, at this moment, recur to. The following cordial notice, from the 'True Sun,' is the only other we have seen up to this present writing, but many others will have appeared by the time it is published.

"It is with a feeling of the deepest pain and sorrow that we have to record the death of this friend and benefactor of humanity. Charles Lamb, the fine-minded and noble-hearted Elia, expired at his house at Edmonton, on the morning of Saturday last. His death was rather sudden, and we greatly fear that it may have been hastened by an accident which he met with a few days before. While taking his customary morning walk on the London road, his foot slipped, and he fell—striking his face against some stones, so as to wound it severely. He was recovering, however, when we heard of him (on Christmas-day), and as full of jest and whim as ever. Mr Lamb sustained a severe shock in the loss of his, perhaps, oldest and dearest friend, Coleridge—to whom he so recently paid the last tribute of mortality—with whom he has so soon been re-united. All love and honour wait upon the memory of the Friends! No man was ever more loved and honoured in life than Charles Lamb; his audience was fit, though few. His exquisite humour, his refined and subtle thought, his admirable critical powers—the fancy, the feeling, the wit that give a character to his essays quite unique—

'All were but ministers of love,
And fed his sacred flame;'

that love which embraces humanity—the sympathy that encircles the whole family of life. Mr Lamb was, we believe, in his sixty-first year. He has left a memory to which years will but add grace and lustre."

Mr Lamb was a humanist, in the most universal sense of the term. His imagination was not great, and he also wanted sufficient vigour of impulse to render his poetry as good as his prose; but, as a prose-writer, and within the wide circuit of humanity, no man ever took a more complete range than he. He had felt, thought, and suffered so much, that he literally had intolerance for nothing, and never seemed to have it, but when he supposed the sympathies of men, who might have known better, to be imperfect. He was a wit and an observer of the first order, as far as the world around him was concerned, and society in its existing state; for as to anything theoretical or transcendental, no man ever had less care for it, or less power. To take him out of habit and convention, however tolerant he was to those who could speculate beyond them, was to put him into an exhausted receiver, or to send him naked, shivering, and driven to shatters, through the regions of space and time. He was only at his ease in the old arms of humanity; and she loved and comforted him like one of her wisest, though weakest children. His life had experienced great and peculiar sorrows; but he kept up a balance between those and his consolations, by the goodness of his heart, and the ever-willing sociality of his humour; though, now and then, as if he would cram into one moment the spleen of years, he would throw out a startling and morbid subject for reflection, perhaps in no better shape than a pun; for he was a great punster. It was a levity that relieved the gravity of his thoughts, and kept them from falling too heavily earthwards.

Mr Lamb was under the middle-size, and of fragile make; but with a head as fine as if it had been carved on purpose. He had a very weak stomach; and three glasses of wine would put him in as lively a condition as can only be wrought in some men by as many bottles; which subjected him, sometimes, to mistakes on the part of the inconsiderate.

His essays, especially those collected under the signature of ELIA, will take their place among the daintiest productions of English wit-melancholy,—an amiable melancholy being the ground-work of them, and serving to throw out their delicate flowers of wit and character with the greater nicety. Nor will they be liked the less for a sprinkle of old language, which was natural in him by reason of his great love of the old English writers. Shakspeare himself might have read them, and Hamlet have quoted them; for truly was our excellent friend of the genuine line of Yorick; and we cannot help fancying the old skeleton, Death himself, looking kindly on him, and saying, "Come, you see even I have a right to your good word."

Roman Politeness.—Messala was united to Terentia, who had been first married to Cicero, and subsequently to Sallust, the historian. After the death of Messala, she entered, in extreme old age, into a fourth marriage, with a Roman senator, who used to say that he possessed the two greatest curiosities in Rome,—the widow of Cicero, and the chair in which Julius Caesar had been assassinated.—Dunlop's Roman Literature.

True Breeding.—Lord Chatham, who was almost as remarkable for his manners as for his eloquence and public spirit, has defined good-breeding "Benevolence in trifles, or the preference of others to ourselves in the little daily occurrences of life."—Sharp's Letters and Essays.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

We are very sensible of the good-will and approbation of the 'Manchester Times.'

A press of matter connected with the time of the year has delayed our extracts from Mr Simpson's valuable book, but we shall resume them in our next.

It is our intention to resume the subject mentioned by our kind friend Europos of Hereford. We hope also he will see his other wishes attended to in some shape or other, as occasion arises. He is right respecting the channel of communication.

We will consider the subject mentioned to us by H. W. H.

We read with great pleasure the letter of our friend T. R., and shall pay our best attention to his communication, of which we can here only acknowledge the receipt.

Perhaps ELLEN will favour us with some further account of the author in question, that we may be able to say more of him if necessary.

Thanks for the approbation and advice of CHRISTOPHER EASEL.

We entertain no contempt for any form of verse, in which clever men can convey their feelings; but the particular one selected by T. T. Jun. would give rise to the necessity of rejecting many of a like sort; and we foresee, from our press of matter, especially that portion of it connected with our older poetry, that we shall be compelled to admit fewer poetical contributions than usual into the LONDON JOURNAL. Indeed, we are already under the necessity of withholding many of those contributions, for similar and other reasons lately mentioned; otherwise we should have been much gratified in showing our sense of the minds and hearts of many of our Correspondents; IOTA for one, and E. N. and W. D., whose letters were very acceptable. We cannot even say any more to the truly womanly letter, dated Dublin, December 23, and containing lines on a deceased friend of the fair writer.

We will see if we cannot do what is desired by Mr F. R., respecting the title-pages to the volumes he speaks of, and let him know in our Notices to Correspondents a week or two hence.

E.'s communications from Croydon were received and duly relished, his letter not the least of them. He will understand why our acknowledgments are not more specific. As to the "astonishing brilliance," it was a license of announcement taken with our own spirits, and the good-humour of the readers; but it is alarming to be reminded of it; and we trust that E., and all other readers, will judge of it by the impulse and not the performance.

JUNIUS DELECTOR, alas! does not know how much the time of a man of letters is taken up, nor what a number of things must take place, besides what he thinks necessary.

Between the printing of a dreadful article, And the first thought of it.

In the rest we hope we may do something to gratify him.

The explanation promised to F. respecting Northumberland House was omitted last week by forgetfulness; and on reflection we think it had better appear in the ensuing number of the Supplement itself; which shall also contain the corrections with which he has favoured us. We thank him for the spirit of his second letter. It will have rendered it unnecessary for us to notice with regret something which pained us in the first.

We must beg J. C. M. to wait till next week.

The communication of a SON OF LABOUR came too late, but we are obliged to him for his letter. The alteration he proposes in the size of the JOURNAL would not be accounted a judicious one by those who are conversant with such publications.

THE PIANO-FORTE.

HENRY THE FOURTH expressed a patriotic hope to see the time arrive when every man in France should have "a fowl boiling in his pot." The anathemas of an able political writer against music-playing in farmers' houses (very just if his calculation of the effect of it were the only one) do not hinder us from expressing a hope, that the time may arrive, when every family that can earn its subsistence, shall have its Piano-forte. Not to make them "fine and fashionable," or contemptuous of any right thinking; but to help them to the pleasures of true refinement, to reward them for right thinking and right doing, and make them feel how compatible are the homeliest of their duties with an elegant recreation. Just as the fields and homesteads around them are powdered with daisies and roses, and the very cabbages in their gardens can glitter with sunny dew-drops, to those that have eyes beyond their common use.

In Germany they have Piano-fortes in inns and cottages; why should they not have them in England? The only true answer is, because we sea-faring and commercial Saxons, by very reason of our wealth, and of the unequal advance of knowledge in comparison with it, have missed the wiser conclusions, in this respect, of our continental brethren, and been accustomed to the vulgar mistake of identifying all refinement with riches, and, consequently, all the right of being refined with the attainment of them. We fancy that nobody can or will be industrious and condescend to a homely duty, who has a taste for an elegance; and, so fancying, we bring up the nation, at their peril, to have the same opinion, and thus the error is maintained, and all classes suffer for it; the rich, because it renders them but half sensible of the real enjoyment of their accomplishments, and makes them objects of jealousy to the poor; and the poor, because it forces them to work out, with double pain, that progression towards a better state of things, the steps of which would be healed and elevated by such balmy accompaniments. In England, it is taken for an affectation, or some worse sign, if people show an inclination to accomplishments not usually found within their sphere. But the whole evil consists in the accomplishments not being there already, and constituting part of their habits; for in Germany the circumstance is regarded with no such ill-will; nor do the male or female performers who can play on the Piano-forte, or sing to it (and there are millions of such) fancy they have the less duties to perform, or that they are intitled a bit the more to disrespect those duties. On the contrary, they just know so much the better what is good both in the duty and the recreation; for no true thing can co-exist falsely with another that is true; each reflects light and comfort on each. To have one set of feelings harmonized and put in good key, is to enable us to turn others to their best account; and he or she who could go from their music to their duties in a frame of mind the worse for it, would only be the victim of a false opinion, eradicable, and not of a natural feeling improveable. But false refinements are first set up, and then made judges of true ones. A foolish rich man, who can have concerts in his house, identifies his music, not with anything that he really feels or knows about it, but with his power to afford it. He is of opinion with Hugh Rebeck in the play, when he is asked why music is said to have a "silver sound,"—"Because musicians sound for silver." But if he knew what music really was, he would not care twopence for the show and flare of the thing, any more than he would to have a nightingale painted like a parrot. You may have an Æolian harp in your window that shall cost twenty guineas—you may have another that shall cost little more than a many pence. Will the winds visit the poor one with less love? or the true ear hear it with the less rapture? One of the obstacles in the way of a general love of music, in this country, is the dearness of it, both print and instrument; and this is another effect of the mistakes of wealth. The rich, having monopolized music, have made it costly; and the mistaken spirit of trade encourages the delusion, instead of throwing open the source of comfort to greater numbers. A costly Piano-forte makes a very fine, and, it must be owned, a very pleasing show in a room, if made in good taste; but scarcely a bit of the fineness is necessary to it. A Piano-forte is a harp in a box; and the box might be made of any decent materials, and the harp strung for a comparative nothing to what it is now. If we took a lesson from our cousins in Saxony and Bavaria, the demand for cheap Piano-fortes would soon bring down the price; and instead of quarrelling over their troubles, or muddling them with beer and opium, and rendering themselves alike unfit for patience or action, the poor would "get up" some music in their villages, and pursue their duties, or their claims, with a calmness beneficial to everybody.

We are aware of the political question that might be put to us at these points of our speculation; but we hold it to be answered by the real nature of the case, and, in fact, to have nothing whatever to do with it. We are an unmusical people at present (unless the climate have to do with it), simply because of what has been stated, and not for any reason connected with questions of greater or less freedom. The most musical nations—Greece, Italy, and Germany—have alike been free or enslaved, according as other circumstances happened; not as music was more or less regarded; with this difference, that the more diffused the music, the more happy the peace, or the more "deliberate" the "valour." The greatest among the most active as well as most contemplative of mankind have been lovers of music, often performers of it, and have generally united, in consequence, both action and contemplation. Epaminondas was a flute-player; so was Frederick the Second; and Luther and Milton were organists.

In connexion with music, then, let us hear nothing about politics, either way. It is one of God's goods which we ought to be desirous to see cultivated among us, next after corn, and honesty, and books. The human hand was made to play it, the ear to hear it, the soul to think it something heavenly; and if we do not avail ourselves of it accordingly, we turn not our hands, ears, and souls to their just account, nor reap half the benefit we might from the very air that sounds it.

A Piano-forte is a most agreeable object. It is a piece of furniture with a soul in it, ready to waken at a touch, and charm us with invisible beauty. Open or shut, it is pleasant to look at; but open, it looks best, smiling at us with its ivory, like the mouth of a sweet singer. The keys of a Piano-forte are, of themselves, an agreeable spectacle,—an elegance not sufficiently prized for their aspect, because they are so common; but well worth regarding even in that respect. The colour of the white keys is not a cold white, or even when at their whitest there is something of a warmth in the idea of ivory. The black furnish sort of Mosaic, and all are smooth and easy to the touch. It is one of the advantages of this instrument to the learner, that there is no discord to go through in getting at a tone. The tone is ready made. The finger touches the key, and there is music at once. Another and greater advantage is, that it contains a whole concert in itself, for you may play with all your fingers, and then every finger performs the part of a separate instrument. True, it will not compare with a real concert,—with the rising winds of an orchestra; but in no single instrument, except the organ, can you have such a combination of sounds; and the organ itself cannot do for you what the Piano-forte does. You can neither get it so cheap, nor will it condescend to play everything for you as the other does. It is a lion which has "no skill in dandling the kid." It is Jupiter, unable to put off his deity when he visits you. The Piano-forte is not incapable of the grandest music, and it performs the light and neat to admiration, and does not omit even the tender. You may accompany with it, almost equally well, the social graces of Mozart, and the pathos of Winter and Paesiello; and, as to a certain miniature brilliance of taste and execution, it has given rise to a music of its own, in the hands of Clementi and others. All those delicate ivory keys which repose in such evenness and quiet, wait only the touch of the master's fingers to become a dancing and singing multitude, and, out of apparent confusion, make accordant loveliness. How pleasant to the uninitiated to see him lay his hand upon them, as if in mere indifference, or at random; and as he dimples the instrument with touches wide and numerous as rain-drops on a summer-sea, play upon the ear the most regular harmonies, and give us, in a twinkling, elaborations, which it would take us years to pick out. We forget that he has gone through the same labour, and think only of the beautiful and mysterious result. He must have a taste, to be sure, which no labour can gift him with, and of this we have a due sense. We wish we had a book by us, written a few years back, intitled 'A Ramble among the Musicians in Germany,' in order that we might quote a passage from it about the extempore playing of Hummel, the celebrated master who was lately in this county; but, if we are not mistaken, it is the hand of the same writer which, in so good a style, between sport and scholarship, plays its musical criticisms every week in the 'Atlas,' for they are the next thing to an instrument themselves; and we recommend our readers to get a sight of that paper as often as they can, in order to cultivate the taste

* " ————— Anon they move

Of flutes and soft recorders: such as rais'd
To height of noblest temper heroes old of which England at present seems to be so promisingly ambitious. By the way, we know not whether the Italians use the word in the same sense at present; but in an old dictionary in our possession, the keys of musical instruments are called "tasti,"—tastes,—a very expressive designation. You do taste the Piano-forte the moment you touch it. Anybody can taste it; which, as we said before, is not the case with other instruments, the tone in them not being ready made; though a master, of course, may apply the word to any.

"So said,—his hand, sprightly as fire, he flings,
And with a quavering coyness tastes the strings."

There are superfine ears that profess not to be able to endure a Piano-forte after a concert; others that always find it to be out of tune; and more who veil their insensibility to music in general, by protesting against "everlasting tinkles," and school-girl affectation or sullenness. It is not a pleasure, certainly, which a man would select, to be obliged to witness affectations of any sort, much less sullenness, or any other absurdity. Such young ladies as are perpetually thinking of their abstract pretensions, and either affectedly trying to sew up their musical skill to them, or resenting, with tears and petty exclamations, that they cannot do it, are not the most sensible and agreeable of all possible charmers. But these terrible calamities may be safely left to the endurance, or non-endurance, of the no less terrible critics, who are so merciless upon them, or pretend to be. The critics and the performers will equally take themselves for prodigious people; and music will do both parties more good than harm in the long run, however their zeal may fall short of their would-be capacity for it. With respect to Piano-fortes not perfectly in tune, it is a curious fact, in the history of sounds, that no instrument is ever perfectly in tune. Even the heavenly charmer, music, being partly of earth as well as of heaven, partakes the common imperfection of things sub-lunary. It is, therefore, possible to have senses too fine for it, if we are to be always sensible of this imperfection; to and if we are not to be thus sensible, who is to judge at what nice point of imperfection the disgust is to begin, where no disgust is felt by the general ear? The sound of a trumpet, in Mozart's infancy, is said to have threatened him with convulsions. To such a man, and especially to so great a master, every right of a horror of discord would be conceded, supposing his ear to have grown up as it began; but that it did not do so is manifest from his use of trumpets; while at the same time so fine beyond ultra-fineness was his ear, that there is a passage in his works, pronounced impractically discordant by the whole musical world, which nevertheless the critics are agreed that he must have written as it stands.* In other words, Mozart perceived a harmony in discord itself, or what universally appeared to be such,—just as very fine tastes in eating and drinking relish something which is disliked by the common palate; or, as the reading world discovered, not long ago, that Pope, for all his sweetness, was not so musical a versifier as those "crabbed old English poets." The crabs were found to be very apples of the Hesperides. What we would infer from this is, that the same exquisite perception which discerned the sweetness in the sour of that discord, would not have been among the first to despise an imperfection in the tuning of an instrument, nor, though he might wish it away, be rendered insensible by it of that finest part of the good music it performed, which consists in invention, and expression, and grace,—always the flower of music, as of every other art, and to be seen and enjoyed by the very finest ears as well as the humbler ones of good-will, because the soul of a thing is worth more to them than the body of it, and the greater is greater than the less.

"Die of an air in achromatic pain;"

Thus much to caution true lovers of music how they suffer their natural discernment to be warped by platitudes "more nice than wise," and to encourage them, if an instrument pleases the general lovers of music, to try and be pleased with it as much as they can themselves, maugre what technical refiners may say of it, probably out of a jealousy of those whose refinements are of a higher order. All instruments are out of tune, the acoustic philosopher tells us. Well, be it so; provided we are not so much out of tune ourselves as to know it, or to be unable to discern something better in spite of it.

* We cannot refer to it in its place; but it was quoted some time since in the 'Atlas.'

As to those who, notwithstanding their pretended love of music at other times, are so ready to talk of "jingling" and "tinkling," whenever they hear a Piano-forte, or a poor girl at her lesson, they have really no love of music whatsoever, and only proclaim as much to those who understand them. They are among the wiseacres who are always proving their spleen at the expence of their wit.

Piano-fortes will probably be much improved by the next generation. Experiments are daily making with them, sometimes of much promise; and the extension of science on all hands bids fair to improve whatever is connected with mechanism. We are very well content, however, for ourselves, with the instrument as it is; are grateful for it, as a concert in miniature; and admire it as a piece of furniture in all its shapes: only we do not like to see it made a table of, and laden with moveables; nor when it is upright does it seem quite finished without a bust on it; perhaps, because it makes so good a pedestal, and seems to call for one.

Piano-forte (soft and strong) is not a good name for an instrument which is no softer nor stronger than some others. The organ unites the two qualities most; but organ (ὄργανον, instrumentum, —is if the instrument, by excellence) is the proper word for it, not to be parted with, and of a sound fit for its nobleness. The word Piano-forte came up, when the harpsichord and spinet, its predecessors, were made softer. Harpsichord (arpichorda,—commonly called in Italian clavicembalo, or keyed cymbal, i. e. a box or hollow, Fr. clavecin) is a sounding, but hardly a good word, meaning a harp with chords—which may be said of any harp. Spinet, an older term (spinette, thorns), signifies the quills which used to occupy the place of the modern clothed hammers, and which produced the harsh sound in the old instruments; the quill striking the edge of the strings, like the nicking of a guitar-string by the nail. The spinett was preceded by the Virginals, the oldest instrument, we believe, of the kind,—so called, perhaps, from its being chiefly played upon by young women, or because it was used in singing hymns to the Virgin. Spenser has mentioned it in an English Trimeter-Lambic; one of those fantastic attempts to introduce the unoriginalities of Latin versification, which the taste of the great poet soon led him to abandon. The line, however, in which the virginals are mentioned, presents a picture not unworthy of him. His apostrophe, at the outset, to his "unhappie verse," contains an involuntary satire:

"Unhappie Verse! the witness of my unhappie state,
Make thyself flutt'ring wings of thy fast flying Thought, and fly forth unto my Love whosoever she be;

Whether lying restless in heavy bedde, or else
Sitting so cheerelesse at the cheerfull boarde, or else
Playing alone carelesse on her heavenlie virginals."

Queen Elizabeth is on record as having played on the virginals. It has been supposed by some that the instrument took its name from her; but it is probably older. The musical instrument mentioned in one of Shakespeare's sonnets is of the same keyed family. What a complete feeling of the andante, or going movement (as the Italians call it), is there in the beautiful line which we have marked! and what a pleasant mixture of tenderness and archness throughout!

"How oft when thou, my music, music play'st
Upon that blessed wood, whose motion sounds
With thy sweet fingers, when thou gently sway'st
The wiry concord that mine ear confounds,
Do I envy those jacks, that nimble leap
To kiss the tender inward of thy hand,
Whilst my poor lips, that should that harvest reap,
At the wood's boldness by thee blushing stand!
To be so tickled, they would change their state
And situation with those dancing chips
O'er whom thy fingers walk with gentle gait!
Since saucy jacks so happy are in this,
Give them thy fingers, methy lips to kiss."

Thus we have two out of our great poets, Spenser and Shakespeare, showing us the delight they took in the same species of instrument which we have now, and so bringing themselves near to our Piano-fortes.

"Still virginalling Upon his palm—"

says the jealous husband in the 'Winter's Tale.' Chaucer, Spenser, Shakespeare, and Milton, all mention the organ. Chaucer speaks of several instruments, but we cannot trace to him any keyed ones. It is rather surprising that the poets, considering the love of music natural to them, and their frequent mention of the art, have spoken of so few musical instruments—at least as if conversant with them in their houses. Milton was an organ-player, and Gay a flute-player (how like the difference of their genius!). Thomson possessed an Æolian harp, of which he seems to have been very fond. He has addressed an ode to it (from which the verses have been set to music, beginning and has again mentioned the instrument in his 'Castle of Indolence,' a most fit place for it.

"Methinks I hear the full celestial choir");

All the truest lovers of any one art admire the other arts. Farinelli had several harpsichords, to which he gave the names of painters, according to their respective qualities,—calling one his Raphael, another his Correggio, &c. And the exquisite little painting, by Annibal Carracci, in the British Gallery, of 'Silenus teaching Apollo to play the pany-pipe' (together with a companion picture hanging near it) is said to have formed one of the compartments of the harpsichord belonging to that great painter. This is the natural magnificence of genius, which thinks no ornaments too precious for the objects of its love. We should like to be rich enough to play at imitating these great men, and see how much we could do to aggrandize a Piano-forte. Let us see: It should be of the most precious, aromatic wood; the white keys, ivory (nothing can be better than that); the black, ebony; the legs, sculptured with foliage and Loves and Graces; the panels should all be Titians and Correggios; the most exquisite verses out of the Poets should be carved between them; an arabesque cabinet should stand near it, containing the finest compositions; and Rossini should come from Italy to play them, and Pasta to sing.

¶ Meantime, what signifies all this luxury? The soul of music is at hand, wherever there are keys and strings and loving fingers to touch them; and this soul, which disposes us to fancy the luxury, enables us to do without it. We can enjoy it in vision, without the expense.

We take the liberty of closing this article with two copies of verses, which two eminent living musicians, Messrs Barnett and Novello, have done us the honour to set to music. The verses have been printed before, but many of our readers will not have seen them. We did not think it possible for any words of our own to give us so much pleasure in the repetition, as when we heard her father's composition sung by the pure and most tuneful voice of Miss Clara Novello (Clara is she well named); and the reader may see what is thought of Mr Barnett's powers, by musical judges, in a criticism upon it in a late number of the 'Atlas,' or another in a new cheap periodical publication, called the 'Englishwoman,' heirress to the graces and good stock of her deceased parents, the 'Ladies' Gazette' and the 'Penny Novelist,' and uniting them both to better advantage :—

THOUGHTS ON HEARING SOME BEAUTIFUL MUSIC.

(Set to music by Vincent Novello.)

When lovely sounds about my ears
Like winds in Eden's tree-tops rise,
And make me, though my spirit hears,
For very luxury close my eyes,
Let none but friends be round about,
Who love the smoothing joy like me,
That so the charm be felt throughout,
And all be harmony.

And when we reach the close divine,
Then let the hand of her I love,
Come with its gentle palm on mine,
As soft as snow, or lighting dove;
And let, by stealth, that more than friend
Look sweetness in my opening eyes;
For only so such dreams should end,
Or wake in Paradise.

THE LOVER OF MUSIC TO HIS PIANO-FORTE.

(From Barnett's 'Lyrical Illustrations of the Modern Poets.')

Oh friend, whom glad or grave we seek,
Heav'n-holding shrine!
I ope thee, touch thee, hear thee speak,
And peace is mine.
No fairy casket, full of bliss,
Out-values thee;
Love only, waken'd with a kiss,
More sweet may be.

To thee, when our full hearts o'erflow
In griefs or joys,
Unspeakable emotions owe
A fitting voice:
Mirth flies to thee, and Love's unrest,
And Memory dear,
And Sorrow, with his tighten'd breast,
Comes for a tear.

Oh, since no joy of human mould
Thus waits us still,
Thrice bless'd be thine, thou gentle fold
Of peace at will.
No change, no sullenness, no cheat,
In thee we find;
Thy saddest voice is ever sweet,—
Thine answer, kind.

SHAKESPEARE AT THE BURIAL OF SPENSER.

THE funeral of the great author of the 'Faerie Queene,' in Westminster Abbey, was attended by his poetical brethren, who threw verses into the grave. In Mr Landon's new and delightful volume, the 'Examination of William Shakespeare' (which ought to be in the hands of every lover of subtle wit and sentiment, that can afford to purchase it), the future still greater poet, then young and unknown, is supposed to be modestly present in the back-ground; and a conceited townsman of his gives the following exquisite account of his promising countryman. He is writing a letter to another Stratford man, who comments upon the narrative in a like vein of self-complacent patronage and dull knowingness.

"Now I speak of poets (writeth Master Jacob Eldridge) you will be in a maze at hearing that our townsman hath written a power of matter for the play-houses. Neither he nor the bookseller think it quite good enough to print; but I do assure you on the faith of a Christian, it is not bad; and there is rare fun in the last thing of his about Venus, where a Jew, one Shiloh, is choused out of his money and his revenge. However, the best critics and the greatest lords find fault, and very justly, in the words.

"Hath not a Jew eyes? hath not a Jew hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions? fed with the same food, hurt with the same weapon, subject to the same diseases, healed by the same means, warmed and cooled by the same winter and summer as a Christian is?"

Surely this is very unchristianlike. Nay, for supposition sake, suppose it to be true, was it his business to tell the people so? Was it his duty to ring the crier's bell and cry to them, the sorry Jews are quite as much men as you are. The impudentest things (excepting some bauderies) that ever came from the stage! The church, luckily, has let him alone for the present, and the Queen winks upon it. The best defence he can make for himself is that it came from the mouth of a Jew, who says many other things as abominable. Master Greene may overrate him; but Master Greene declares that, if William goes on improving and taking his advice, it will be desperate hard work in another seven years to find so many as half-a-dozen chaps equal to him within the liberties. Master Greene and myself took him with us to see the burial of Master Edmund Spenser, in Westminster Abbey, on the 19th of January last. The halberdmen pushed us back as having no business there. Master Green told them he belonged to the Queen's company of players. William Shakespeare could have said the same, but did not. And I, fearing that Master Greene and he might be halberded back into the crowd, showed the badge of the Earl of Essex. Whereupon did the sergeant ground his halbert, and say unto me,—

"That badge commands admittance every where :—your folk likewise may come in."

Master Greene was red-hot angry, and told me he would bring him before the council.

William smiled, and Master Greene said,

"Why, would not you, if you were in my place?" He replied,

"I am an half inclined to do worse—to bring him before the audience some spare hour."

At the close of the burial-service, all the poets of the age threw their pens into the grave, together with the pieces they had composed in praise or lamentation of the deceased. William Shakespeare was the only poet who abstained from throwing either pen or poem,—at which no one marvelled, he being of low estate, and the others not having yet taken him by the hand. Yet many authors recognised him, not indeed as author, but as player; and one, civiler than the rest, came up unto him triumphantly, his eyes sparkling with glee and satisfaction, and said consolatorily,—

"In due time, my honest friend, you may be admitted to do as much for one of us."

"After such encouragement," replied our townsman, "I am bound in duty to give you the preference, should I indeed be worthy."

This was the only smart thing he uttered all the remainder of the day; during the whole of it he appeared to be half lost, I know not whether in melancholy or in meditation, and soon left us."

Here endeth all that my kinsman Jacob wrote about William Shakespeare, saving and excepting his excuses for having written so much. The rest of his letter was on a matter of wider and mightier import, namely, on the price of Cotteswolde cheese at Evesham fair. And yet, although ingenious men be not among the necessities of life, there is something in them that makes us curious in regard to their goings and doings. It were to be wished that some of them had attempted to be better accountants, and others do appear to have laid aside the copybook full early in the day.

A Wise Man's Revenge.—Lycurgus, when they had abandoned to his revenge him who had put out his eye, took him home, and the punishment he inflicted was sedulous instructions to virtue; after which, the offender being restored to his people, was by them, from a rash and injurious, found become a good, honest, and modest, citizen.—Du Vair.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

LIII.—A TRAGEDY OF THE WAR IN SPAIN.

(From the Memoirs of the Duchess D'Abrantes.)

A REGIMENT was sent from Burgos against a Guerilla party, under the Marquis of Villa Campo, and ordered to treat the Spaniards with the most rigorous severity, especially the inhabitants of Arguano, a little village near the famous forest of Covelleda, whose deep shades, intersected only by narrow footpaths, were the resort of banditti and Guerillas. A principal feature of the whole Spanish war was the celerity with which all our movements were notified to the insurgent chiefs, and the difficulty we experienced in procuring a spy or a guide, while these, when found, proved almost uniformly treacherous. The battalion had to march through a frightful country, climbing rugged rocks, and crossing frozen torrents, always in dread of unforeseen and sudden dangers. They reached the village, but perceived no movement—heard no noise. Some soldiers advanced, but saw nothing—absolute solitude reigned. The officer in command, suspecting an ambush, ordered the utmost circumspection. The troops entered the street, and arrived at a small opening, where some sheaves of wheat and Indian corn, and a quantity of loaves were still smoking on the ground, but consumed to a cinder and swimming in floods of wine, which had streamed from leathern skins that had evidently been purposely broached as the provisions had been burnt, to prevent their falling into the hands of the French.

No sooner had the soldiers satisfied themselves, that after all their toils and dangers no refreshment was to be obtained, than they roared with rage—but no vengeance was within reach! All the inhabitants had fled!—fled into that forest where they might defy pursuit.

Suddenly cries were heard issuing from one of the deserted cottages, amongst which the soldiers had dispersed themselves in hopes of discovering some food or booty; they proceeded from a young woman holding a child, a year old, in her arms, whom the soldiers were dragging before their lieutenant. "Stay, lieutenant," said one of them, "here is a woman we have found sitting beside an old one, who is past speaking: question her a little."

She was dressed in the peasant costume of the Soria and Rioja mountains; and was pale, but not trembling.

"Why are you alone here?" asked the lieutenant.

"I staid with my grandmother, who is paralytic, and could not follow the rest to the forest," replied she, haughtily, and as if vexed at being obliged to drop a word in presence of a Frenchman; "I staid to take care of her."

"Why have your neighbours left the village?" The Spaniard's eyes flashed fire; she fixed on the lieutenant a look of strange import, and answered: "You know very well; were they not all to be massacred?"

The lieutenant shrugged his shoulders: "But why did you burn the bread and wheat, and empty the wine skins?"

"That you might find nothing; as they could not carry them off, there was no alternative but burning them."

At this moment shouts of joy arose, and the soldiers appeared carrying a number of hams, some loaves, and more welcome than all, several skins of wine, all discovered in a vault, the entrance to which was concealed by the straw the old woman was lying on. The young peasant darted on them a look of infernal vengeance, while the lieutenant, who had pondered with anxiety on the destitute and sinking condition of his troops, rejoiced for a moment in the unexpected supply. But the recent poisoning of several cisterns, and other fearful examples, putting him on his guard, he again interrogated the woman.

"Whence come these provisions?"

"They are all the same as those we burnt; we concealed them for our friends."

"Is your husband with yonder brigands?"

"My husband is in heaven!" said she, lifting up her eyes; "he died for the good cause,—that of God and King Ferdinand!"

"Have you any brother amongst them?"

"I have no longer a tie—except my poor child"—and she pressed the infant to her heart:—the poor little creature was thin and sallow, but its large black eyes glistened as they turned to its mother.

"Commander," exclaimed one of the soldiers, "pray order divisions of the booty, for we are very hungry, and devilish thirsty."

"One moment, my children; listen," said he, eyeing the young woman with suspicious inquisition; "these provisions are good I hope?"

"How should they be otherwise?" replied the Spaniard, contemptuously,—"they were not for you."

"Well! here's to thy health, then, demonia," said a young sub-lieutenant, opening one of the skins and preparing for a draught, but his more prudent commander still restrained him.

"One moment. Since this wine is good, you will not object to a glass."

"Oh, dear no! as much as you please." And, accepting the mess-glass offered by the lieutenant, she emptied it without hesitation.

"Huzza! Huzza!" shouted the soldiers, delighted at the prospect of intoxication without danger.

"And your child will drink some also," said the lieutenant; "he is so pale, that it will do him good."

The Spaniard had herself drank without hesitation, but in holding the cup to her infant's lips her hand trembled: the motion, however, was unperceived, and the child also emptied his glass. Thereupon the provisions speedily disappeared, and all partook both of food and wine. Suddenly, however, the infant was observed to turn livid—its features contracted—and its mouth, convulsed with agony, gave vent to piteous shrieks. The mother too, though her fortitude suppressed all complaint, could scarcely stand, and her distorted features betrayed her sufferings.

"Wretch!" exclaimed the commandant, "thou hast poisoned us!"

"Yes," said she with a ghastly smile, falling to the ground beside her child, already struggling with the death-rattle. "Yes; I have poisoned you. I knew you would fetch the skins from their hiding-place;—was it likely you would leave a dying creature undisturbed on her litter! Yes—yes—you will die, and die in perdition, while I shall go to heaven."

Her last words were scarcely audible, and the soldiers at first did not comprehend the full horror of their situation; but as the poison operated, the Spaniard's declaration was legibly translated in her convulsed features. No power could longer restrain them; in vain their commander interposed; they repulsed him, and dragging their expiring victim by the hair to the brink of the torrent, threw her into it, after lacerating her with more than a hundred sabre strokes. She uttered not a groan. As for the child, it was the first victim.

Twenty-two men were destroyed by this exploit—which I cannot call otherwise than great and heroic. The commander himself told me he escaped by miracle.

The persuasion that the bed of death would be disturbed in search of booty, was indeed holding us as savages; and such was the impression produced by the man who could command, "Let no sanctuary deter your search." By such means were the populace from the beginning exasperated against us, and especially by the oppressions of General D If the inhabitants of Arguene had not received information that they were to be massacred, they would not have taken the lead in massacre.

Such were the people amongst whom I dwelt. When this tale was related to me, on the eve of my departure from Burgos, I shuddered in contemplating on the murderous war of people against people! I trembled for the first time since my entrance into Spain. I was become timid. Alas! it was not on my own account—but I was again approaching the great crisis of maternity—and amidst what perils, good God! was my child destined to see the light.

CHARACTERS OF SHAKSPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

NO. II.—CYMBELINE.

CYMBELINE is one of the most delightful of Shakspeare's historical plays. It may be considered as a dramatic romance, in which the most striking parts of the story are thrown into the form of a dialogue, and the intermediate circumstances are explained by the different speakers, as occasion renders it necessary. The action is less concentrated in consequence; but the interest becomes more aerial and refined, from the principle of perspective introduced into the subject by the imaginary changes of scene, as well as by the length of time it occupies. The reading of this play is like going a journey with some uncertain object at the end of it, and in which the suspense is kept up and heightened by the long intervals between each action. Though the events are scattered over such an extent of surface, and relate to such a variety of characters, yet the links which bind the different interests of the story together are never intirely broken. The most straggling and seemingly casual incidents are contrived in such a manner, as to lead at last to the most complete development of the catastrophe. The ease and conscious unconcern with which this is effected only makes the skill more wonderful. The business of the plot evidently thickens in the last act; the story moves forward with increasing rapidity at every step; its various ramifications are drawn from the most distant points to the same centre; the principal characters are brought together and placed in very critical situations, and the fate of almost every person in the drama is made to depend on the solution of a single circumstance—the answer of Iachimo to the question of Imogen respecting the obtaining of the ring from Posthumus. Dr Johnson is of opinion that Shakspeare was generally inattentive to the winding-up of his plots. We think the contrary is true; and we might cite in proof of this remark not only the present play, but the conclusion of Lear, of Romeo and Juliet, of Macbeth, of Othello, even of Hamlet and of other plays of less moment, in which the last act is crowded with decisive events brought about by natural and striking means.

The pathos in 'Cymbeline' is not violent or tragical but of the most pleasing and amiable kind. A certain tender gloom overspreads the whole. Posthumus is the ostensible hero of the piece, but its greatest charm is the character of Imogen. Posthumus is only interesting from the interest she takes in him, and she is only interesting herself from her tenderness and constancy to her husband. It is the peculiar characteristic of Shakspeare's heroines, that they seem to exist only in their attachment to others. They are pure abstractions of the affections. We think as little of their persons as they do themselves, because we are let into the secrets of their hearts, which are more important. We are too much interested in their affairs to stop to look at their faces, except by stealth and at intervals. No one ever hit the true perfection of the female character, the sense of weakness leaning on the strength of its affections for support, so well as Shakspeare—no one ever so well painted natural tenderness free from affectation and disguise—no one else ever so well showed how delicacy and timidity, when driven to extremity, grow romantic and extravagant; for the romance of his heroines (in which they abound) is only an excess of the habitual prejudices of their sex, scrupulous of being false to their vows, true to their affection, and taught by the force of feeling when to forego the forms of propriety for the essence of it. His women were, in this respect, exquisite logicians; for there is nothing so logical as passion. They knew their own minds exactly, and only followed up a favourite idea, sworn to with their tongues and which was engraven on their hearts, into its untoward consequences. They were the prettiest set of martyrs and confessors on record.

Cibber, in speaking of the early English stage, accounts for the want of prominence and theatrical display in Shakspeare's female characters, from the circumstance that women, in those days, were not allowed to play the parts of women, which made it necessary to keep them a good deal in the back ground. Does not this state of manners itself, which prevented them from exhibiting themselves in public, and confined them to the relations and charities of domestic life, afford a truer explanation of the matter? His women are certainly very unlike stage-heroines; the reverse of tragedy queens.

We have almost as great an affection for Imogen as we had for Posthumus; and she deserves it better. Of all Shakspeare's women she is perhaps the most tender and most artless. Her incredulity—the opening scene with Iachimo as to her husband's infidelity—is so much as Desdemona's backwardness to believe Othello's jealousy. Her answer to the most distressing part of the picture is only, "My lord, I fear, has forgot Britain." Her readiness to pardon Iachimo's false imputation, and his designs against herself, is a good lesson to prudes; and may show that where there is a real attachment to virtue, it has no need to bolster itself up with an outrageous or affected antipathy to vice. The scene in which Pisanio gives Imogen his master's letter, accusing her of incontinency, on the treacherous suggestions of Iachimo, is as touching as it is possible for anything to be:—

PISANIO. What cheer, madam?

IMOGEN. False to his bed? What is it to be false, To lie in watch there, and to think on him?

To weep 'twixt clock and clock? If sleep charge nature,

To break it with a fearful dream of him And cry myself awake? That's false to's bed, is it?

PISANIO. Alas, good lady!

IMOGEN. I false? Thy conscience witness, Iachimo, Thou didst accuse him of incontinency, Thou then look'dst like a villain; now methinks Thy favour's good enough. Some jay of Italy, Whose mother was her painting, hath betrayed him:

Poor I am stale, a garment out of fashion, And for I am richer than 't hang by the walls, I must be right: to pieces with me. Oh, Men's vows are women's traitors. All good seeming By thy revolt, oh husband! shall be thought Put on for villany: not born where't grows, But worn a bait for ladies.

PISANIO. Good madam, hear me—

IMOGEN. Talk thy tongue weary, speak: I have heard I am a strumpet, and mine ear, Therein false struck, can take no greater wound, Nor tent to bottom that."

When Pisanio, who had been charged to kill his mistress, puts her in a way to live, she says:—

"Why, good fellow, What shall I do the while? Where bide? How live?

Or in my life what comfort, when I am Dead to my husband?"

Yet when he advises her to disguise herself in boy's clothes, and suggests "a course pretty and full in view, by which she may happily be near the residence of Posthumus," she exclaims,

"Oh, for such means

Though peril to my modesty, not death on't, I would adventure."

And when Pisanio, enlarging on the consequences, tells her she must change,

"Fear and niceness,

The handmaids of all women, or more truly Woman its pretty self, into a waggish courage Ready in gibes, quick-answered, saucy, and As quarrellous as the weasel,"

She interrupts him hastily,—

"Nay, be brief;

I see into thy end, and am almost A man already,"

In her journey, thus disguised, to Milford Haven, she loses her guide and her way; and, unbosoming her complaints, says beautifully,—

"My dear lord,

Thou art one of the false ones; now I think on thee, My hunger's gone, but even before, I was At point to sisk for food."

She afterwards finds, as she thinks, the dead body of Posthumus and engages herself as a footboy to serve a Roman officer, when she has done due obsequies to him she calls her former master :—

“ And when
With wild wood-leaves and weeds I ha' strewed his grave,
And on it said a century of prayers,
Such as I can, twice o'er, I'll weep and sigh,
And leaving so his service, follow you,
So please you entertain me.”

Now this is the very religion of love. She all along relies little on her personal charms, which she fears may have been eclipsed by “some painted jay of Italy;” she relies on her merit, and her merit is in the depth of her love, her truth, and her constancy. Her admiration of her beauty is exerted with as little consciousness as possible on her part. There are two delicious descriptions given of her, one when she is asleep, and one when she is supposed dead. Arviragus thus addresses her :—

“ With fairest flowers,
While summer lasts, and I live here, Fidele,
I'll sweeten thy sad grave; thou shalt not lack
The flower that's like thy face, pale primrose, nor
The azur'd hare-bell, like thy veins, no, nor
The leaf of eglantine, which not to slander
Outsweeten'd not thy breath.”

Iachimo gives another thus, when he steals into her bed-chamber :—

“ Cytheres,
How bravely thou becom'st thy bed! Fresh lily,
And whiter than the sheets. That I might touch—
But kiss, one kiss—'Tis her breathing that Perfumes the chamber thus; the flame o' the taper
Bows toward her, and would under-peep her lids
To see the inclosed lights, now canopied
Under the windows, white and azure, laced
With blue of heaven's own tinct—on her left breast
A mole cinque-spotted, like the crimson drop
I' the bottom of a cowslip.”

There is a moral sense in the proud beauty of this last image, a rich surfeit of the fancy,—as that well-known passage beginning, “Me of my lawful pleasure she restrained, and prayed me oft forbearance,” sets a keener edge upon it by the inimitable picture of modesty and self-denial.

The character of Cloten, the conceited booby lord and rejected lover of Imogen, though not very agreeable in itself, and at present obsolete, is drawn with great humour and knowledge of character. The description which Imogen gives of his unwelcome addresses to her—“Whose love-suit has been to me as fearful as a siege”—is enough to warn the most ridiculous lover of his folly. It is remarkable that though Cloten makes so poor a figure in love, he is described as assuming an air of consequence as the queen's son in a council of state, and, with all the absurdity in his person and manner, is not without shrewdness in his observations. So true is it that folly is as often owing to a want of proper sentiment as to a want of understanding. The exclamation of the ancient critic, “Oh, Menander and Nature, which of you copied from the other!” would not be misapplied to Shakspeare.

The other characters in this play are represented with great truth and accuracy; and, as it happens in most of the author's works, there is not only the utmost keeping in each separate character; but in the casting of the different parts, and their relation to one another, there is an affinity and harmony like what we may observe in the gradations of colour in a picture. The striking and powerful contrasts in which Shakspeare abounds could not escape observation: but the use he makes of the principle of analogy to reconcile the greatest diversities of character, and to maintain a continuity of feeling throughout, has not been sufficiently attended to. In ‘Cymbeline,’ for instance, the principal interest arises out of the unalterable fidelity of Imogen to her husband, under the most trying circumstances.

Now the other parts of the picture are filled up with subordinate examples of the same feeling, variously modified by different situations, and applied to the purposes of virtue and vice. The plot is aided by the amorous importunities of Cloten; by the tragical determination of Iachimo to conceal the defeat of his project by a daring imposture; the faithful attachment of Pisanio to his mistress is an affecting accompaniment to the whole; the obstinate adherence to his purpose in Bellarius, who keeps the fate of the princess so long a secret, in resentment for the ungrateful return to his former services; the incorrigible wickedness of the queen, and even the blind uxorious confidence of Cymbeline, are all so many lines of the same story leading to the same point. The effect of this coincidence is rather felt than observed; and as the impression exists unconsciously in the mind of the reader, so it probably arose in the same manner in the mind of the author, not from design, but from the force of natural association, a particular train of feeling suggesting different inflections of the same predominant principle, melting into, and strengthening one another,—like chords in music.

The characters of Bellarius, Guiderien, and Arviragus, and the romantic scenes in which they appear, are a fine relief to the intrigues and artificial refinements of the court from which they are banished. Nothing can surpass the wildness and simplicity of the descriptions of the mountain life they lead. They follow the pursuits of hunters, not of shepherds; and this is in keeping with the spirit of adventure and uncertainty of the rest of the story, and with the scenes in which they are afterwards called on to act. How admirably the youthful fire and impatience to emerge from their obscurity in the young princes is opposed to the cooler calculations and prudent resignation of their more experienced counsellor! How well the disadvantages of knowledge and of ignorance, of solitude and society, are placed against each other!

“GUIDERIUS. Out' of 'your proof you speak: we poor unfledged
Have never wing'd from view o' the nest; nor know not
What air's from home. Haply this life is best,
If quiet life is best; sweeter to you
That have a sharper known; well corresponding With your stiff age: but unto us it is
A cell of ignorance, travelling a-bed,
A prison for a debtor, that not dares
To stride a limit.

ARVIRAGUS. What should we speak of
When we are old as you? When we shall hear
The rain and wind beat dark December! How
In this our pinching cave shall we discourse
The freezing hours away? We have seen nothing;
We are beastly; subtle as the fox for prey,
Like warlike as the wolf for what we eat:
Our valour is to chase what flies; our cage
We make a quire, as doth the prison'd bird,
And sing our bondage freely.”

The answer of Bellarius to this expostulation is hardly satisfactory; for nothing can be an answer to hope, or the passion of the mind for unknown good, but experience. The Forest of Arden in ‘As You Like It’ can alone compare with the mountain scenes in ‘Cymbeline:’ yet how different the contemplative quiet of the one from the enterprising boldness and precarious subsistence of the other! Shakspeare not only lets us into the minds of his characters, but gives a tone and colour to the scenes he describes from the feelings of their imaginary inhabitants. He, at the same time, presents the utmost propriety of action and passion, and gives all their local accompaniments. If he was equal to the greatest things she was not above attention to the smallest. Thus the gallant sportsmen in ‘Cymbeline’ have to encounter the abrupt declivities of hill and vallies: Touchstone and Audrey jog along a level path. The deer in Cymbeline are only regarded as objects of prey. “The game's a fool,” &c.; with Jacques, they are fine subjects to moralize upon at leisure, “under the shade of melancholy boughs.”

We cannot take leave of this play, which is a favourite with us, without noticing some occasional touches of natural piety and morality. We may allude here to the opening of the scene in which Bellarius instructs the young Princes to pay their orisons to heaven :—

“ See, boys, this gate
Instructs you how t' adore the heav'ns; and bows you
To morning's holy office.
GUIDERIUS. Hail, heaven!
ARVIRAGUS. Hail, heaven!
BELLARIUS. Now for our mountain sport, up to yon hill.”

What a grace and unaffected spirit of piety breathes in this passage. In like manner, one of the brothers says to the other, when about to perform the funeral rites to Fidele :—

“ Nay, Cadwell, we must lay his head to the East,
My father hath a reason for 't.”

Shakspeare's morality is introduced in the same simple unobtrusive manner. Imogen will not let her companions stay away from the chase to attend her when sick, and gives her reason for it :—

“ Stick to your journal course; the breach of custom
Is breach of all.”

When the queen attempts to disguise her motives for procuring the poison from Cornelius, by saying she means to try its effects on “creatures not worth hanging,” his answer conveys at once a tacit reproof of her hypocrisy and a useful lesson of humanity—

“ ——— Your highness Shall from this practice but make hard your heart.”

EDUCATION OF THE MIDDLE CLASSES.

[Continuation of the Second Chapter of Mr Stimpson's ‘Necessity of Popular Education as a National Object.’]

CONTENTS :—FALSE MORALITY OF CLASSICS.

It is a natural result of the long reign of an institution which it is held a sort of treason to question, that it is ill prepared for its defence when it comes to be put upon it. The treatises professedly defensive of classical literature are few, because, like the popish faith, it has long claimed infallibility, and the need of apologies for it was as little dreamed of as arguments for popery at Rome. When we do meet with that superfluity, as hitherto deemed, a defence of Latin and Greek, or rather a catalogue of their merits which is not expected to be questioned, it is wonderful how feeble we find it. Scarcely an exception exists; even the talent of a Vicesimus Knox is nought here. The advocates of the dead languages uniformly avoid, or at least mistake, the true ground of the controversy. They expatiate on the absolute merits of classical literature, but never dream of comparing it with the education which it excludes. When the question, however, is set on this latter ground, it is capable of great abridgment; for, though we should grant much of absolute value to the actual attainment of classical accomplishment, the experience of centuries has demonstrated that it is of value to so few of those who are forced to pursue it, that the patient repetition of the error from generation to generation,—the unquestioned duty of each oblivious father to enter his son in the classical curriculum, as he was entered by his son's grandfather, in which he is to devote years to what is expected to be faithfully forgotten, more majorem, affords a striking proof of the force of an ignorant custom enthralling an imperfectly-educated people. Were the actual value, then, of classical study tenfold what it is, if it be true that ninety-nine in every hundred who engage in it fail, and for centuries have failed, of attaining to that degree of proficiency which is of any value at all, then classical study is not the proper education for ninety-nine in every hundred of those who at present lose their time in the pursuit of it; and, who, as there is no substitute, are left uneducated to all useful practical ends and purposes. What is therefore wanted, is to abolish the exclusiveness of the dead languages; to allot them their proper place as subjects of study; to render them easily accessible to all who seek them, either as necessary to a learned profession, as a direct gratification of taste, or an elegant accomplishment; and, at the same time, to substitute, in early and general education, objects of study more practically useful, which, from their nature, will be better remembered, and will furnish the substantial power of knowledge and resource for life. All the real benefit society to from the classics will thus be preserved; it being obvious that no benefit accrues in any way whatever, either to the student or the community, from their stated oblivion. When we come to the proposed educational substitute, however, it is hoped it will be admitted that the condition of the non-classical world, will, after all, not be so desolate; and, that, though labouring in another field, or travellers by another road, they will present an aspect of society at least as enlightened, as powerful, and as accomplished, as any to be found within the walls of the most ancient classical foundations. Now all this is true, even on the assumption of greater advantages than can well be conceded to the dead languages; but it is still more worthy of consideration, if it be true that their value is greatly overrated.

What is arrogated for Latin and Greek may be comprised in a few particulars. They afford, it is said, the best possible discipline for the intellectual faculties,—they are, from their perfection, as tongues, the best known subjects of philological exercise;—for the same reason, they are the most perfect instruments of thought with which we are acquainted;—as radical languages, they are the sources of a most extensive and instructive etymology;—they are the depositories of much useful science and sublime philosophy, physical and moral;—they are, finally, par excellence, the native tongues of poetry, eloquence, wit, and taste. Generally, I would humbly argue that none of these claims are exclusive, even if granted to their fullest extent. The study of English alone, to say nothing of other modern languages, affords ample scope for intellectual discipline, to the limited extent that language can supply it; our own tongue is a copious and refined instrument of thought, and is capable of a most critical and logical analysis; the Celtic, Saxon, and Scandinavian, have stronger claims on the ground of etymology, yet are never appealed to as necessary to explain their derivatives; and no more need the Latin and Greek. We are richer than Greece and Rome in poetry, oratory, wit, and taste, because we have all theirs transferred, and all our own superadded; and, lastly, our science and philosophy reduce the pretensions of the Latins and Greeks, in this particular, to utter insignificance.

It is no reply to say that all these advantages were originally borrowed from the ancient tongues. This is granted, and gratefully acknowledged; still, if it was borrowed, it is incorporated; the loan is not merely enjoyed, but added to an immense superstructure of capital unknown to the lenders. Into English are transferred and incorporated correct logical grammar,—copious, refined, and exquisitely various expression,—a store of taste, elegance, imagery, pathos, wit, and criticism,—and all the science worth transferring; while the ancient authors themselves are all translated to the complete and undeniable appropriation of everything but certain felicitous turns of expression, the only quality which translation cannot transfer; but, at its best, a luxury, too dearly purchased by exclusive study for one-fourth of a lifetime. It is undeniable, that, as records of ancient civilization, such as it was, and of the institutions, laws, philosophy, and literature of Greece and Rome, they are all transferred into our own language. An unfair use is made, in the controversy, of the fact, that the New Testament is written in Greek; and a sort of charge of impiety is insinuated against those who object to the universal study of the tongue on this account. Now, no one has gone so far as to propose to extinguish Greek as an entity, or to deny that theologians ought to be master of it. But if the Christian message is only to be understood in Greek, why was it translated into English, and in that language alone read to and by the universal British people, with the perfect sanction of their spiritual guides, themselves masters of the original?

This discussion might be extended far beyond the space which can be allotted to it here. It may be observed, summarily, 1st, It is to mistake, as shall be made to appear in the sequel, the nature and operation of the faculties of the human mind, to talk of cultivating an instrument of thought previously to using it in actual thinking. The use of the tool is learned by applying it to the material, and cannot be learned without it; and, moreover, the material must be understood before the tool can be conceived. The faculties require knowledge first, and then expression in language; to reverse the order were a solecism; in a word, thought must precede language; the utmost analytical refinements of language are only so many means of expressing varieties of thought; the language did not create the thought, but the thought demanded the language; so that when a mere philologist is engaged in his analytical task, and is dealing with ideas as well as words, he deceives himself if he thinks that the most refined expressions, the most delicate shades of meaning suggested the ideas; much more if he imagines that they constitute the ideas themselves. How and where ideas are to be obtained by the right exercise of the faculties will afterwards be shown; and it is trusted that it will then appear that nature has ordained a better course for this than translating, analysing and parsing a page of Greek; nay, that this last operation itself will be more intelligently and usefully performed by the student, who comes to it with the knowledge stores of an intellectual training more in accordance with nature.

2nd, It will likewise be shown in the sequel, that there are modes of disciplining the mind much more effectual than the most critical philology, which itself will be incalculably aided by that previous better discipline. As languages, Greek and Latin exercise but one faculty,—viz. verbal memory; their advocates who argue that they communicate a store of ideas, forget that these are as distinct from the languages themselves, “as is the swimmer from the flood,” and that there are better, because more natural, modes of obtaining them, modes much more entitled to the name of intellectual discipline.

3rd, The etymological argument is losing weight every day. The derivatives in English are made, and most successfully, direct subjects of study, and as easy of comprehension as their roots. As already said, we follow this course with all words of Celtic, Saxon, or Scandinavian origin; it is followed now, with regard to derivatives from Greek and Latin, by every school girl; till all the terms of art and science so derived, are becoming as familiar as such words as telescope, philosophy, anatomy, panorama, &c. from the Greek, and mensuration, rejection, emancipation, auction, &c. from the Latin.*

4th, No one who knows them, denies the splendour,—imaginative, however, more than moral—of classical poetry and oratory, more than he disallows the claims of painting, music, sculpture, and architecture. It is, however, not too much to condition for the former, as we always do for the latter, that these only whose talents point in the direction of the objects so as to offer a chance of excellence, should devote themselves to them. But we have English poetry.

“We too can sing
With Lycidas, and build the lofty rhyme.”

We have exquisite poetry, besides, from female pens, whose authors never read a Greek or a Latin poet in the original.

5th, It is a matter of surprise to meet with the argument of science outside the walls of a very old classical foundation, within which the actual state of the scientific world is unknown. Latin and Greek contained science for the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries; but it is surely too much to send the student of the nineteenth to the ancient authors for science. Everything true and useful in these is to be found, improved upon an hundred-fold, in thousands of English books; while the great proportion that is false and useless is better forgotten. We can study Euclid's relations of extension, Diophantus's relations of number, and Archimedes's demonstration of specific gravity, of the properties of the lever, and of the relations of the sphere, cylinder, and cone,—found by Cicero sculptured on his monumental stone,—without requiring previously to learn Greek. No teacher of chemistry, mechanical philosophy, anatomy, physiology, or medicine, would dream of recommending to his pupils the ancient theorists on these induction-created sciences; if they did so, it would only be as a curious history of error, a subject for antiquarian research.

If for moral science, or ethics, we are told to go to Plato, Aristotle, Socrates, Zeno, Epicurus, Cicero, and Seneca, the answer will naturally be—to which of all these? for the metaphysics, morals, and ethics of none of the Greek sages—Cicero and Seneca were scarcely original theorists—agree with those of another. I am well aware that the same difficulty occurs to perplex our choice among modern metaphysicians and moral philosophers,—at least down to the time of Professor Dugald Stewart, who joins in the confession of the Abbé Bonald, that philosophy is yet in expectation: but surely we need not take the trouble to learn Latin and Greek in quest of true philosophy not there to be found, merely that we may read, in the original, ingenious theories founded on false views of human nature, declamatory generalities about virtue and happiness, the practical worthlessness of which was exposed by their lack of practical effects in mitigating the selfishness, injustice, cruelty, and vice, of the people to whom they were taught, or rather before whom they were vainly displayed.

THE WEEK.

BIRTH-DAYS.

JANUARY 15, 1622. At Paris, Jean Baptiste Poquelin de Moliere, the greatest of comic dramatists; equally famous for the breadth of his humour, and the force of its foundation in truth. He was the son of an upholsterer. Like all the very greatest geniuses, he was a good-hearted man. It was he that gave a piece of gold by mistake to a beggar; and, upon the man's returning it to him, exclaimed, with a good faith little common to satirists, “Oh virtue! in what a corner hast thou siched thyself!”

17, 1706. At Boston, in New England, where his father was a soap-boiler and tallow-chandler, Benjamin Franklin, one of the Founders of the American Republic, a philosopher of the most practical order, scientific and moral, but defective in the imaginative part of man's nature, and in the knowledge of its wants. He began life in Philadelphia with a half-penny in his pocket, a roll of bread in his hand, and no lodging; and was seen by his future wife, as she stood at a window, eating his roll, and looking about him. Such a beginning was glorious; but it is a pity he ended with cutting his son off with a shilling, for differing with him in politics.

Same day, 1749. At Asti, in Piedmont, of a noble family, Vittorio Alfieri, the most celebrated tragic dramatist of Italy,—a country remarkable for its deficiency in the drama solely. He had more will than power perhaps to be a great poet, and far too little sympathy for a dramatic one. He beats out his short and stern sentences, like bolts on an anvil. But we should speak of him with hesitation, having never been able to do more than look into his writings. Alfieri was singularly fond of horses; and used to allow himself an additional one, for every new tragedy that he wrote.

18, 1689. At the Chateau of Brede, near Bordeaux, Charles de Secondat, Baron de Montesquieu; a lively theoretical legislator, more profound than his wit lets him be taken for by some, and less a than his constitutional vivacity and freedom from trouble would suffer his natural powers to render him. He was a very amiable man. Some foreign visitors waiting upon him in his old age, found a volume of Ovid's love poems lying open on his table; and he was so hale and agile, that going to show them about his grounds, and coming to a gate which was locked and put them to a stand, he astonished them by laying his hand upon it, and jumping over.

19, 1479. At Thorn in Prussia, Nicholas Copernicus, the restorer of the Pythagorean and existing theory of the universe, which makes the sun the centre of the planetary system. He was son of a merchant, and was in the church. A fear of offending the religious mistakes of his time kept his great work a long time from the press. At length he permitted it to appear, and received a copy of it a few hours before he died.

—1736. At Greenock in Scotland, James Watt, the advancer of the steam-engine to its present important usefulness. He was son of a tradesman, and was bred a mathematical instrument maker.

THE WEATHER, AND THE MOVEMENTS OF NATURE.

Very cold weather takes place this time of year; when it happens otherwise, it generally either rains or blows a gale.

Larks now congregate, and fly to the warm stubble for shelter; and the nut-hatch is heard. The slug makes its appearance, and commences its depredations on garden-plants and green wheat. The thrush, missel-thrush, and hedge-sparrow, begin to sing. The wren also pipes her perennial lay, even among the flakes of snow. The titmouse pulls straw out of the thatch, in search of insects. Linnets congregate, and rooks resort to nest trees; pullets begin to lay; young lambs are dropped.

The house-sparrow chirps; the bat appears; spiders shoot out their webs; and the blackbird whistles. The field-fares, red-wings, skylarks, and titlarks, resort to watered meadows for food, and are in part supported by the gnats which are on the snow, near the water. Ivy berries and the tops of tender turnips afford nourishment to the gaminivorous birds, as the ring-dove, &c. Earth-worms lie out on the ground, and the snail appears.—Forster's Perennial Calendar.

WINTER.

It was a winter, such as when birds do die
In the deep forests; and the fishes lie
Stiff'd in the translucent ice, which makes
Even the mud and slime of the warm lakes
A wrinkled clod as hard as brick; and when,
Among their children, comfortable men
Gather about great fires, and yet feel cold:
Alas! then for the homeless beggar old!

SHELLEY.

The sword of winter, keen and cold.

CHAUCER.

Poor naked wretches, whosoe'er you are,
That bide the pelting of this pitiless storm,
How shall your houseless heads and unfed sides,
Your loop'd and window'd raggedness defend you
From seasons such as these? O, I have ta'en Too little care of this!

[It is King Lear who is speaking.]

Take physic, pomp;
Expose thyself to feel what wretches feel;
That thou may'st shake the superflux to them
And show the heavens more just. * *

[Enter Edgar, disguised as a madman.]

Edg. Away! the foul fiend follows me!

Through the sharp hawthorn blows the cold wind.
Humph! go to thy bed and warm thee.

Lear. Hast thou given all to thy two daughters, and art thou come to this?

SHAKESPEARE.

Scene in Petruchio's Country-house.

Grumio. Holla! ho! Curtis!

Enter Curtis. Who is that calls so coldly?

Grumio. A piece of ice. If thou doubt it, thou may'st slide from my shoulder to my heel, with no greater run than my head and neck.

Taming of the Shrews.

Part of a Song in 'Love's Labour Lost.'
When icicles hang by the wall,
And Dick the shepherd blows his nail,
And Tom bears logs into the hall,
And milk comes frozen home in pail,
Then nightly sings the staring owl,
To-whit, to-whit, a merry note,
While greasy Joan doth keel the pot.

SPECULATIONS ON MY GRAND-FATHER;

BEING AN INTRODUCTION TO A GRAVER QUESTION.

In contemplating the life of an individual who existed in a past age, events are so scarce, and matters of moment so sparingly found over its course, that the reviewer can scarcely distinguish whether he has before him the events of a day—a morning sunny, and a stormy noon—or the records of a life of the full term of man's existence. He sees, at one and the same instant, the child sporting in the fields, crowning itself with flowers,—fishing in the brook, or forcing his way through brake and briar after some boyish treasure,—eye looking towards the heaven, but thinking upon earth; and the old man, withered and worn with life and trouble, who has survived equally the ambition of the man and the cravings of the child—with eyes bent on earth, but thoughts turned heavenward; and they are the same individual. No one stage of his life is of more importance than another, who has not signalized it by some effort for the advantage of his species.

This is only a passing observation, perhaps uncalled for,—for fate has denied me ancestors whose deeds might have furnished to their survivor the study of a morning. I presented my promissory note for a grandaunt at the portals of a past generation, and there were no effects! Reader, I pray you note it! for upon this defalcation in my progenitorial annals are founded the very unlettered thoughts which follow.

Some worthy has observed, that he sighed neither for park nor estate, because at any time he could take his recreation in these of others, and fancy them his own, and, moreover, without any of the inconveniences of their being such in fact. Here the philosopher had a manifest advantage over the proprietor, for he could appropriate in this pleasant way every agreeable spot he should chance to encounter; but for the man who owns a park—there is but one park in the world—his own: he has felt the substance of his own broad lands, and his mind consequently refuses to be cajoled by empty fancies into the possession of even a paradise. The philosopher might gladly find the last forever better than the first; but, amidst his admiration, the landholder would always be striking his foot against some "odious comparison," lying, like a tripping-stone, upon his path.

As to the enthusiast no estate, so to me no grand-father descended; and, accordingly, we both have gone up and down the world, picking and choosing, wherever fancy led us. This is no unpleasant prerogative; but men do not stand the examination of their descendants. I have chosen eleven grandsires already—in their several turns they all have given way—I have now a twelfth upon trial.

I have, too, chosen an ancestor by his looks. Standing in a broker's ware-room, or old gallery, the portrait of some respectable-looking gentleman has arrested me as his; and a reverential emotion would steal over his possible descendant. Does he nod at me—or is't a "rat behind the arras?" At other times, the high-backed chair, the antique secrétaire, attracted my curiosity. Of the one I demanded if it had ever supported his beloved form? and of the other, whether it had been the depository of the secrets of him who was now a mystery to me? Who and what was he? A Creole or a Turk—a Nabob, or one of the Society of Friends—an Equivaux or a Yorkshireman—which? Was he a broad-shouldered

"lover, from Brin's green isle," or a "good old English gentleman?"—I am at liberty to choose. Was he a dapper merchant, dwelling behind stained panes in some city causeway, perched eternally at his desk, like his good lady's parrot in its golden cage—or was he a hedger and ditcher, or at times a mower, "singing blythe" over conquered fields of hay—given to resting on his arms, and his uncared-for thoughts occupied alone with the low state of his firkin?—which?

Ex filio discite patres. I have oft imagined him,—the placid, dignified old man! He is walking before me, say down Oxford road, towards the once rural village of St Giles; and he sighs to think how enormous and overgrown London is becoming. His hat is a hat—and not a warming pan in beaver: he evidently covers his head, as he would tile his house,—substantially. His coat, too, is that of a man of weight—with pockets (how unlike their gentle master) capable of any enormity; they are like panniers: he might carry his children to church in them. In his hand he wields, sedately planting it every step with firmness on the ground, an oaken branch of no mean weight. A leg, worthy of the whole frame, supports the well-built fabric; its foot decorated with a goodly buckle. A buckle! the eye follows that crowning glory of a shoe with respect, as it irradiates his firm and steady and modest steps over the path. He might have handed down those shoe-buckles to posterity; he would have done me a kindness by the trifle. They should have been treasured up as a memento mori, and, hanging over my boot-rack, acted as a tie upon me,—Lockes upon my understanding,—illustrious persuaders to serious thoughts. Each day I might have buckled-to, afresh, with good resolutions, or set on foot some worthy deed. Over them I would have had a legend, and the legend should have run thus:

My grandmother's shoe is in my possession; and such a shoe! from the beauty of its form, it was evidently formed for the family foot; but there is a flauntiness and a gaud in the height of the heel—in its colour—in the sky-blue ribbons—and its silver embroidery in front,—such as I don't altogether approve. Like the Irishman, I tremble for my own identity. I think of the time when these braveries were as the colours hung out by a pretty leg above; and the shoe misses the solemn and controuling faculty of the buckle.

What were my grandsire's tastes and occupations? Was he a student and a reader? or did he pass through life, unknowing of half his powers of sensation and enjoyment?—as if he were the alpha and omega of human kind: as if none had lived before by whom he might profit, or none were to follow, to whom he owed—ay, undoubtedly, owed, some tribute of instruction. Did he never dig a well in the great desert of life—for future wayfarers? Was he a virtuoso, passing his days in his museum? If so, his collection has slid into other hands, and his heart, perhaps, is preserved, and still looked up in the cabinet,—valuable as when beating with life.—His skull perchance grins cheek by jowl with that of a tattooed Indian or "stuffed alligator."—Was he a statesman, seeking the philosopher's stone of modern times, public approbation? and did he win it? Was he a musician, his full-swelling march of existence dying away into an echo? Young, did his heart beat with (as he thought) the ambition of a Buonaparte, and did he live to find others, less capable, and no less grasping? Did he ever dream he read his fate in the eyes of a woman, and think his youth eternal, and her charms imperishable, and to be for ever in their spring, like the gardens of the south? Did he ever cease to love something or somebody? I hope not. And finally, did he live to find, notwithstanding the nullity of all his findings, that youth affords time enough for the man to lay up a store of virtue and sweet recollections—as comforting to old age as mother's milk is to the infant?

If my turn should ever come, like the heroes of antiquity, by the yawning mouth of black Acheron, to seek this mysterious ancestor in the Elysian fields—

Locos lætos et amana vireta—

Glad spots, and balmy places green—

I have a few more questions, one in particular, wherewith to pose him; but this it may be as well to put to others, who are alive and can turn it to account; and, by the Editor's leave, I accordingly propose to do so in the next number of the LONDON JOURNAL. It may be thought less wise than cunning to excite the reader's curiosity by this announcement; but whatever may be the style in which I may put it, the question, when it makes its appearance, will be acknowledged by all to be of the greatest moment; and if I cannot talk well for it myself, I shall leave it to talk for me. T. R.

. We have seen the question put by our Correspondent, and do hereby state that it is one extremely to the purpose, and worth everybody's attention, and that he argues it very well too.—ED.

FINE ARTS.

Birmingham and its Vicinity, as a Manufacturing and Commercial District. By W. Hawkes Smith. No. II. Radclyffe and Co. Charles Tilt.

A PARTLY got up account of Birmingham, with many illustrative engravings on steel, of public buildings, and manufactories, and large shops, very neatly executed by the local publishers, forming a sort of novel and attractive advertisement, less objectionable than many now in use. Among them are a very good view of the Bank—an exceedingly handsome building, a view of New Street, and the handsome portico of the Society of Arts. A view of Walsal fronts the number—and an excellent view it is too. Good illustrations are a very necessary part of a topographical work; but on account of the low price at which such works are necessarily sold, and the very inferior way in which wholesale engravers usually execute their work, they are very rare. Birmingham and its vicinity, however, is a work of love; it is published and illustrated by the proprietors; and forms in itself a very creditable testimony of their spirit, as denizens of the place and as tradesmen, and a very proper and sufficient advertisement of their own abilities.

MUSIC.

Songs of the Months; a Musical Garland. Novello, Fox.

THESE songs appeared originally in the 'Monthly Repository,' illustrating each month as it passed: they are now bound up in an octavo volume, equally slender and elegant. There is a pretty passage here and there, but they are overlaid with painful efforts to be original, and an affectation of abstruseness in the harmonies more surprising than pleasing. The authoress would seem to consult her grammar rather than her piano-forte; she has been infected by the mania for seeing her paper adorned with plenty of those fascinating characters that typify the sharps and flats, the privilege of using which is so envied by tyro composers, and does not enough consider how the ear may suffer for her caprices. It is as attractive and engrossing a propensity as that for using hard words, and as little to be depended upon as a test of real learning. Swift's test of a good style in language might be adapted to music—proper notes in proper places. Rule and rationality are no fetters to original genius. Sir Joshua Reynolds has aptly likened them to armour—a defence and aid to the strong, an oppression only to the weak. The fair composer, however, has evidently so competent a knowledge of the art in general, and it is so rare and pleasant a thing to see a lady favouring the public in this way, that we hope another time she will do justice to the better part of her musical faculties, and consult the grace and feeling that she really possesses, instead of the wish to be admired for them.

THE LATE MR IRVING.

[From 'Fraser's Magazine.' It may be as well to add, considering the prevailing tone of this magazine, that the article from which the following passage is taken, is written in sober earnest—we need not add, how well.]

"This man was appointed a Christian Priest: and strove with the whole force that was in him so to be it. To be it: in a time of Tithe Controversy, Encyclopedism, Catholic Rent, Philanthropism, and the Revolution of Three Days! He might have been so many things; not a speaker only, but a doer; the leader of hosts of men. For his head (when the Fog-Babylon had not yet obscured it), was of strong far-searching insight; his very enthusiasm was sanguine, not atrabiliar; he was so loving, full of hope, so simple-hearted, and made all that approached him his. A giant force of activity was in the man; speculation was accident, not nature. Chivalry, adventurous field-life of the old Border (and a far nobler sort) ran in his blood. There was in him a courage dauntless, not pugnacious; hardly fierce, by no possibility ferocious: as of the generous war-horse, gentle in its strength, yet that laughs at the shaking of the spear.—But, above all, be what he might, to be a reality was indispensable for him. In his simple Scottish circle, the highest form of mankind attainable or known was that of Christian; the highest Christian was the Teacher of such. Irving's lot was cast. For the foray-spears were all rusted into earth there; Annan Castle had become a Town-hall; and Prophetic Knox had sent tidings thither: Prophetic Knox—and, alas, Sceptic Hume,—and (as the natural consequence), Diplomatic Dundas. In such mixed incongruous element had the young soul to grow.

"Grow nevertheless he did (with that strong vitality of his); grow and ripen. What the Scottish uncelebrated Irving was they that have only seen the London celebrated (and distorted) one can never know. Bodily and spiritually, perhaps there was not (in that November, 1822) a man more full of genial energetic life in all these Islands.

"By a fatal chance, Fashion cast her eye on him, as on some impersonation of Novel-Cameronianism, some wild product of Nature from the wild mountains; Fashion crowded round him, with her meteor lights, and Bacchic dances; breathed her foul incense on him; intoxicating, poisoning. One may say, it was his own nobleness that forwarded such ruin: the excess of his sociability and sympathy, of his value for the suffrages and sympathies of men. Syren songs, as of a new Moral Reformation (sons of Mammon, and high sons of Belial and Beelzebub, to become sons of God, and the gumflowers of Almack's to be made living roses in a new Eden), sound in the inexperienced ear and heart. Most seductive, most delusive! Fashion went her idle way, to gaze on Egyptian Crocodiles, Iroquois Hunters, or what else there might be; forgot this man—who unhappily could not in his turn forget. The intoxicating poison had been swallowed; no force of natural health could cast it out. Unconsciously, for most part in deep unconsciousness, there was now the impossibility to live neglected; to walk on the quiet paths, where alone it is well with us. Singularity must henceforth succeed Singularity. O foulest Circean draught, thou poison of Popular Applause! madness is in thee, and death; thy end is Bedlam and the Grave. For the last seven years, Irving, forsaken by the world, strove either to recall it, or to forsake it; shut himself up in a lesser world of ideas and persons, and lived isolated there. Neither in this was there health: for this man such isolation was not fit; such ideas, such persons.

"One who knew him well, and may with good cause love him, has said: 'But for Irving, I had never known what the communion of man with man means. His was the freest, brotherliest, bravest human soul mine ever came in contact with: I call him, on the whole, the best man I have ever (after trial enough) found in this world, or now hope to find.'"

FIRST THOUGHTS AND SECOND THOUGHTS.

First thoughts are good, and second thoughts are good;

Those most enrich us, these do best advise.

First thoughts are like first love, and us surprise

With sudden bliss—till second thoughts intrude,

Fraught with wise doubts of much to be eschewed,

Not fit;—where yet the greater danger lies,

Lest while we doubt, the vision from our eyes

Offended pass—thereafter vainly wooed.

First thoughts are mistresses with heat pursued,

And mad devotion;—second thoughts are wives

Oft wed in over-prudence, and a mood

Most passionless.—He wiseliest contrives

Who adds the judgment while the love survives;

For so shall second thoughts, first thoughts include.

E. H. ...

The late Mr Charles Lamb.—We have this week the melancholy office of recording the death of Mr Charles Lamb, the author of 'John Woodvil,' of the 'Essays of Elia,' and of other works both in verse and prose, the most intirely delightful which the age has produced. It is the saddest duty of the kind we have ever been called on to perform; and it is with difficulty we can force on ourselves the persuasion that the event which compels us to it is real. Mr Lamb's genius, pure and delicate as it was, so intimately associated itself with household thoughts, so closely intermingled with the customary enjoyments of daily life, making what was already dear, yet dearer, touching the secret springs of social pleasure with a quickening art, and bringing out so delightfully the latent affinities of familiar things, that our obstinate regard insists on the impossibility of its being taken from us. But it is so! Mr Lamb died on Saturday, the 27th of December, at Edmonton, in the sixty-first year of his age, after an illness of a few days, during which we have the consolation to believe that he suffered but little, and to know that his almost unparalleled sweetness of disposition never, for an instant, failed. When time shall have enabled us to contemplate more steadily than we can do at present, the works which he has left behind him, we shall endeavour to express our own sense of the faculties which produced them—as exquisite in degree, and as remarkable in kind, as those which have appertained to any of the great poets of his time, the greatest of whom were among the warmest admirers and his fastest friends.—Examiner.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THANKS TO F. G.

The 'Reflector' has long been out of print, and, we believe, can only be met with accidentally.

We are not aware of any version of the tragedy of 'Egmont,' but will inquire, and speak further if we find one.

Our fair friend, ONE OF THE MISS SMITHS, has doubly gratified us by her letter; but we fear that her opinions would by no means be so accordant respecting one picture as the other.

The Editor has just received (Jan. 6) a letter from Paris, in reference to some translations from the writings of M. de B. He will duly consider the wishes expressed in that letter; and he mentions the receipt of it here, in case any unavoidable delay in answering it privately, might lead the fair writer to suppose that it had not come to hand.

If MONTICOLA will favour us with a specimen of the sort of questions and answers which he proposes to institute in our JOURNAL between cultivators of the Fine Arts, we will see what we can do for his project.

We are unable to answer the question of AMICUS and another Correspondent, respecting the Supplements, till next week.

PRICE THREE HALFPENCE.

THE EVE OF ST AGNES.

THE reader should give us three pearls, instead of three half-pence, for this number of our Journal, for it presents him with the whole of Mr Keats's beautiful poem, entitled as above,—to say nothing of our loving commentary. We promised, some time ago, in giving quotations from Thomson's 'Castle of Indolence,' to read a small poem occasionally with the reader, after this fashion. Correspondents have more than once reminded us of the promise: we never lost sight of it, and here we redeem it; as we hope we often shall.

To-day is the Eve of St Agnes; and we thought we could not take a better opportunity of increasing the public acquaintance with this exquisite production, which is founded on the popular superstition connected with the day. St Agnes was a Roman virgin, who suffered martyrdom in the reign of Dioclesian. Her parents, a few days after her decease, are said to have had a vision of her, surrounded by angels, and attended by a white lamb, which afterwards became sacred to her. In the Catholic church formerly the nuns used to bring a couple of lambs to her altar during mass. The superstition is (for we believe it is still to be found) that by taking certain measures of divination, damsels may get a sight of their future husbands in a dream. The ordinary process seems to have been by fasting. Aubrey (as quoted in 'Brand's Popular Antiquities') mentions another, which is, to take a row of pins, and pull them out one by one, saying a Pater-noster; after which, upon going to bed, the dream is sure to ensue. Brand quotes Ben Jonson:—

"And on sweet St Agnes' night,
Please you with the promis'd sight—
Some of husbands, some of lovers,
Which an empty dream discovers."]

But another poet has now taken up the creed in good poetic earnest; and if the superstition should go out in every other respect, in his rich and loving pages it will live for ever.

THE EVE OF ST AGNES.

BY JOHN KEATS.

I.

ST AGNES' EVE—Ah! bitter chill it was;
The owl, for all his feathers, was a-cold;
The hare limp'd trembling through the frozen grass,

And silent was the flock in woolly fold;
Numb were the beadsman's fingers while he told
His rosary, and while his frosted breath,
Like pious incense, from a censer old,
Seem'd taking flight for heaven without a death,
Past the sweet Virgin's picture, while his prayer
he saith.

What a complete feeling of winter-time is here, together with an intimation of those Catholic elegancies, of which we are to have more in the poem!

"The owl, with all his feathers, was a-cold."

Could he have selected an image more warm and comfortable in itself, and, therefore, better contradicted by the season? We feel the plump, feathery bird in his nook, shivering in spite of his natural household warmth, and staring out at the strange weather. The hare cringing through the chill grass is very piteous, and the "silent flock" very patient; and how quiet and gentle, as well as wintery, are all these circumstances, and fit to open a quiet and gentle poem! The breath of the pilgrim, likened to "pious incense," completes them, and is a simile in admirable "keeping," as the painters call it; that is to say, is thoroughly harmonious in itself and with all that is going on. The breath of the pilgrim is visible, so is that of a censer; his object is religious, and so is the use of the censer; the censer, after its fashion, may be said to pray, and its breath, like the pilgrim's, ascends to heaven. Young students of poetry may, in this image alone, see what imagination is, under one of its most poetical forms, and how thoroughly it "tells." There is no part of it unfitting. It is not applicable in one point, and the reverse in another.

II.

His prayer he saith, this patient, holy man,
Then takes his lamp, and riseth from his knees,
And back returneth, meagre, barefoot, wan,
Along the chapel aisle by slow degrees:
The sculptured dead on each side seemed to freeze,
Imprisoned in black purgatorial rails:
Knights, ladies, praying in dumb oratories,
He passeth by; and his weak spirit fails
To think how they may ache in icy hoods and mails.

The germ of this thought, or something like it, is in Dante, where he speaks of the figures that perform the part of sustaining columns in architecture. Keats had read Dante in Mr Carey's translation, for which he had a great respect. He began to read him afterwards in Italian, which language he was mastering with surprising quickness. A friend of ours has a copy of Ariosto, containing admiring marks of his pen. But the same thought may have originally struck one poet as well as another. Perhaps there are few that have not felt something like it in seeing the figures upon tombs. Here, however, for the first time, we believe, in English poetry, is it expressed, and with what feeling and elegance! Most wintery as well as penitential is the word "aching," in "icy hoods and mails;" and most felicitous the introduction of the Catholic idea in the word "purgatorial." The very colour of the rails is made to assume a meaning, and to shadow forth the gloom of the punishment—

"Imprisoned in black purgatorial rails."

III.

Northward he turneth through a little door,
And scarce three steps, ere music's golden tongue
Flattered to tears this aged man and poor;
But no; already had his death-bell rung;
The joys of all his life were said and sung:
His was harsh penance on St Agnes' Eve:
Another way he went, and soon among
Rough ashes sat he, for his soul's reprieve;
And all night kept awake, for sinners' sake to grieve.

"Flatter'd to tears this aged man and poor."

This "flattered" is exquisite. A true poet is by nature a metaphysician; far greater in general than metaphysicians professed. He feels instinctively what the others get at by long searching. In this word "flattered" is the whole theory of the secret of tears; which are the tributes, more or less worthy, of self-pity to self-love. Whenever we shed tears, we take pity on ourselves; and we feel, if we do not consciously say so, that we deserve to have the pity taken. In many cases, the pity is just, and the self-love not to be construed unhandsonely. In many others, it is the reverse; and this is the reason why selfish people are so often found among the tear-shedders, and why they seem even to shed them for others. They imagine themselves in the situation of the others, as indeed the most generous must, before they can sympathize; but the generous console as well as weep. Selfish tears are avaricious of everything but themselves.

"Flatter'd to tears." Yes, the poor old man was moved, by the sweet music, to think that so sweet a thing was intended for his comfort as well as for others. He felt that the mysterious kindness of heaven did not omit even his poor, old, sorry case, in its numerous workings and visitations; and, as he wished to live longer, he began to think that his wish was to be attended to. He began to consider how much he had suffered—how much he had suffered wrongly or mysteriously—and how much better a man he was, with all his sins, than fate seemed to have taken him for. Hence, he found himself deserving of tears and self-pity, and he shed them, and felt soothed by his poor, old, loving self. Not undeservedly either; for he was a pains-taking pilgrim, aged, patient, and humble, and willingly suffered cold and toil, for the sake of something better than he could otherwise deserve; and so the pity is not exclusively on his own side: we pity him too, and would fain see him well out of that cold chapel, gathered into a warmer place than a grave. But it was not to be. We must, therefore, console ourselves with knowing, that this icy endurance of his was the last, and that he soon found himself at the sunny gate of heaven.

IV.

That ancient beadsman heard the prelude soft,
And so it chanced (for many a door was wide
From hurry to and fro) soon up aloft
The silver snarling trumpets 'gan to chide;
The level chambers, ready with their pride,
Were glowing to receive a thousand guests;
The carved angels, ever eager-eyed,
Stared, where upon their heads the cornice rests,
With hair blown back, and wings put cross-wise over their breasts.

V.

At length burst in the argent revelry,
With plume, tiara, and all rich array,
Numerous as shadows haunting fairly
The brain, new-stuff'd, in youth, with triumphs gay
Of old romance. These let us wish away,
And turn, sole-thoughted, to one Lady there,
Whose heart had brooded, all that wintry day,
On love, and wing'd St Agnes' saintly care,
As she had heard old dames full many times declare.

VI.

They told her how, upon St Agnes' Eve,
Young virgins might have visions of delight;
And soft adorning from their loves receive
Upon the honey'd middle of the night,
If ceremonies due they did aright;

As, supperless to bed they must retire
And couch supine their beauties, fly white;
Nor look behind, nor sideways, but require
Of heaven with upward eyes for all that they desire.

VII.

Full of this whim was thoughtful Madeline;
The music, yearning like a god in pain,
She scarcely heard; her maiden eyes divine
Fix'd on the floor, saw many a sweeping train
Pass by—she headed not at all; in vain
Came many a tiptoe, amorous cavalier,
And back retired; not cool'd by high diadems;
But she saw not; her heart was elsewhere;
She sigh'd for Agnes' dreams, the sweetest of the year.

VIII.

She danced along with vague, regardless eyes,
Anxious her lips, her breathing quick and short;
The hallowed hour was near at hand; she sighs
Amid the timbrels, and the thronged resort
Of whisperers, in anger or in sport;
Mid looks of love, defiance, hate, and scorn;
Hood-winked with fairy fancy; all amorn,
Save to St Agnes and her lambs unshorn,
And all the bliss to be before to-morrow morn.

IX.

So, purposing each moment to retire,
She lingered still. Meantime, across the moors,
Had come young Porphyro, with heart on fire
For Madeline. Beside the portal doors, Buttress'd from moonlight, stands he, and implores
All saints to give him sight of Madeline,
But for one moment in the tedious hours,
That he might gaze, and worship all unseen, Perchance speak, kneel, touch, kiss—in sooth such things have been.

X.

He ventures in; let no buzz'd whisper tell;
All eyes be muffled, or a hundred swords
Will storm his heart, Love's ferv'rous citadel.
For him those chambers held barbarian hordes,
Hyena foemen, and hot-blooded lords,
Whose very dogs would execrations howl
Against his lineage. Not one breast affords
Him any mercy, in that mansion foul,
Save one old beldame weak in body and in soul.

XI.

Ah, happy chance! the aged creature came
Shuffling along with ivory-headed wand,
To where he stood, hid from the torches' flame,
Behind a broad hall-pillar, far beyond
The sound of merriment and chorus bland.
He startled her; but soon she knew his face,
And grasp'd his fingers in her palsied hand:
Saying, "Mercy, Porphyro! hie thee from this place;
They are all here to-night, the whole blood-thirsty race.

XII.

"Get hence! Get hence! there's dwardah Hildebrand,
He had a fever late, and in the fit
He cursed thee and thine, both house and land;
Then there's that old Lord Maurice, not a whit
*More tame for his grey hairs—*Alas, me! fit;
Flit like a ghost away."—"Ah, gossip dear,
We're safe enough; here in this arm-chair sit,
And tell me how—"—"Good Saints! not here!
not here!
Follow me, child, or else these stones will be thy hier."

XIII.

He followed through a lowly, arched way,
Brushing the cobwebs with his lofty plume;
And as she mutter'd "Well-a—well-a-day!"
He found him in a little moonlight-room,
Pale, latticed, chill, and silent as a tomb.

"Now tell me where is Madeline," said he,
"Oh, tell me, Angela, by the holy loom
Which none but secret Sisterhood may see,
When they St Agnes' wool are weaving piously."

The poet does not make his "little moonlight room" comfortable, observe. The high taste of the exordium is kept up. All is still wintry. There is to be no comfort in the poem but what is given by love. All else may be willingly left to the cold walls.

XIV.

"St Agnes! Ah! it is St Agnes' Eve—
Yet men will murder upon holy days;
Thou must hold water in a witch's sieve,
And be the liege-lord of all elves and fays
To venture so: it fills me with amaze
To see thee, Porphyro!—St Agnes' Eve!
God's help! my lady fair the conjurer plays
This very night: good angels her deceive!
But let me laugh awhile; I've mickle time to grieve."

XV.

Feebly she laugheth in the languid moon,
While Porphyro upon her face doth look,
Like puzzled urchin on an aged crone,
Who heepeth closed a wondrous riddle-book,
As spectated she sits in chimney nook;
But soon his eyes grew brilliant, when she told
His lady's purpose; and he scarce could brook
Tears, at the thought of those enchantments cold,
And Madeline asleep in lap of legends old.

He almost shed tears—of sympathy, to think how his treasure is exposed to the cold—and of delight and pride to think of her sleeping beauty, and her love for himself. This passage "asleep in lap of legends old" is in the highest imaginative taste, fusing together the tangible and the spiritual, the real and the fanciful, the remote and the near.
Madeline is asleep in her bed; but she is also asleep in accordance with the legends of the season; and therefore the bed becomes their lap as well as sleep's.
The poet does not critically think of all this; he feels it: and thus should other young poets draw upon the prominent points of their feelings on a subject, sucking the essence out of them into analogous words, instead of beating about the bush for thoughts, and, perhaps, getting very clever ones, but confused—not the best, nor any one better than another. Such, at least, is the difference between the truest poetry and the degrees beneath it.

XVI.

Sudden a thought came, like a full-blown rose,
Flushing his brow; and in his pained heart
Made purple riot; then doth he propose
A stratagem, that makes the beldame start.
"A cruel man, and impious, thou art:
Sweet lady! let her pray, and sleep, and dream,
Alone with her good angels, far apart
From wicked men like thee. Go! go!—I deem Thou canst not, surely, be the same that thou dost seem."

XVII.

"I will not harm her, by all saints I swear," Quoth Porphyro: "Oh, may I ne'er find grace,
When my weak voice shall whisper its last prayer,
If one of her soft ringlets I displace,
Or look with ruffian-passion in her face:
Good Angela, believe me, by these tears,
Or I will, even in a moment's space,
Awake with horrid shout my foemen's ears,"
And beard them, though they be more fang'd than wolves and bears."

XVIII.

"Ah! why wilt thou affright a feeble soul?"
A poor, weak, palsy-stricken, church-yard thing,
Whose passing-bell may ere the midnight toll;
Whose prayers for thee, each morn and evening,
Were never miss'd?" Thus, plaining, doth she bring

A gentler speech from burning Porphyro;
So woeful and of such deep sorrowing,
That Angela gives promise she will do
Whatever he shall wish, betide her weal or woe;

XIX.

Which was, to lead him in close secrecy,
Even to Madeline's chamber, and there hide
Him in a closet, of such privacy
That he might see her beauty unespied,
And win perhaps that night a peerless bride;
While legion'd fairies paced the coverlet,
And pale enchantment held her sleepy-eyed.
Never on such a night have lovers met,
Since Merlin paid his Demon all the monstrous debt.

What he means by Merlin's "monstrous debt," we cannot say. Merlin, the famous enchanter, obtained King Uther his interview with the fair Lo-gornet; but though the son of a devil, and conversant with the race, we are aware of no debt that he owed them.

XX.

"It shall be as thou wishest," said the dame;
"All cases and dainties shall be stored there,
Quickly on this feast-night: by the tambour frame,
Her own lute thou wilt see: no time to spare,
For I am slow and feeble, and scarce dare
On such a catering trust my ditty head:
Wait here, my child, with patience; kneel in prayer
The while: ah! thou must needs the lady wed,
Or may I never leave my grave among the dead."

XXI.

So saying, she hobbled off with busy fear;
The lover's endless minutes slowly pass'd,
The dame return'd, and whispered in his ear
To follow her; with aged eyes aghast
From fright of dim espial. Safe at last,
Through many a dusky gallery, they gain
The maiden's chamber, silken, hush'd, and chaste,
Where Porphyro took covert, pleas'd amain:
His poor guide hurried back with agues in her brain.

XXII.

Her fankering hand upon the balustrade,
Old Angela was feeling for the stair,
When Madeline, St Agnes' charmed maid,
Rose, like a mission'd spirit, unaware:
With silver taper's light, and pious care,
She turn'd, and down the aged gossip led
To a safe level matting. Now prepare
Young Porphyro, for gazing on that bed;
She comes, she comes again, like ring-dove fray'd and fled."

XXIII.

Out went the taper as she hurried in;
Its little smoke, in pallid moonshine, died:
She closed the door, she panted, all akin,
To spirits of the air, and visions wide;
Nor uttered syllable, or, woe betide!
But to her heart, her heart was voluble,
Paining with eloquence her balmy side:
As though a tongueless nightingale should swell
Her throat in vain, and die, heart-stifled, in her dell.

"Its little smoke, in pallid moonshine, died,"

is a verse in the taste of Chaucer, full of minute grace and truth. The smoke of the waxen taper seems almost as ethereal and fair as the moonlight, and both suit each other and the heroine. But what a lovely line is the seventh, about the heart,

"Paining with eloquence her balmy side!"

And the nightingale! how touching the simile! the heart a "tongueless nightingale," dying in that dell of the bosom. What thorough sweetness, and perfection of lovely imagery! How one delicacy is heaped upon another! But for a burst of richness, noiseless, coloured, suddenly enriching the moonlight, as if a door of heaven were opened, read the following:—

XXIV.

A casement, high and triple-arch'd, there was,
All garlanded with carven imageries
Of fruits and flowers, and bunches of knot-grass,
And diamonded with paxes of quaint device,
Innumerable of stains and splendid dyes,
As are the tiger-moth's deep-damask'd wings;
And in the midst, 'mong thousand herakdries,
And twilight saints, and dim emblazonings,
A shielded 'scutcheon blush'd with blood of queens and kings.

Could all the pomp and graces of aristocracy, with Titian's and Raphael's aid to boot, go beyond the rich religion of this picture, with its "twilight mints," and its 'scutcheons' "blushing with the blood of queens?" But we must not stop the reader:—

XXV.

Full on this casement shone the wintry moon,
And threw warm gules on Madeline's fair breast,
As down she knelt for heaven's grace and boon;
Rose-bloom fell on her hands together prest,
And on her silver cross soft amethyst;
And on her hair a glory like a saint:
She seemed a splendid angel, newly drest,
Save wings, for heaven:—Porphyro grew faint,
She knelt, so pure a thing, so free from mortal taint.

The lovely and innocent creature, thus praying under the gorgeous painted window, completes the exceeding and unique beauty of this picture,—one that will for ever stand by itself in poetry, as an addition to the stock. It would have struck a glow on the face of Shakspeare himself. He might have put Imogen or Ophelia under such a shrine. How proper, as well as pretty, the heraldic term gules, considering the occasion. Red would not have been a fiftieth part so good. And with what elegant luxury he touches the "silver cross" with "amethyst," and the fair human hands with "rose-colours," the kin to their carnation! The lover's growing "faint" is one of the few inequalities which are to be found in the later productions of this great, but young and over-sensitive poet. He had, at the time of writing his poems, the seeds of a mortal illness in him, and he, doubtless, wrote as he had felt—for he was also deeply in love; and extreme sensibility struggled in him with a great understanding. But our picture is not finished:—

XXVI.

Anon his heart revives: her vespers done,
Of all its wreathed pearls her hair she frees;
Unclasps her warmed jewels one by one;
Loosens her fragrant bodice; by degrees
Her rich attire creeps rustling to her knees:
Half-hidden, like a mermaid in sea-weed,
Pensive awhile she dreams awake, and sees
In fancy fair St Agnes in her bed,
But dares not look behind, or all the charm is fled.

How true and cordial, the "warmed jewels," and what matter of fact also, made elegant, in the rustling downward of the attire; and the mixture of dress and undress, and dishevelled hair, likened to a "mermaid in sea-weed!" But the next stanza is perhaps the most exquisite in the poem.

XXVII.

Soon, trembling in her soft and chilly nest,
In sort of wakeful swoon, perplex'd she lay,
Until the poppi'd warmth of sleep oppress'd
Her soothed limbs, and soul, fatigued away,
Flown, like a thought, until the morrow-day;
Blissfully haven'd both from joy and pain;
Clasped like a missal, where swart Paynims pray;
Blinded alike from sunshine and from rain,
As though a rose should shut, and be a bud again.

Can the beautiful go beyond this? We never saw it. And how the imagery rises! Flown like a thought—Blissfully haven'd—Clasped like a missal in a land of Pagans: that is to say, where Christian prayer books must not be seen, and are, therefore, doubly cherished for the danger. And then, although no thing can surpass the preciousness of this idea, is the idea of the beautiful, crowning all—

"Blinded alike from sunshine and from rain,
As though a rose should shut, and be a bud again."

Thus it is that poetry, in its intense sympathy with creation, may be said to create anew, rendering its words almost as tangible as the objects they speak of,
and individually more lasting; the spiritual perpetuity putting them on a level (not to speak it pro-fanely) with the fugitive substance.

But we are to have more luxuries still, presently.

XXVIII.

Stol'n to this paradise, and so entranced,
Porphyro gazed upon her empty dress,
And listen'd to her breathing, if it chanced
To wake into a slumberous tenderness;
Which when he heard, that minute did he bless,
And breathed, himself; then from the closet crept,
Noiseless as fear in a wild wilderness,
And over the hush'd carpet silent stept,
And 'tween the curtains peep'd, where, lo! how fast she slept.

XXIX.

Then, by the bedside, where the faded moon
Made a dim silver twilight,—soft he set
A table, and, half-anguish'd, threw thereon
A cloth of woven crimson, gold, and jet:—
O for some drowsy Morphean amulet!
The boisterous, midnight, festive clarion,
The kettle drum, and far-heard clarionet,
Affray his ears, though but in dying tone:—
The hall door shuts again, and all the noise is gone,

XXX.

And still she slept an azure-lidded sleep
In blanched linen, smooth and lavender'd,
While he from forth the closet brought a heap
Of candied apple, quince, and plum, and gourd,
With jellies soother than the creamy curd,
And lucent syrups, tinct with cinnamon;
Manna and dates, in argosy transferr'd
From Fex; and spiced dainties, every one
From silken Samarcand to cedar'd Lebanon.

Here is delicate modulation, and super-refined epicurean nicety!

"Lucent syrups, tinct with cinnamon," make us read the line delicately, and at the tip-end, as it were, of one's tongue.

XXXI.

These delicacies he heap'd with glowing hand;
On golden dishes and in baskets bright
Of wreathed silver: sumptuous they stand,
In the retired quiet of the night,
Filling the chilly room with perfume light.—
"And now, my love, my seraph fair, awake!
Thou art my heaven, and I thine eremite:
Open thine eyes, for meek St Agnes' sake,
Or I shall drowse beside thee, so my soul doth ache."

XXXII.

Thus whispering, his warm, unnerved arm
Sank in her pillow. Shaded was her dream
By the dusk curtains:—'twas a midnight charm
Impossible to melt as iced stream:
The lustrous salvers in the moonlight gleam;
Broad golden fringe upon the carpet lies;
It seem'd he never, never could redeem
From such a steadfast spell his lady's eyes;
So mused awhile, entol'd in woofed phantasies.

XXXIII.

Awakening up, he took her hollow lute,— Tumultuous,—and, in chords that tenderest be,
He played an ancient ditty, long since mute,
In Provence call'd, "La belle dame sans mercy:"
Close to her ear touching the melody:—
Wherewith disturb'd, she uttered a soft moan:
He ceased—she panted quick—and suddenly
Her blue affrayed eyes wide open shone:
Upon his knees he sank, pale as smooth-sculptured stone.

XXXIV.

Her eyes were open, but she still beheld,
Now wide awake, the vision of her sleep:
There was a painful change, that nigh expell'd
The blisses of her dream so pure and deep,
At which fair Madeline began to weep,
And moan forth witless words with many a sigh;
While still her gaze on Porphyro would keep;
Who knelt, with joined hands and piteous eye,
Fearing to move or speak, she look'd so dream-ingly.

XXXV.

"Ah, Porphyro!" said she, "but even now
Thy voice was a sweet tremble in mine ear,
Made tuneable with every sweetest vow,
And those sad eyes were spiritual and clear;
How changed thou art! how pallid, chill, and drear,—
Give me that voice again, my Porphyro,
Those looks immortal, those complainings dear;
Oh! leave me not in this eternal woe,
For if thou diest, my love, I know not where to go."

Madeline is half awake, and Porphyro reassures her with living, kind looks, and an affectionate embrace.

XXXVI.

Beyond a mortal man impassioned far
At these voluptuous accents, he arose,
Ethereal, flushed, and like a throbbing star
Seen 'mid the sapphire heaven's deep repose;
Into her dream he melted, as the rose
Blendeth its odour with the violet,—
Solution sweet. Meanwhile the frost wind blows
Like love's alarm, pattering the sharp sleet Against the window panes: St Agnes' moon hath set.

XXXVII.

'Tis dark; quick pattereth the flaw-blown sleet;
"This is no dream; my bride, my Madeline!"
'Tis dark: the iced gusts still rave and beat:
"No dream, alas! alas! and woe is mine;
Porphyro will leave me here to fade and pine,— Cruel! what traitor could thee hither bring?
I curse not, for my heart is lost in thine,
Though thou forsakest a deceived thing;—
A dove, forlorn and lost, with sick unpruned wing."

XXXVIII.

"My Madeline! sweet dreamer! lovely bride!
Say, may I be for aye thy vassal blest?
Thy beauty's shield, heart-shaped, and vermeildyed?
Ah! silver shrine, here will I take my rest,
After so many hours of toil and quest—
A famished pilgrim, saved by miracle,
Though I have found, I will not rob thy nest
Saving of thy sweet self; if thou think'st well
To trust, fair Madeline, to no rude infidel."

With what a pretty wilful conceit the costume of the poem is kept up in the third line about the shield! The poet knew when to introduce apparent trifles forbidden to those who are void of real passion, and who, feeling nothing intensely, can intensify nothing.

XXXIX.

"Hark! 'tis an elfin-storm from faery land,
Of baggard seeming, but a boon indeed;
Arise—arise! the morning is at hand;—
The bloated wassailers will never heed:—
Let us away, my love, with happy speed;
There are no ears to hear, or eyes to see,— Drown'd all in Rhenish and the sleepy mead:
Awake! arise! my love, and fearless be,
For o'er the southern moors I have a homo for thee."

XL.

She hurried at his words, beset with fears,
For there were sleeping dragons all around,
At glaring watch, perhaps, with ready spears—
Down the wide stairs a darkling way they found,—
In all the house was heard no human sound.

A chain-droop'd lamp was flickering by each door ;
The arras, rich with horseman, hawk, and hound,
Flutter'd in the besieging wind's uproar ;
And the long carpets rose along the gusty floor.

This is a slip of the memory, for there were hardly carpets in those days. But the truth of the painting makes amends, as in the unchronological pictures of old masters.

XXI.

They glide, like phantoms, into the wide hall ;
Like phantoms to the iron porch they glide,
Where lay the porter, in uneasy sprawl,
With a huge empty flagon by his side ;
The wakeful bloodhound rose, and shook his hide,
But his sagacious eye an inmate owns :
By one, and one, the bolts full easy slide :
The chains lie silent on the footworn stones ;
The key turns, and the door upon its hinges groans.

XXII.

And they are gone : ay, ages long ago
These lovers fled away into the storm.
That night the Baron dreamt of many a woe,
And all his warrior-guests, with shade and form
Of witch, and demon, and large coffin-worm,
Were long be-nightmared. Angela the old
Died palsy-twitch'd, with meagre face deform ;
The beadsman, after thousand aves told,
For aye unsought-for slept among his ashes cold.

Here endeth the young and divine Poet, but not the delight and gratitude of his readers ; for, as he sings elsewhere—

"A thing of beauty is a joy for ever."

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

LIV.—LIVING UNDER GROUND.

FROM 'Memoirs of George and Lady Grissel Baillie, by Lady Murray,'—the tribute of a loving daughter to the memory of loving parents,—a book most honourable to all parties. Grissel is Griselda, the heroine's name in the beautiful story of Chaucer and Boccaccio, whose patience has become a proverb. It is often found among the British gentry of old times, and therefore must have been frequently inherited and introduced among families who had little pretensions to the virtue ; but, in the present instance, it seems to have illustrated a family quality.

Lady Grissel Baillie (says her daughter) was born at Redbraes Castle, December 25, 1665 ; was married there, September 17, 1692 ; and died at London, December 6, 1746. She was buried close by my father's side, in the monument at Mellerstain, on her birthday, Christmas, 25th of December, in the same manner she had directed my father's funeral, according to his own orders ; near relations, near neighbours, and her own tenants only being present—a day never to be forgot by her family, as it brought her into the world, who was so great a blessing to it, and also hid and buried her from us. She was the eldest of eighteen children my grandmother bore, except two, who died infants. My lady Torphichen, the youngest, is now the only one alive, and sixteen years younger than my mother. She was called after her mother, and, from her infancy, was the darling and comfort of her parents, having early occasion to be trusted and tried by them. In the troubles of King Charles the Second's time, she began her life with many afflicting, terrifying hardships ; though, I have often heard her say, she never thought them any. At the age of twelve, she was sent by her father to their country-house at Edinburgh (a long journey), when my grandfather Baillie was first imprisoned (my grandfathers being early and intimate friends, connected by the same way of thinking in religion and politics), to try if, by her age, she could get admittance into the prison unsuspected, and slip a letter into his hand of advice and information, and bring back what intelligence she could. She succeeded so well in both, that from that time I reckon her hardships began, from the confidence put in her, and the activity she naturally had, far beyond her age, in executing whatever she was intrusted with.

Soon after that, her father was confined fifteen months in Dumbarton Castle, and was then set at liberty, without ever being told for what he was pent up all that time ; and till he went to Holland, she was the active person that did all, by my grandmother's directions, whom affliction, and care of her little ones, kept at home, being less able to make journeys, and would have been more narrowly watched, and sooner suspected than one of my mother's age.

After persecution began afresh, and my grandfather Baillie again in prison, her father thought it necessary to keep concealed, and soon found he had too good reason for so doing ; parties being continually sent out in search of him, and often to his own house, to the terror of all in it ; though not from any fear for his safety whom they imagined at a great distance from home ; for no soul knew where he was but my grandmother and my mother, except one man, a carpenter, called Jamie Winter, who used to work in the house, and lived a mile off, on whose fidelity they thought they could depend, and were not deceived. The frequent examinations and oaths put to servants in order to make discoveries, were so strict, they durst not run the risk of trusting any of them. By the assistance of this man, they got a bed and bed-clothes carried in the night to the burying-place, a vault under ground at Polwarth church, a mile from the house ; where he was concealed a month, and had only for light an open slit at one end, through which nobody could see what was below. She went every night, by herself, at midnight, to carry him victuals and drink, and stayed with him as long as she could, to get home before day. In all this time, my grandfather showed the same constant composure and cheerfulness of mind that he continued to possess, till his death, which was at the age of eighty-four ; all which good qualities she inherited from him in a high degree. Often did they laugh heartily, in that doleful habitation, at different accidents that happened. She, at that time, had a terror for a church-yard, especially in the dark, as is not uncommon at her age, by idle nursery stories ; but when engaged by concern for her father, she stumbled over the graves every night alone, without fear of any kind entering her thoughts, but for soldiers and parties in search of him, which the least noise or motion of a leaf put her in terror for. The minister's house was near the church ; the first night she went, his dogs kept up such a barking, as put her in fear of a discovery ; my grandmother sent for the minister next day, and, upon pretence of a mad dog, got him to hang all his dogs. There was also difficulty of getting victuals to carry him, without the servants suspecting ; the only way it was to be done was, by stealing it off her plate, at dinner, into her lap. Many a diverting story she has told about this, and other things of a like nature. Her father liked sheep's head ; and while the children were eating their broth, she had concealed most of one in her lap ; when her brother Sandy (the late Lord Marchmont) had done, he looked up with astonishment, and said, "Mother, will ye look at Grissel, while we have been eating our broth she has eat up the whole sheep's head !" This occasioned so much mirth among them, that her father at night was greatly entertained by it, and desired Sandy might have a share of the next. I need not multiply stories of this kind, of which I know many. His great comfort and constant entertainment (for he had no light to read by), was repeating Buchanan Psalms, which he had by heart, from beginning to end, and retained them to his dying day. Two years before he died, which was in the year 1724, I was witness to his desiring my mother to take up that book, which, amongst others, always lay upon his table, and bid her try if he had forgot his Psalms, by naming any one she would have him repeat ; and by casting her eye over it she would know if he were right, though she did not understand it ; and he missed not a word in any place she named to him, and said they had been the great comfort of his life, by night and day, on all occasions.

He retained his judgment and good-humour to the last. Two or three years before he died, my mother was at Berwick with him, where he then lived ; and many of her relations came there to see her before she went to London. As mirth and good-humour, and particularly dancing, had been always one characteristic of the family, when so many of us were met, being no fewer than fourteen of his grandchildren and children, we had a dance. He was then very weak in his limbs, and could not walk down stairs, but desired to be carried down to the room where we were, to see us ; which he did with great cheerfulness, saying, "Though he could not dance with us, he could yet beat time with his foot ;" which he did, and bid us dance as long as we could ; that it was the best medicine he knew, for, at the same time that it gave exercise to the body, it cheered the mind. At his usual time of going to bed, he was carried up stairs, and we ceased dancing for fear of disturbing him ; but he soon sent to bid us go on, for the noise and music, so far from disturbing that it would lull him to sleep. He had no notion of interrupting the innocent pleasures of others, though his age hindered him to partake of them. His exemplary piety and goodness were no bar to his mirth.

She often said, her natural temper was warm and passionate ; but, from the time I could observe her, there appeared nothing but meekness, calmness, and resignation ; and she often reproved us for the contrary. Our saying "we could not help it," was no satisfying answer to her, who told us, she had been the same, and had conquered it.

Her duty and affection as a wife was unparalleled. I have it by me, writ in a book with her own hand, amongst many other things : "The best of husbands, and delight of my life for forty-eight years, without one jar betwixt us, died at Oxford (where he went for the education of his grandsons), the 6th of August, 1738, and was sent home to his burying place at Mellerstain."

I have often heard her declare that they never had the shadow of a quarrel or misunderstanding, no, not for a moment, and that to the last of his life, she felt the same ardent and tender love and affection for him, and the same desire to please him in the smallest trifle, that she had at their first acquaintance. Indeed, her principal and sole delight was, to watch and attend to everything that could give him pleasure or make him easy. He never went abroad but she went to the window to look after him ; and so she did that very day he fell ill, the last time he was abroad, never taking her eyes from him as long as he was in sight.

TWELFTH NIGHT, LOVE, AND THE TREES.

Enfield, January 12, 1825.

DEAR INDICATOR,—Well do I know the hallowed residence in York buildings, so charmingly alluded to in the close of your article on Twelfth Night. Often have I heard recounted the never-to-be-forgotten festivities of "the Twelfth Night," for I can boast of being nearly related to one of the fortunate members of the party assembled on that renowned occasion. That house once formed the boundary of my "run on a frosty morning," when as a rosy child, I used to roll my hoop daily down Baker street.

Perhaps the claims I have already advanced as intitling me to address you, will form my apology ; but I have yet one more plea in behalf of this trespass on your attention. Your heart-deep sympathy with human nature and its best emotions, encourages me to impart to you (and if you think fit, to your readers) the following simple incident.

Do you know a cluster of fields, dear Indicator, in the neighbourhood of one of our lovely villages (where are there such villages as in beautiful England?) lying about ten miles to the north of London?

It was a sultry day in July 18—, the sky was one unvaried blue—the hedge-rows (maugre the heat) were bright green—and no noise seemed stirring but the contented hum of myriads of insects. This hush of Nature was not broken by a couple who advanced arm in arm, in mute enjoyment of happy thoughts—they had been married that morning, and were retiring from “populous cities” to this quiet village, the birth-place of the bridegroom. At least the lady stopped, as if to “still her beating mind” by repose.

“When Portia’s exulting heart,” whispered she, “was beating high with the joyous sense of her own recent good deeds, she moralized every object into a magnified source of delight—the ‘little candle’ from her own hall shows like a welcoming star. I know not how it is, but methinks I never saw colour surpassing in vividness the tender green of yonder young oaks.”

“Singular enough,” replied her companion, “that those very trees should have attracted your peculiar notice. Would that the venerable planter of those oaks could witness this moment!—the hope that his spirit does behold and rejoice in his son’s present felicity forms one of the many blessed visions of this day. Several years ago, when I was a little fellow no higher than one of these saplings, it was one of my beloved father’s favourite amusements, during his daily walks in this vicinity, to thrust his walking-stick into the ground, and to drop into the hole thus formed, an acorn, supplied from a canvass bag, which it was the pride of his little companion to be permitted to hold while he stood by and watched the interesting operation. I may say that we have planted some thousands in various walks.”

The touching association, thus added to the lovers’ stock of pleasant feelings, will serve as an illustration of your remarks in the article above alluded to: “Every one should plant a tree who can.” * * * If a man cannot reckon upon enjoying the shade much himself, it is surely worth while to bequeath so pleasant a memorial of himself to others.”

Accept the compliments of the joyous season you have so delightfully treated of lately, and believe me, dear Indicator (for under that title, so long dear to me, allow me still to address you),

Your constant reader and admirer,

FELICIA MARITATA.

* * * We hope the reader does not think us lost to all sense of shame in publishing so flattering a letter as this. All we can say is, that we could not help it; and that he must throw the first stony editorship at us, who could. Besides, it was one of the avowed objects of this Journal to open people’s hearts, and make the community more sensible of one another’s enjoyments. The sweet candour of the signature alone would make the letter worth publishing, setting aside its other merits.

WEEK.

BIRTH-DAYS AND OTHER ANNIVERSARIES.

JANUARY 21. Eve of St Agnes. — See the First Article.

—22, 1592. At York House (on the site of the present Buckingham street in the Strand), Francis Bacon, Viscount St Alban’s, &c. The Father of Experimental Philosophy,—the liberator of the hands of knowledge. A great and wise man who would have been still wiser, and incurred no fall, and no shame of ingratitude to a fallen man (Essex) had he possessed heart enough to follow out the doctrines of his Essays, and set the simplicity of a sage above worldly cunning. Yet even in those Essays, admirable as they are, may be discerned the seeds of that mistake, even in the very passage where he seems to denounce it. (See the Essay upon ‘Cunning.’) Lord Bacon died like a proper experimenter, in consequence of his getting out of his carriage to make some observation respecting snow. It was upon Highgate Hill. A cold and fever seized him; he stopped at the house of Lord Southampton, and expired there, after a few days’ illness, on the spot which has since witnessed the death of a philosopher of a very different description,—one of the most imaginative, and least advantage-seeking,—Mr Coleridge. The house in which Mr Coleridge died, in the “Grove,” was one of a set that was built upon the ground formerly occupied by Sonthampton House.

—1592. At Chanterrier, near Digne, in Provence, Pierre Gassendi, an eminent mathematician and philosopher, reviver of the doctrines of Epicurus, which, however, he reconciled with belief in a divine superintending mind. The morals of Epicurus also he construed after their true fashion, and not in the spirit of the vulgar mistake which has since rendered the word Epicurus synonymous with a studier of the palate. Gassendi was a walker in gardens, and fond of the society of his friends. In his last illness he was bled beyond his strength, and, while sinking away into death, said to his amanuensis, “It is better, by this loss of strength, to sleep quietly in Christ, than to be taken off with more pain by suffocation.”

—1788. In Holles Street, Cavendish Square, George Gordon Byron, Lord Byron, a true poet and wit, whose poetry would have been more equal, and whose productions, altogether, of a turn less startling to those who wish to think well and hopefully of all things, had he not had the misfortune to be born in a rank that perplexed his aspirations, and of parents unfitted to develop his character.

24, 1712. Frederick the Second of Prussia, a great soldier and statesman, and mediocre man of letters, who singularly exalted the power and importance of his country in the midst of potent antagonists.

—1732. At Paris, son of a watchmaker, Pierre Augustin Caron de Beaumarchais, author of the celebrated comedy of ‘Figaro,’ an abridgment of which has been rendered more celebrated by the music of Mozart. He made a large fortune by supplying the American republicans with arms and ammunition, and lost it by speculations in salt and printing. His comedy is one of those productions which are accounted dangerous, from developing the spirit of intrigue and gallantry with more gaiety than objection; and they would be more undeniably so, if the good-humour and self-examination to which they excite did not suggest a spirit of charity and inquiry beyond themselves.

—1749. Charles James Fox, son of the first Lord Holland, an illustrious statesman, whose character is too nearly concerned with these times to be handled in this unpolitical Journal. He was an amiable man, of a wise simplicity of manner, and a cultivator of elegant literature. We saw him, not long before his death, standing in Parliament street, and making two young gentlemen laugh heartily, apparently with some story that he was relating to them.

25, 1627. At Lismore, in Ireland, of a noble family, Robert Boyle, a celebrated chemical philosopher, not so happy in his ethics and moral reasoning. Swift bantered the triviality of his thinking in his famous ‘Meditations on a Broomstick.’ His want of a right Christian discernment in his Christianity may be illustrated (with the reader’s leave) by the following passage from the ‘Indicator’:

“The celebrated Robert Boyle, the chymist, was accounted, in his days, a sort of perfection of a man, especially in all respects intellectual, moral, and religious. This excellent person was in the habit of moralizing upon everything that he did or suffered, such as ‘Upon his manner of giving meat to his dog,’ ‘Upon his horse stumbling in a very fair way,’ ‘Upon his sitting at ease in a coach that went very fast,’ and among other Reflections is one ‘Upon a fish’s struggling after having swallowed the hook.’ It amounts to this; that, at the moment when the fish thinks himself about to be most happy, the hook ‘does so wound and tear his tender gills, and thereby puts him into such restless pain, that no doubt he wishes the hook, bait, and all, were out of his torn jaws again. Thus,’ says he, ‘men who do what they should not, to obtain any sensual desires,’ &c. &c. Not a thought comes over him as to his own part in the business, and what he ought to say of himself for tearing the jaws and gills to indulge his own appetite for excitement. Take also the following:—‘Fifth Section—Reflection 1. Killing a crow (out of window) in a hog’s trough, and immediately tracing the ensuing reflexion with a pen made of one of his quills. —Long and patiently did I wait for this unlucky crow, wallowing in the sluttish trough (whose sides kept him a great while out of the reach of my gun), and gorging himself with no less greediness than the very swinish proprietaries of the feast, till at length my no less unexpected than fatal shot struck him down, and, turning the scene of his delight into that of his pangs, made him abruptly alter his note, and change his triumphant chant into a dismal and tragical noise. This method is not unusual to divine justice, towards brawny and incorrigible sinners,’ &c. &c. Thus the crow for eating his dinner, is a rascal worthy to be shot by the Honourable Mr Robert Boyle, before the latter sits down to his own; while the said Mr Boyle, instead of contenting himself with being a gentleman in search of amusement at the expence of birds and fish, is a representative of Divine Justice.”

We laugh at this wretched moral pedantry now, and deplore the involuntary hard-heartedness, which such mistakes in religion tended to produce; but in how many respects should it not make us look about ourselves, and see where we fall short of an enlargement of thinking?

—1759. On the banks of the Doon, in Ayrshire, Robert Burns, the poet of the song of Nature. He is so well known, and so particularly talked of at present, in consequence of Mr Cunningham’s edition of his Life and Works, that it is unnecessary to say anything further of him in this place.

27, 1756. At Salzburg, in Germany, Johann Chrysostom Wolfgang Theophilus Mozart, the prince of dramatic musicians; wonderful for the endless variety and undeviating grace of his invention. Yet his wife said of him, that he was a still better dancer than musician! In a soul so full of harmony, kindness towards others was to be looked for; and it was found. When a child, he would go about asking everybody “whether they loved him.” When a great musician, a man in distress accosted him one day in the street, and, as he had no money to give him, he bade him wait a little, while he went into a coffee-house, where he composed a beautiful minuet on the instant, and, sending the poor man with it to a music-seller’s, obtained for him several gold pieces. This is the way that great musicians rise. Their sensibility is their genius.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

NO. III.—MACBETH.

“The poet’s eye in a fine frenzy rolling
Doth glance from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven;
And, as imagination bodies forth
The forms of things unknown, the poet’s pen
Turns them to shape, and gives to airy nothing
A local habitation and a name.”

MACBETH and Lear, Othello and Hamlet, are usually reckoned Shakspeare’s four principal tragedies. Lear stands first for the profound intensity of the passion; Macbeth for the wildness of the imagination and the rapidity of the action; Othello for the progressive interest and powerful alternation of feeling; Hamlet for the refined development of thought and sentiment. If the force of genius shown in each of these works is astonishing, their variety is not less so. They are like different creations of the same mind, not one of which has the slightest reference to the rest. This distinctness and originality is indeed the necessary consequence of truth and nature. Shakspeare’s genius alone appeared to possess the resources of nature. He is “your only tragedy-maker.” His plays have the force of things upon the mind. What he represents is brought home to the bosom, a part of our experience, implanted in the memory, as if we had known the places, persons, and things of which he treats. Macbeth is like a record of a preternatural and tragical event. It has the rugged severity of an old chronicle with all that the imagination of the part can engraft upon traditional belief. The castle of Macbeth, round which "the air smells wooingly," and where "the temple-haunting martlet builds," has a real subsistence in the mind; the weird sisters meet as in person on the "bleasted heath;" the "air-drawn dagger" moves slowly before our eyes; the "gracious Duncan," the "blood-boltered Banquo," stand before us; all that passes through the mind of Macbeth, without the loss of a tittle, passes through ours. All that could actually take place, and all that is only possible to be conceived, what was said and what what done, the workings of passion, the spells of magic, are brought before us with the same absolute truth and vividness. Shakspeare excelled in the openings of his plays; that of Macbeth is the most striking of any. The wildness of the scenery, the sudden shifting of the situations and characters, the bustle, the expectations excited, are equally extraordinary. From the first entrance of the witches and the description of them when they meet Macbeth—

—"What are these

So wither'd and so wild in their attire,
That look not like the inhabitants of th' earth,
And yet are on't?"—

the mind is prepared for all that follows.

This tragedy is alike distinguished for the lofty imagination it displays, and for the tumultuous vehemence of the action; and the one is made the moving principle of the other. The overwhelming pressure of preternatural agency urges on the tide of human passion with redoubled force. Macbeth himself appears driven on by the violence of his fate, like a vessel before a storm; he reels to and fro like a drunken man; he staggers under the weight of his own purposes and the suggestions of others; he stands at bay with his situation; and from the superstitious awe and breathless suspense into which the communications of the Weird Sisters throw him, is hurried on with daring impatience to verify their predictions; and with impious and bloody hand to tear aside the veil which hides the uncertainty of the future. He is not equal to the struggle with fate and conscience. He now "bends up each corporal instrument to the terrible feat;" at other times his heart misgives him, and he is cowed and abashed by his success. "The deed, no less than the attempt, confounds him." His mind is assailed by the stings of remorse, and full of "preternatural sollicitings." His speeches and soliloquies are dark riddles on human life, baffling solution, and entangling him in their labyrinths. In thought he is absent and perplexed, sudden and desperate in act, from a distrust of his own resolution. His blindly rushing forward on the objects of his ambition and revenge, or his recoiling from them, equally betrays the harassed state of his feelings. This part of his character is admirably set off, by being brought in connection with that of Lady Macbeth, whose obdurate strength of will and masculine firmness give her the ascendancy over her husband's faltering virtue. She at once seizes on the opportunity that offers for the accomplishment of all their wished-for greatness, and never flinches from her object till all is over. The magnitude of her resolution almost covers the magnitude of her guilt. She a great bad woman, whom we hate, but whom we fear more than we hate. She does not excite our loathing and abhorrence like Regan and Gonerill. She is only wicked to gain a great end, and is perhaps more distinguished by her commanding presence of mind and inexorable self-will, which do not suffer her to be diverted from a bad purpose, when once formed, by weak and womanly regrets, than by the hardness of her heart or want of natural affections. The impression which her lofty determination of character makes on the mind of Macbeth is well described where he exclaims,

"Bring forth men children only;
For thy undaunted mettle should compose Nothing but males!"

Nor do the pains she is at to "screw his courage to the sticking-place," the reproach to him, not to be "lost so poorly in himself," the assurance that "a little water clears them of this deed," show anything but her greater consistency in depravity. Her strong-nerved ambition furnishes ribs of steel to "the sides of his intent;" and she is herself wound up to the execution of her baneful project with the same unshrinking fortitude in crime, that in other circumstances she would probably have shown patience in suffering. The deliberate sacrifice of all other considerations to the gaining "for their future days and nights sole sovereign sway and masterdom," by the murder of Duncan, is gorgeously expressed in her invocation on hearing of "his fatal entrance under her battlements:"—

"Come all you spirits

That tend on mortal thoughts, unsex me here:
And fill me, from the crown to th' toe, top-full
Of direst cruelty; make thick my blood,
Stop up the access and passage to remorse,
That no compunctious visitings of nature
Shake my fell purpose, nor keep peace between
The effect and it. Come to my woman's breasts,
And take my milk for gall, you murdering ministers,

Wherever in your sightless substances
You wait on nature's mischief. Come, thick night!

And pall thee in the dunnest smoke of hell,
That my keen knife see not the wound it makes,
Nor heav'n peep through the blanket of the dark,
To cry, hold, hold!"

When she first hears that "Duncan comes there to sleep," she is so overcome by the news, which is beyond her utmost expectations, that she answers the messenger, "Thou'rt mad to say it!" and on receiving her husband's account of the predictions of the Witches, conscious of his instability of purpose, and that her presence is necessary to goad him on to the consummation of his promised greatness, she exclaims—

"Hie thee hither,

That I may pour my spirits in thine ear,
And chastise with the valour of my tongue
All that impedes thee from the golden round,
Which fate and metaphysical aid doth seem
To have thee crowned withal."

This swelling exultation and keen spirit of triumph, this uncontrollable eagerness of anticipation, which seems to dilate her form and take possession of all her faculties, this solid, substantial flesh and blood display of passion, exhibit a striking contrast to the cold, abstracted, gratuitous, servile malignity of the Witches, who are equally instrumental in urging Macbeth to his fate for the mere love of mischief, and from a disinterested delight in deformity and cruelty. They are hags of mischief, obscene panders to iniquity, malicious from their impotence of enjoyment, enamoured of destruction, because they are themselves unreal, abortive, half-existences, and who become sublime from their exemption from all human sympathies and contempt for all human affairs, as Lady Macbeth does by the force of passion! Her fault seems to have been an excess of that strong principle of self-interest and family aggrandisement, not amenable to the common feelings of compassion and justice, which is so marked a feature in barbarous nations and times. A passing reflection of this kind, on the resemblance of the sleeping king to her father, alone prevents her from slaying Duncan with her own hand.

To be concluded in our next.

— They say, of Jupiter, that he can of himself dart favourable and propitious bolts, but must have the counsel and assistance of the twelve gods when he would throw those of danger and vengeance. 'Tis a great account, that the greatest of the gods, who, of himself can benefit the whole world, can destroy none without solemn deliberation. The wisdom of Jupiter himself is so wary of mistake, that, when there is a debate of vengeance, he must call a council to stay his arm.—Du Vair.

SPECIMENS OF THE WIT, HUMOUR, AND CRITICISM OF CHARLES LAMB.

BURIAL SOCIETIES.—I was amused the other day with having the following notice thrust into my hands by a man who gives out bills at the corner of Fleet market. Whether he saw any prognostics about me that made him judge such notice seasonable, I cannot say; I might, perhaps, carry in a countenance (naturally not very florid) traces of a fever which had not long left me. Those fellows have a good instinctive way of guessing at the sort of people that are likeliest to pay attention to their papers:—

"BURIAL SOCIETY.

"A favourable opportunity now offers to any person of either sex, who would wish to be buried in a genteel manner, by paying one shilling entrance, and twopence per week for the benefit of the stock. Members to be free in six months. The money to be paid at Mr Middleton's, at the sign of the First and the Last, Stonecutter's street, Fleet market. The deceased to be furnished as follows:—A strong elm coffin, covered with superfine black, and finished with two rows all round, close-drove, best japanned nails, and adorned with ornamental drops, a handsome plate of inscription, angel above, and flowers beneath, and four pair of handsome handles with wrought grips; the coffin to be well pitched, lined and ruffled with fine crape; a handsome crape shroud, cap and pillow. For use, a handsome velvet pall, three gentlemen's cloaks, three crape hat-bands, three hoods and scarfs, and six pair of gloves; two porters equipped to attend the funeral, as many to attend the same with bands and gloves; also, the burial fees paid, if not exceeding one guinea."

"Man," says Sir Thomas Brown, "is a noble animal, splendid in ashes and pompous in the grave." Whoever drew up this little advertisement certainly understood this appetite in the species, and has made abundant provision for it.

It really almost induces tedium vite upon one to read it. Methinks I could be willing to die, in death to be so attended. The two rows all round, close-drove, best black japanned nails; how feelingly do they invite and almost irresistibly persuade us to come and be fastened down! what aching head can resist the temptation to repose, which the crape shroud, the cap, and the pillow present! what sting is there in death, which the handles with wrought grips are not calculated to pluck away? what victory in the grave, which the drops and the velvet pall do not render at least extremely disputable? But, above all, the pretty emblematic plate, with angel above and the flowers beneath, takes me mightily.

UGLY SUBJECTS.—How ugly a person appears, upon whose reputation some awkward aspersion hangs, and how suddenly his countenance clears up with his character. I remember being persuaded of a man, whom I had conceived an ill opinion of, that he had a very bad set of teeth; which, since I have had better opportunities of being acquainted with his face and facts, I find to have been the very reverse of the truth. That crooked old woman, I once said, speaking of an ancient gentlewoman whose actions did [not square altogether with my notions of the rule of right; the unanimous surprise of the company, before whom I uttered these words, soon convinced me that I confounded mental with bodily obliquity, and that there was nothing tortuous about the old lady but her deeds.

This humour of mankind to deny personal comeliness to those with whose moral attributes they are dissatisfied, is very strongly shown in those advertisements which stare us in the face, from the walls of every street, and, with the tempting bait which they hang forth, stimulate at once cupidity and an abstract love of justice in the breast of every passing peruser; I mean the advertisements offering rewards for the apprehension of absconded culprits, strayed apprentices, bankrupts who have conveyed away their effects, or debtors that have run away from their hail. I observe that, in exact proportion to the indignity with which the prosecutor, who is commonly the framer of the advertisement, conceives he has been treated, the personal pretensions of the fugitive are denied, and his defects exaggerated.

A fellow whose misdeeds have been directed against the public in general, and in whose delinquency no individual shall feel himself particularly interested, generally meets with fair usage. A coiner or a smuggler shall get off tolerably well. His beauty, if he has any, is not much underrated; his deformities are not much magnified. A run-away apprentice who excites, perhaps, the next least degree of spleen in his prosecutor, generally escapes with a pair of bandy legs; if he has taken anything with him in his flight, a hitch in his gait is generally superadded.

AN APETITE IL-PROVIDED FOR.—You have seen, if you have ever passed your time much in country towns, the kind of suppers which elderly ladies in these places have lying in petto in an adjoining parlour, next to that where they are entertaining their periodically-invited coevals with cards and muffs. The cloth is usually spread some half-hour before the final rubber is decided, whence they adjourn to sup upon what may emphatically be called nothing. A silver of ham, purposely contrived to be transparent to show the china-dish through it, neighbouring a slip of invisible brown, which abuts upon something they call a curlet, as that is bravely supported by an atom of marmalade, flanked in its turn by a grain of potted beef, with a power of such dishing-minims of hospitality, spread in defiance of human nature; or rather with an utter ignorance of what it demands. Being engaged at one of these card-parties, I was obliged to go a little before supper-time (as they facetiously call the point of time in which they are taking these shadowy reflections) and the old lady, with a sort of fear shivering through the smile of courteous hospitality that beamed in her countenance, begged me to step into the next room and take something before I went out in the cold,—a proposal which lay not in my nature to deny. Indignant at the airy prospect I saw before me, I set to, and, in a trice, despatched the whole meal intended for eleven persons,—fish, flesh, fowl, pastry,—to the sprigs of garnishing parsley, and the last fearful custard that quaked upon the board. I need not describe the consternation when, in due time, the dowagers adjourned from their cards. Where was their supper?—and the servant's answer, Mr — had eat it all. That freak, however, jested me out of a good three hundred pounds a-year, which I afterwards was informed, for a certainty, the old lady meant to leave me.

SINGULAR RECEPTION OF A CHALLENGE.

THE practice of duelling (like all appeals to the animal instead of the intellectual part of us) appears going out of fashion, and various are the modes by which challenges are evaded or repulsed. It is a delicate point, and requires some address to manage it with credit. Bruce, the traveller, once experienced a singular baulk to his belligerent intentions.

The "Lord of Geesh" (his Abyssinian title) was a tall fellow, both in body and mind, and we may gather from his own narrative, that he was of a domineering disposition. This was natural. He was taller and stronger than is common with men, sanguine, successful in his enterprises, much admired, almost as much (and we believe most unjustly) condemned and ridiculed; he possessed great acuteness, surprising energy, and but little reflection. Such is the very recipe for an overbearing disposition. Look at the portrait of the man,—

"Mr Bruce's stature was six feet four inches; his person was large and well-proportioned, and his strength corresponded with his size and stature. In his youth he possessed much activity, but in the latter part of his life he became corpulent; though, when he chose to exert himself, the effects of time were not perceptible. The colour of his hair was a kind of dark red; his complexion was sanguine; and the features of his face were elegantly formed. The general tone of his voice was loud, strong, and rather harsh on particular occasions; when dictating to an amanuensis, his articulation was somewhat careless and indistinct. His walk was stately, and his air noble and commanding. He was attentive to his dress, and had a particular art of wearing that of the nations through which he passed in an easy and graceful manner, to which he was indebted for part of his good reception, especially in Abyssinia."

An Italian gentleman, the Marquis di Accoramboni, had married a Scotch lady whom Bruce considered as engaged [to himself]. The Marquis protested he was ignorant of any such engagement, but refused to say so in writing; so Bruce challenged him. The challenge is singular for its length and grandiloquence. The answer to it puzzles conjecture; we cannot guess whether the Italian is afraid, indifferent, or sarcastic. Most probably he had a national regard for his safety, and an equally national sense of the ridiculous; and so his letter is a salvo for himself and a quip upon Bruce. He apologises, and makes his bow with a grimace of exaggerated defence to Bruce's regal bearing. We have retranslated the answer from the Italian, preserving the original idiom as much as possible, to convey a better idea of its spirit and peculiarity:—

THE CHALLENGE.

"SIR,—Not my heart, but the entreaties of my friends, made me offer you the alternative by the Abbé Grant. It was not for such satisfaction, that, sick and covered with wounds, I have traversed so much land and sea to find you.

An innocent man employed in the service of my country—without provocation or injury from me, you have deprived me of my honour, by violating all the most sacred rights before God and man; and you now refuse to commit to writing what you so willingly confess in words. A man of honour and innocence, Marguise, knows no such shifts as these; and it will be well for one of us to-day, if you had been as scrupulous in doing an injury as you are in repairing it.

I am your equal, Marquis, in every respect; and God alone can do me justice for the injury which you have done me. Full of innocence, and with a clear conscience, I commit my revenge to him, and draw my sword against you with confidence, inspired by the reflection of having done my duty, and by a sense of the injustice and violence which I have suffered from you without any reason.

At half-past nine, (French reckoning,) I come to your gate in my carriage; if it does not please you, let your own be ready; and let us go together to determine which is the more easy, to injure a man in his absence, or to defend it when he is present.

THE ANSWER.

SIGNOR CAVALIER,—When the marriage with Mad. M., now my wife, was in treaty, I was never told that there was a preventive promise to your Lordship, otherwise the affair would not have been so concluded.

In regard to your Lordship's person;—on my honour I have in no manner spoken of it, your person not being known to me. So, if I can serve you, command me; and, with the most profound respect, I sign myself,

Your Lordship's
Most humble and obliged servant,
FILIPPO ACCORAMBONI.

Al Signor Janne Bruce.

A Recipe for a Fit of the Gout.—Posidonius discoursing in Pompey's presence was surprised with a violent fit of the gout, which in spite of its importunity he concealed, pursuing his discourse without any look or action to confess it. Pray tell me what new remedies had this philosopher found against its pain? what sea-cloths, what unguents against this gout?—only the knowledge of things, and the resolution of his mind.—Du Vair.

CHARLES LAMB.

SUCH of our readers as have seen the following passages in the Athenaeum, will pardon, for friendship's sake, our repetition of them in this Journal. We wish that the LONDON JOURNAL should contain whatever has been said, in any quarters, calculated to do honour to our excellent friend, and to increase the desire of the reading public to become acquainted with him.

"We sit down, with unfeigned pain, to put upon record the death of one of our most distinguished friends. Charles Lamb is dead! The fine-hearted Elia—the masterly critic—the quaint, touching, subtle humorist has left us. This time, we sigh to say it, his departure is, indeed, no fiction. He is gone; and with him are gone a world of grave and noble thoughts, innocent jests, delicate fancies. Never again will he 'set the table in a roar'—never again lift us out of the dull common-places of life by his new and pleasant speculations!

"If ever there was a man in whom 'the elements' were delightfully, although strangely mixed—in whom the minor foibles and finer virtues of our nature were bound up together, intimately—inextricably, it was surely he. They were deep-rooted, and twined together, beyond all chance of separation. Yet these foibles were, for the most part, so small, and were grafted so curiously upon a strong, original mind, that we would scarcely have desired them away. They were a sort of fret-work, which let in light, and showed the form and order of his character. 'We knew him, Horatio'—and having known him, it seems idle to say how truly and deeply we deplore his loss. Who, in truth, that had been his intimate, could speak of him but with affection and reverence? His prejudices, which were rather humours than grave opinions,—his weaknesses, which never hurt one human being except himself—may sometimes have been talked of—by strangers. But it was the pride of his friends, that they had opportunities of seeing deeper into his heart, and could feel and avouch for his many virtues. As a man, he was gentle—sincere—benevolent—modest—charitable towards others—beyond most men. In the large sense of the word, he was eminently 'humane.'

"Charles Lamb was born about the year 1774. His family were settled in Lincolnshire, as we learn by his reference to the 'family name' in a pretty sonnet.

'Perhaps some shepherd on Lincolnian plains,
In manners guileless as his own sweet flocks,
Received thee first, amid the merry mocks,
And arch allusions of his fellow swains.'

"In 1782, being then about eight years of age, he was sent to Christ's Hospital, and remained there till 1789. He has left us his 'Recollections' of this place, in two charming papers. These are evidently works of love; yet, being written with sincerity, as well as regard, they communicate to the reader a veneration for the ancient school. One wishes, whilst reading them, to muse under the 'mouldering cloisters of the old Grey Friars'—to gaze on the large pictures of Lely and Verrio—to hold colloquy with 'the Grecians'; and, above all, these springs up within us a liking—a sympathy (something between pity and admiration) for the poor Blue-coat boy, toiling for college honours, or wandering homeless through the London streets, a result, perhaps, of more moment to the author, than that of upholding the reputation of his favourite school. In his second paper, on this subject, and where he apostrophizes some of his contemporaries, the following passage has just met our eyes—'Come back into memory, like as thou wert in the day-spring of thy fancies, with hope like a fiery column before thee—the dark pillar not yet turned—Samuel Taylor Coleridge—logician, metaphysician, bard!'—It is thus that he invoked the most famous of his school companions—one whom he always held in close friendship, and who has died—how short a time!—before him.

"It was not long after he quitted Christ's Hospital, we believe, that he obtained the situation of clerk in the India House. Here he remained for many years—if we are to take him literally, thirty-six years—rising gradually from a small salary to a comfortable yearly stipend; until, in 1825, or thereabouts, he was pensioned off liberally (with 'two thirds of my accustomed salary,' he says) by the Directors.

"The paper in which he has made grateful mention of this, and in which he bids farewell to the 'stately House of Merchants,' and to the partners of his toil—

(Farewell, kind Chairman, Iras, long farewell!) should be hung up in the India House; to remind the merchants of one of their generous deeds; and to tell the young and repining clerk, that a man of rare genius once toiled (as he may do) thirty-six years within those walls.

"During this period, he dwelt in various places; sometimes in London, sometimes in the suburbs. He had (amongst other residences) chambers in the Temple—lodgings in Russell street, Covent Garden (the first floor, over the shop now occupied by Mr Creed the bookseller)—a house at Islington, on the border of the New River—lodgings at Dalston (or Shacklewell)—at Enfield Chase—and, finally, at Edmonton, where he died.

"Mr Lamb had one brother (whom he lost some years ago), and one sister; but he had no other—certainly no other near relations. His brother, Mr John Lamb, of the South-Sea House, was considerably his senior. 'You were figuring in the career of manhood,' he says, addressing his brother,

'When I was yet a little peevish boy.'

"The reader may remember, that it was this brother (otherwise James, Elia) who, upon seeing some Eton boys at play, gave vent to his forebodings in that memorable sentence, 'What a pity to think that these fine ingenious lads in a few years will all be changed into frivolous members of Parliament.' His sister, between whom and our friend, there existed a long, deep, and untiring affection—and who is worthy in every respect, to have been the sister of such a man—survives him. They lived together (being both single)—read together—thought together, and crowned the natural tie that linked them to each other, with the truest friendship. He has written down her qualities—some of them at least—in a pleasant essay: she is the Bridget Elia of 'Mackery End'; and she is the person, also, to whom one of his early sonnets is addressed, in which he reproaches himself for some little inequality of temper towards her—

'If from my lips some angry accents fell,
Peevish complaint, or harsh reproof unkind,
'Twas but the error of a sickly mind.'

"'Thou didst ever show' to me (he proceeds) 'kindest affection,

'Weeping my sorrows with me, who repay
But ill the mighty debt of love I owe,
Mary, to thee, my sister and my friend!'

"Mr Lamb was the author of various works in prose and verse; viz. 'Specimens of the English Dramatic Poets,' 1808; 'The Works of Charles Lamb,' (2 vols.) 1818; 'Elia,' 1823; 'The Last Essays of Elia,' 1833; 'The Adventures of Ulysses,' and 'Tales from Shakspeare,' besides which, he made a second gleaning from the Old English Dramatists, under the name of 'The Garrick Papers' (published in Hone's 'Every-Day Book'); assisted his sister in her beautiful little book, called 'Mrs Leicester's School,' and favoured this Paper with a few of the later efforts, or rather sportings of his pen.*

He died at Edmonton, on the 27th of December, in the sixty-first year of his age. He fell, accidentally, in the road, and having wounded his face considerably, an erysipelas ensued, which put a period to his valuable life."

* He wrote also some verses and theatrical criticisms in the 'Examiner,' and, we believe, in the 'Times.'

FINE ARTS.

Curtis's Botanical Magazine, or Flower-Garden Displayed. Curtis. No. I.—XCV.

THE illustrations are carefully drawn, and give a just notion of the details of their originals; but from a great want of artistic effect, it would be very difficult to form a true idea of the general appearance of the plants represented. The colouring is clear and lively, nay, of the kind, it is delicate, but by no means matches the originals;—indeed the whole system of print-colouring is defective; in some cases it is perfectly ridiculous. What can be thought of a picture coloured by as many hands as there are colours in it; where each colour has its own painter, and the picture passes from one to another to receive the tints that are to imitate the harmony, richness, and delicacy of nature. We laugh at the country that produces a horn band composed of monotonous individuals;—a chromatic troop; a force amounting to two octaves, that fire off a melody in line;—a band of sharp shooters practicing in a body; but what are we to think of a troop of artists, brush in hand, laying on to one poor engraving, distributing their colours at word of command, furnishing coats of red or blue, or other colour, like army-clothiers, which must do, fit or no fit. An invention that would supersede the ordinary method of colouring each print by hand would be most welcome; some plan by which colours could be multiplied in their proper places and degrees; like the different tones of an engraving. At present, coloured engravings are in the same predicament that books were formerly; each copy is made by hand, as manuscripts were before the invention of printing.

We have said the system was to blame for this. While it lasts, therefore, we must judge of coloured prints according to their comparative, rather than their intrinsic, merits. The chief use to which they can be put is, to more decidedly enable a reader to identify the original of a verbal description. To this end they must be at least generally correct. Such the plates before us seem to be, due allowance being made for the deficiencies to which we have adverted; and the colours are brighter and cleaner than we commonly get in such publications.

Chaucer's Canterbury Pilgrims. By Charles Cowden Clarke. Effingham Wilson.

Parterre. Nos. I.—V. Effingham Wilson.

CHAUCER unillustrated by pictures would have been a sad business; and Mr Clarke has too much good taste and gusto to have committed so cold-hearted a blunder. So here we have the 'Canterbury Pilgrims,' and their various imaginings shadowed forth in goodly figures by the pleasant hand of Mr Samuel Williams, who handles his wooden blocks with all the love and pride, and skilful practice, as if he were born of a hamadryad, and felt in every grain of the box-wood. A vile scratchiness deforms the neatness of most of the finer wood-cuts now-a-days, which makes us sometimes doubt their superiority over the blunt, rude, heavy-stroked, hard-lined, black-shadowed cuts of old. Freedom from either defect is very rare; but Mr Williams may truly boast, that no cuts of the day are clearer and neater than his, while they have all the vigor and freedom of the old style, with more depth and richness of tone than belongs to either. Mr Williams's defects are, a certain mannerism in the drawing,—a sort of extra-flow of line in the limbs,—occasionally a degree of stiffness in the attitudes, and too great a neglect of the expression in the faces; for even in designs as small as his, the expression may be conveyed—though by the slightest touch. Of the pleasing effect, however, that may be produced in wood, Mr Williams's designs in the 'Chaucer,' and the numbers of the 'Parterre,' are excellent specimens; he is less lavish of his lines, more varied in his shadows, his handling is simpler, and he produces a picture in better keeping than we often meet with among engravings of the kind. We have never seen a better bit of colour in wood than the black horse upon which Troilus is riding, nor a better effect of perspective than in the figures in the procession of the Pilgrims.

We must not omit to mention in fit terms of praise a very excellent engraving, by Scriven, at the beginning of the 'Canterbury Pilgrims,' of the traditional portrait of Chaucer.

MUSIC.

The Musical Library. No. X. Charles Knight.

THERE is too great a portion of this month's part devoted to that prosaic style of music which has delighted our forefathers of the glee order. The pieces, however, are good of their kind; there is the after dinner duet, 'Could a Man be Secure,' the pretty glee, 'Adieu to the Village Delights,' and a good madrigal, by Giacomo Gastoldi: we cannot, however, perceive any point of connection between the solid, heavy style of the madrigal, and the airy vivacity of Suckling's words; it reminds us of the organist, who scandalised his rector by playing the people out of church to the tune of 'Cherry Ripe.' Haydn's canonet, 'The Wanderer,' is inferior to his others. The bolero, by Piantanida, with a melody for the voice, is a charming, playful bit of frolic, gay and light-hearted; it might be danced and sung by the tutelar fairy of a jessamine bower; we particularly like the pertinacious little runs backwards and forwards on the words 'Candore' and 'Fiore.' The air, by Gluck, 'Non vi Turbate no,' is worthy of its beautiful and heroic subject; it is sung by Alceste, and expresses her happiness in being allowed to die or her husband.

There is a Flower, a Ballad. By W. Bayley. Cooper. Aldridge.

Nor strikingly original, but pleasing, and not difficult. We could have wished that Mr Bayley had been more sparing of his turns; an ornament that cannot be too sparingly used, which ballad-singers seldom require prompting to introduce, from its ease. It is apt to become vulgar in the mouths of ordinary singers.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

IN consequence of our new-year's arrangements, of the increase of original matter, and of the re-publication of Mr Hazlitt's Shakspeare criticisms (now out of print), various estimable Correspondents are requested to pardon us if we are compelled to delay the appearance of promised communications, perhaps, ultimately, to omit some of them. We do it with great unwillingness, and would fain, if we could, publish some extra sheets, on purpose to gratify both them and ourselves: but we mentioned the other day that we foresaw we should have difficulties in doing as we wished in this respect; and obstacles crowd upon us. In future we shall take care how we make promises which it pains us not to keep,—far more, we trust, than those to whom they are made.

Certain of our friends will feel, on various accounts, what exceptions are necessarily to be made in the above announcement,—J. W. D. for one (if he is the same who writes to us about Lord Bacon). His verses were put away in some such very safe place that we cannot find them after long search, and must beg another copy,—which we reckon upon, for reasons which will be obvious to his delicacy. Respecting Bacon, he will see what we have felt ourselves obliged to say in our 'Week,' heartily agreeing, as we do—for the most part, with his letter, and hoping to do what he desires.

The signature to the Sonnet, published in our last week's Journal, should have been E. W., and not E. H.

Our cordial Correspondent, ONE OF THE MILLION, is at liberty to keep the book he speaks of, till he and his friends have quite done with it,—to the year's end, if they please. We owe this to others, being great keepers of books ourselves, as some other Correspondents have too much reason to know: but the volumes are safe with us, as they shall see.

By a mistake, the Supplements were omitted in the index or list of Contents to our first year's volume. The omission will be supplied at the end of the second.

ICE,—WITH POETS UPON IT.

It is related of an Emperor of Morocco, that some unfortunate traveller having thought to get into his good graces by telling him of the wonders of other countries, and exciting, as he proceeded, more and more incredulity in the imperial mind, finished, as he imagined, his delightful climax of novelties, by telling him, that in his native land, at certain seasons of the year, people could walk and run upon the water; upon which such indignation seized his majesty, that, exclaiming, "Such a liar as this is not fit to live!" he whipped off the poor man's head with his scymitar.

It is a pity that some half dozen captives had not been present, from other northern regions, to give the monarch's perplexity a more salutary turn, by testifying to similar phenomena; as, how you drove your chariot over the water,—how lumps of water came rolling down-hill like rocks; and how you chopped, not only your stone-hard meat, but your stone-hard drink,—holding a pound of water between pincers, and pelting a fellow with a gill of brandy instead of a stone. For such things are in Russia and Tartary; where, furthermore, a man shall have half a yard of water for his beard; throw a liquid up in the air, and catch it a substance; and be employed in building houses made of water, for empresses to sit in and take supper. Catherine the Second had one.

"It was a miracle of rare device,

A sunny pleasure-dome with caves of ice;"

thus realizing Mr Coleridge's poetical description of the palace of Kubla Khan.

Many a natural phenomenon is as poetical as this, and adjusts itself into as imaginative shapes and lights. Fancy the meeting an island-mountain of green or blue ice, in a sunny sea, moving southwards, and shedding fountains from its sparkling sides! The poet has described the ice-ice,

"Quietly shining to the quiet moon:"

But the ice-ice (so to speak) described itself first to the poet. Water, when it begins to freeze, makes crystals of itself; the snow is all stars or feathers, or takes the shape of flowers upon your window; and the extreme of solemn grandeur as well as of fairy elegance is to be found in the operations of frost. In Switzerland gulfs of petrified billows are formed in whole vallies by the descent of ice from the mountains, its alternate thawing and freezing, and the ministry of the wind. You stand upon a crag, and see before you wastes of icy solitude, looking like an ocean heaven-struck in the midst of its fury, and fixed for ever. Not another sight is to be seen, but the ghastly white mountains that surround it;—not a sound to be heard, but of under-currents of water breaking away, or the thunders of falling ice-crags, or, perhaps, the scream of an eagle. 'Tis as if you saw the world before heat moved it,—the rough materials of the masonry of creation.

"Far, far above, piercing the infinite sky,
Mont Blanc appears, still, snowy, and serene—
Its subject-mountains their unearthly forms
Pile round it, ice and rock; broad vales between
Of frozen floods, unfathomable deeps,
Blue as the overhanging heav'n, that spread
And wind among the accumulated steeps;
A desert, peopled by the storms, alone."

SHELLEY.

On the other hand, what is more prettily beautiful than the snow above mentioned, or the hoar-frost upon the boughs of a tree, like the locks of Spenser's old man,

("As hoary frost with spangles doth attire
The mossy branches of an oak half dead,") or the spectacle (in the verses quoted below) of a Northern garden,

"Where through the ice the crimson berries glow."

Our winters of late have been very mild; and most desirable is it, for the poor's sake, that they should continue so, if the physical good of the creation will allow it. But when frost and ice come, we must make the best of them; and Nature, in her apparently severest operations, never works without some visible mixture of good, as well as a great deal of beauty (itself a good). Cold weather counteracts worse evils: the very petrification of the water furnishes a new ground for sport and pastime. Then in every street the little boys find a gliding pleasure, and the sheet of ice in the pond or river spreads a joyous floor for skaters. We touched upon this the other day in a "Now;" but now we have the satisfaction of being able to quote some fine verses of Mr Wordsworth's on the subject, which we happened not to have by us at the moment. They are taken from a new edition of Mr Hine's judicious and valuable 'Selections' from that fine poet, just published by Mr Moxon. They are the more interesting, inasmuch as they show Mr Wordsworth to be a skater himself,—no mean reason for his being able to write so vigorously.

"SKATING."

—In the frosty season, when the sun
Was set, and, visible for many a mile,
The cottage windows through the twilight blazed,
I heeded not the summons:—happy time
It was indeed for all of us; for me
It was a time of rapture!—clear and loud
The village clock toll'd six—I wheel'd about,
Proud and exulting like an untired horse,
That cares not for his home.—All shod with steel,

We hiss'd along the polish'd ice in games
Confederate, imitative of the chase
And woodland pleasures,—the resounding horn,
The pack loud bellowing, and the hunted hare.
So through the darkness and the cold we flew,
And not a voice was idle; with the din

Meanwhile the precipices rang aloud.
The leafless trees and every icy crag
Tinkled like iron, while the distant hills
Into the tumult sent an alien sound
Of melancholy, not unnoticed, while the stars
Eastward were sparkling clear, and in the West
The orange sky of evening died away.
Not seldom from the uproar I retired
Into a silent bay,—or sportively Glanced sideways, leaving the tumultuous through

To cut across the reflex of a star,
Image, that, flying still before me, gleam'd
Upon the glassy plain; and oftentimes,
When we had given our bodies to the wind,
And all the shadowy banks on either side
Came sweeping through the darkness, spinning still

The rapid line of motion, then at once
Have I, reclining back upon my heels,
Stopp'd short; yet still the solitary cliffs
Wheel'd by me—even as if the earth had roll'd
With visible motion her diurnal round!
Behind me did they stretch in solemn train,
Feebler and feebler, and I stood and watch'd
Till all was tranquil as a summer sea."

Better for great poets to write in this manner, and show Nature's kindness in the midst of what might seem otherwise, than to do as Dante and Milton have done, and add the tortures of frost and ice to the horrors of superstition. Be never their names, however, mentioned without reverence. The progress of things may have required at their hands what we can smile at now as a harmless terror of poetry. With what fine solid lines Milton always "builds" his verse:—

Beyond this flood * a frozen continent
Lies dark and wild, beat with perpetual storms
Of whirlwind and dire hail, which on firm land
Thaws not, but gathers heap, and ruin seems
Of ancient pile, or else deep snow and ice,
A gulf profound, as that Serbonian bog
Betwixt Damietta and Mount Casius old,
Where armies whole have sunk.† The parching air
Burns froze, and cold performs the effect of fire.
Thither, by happy-footed furies hal'd,
At certain revolutions, all the damned
Are brought, and feel by turns the bitter change
Of fierce extremes, extremes by change more fierce
From beds of raging fire, to starve in ice.
Their soft ethereal warmth, and there to pine
Immoveable, infixed, and frozen round,
Periods of time, thence hurried back to fire.‡

* The river of Oblivion.

† "Serbonis" says Hume (not the Historian, but the commentator on Milton), "was a lake of 200 furlongs in length and 1000 in compass, between the ancient mountain Casius and Damietta, a city of Egypt, on one of the more eastern mouths of the Nile. It was surrounded on all sides by hills of loose sand, which, carried into the water by high winds, so thickened the lake, as not to be distinguished from part of the continent, where whole armies have been swallowed up. Read 'Herodotus,' lib. iii., and 'Lucan's Pharsalia,' viii. 539, &c. Todd's edition of 'Milton,' vol. ii. p. 47.

‡ We add another note or two from Mr Todd's 'Milton,' to show what pleasant reading there is in these Variorum

We will take the taste of the bitter-cold barbarity of this passage out of the reader's heart by plunging him into the "warm South," with its good-natured sunshine, where, when he has basked enough in some noon of heat, vine-leaves, and brown laughing faces, so as to make the idea of cold pleasant to him again, and his eye turn wistfully to those snow-topped mountains yonder, cooling the blue burning air, let him refresh his wine with the Bacchus of the Italian poet Redi:—

ICE NECESSARY TO WINE.

Col topazio pigiato in Lamporecchio,
Ch' è famoso Castel per qual Masetto,
A' inghirlandar le tazze or m' apparecchio,
Purchè gelato sia, e sia puretto,
Gelato, quale alla stagione del' gielo
Il più freddo Aquilon fischia pel cielo.
Cantimette, e cantimpre
Scieno in pronto a tutte l' ore
Con forbite bombolette
Ch' esse e strette tra le brime
Delle nevi cristalline.
Son le nevi il quinto elemento
Che compongono il vero bevere:
Ben è folle chi spera ricevere
Senza nevi nel bere un contento:
Venga pur la Vallombrosa
Neve a jess;
Venga pur la ogni bisocca
Neve in chiocca;
E voi, Satiri, lasciate
Tante frottole, e tanti riboboli,
E del ghiaccio mi portate
Della grotta del Monte di Boboli.
Con alti picchi
Dè mazzapicchi
Dirimpetelo, Sgretolatelò, Infraagnetelo,
Stritolatelò,
Finchè tutto si possa risolvere
In minuta freddissima polvere,
Che mi renda il ber più fresco
Per rinfresco del palato,
Or ch' io son mortocostato.

Bacco in Toscana.

You know Lamporecchio, the castle renowned
For the gardener so dumb, whose works did abound;

There's a topaz they make there; pray let it go round.

! Serve, serve me a dozen, editions, and to recommend them to more general attention. A great poet cannot be too thoroughly studied:—

"This circumstance of the damned suffering the extremes of heat and cold by turns, seems to be founded upon Job xiv, 10, not as it is in the English translation, but in the vulgar Latin version, which Milton often used, 'Ad nimium calorem transiunt ab aqua nivium'; Let him pass to excessive heat from waters of snow." And so Jerome and other commentators understand it. The same punishments after death are mentioned by Shakspeare, 'Measure for Measure,' act iii. sc. i.—

—'and the delighted spirit
To bathe in fiery floods, or to reside
In thrilling regions of thick-ribbed ice.'"

—BISHOP NEWTON.

"This circumstance of the damned's feeling the fierce extremes is also in Dante, 'Inferno,' c. iii. 86.

'I vegno per menarvi all'altra riva
Nelle tenebre eterne, in cable e'n' gielo.'
(I come to lead thee to the other shore
Of the eternal glooms, through heat and ice.)

See also the 'Purgatorio,' c. iii. 31. So, in 'Songs and Sonnets,' by Lord Surrey, and others, 1567, fol. 63,—

'The soules that lacked grace,
Which lie in bitter pain,
Are not in such a place
As foolish folk do fayne:
Tormented all with fire,
And boyle in lead again—
Then cast in frozen pits
To freeze there certain hours.'

And in 'Heywood's Hierarchie of Angels,' 1635, p. 245:—

'And suffer as they sinned, in wrath, in paines
Of frosts, of fires, of furies, whips, and chains.'

In the preceding quotation from 'Surrey's Songs and Sonnets,' there is evidently a sneer at the monks, from whose legendary hell, according to Mr Wharton, the punishment by cold derives its origin.—TODD.

But let it be frozen;

Let it be frozen and finished with ice,
And see that the ice be as virginly nice,
As the colden that whistles from wintry skies.
Coolers and cellarets, crystal with snow,
Should always hold bottles in ready repose.
Snow is good liquor's fifth element;
No compound without it can give content:
For weak is the brain, and I hereby scout it,
That thinks in hot weather to drink without it.
Bring me heaps from the Shady Valley,*:
Bring me heaps
Of all that sleeps
On every village hill and alley.
Hold there, you satyrs,
Your beard-shaking chatters,
And bring me ice duly, and bring it me doubly,
Out of the grotto of Monte di Boboli.
With axes and pickaxes,
Hammers and rammers,
Thump it and hit it me,
Crack it and crash it me,
Hew it and split it me,
Found it and smash it me,
Till the whole mass (for I'm dead-dry, I think)
Turns to a cold, fit to freshen my drink.

Bacchus in Tuscany.

Ice is such a luxury in the South of Europe, and has become also such a necessity, that in some places a dearth of it is considered the next thing to a want of bread. To preach tortures of ice at Naples, would be the counterpart of the mistake of the worthy missionary, who was warned how he said too much of the reverse kind of punishment to the Laplanders. Dante was a native of Florence, where they have winters hard enough; and where, by the way, during its delightful summers, we have eaten, for a few pence, ice-cream enough to fill three of our silver-coasting glasses in England. They bring it you in goblets. The most refreshing beverage we ever drank, was a Florentine lemonade, made with fresh lemons (off the tree), sweetened with capillaire, and floating with ice.

But, if it were not for our subject, we ought to keep these summer reminiscences for next August. We conclude with a proper winter picture, painted by one who has been thought (and is, compared with great ones) a very small poet, (Ambrose Phillips), but who had a vein of truth in all he wrote, which would have obtained him more esteem in an age of poets, than it did in an age of wits. Good-natured Steele, however, discerned his merits; and the poem before us, which Steele inserted in the 'Tatler,' was admired by them all. It was too new in its localities, and too evidently drawn from nature, not to please them; and was, furthermore, addressed to, and patronized by a wit—the Earl of Dorset.

A NORTHERN WINTER.

Copenhagen, March 9, 1766.

From frozen climes, and endless tracks of snow,
From streams that northern winds forbid to flow,
What present shall the Muse to Dorset bring.
Or how so near the Pole attempt to sing?
The hoary winter here conceals from sight
All pleasing objects that to verse invite.
The hills and dales, and the delightful woods,
The flow'ry plains, and silver-streaming floods,
By snow disguised, in bright confusion lie,
And with one dazzling waste fatigue the eye.

No gentle breathing breeze prepares the spring,
Nor birds within the desert region sing.
The ships unmov'd the boisterous winds defy
While rattling chariots o'er the ocean fly.
The vast Leviathan wants room to play,
And spout his waters in the face of day,
The starving wolves along the main sea prow,
And to the moon in icy vallies howl.
For many a shining league, the level main
Here spreads itself into a glassy plain:

* Vallombrosa, which an Englishman may call Milton's Vallombrosa. The convent is as old as the time of Ariosto, who celebrates the monks for their hospitality.

These solid billows of enormous size,
Alps of green ice, in wild disorder rise.

And yet, but lately have I seen, ev'n here,
The winter in a lovely dress appear.
Ere yet the clouds let fall the measur'd snow,
Or winds began through hazy skies to blow,
At evening a keen eastern breeze arose;
And the descending rain unsully'd froze.
Soon as the silent shades of night withdrew,
The ruddy morn disclos'd at once to view
The face of nature in a rich disguise,
And brighten'd every object to my eyes:
For every shrub, and every blade of grass,
And every pointed thorn seemed wrought in glass.
In pearls and rubies rich the hawthorns show,
While through the ice the crimson berries glow.
The thick-sprung reeds the watery marshes yield
Seem polish'd lances in a hostile field.
The stag in limpid currents, with surprise,
Sees crystal branches on his forehead rise.
The spreading oak, the beech, and towering pine,
Glass'd o'er, in the freezing ether shine.
The frighted birds the rattling branches shun,
That wave and glitter in the distant sun.
When, if a sudden gust of wind arise,
The brittle forest into atoms flies:
The crackling wood beneath the tempest bends,
And in a spangled shower the prospect ends;
Or, if a southern gale the region warm,
And by degrees unbind the wintry charm,
The traveller a miry country sees,
And journeys sad beneath the dropping trees.
Like some deluded peasant Merlin leads
Thro' fragrant bowers, and thro' delicious meads;
While here enchanted gardens to him rise,
And airy fabrics there attract his eyes,
His wandering feet the magic paths pursue;
And while he thinks the fair illusion true,
The trackless scenes disperse in fluid air,
And woods, and wilds, and thorny ways appear:
A tedious road the weary wretch returns,
And as he goes, the transient vision mourns.

CHARACTERS OF SHAKSPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

NO. III.—MACBETH.

(Concluded from last week.)

IN speaking of the character of Lady Macbeth, we ought not to pass over Mrs Siddons's manner of acting that part. We can conceive of nothing grander. It was something above nature. It seemed almost as if a being of a superior order had dropped from a higher sphere to awe the world with the majesty of her appearance. Power was seated on her brow, passion emanated from her breast as from a shrine; she was tragedy personified. In coming on in the sleeping-scene, her eyes were open, but their sense was shut. She was like a person bewildered and unconscious of what she did. Her lips moved involuntarily—all her gestures were involuntary and mechanical. She glided on and off the stage like an apparition. To have seen her in that character was an event in every one's life, not to be forgotten.

The dramatic beauty of the character of Duncan, which excites the respect and pity even of his murderers, has been often pointed out. It forms a picture of itself. An instance of the author's power of giving a striking effect to a common reflection, by the manner of introducing it, occurs in a speech of Duncan, complaining of his having been deceived in his opinion of the Thane of Cawdor, at the very moment that he is expressing the most unbounded confidence in the loyalty and services of Macbeth.

"There is no art
To find the mind's construction in the face:
He was a gentleman, on whom I built
An absolute trust.
O worthiest cousin, (addressing himself to Macbeth)
The sin of my ingratitude e'en now
Was great upon me," &c.

Another passage to shew that Shakspeare lost sight of nothing that could in any way give relief or heightening to his subject, is the conversation which takes place between Banquo and Fleance, immediately before the murder-scene of Duncan.

"Banquo. How goes the night, boy?

Fleance. The moon is down: I have not heard the clock.

Banquo. And she goes down at twelve.

Fleance. I take't, 'tis later, Sir.

Banquo. Hold, take my sword. There's husbandry in hear'n,

Their candles are all out.—

A heavy summons lies like lead upon me,
And yet I would not sleep: Merciful Powers,
Restrain in me the cursed thoughts that nature
Gives way to in repose."

In like manner, a fine idea is given of the gloomy coming on of evening, just as Banquo is going to be assassinated.

"Light thickens and the crow Makes wing to the rooky wood."

"Now spurn the lated traveller aspace
To gain the timely inn."

Macbeth (generally speaking) is done upon a stronger and more systematic principle of contrast than any other of Shakspeare's plays. It moves upon the verge of an abyss, and is a constant struggle between life and death. The action is desperate, and the re-action is dreadful. It is a huddling together of fierce extremes, a war of opposite natures, which of them shall destroy the other. There is nothing but what has a violent end or violent beginnings. The lights and shades are laid on with a determined hand; the transitions from triumph to despair, from the height of terror to the repose of death, are sudden and startling; every passion brings in its fellow-contrary, and the thoughts pitch and jostle against each other as in the dark. The whole play is an unruly chaos of strange and forbidden things, where the ground rocks under our feet. Shakspeare's genius here took its full swing, and trod upon the farthest bounds of nature and passion. This circumstance will account for the abruptness and violent antitheses of the style, the throes and labour which run through the expression, and from defects will turn them into beauties. "So fair and foul a day I have not seen," &c. "Such welcome and unwelcome news together." "Men's lives are like the flowers in their caps, dying or ere they sicken." "Look like the innocent flower, but be the serpent under it." The scene before the castle gate follows the appearance of the Witches on the heath, and is followed by a midnight murder; Duncan is cut off betimes by treason leagued with witchcraft; and Macduff is ripped untimely from his mother's womb to avenge his death. Macbeth, after the death of Banquo, wishes for his presence in extravagant terms, "To him and all we thirst," and, when his ghost appears, cries out, "Avaunt and quit my sight," and being gone, he is "himself again." Macbeth resolves to get rid of Macduff, that "he may sleep in spite of thunder;" and cheers his wife on the doubtful intelligence of Banquo's taking-off with the encouragement—"Then be thou jocund: ere the bat has flown his cloistered flight; ere to black Hecate's summons the shard-born beetle has rung night's yawning peal, there shall be done—a deed of dreadful note." In Lady Macbeth's speech, "Had he not resembled my father as he slept, I had done 't," there is murder and filial piety together, and in urging him to fulfil his vengeance against the defenceless king, her thoughts spare the blood neither of infants nor old age. The description of the Witches is full of the same contradictory principle; they "rejoice when good kings bleed," they are neither of the earth nor the air, but both; "they should be women, but their beards forbid it:" they take all the pains possible to lead Macbeth on to the height of his ambition, only to betray him in deeper consequence, and after showing him all the pomp of his art, discover their malignant delight in his disappointed hopes, by that bitter taunt, "Why stands Macbeth thus amazedly?" We might multiply such instances everywhere.

The leading features in the character of Macbeth are striking enough, and they form what may be thought at first only a bold, rude, Gothic outline. By comparing it with other characters of the same author, we shall perceive the absolute truth and identity which is observed in the midst of the giddy whirl and rapid career of events. Macbeth in Shakspeare no more loses his identity of character in the fluctuations of fortune or the storm of passion, than Macbeth in himself would have lost the identity of his person. Thus he is as distinct a being from Richard III as it is possible to imagine, though these two characters in common hands, and indeed in the hands of any other poet, would have been a repetition of the same general idea, more or less exaggerated. For both are tyrants, usurpers, murderers, both aspiring and ambitious, both courageous, cruel, treacherous. But Richard is cruel from nature and constitution. Macbeth becomes so from accidental circumstances. Richard is from his birth deformed in body and mind, and naturally incapable of good. Macbeth is full of "the milk of human kindness," is frank, sociable, generous. He is tempted to the commission of guilt by golden opportunities, by the instigations of his wife, and by prophetic warnings. Fate and metaphysical aid conspire against his virtue and his loyalty. Richard, on the contrary, needs no prompter, but wades through a series of crimes to the height of his ambition from the ungovernable violence of his temper and a reckless love of mischief. He is never gay but in the prospect or in the success of his villainies: Macbeth is full of horror at the thoughts of the murder of Duncan, which he is with difficulty prevailed on to commit, and of remorse after its perpetration. Richard has no mixture of common humanity in his composition, no regard to kindred or posterity, he owns no fellowship with others, he is "himself alone." Macbeth is not destitute of feelings of sympathy, is accessible to pity, is even made in some measure the dupe of his uxoriousness, ranks the loss of friends, of the cordial love of his followers, and of his good name, among the causes which have made him weary of life, and regrets that he has ever seized the crown by unjust means, since he cannot transmit it to his posterity—

"For Banquo's issue have I 'fil'd my mind—
For them the gracious Duncan have I murder'd
To make them kings, the seed of Banquo kings."

In the agitation of his thoughts, he envies those whom he has sent to peace. "Duncan is in his grave; after life's fitful fever he sleeps well."—It is true, he becomes more callous as he plunges deeper in guilt, "direness is thus rendered familiar to his slaughterous thoughts," and he in the end anticipates his wife in the boldness and bloodiness of his enterprises, while she, for want of the same stimulus of action, is "troubled with thick-coming fancies that rob her of her rest," goes mad and dies. Macbeth endeavours to escape from reflection on his crimes by repelling their consequences, and banishes remorse for the past by the meditation of future mischief. This is not the principle of Richard's cruelty, which resembles the wanton malice of a fiend as much as the frailty of human passion. Macbeth is goaded on to acts of violence and retaliation by necessity; to Richard, blood is a pastime.—There are other decisive differences inherent in the two characters. Richard may be regarded as a man of the world, a plotting, hardened knave, wholly regardless of everything but his own ends, and the means to secure them—Not so Macbeth.—The superstitions of the age, the rude state of society, the local scenery and customs, all give a wildness and imaginary grandeur to his character. From the strangeness of the events that surround him, he is full of amazement and fear; and stands in doubt between the world of reality and the world of fancy. He sees sights not shown to mortal eye, and hears unearthly music. All is tumult and disorder within and without his mind; his purposes recoil upon himself, are broken and disjointed; he is the double thrall of his passions and his evil destiny. Richard is not a character either of imagination or pathos, but of pure self-will. There is no conflict of opposite feelings in his breast. The apparitions which he sees only haunt him in his sleep; nor does he live like Macbeth in a waking dream. Macbeth has considerable energy and manliness of character; but then he is "subject to all the skyey influences." He is sure of nothing but the present moment. Richard in the busy turbulence of his projects never loses his self-possession, and makes use of every circumstance that happens as an instrument of his long-reaching designs. In his last extremity can we only regard him as a wild beast taken in the toils: we never intirely lose our concerns for Macbeth; and he calls back all our sympathy by that fine close of thoughtful melancholy,

"My way of life is fallen into the sear,
The yellow leaf; and that which should accompany old age,
As honour, troops of friends, I must not look to have;
But in their stead, curses not loud but deep,
Mouth-honour, breath, which the poor heart
Would fain deny, and dare not."

We can conceive a common actor to play Richard tolerably well; we can conceive no one to play Macbeth properly, or to look like a man that had encountered the Weird Sisters. All the actors that we have ever seen, appear as if they had encountered them on the boards of Covent Garden or Drury Lane, but not on the heath at Forres, and as if they did not believe what they had seen. The Witches of Macbeth indeed are ridiculous on the modern stage, and we doubt if the Furies of Æschylus would be more respected. The progress of manners and knowledge has an influence on the stage, and will in time perhaps destroy both tragedy and comedy. Filch's picking pockets in the Beggars' Opera is not so good a jest as it used to be: by the force of the police and of philosophy, Lillo's murders and the ghosts in Shakspeare will become obsolete. At last, there will be nothing left, good nor bad, to be desired or dreaded, on the theatre or in real life. A question has been started with respect to the originality of Shakspeare's Witches, which has been well answered by Mr Lamb in his notes to the 'Specimens of Early Dramatic Poetry.'

"Though some resemblance may be traced between the charms in Macbeth, and the incantations in this play (the Witch of Middleton), which is supposed to have preceded it, this coincidence will not detract much from the originality of Shakspeare. His Witches are distinguished from the Witches of Middleton by essential differences. These are creatures to whom man or woman, plotting some dire mischief, might resort for occasional consultation. Those originate deeds of blood, and begin bad impulses to men. From the moment that their eyes first meet with Macbeth's he is spell-bound. That meeting sways his destiny. He can never break the fascination. These Witches can hurt the body; those have power over the soul.—Hecate in Middleton has a son, a low buffoon: the hags of Shakspeare have neither child of their own, nor seem to be descended from any parent. They are foul anomalies, of whom we know not whence they are sprang, nor whether they have beginning or ending. As they are without human passions, so they seem to be without human relations. They come with thunder and lightning, and vanish to airy music. This is all we know of them.—Except Hecate, they have no names, which heightens their mysteriousness. The names, and some of the properties which Middleton has given to his hags, excite smiles. The Weird Sisters are serious things. Their presence cannot co-exist with mirth. But, in a lesser degree, the Witches of Middleton are fine creations. Their power too is, in some measure, over the mind. They raise jars, jealousies, strifes, like a thick scurf o'er life."

THE WEEK.

Our present week is as barren of birth-days, as the last was otherwise. The date assigned to that of Ben Jonson in some of the 'Almanacs,' is a mistake. He was born, not on the 31st of January, but on the 11th of June. So say, at least, all the lives of him that we are acquainted with; some of them adding, that he has said so himself; though we cannot find where. Have the 'Almanacs' got any intelligence later than Chalmers?

As severe weather is to be expected about this time (if we are to have any at all), we take the opportunity of inserting the following pleasant verses which have been sent us by a Reader, and which we like for many reasons: first, because of their own merit; second, because of the Scottish dialect, which is an old favourite of ours, ever since we read 'Allan Ramsay' (we really believe that archness and good sense never go so well together in a song, as when it is written in Scotch); third, because of their seasonable and hearty logic; and fourth, because our Correspondent is candid enough to tell us they have been published before, though in a periodical not likely to have forestalled many of our English readers:—

A NEW POEM,

IN THE SCOTTISH TONGUE,

SHOWING HOW WINTER CALLED ON AN INHABITANT OF EDINBURGH, AND HOW THEY CONVERSED TOGETHER.

THE AUTHORS OF THE 'ODD VOLUME.

I.

Ae night as I sat in the gloaming,
Girning at wife and bairns gaen roaming, }
About the town;
The storm howled on wi' sic a din,
I thought the house and a' within,
Was coming down.

II.

The hail it rattled on the roof,
The blast came down the chimley mouth, }
Wi' hideous roar,
And, in its raving wild career,
Now here, now there, in front and rear,
Dang wide the door.

III.

"Oh! grously Winter! auld dour chiel,
At your dread coming naught I feel
But dool and fear;
Fell mower o' the human race,
I wish I might na see your face,
This hunder year!

IV.

"What brings you here, auld gousty carle,
Making our banes wi' aches to dirl,
Drawing our tears?
In sooth your reign we canna thole,
Sae flee away to your North Pole,
Amang your bears.

V.

"We hear there is an unco clatter,
Ye've frozen every pipe o' water,
A bonny pliakie;
And if we have na soon a thaw,
I would na wonder aye and a'
Would take to whiskey."

VI.

I daunered up to shut the door,
For louder still the storm did roar,
When back I staggered;
As help'd in by a rushing blast,
The open door-way quick he passed,
In Winter swaggered.

VII.

Frae his auld shouthers down did fa'
A mantle o' the driven sna',
Like swan-down tippet,
For perriwig he had a fog,
Set jauntily upon his nob,
And nicely clippet!

VIII.

Lang icicles hung frae his chin,
His een were bleared, his mouth fa'en in,
He looked fu' was;
His nose was red, his cheeks were blue,
His mottled legs o' every hue,
Were bare and blae.

IX.

"Gudeman," said he, "as I gaed past,
Your door was opened by a blast,
Ay gangs beside me,
And, oh! it gives me muckle pain,
To hear my subjects flout my reign,
And canna bide me.

X.

"Ye're just ane o' the senseless pack,
Misca's me sair behint my back,
Black be their fa'!
Sae I've, to vindicate my fame,
And clear frae spot my blemish'd name,
Gien you a ca'."

XI.

Thinks I, I maun the carle fleech,
For weel, gude certie, can he preach,
The cunning body;
Says I, "auld sir, just take a waff
O' that gude fire, we'll hae a laugh
Ower a drap toddy."

XII.

"Gudeman," said he, wi' tone sae snell,
"Think not with such as you I'll mell,
Or drain a tumbler,
Until I've shown baith far and wide,
That ye deserve a weel-pay'd hide,
Ye senseless grumbler.

XIII.

"Wi' friendly hand and tender care,
I send my storms to clear the air,
And raging flood;
To wisest purposes they tend,
And may you find that in the end,
They're for your good.

XIV.

"I mind, alas! the days of old,
When men were hardy, brave, and bold,
Nor feared my rigour,
Who would o' snaw their pillow make,
Nor ever think to grane or quake,
So strong their vigour

XV.

"But now, ye are a feeble race,
There's hardly ane can 'bide my face,
Though happ'd wi' claise;
Ye are unlike these men of might,
Whose arms were powerful in the fight.
Ay! these were days.

XVI.

"I mind me oft how blythe and sweet,
The leddies fear'd na me to meet
On causeway's crown;
Wi' wee made cloaks, and elbows bare,
Silk mittens on their arms sae fair,
And scrimpit gown.

XVII.

"But now the misses look sae gaucy,
As they sail by wi' air sae saucy,
Smoo'd to the nose;
Wi' boas, tippets, cloaks, and muffa,
Lang veils, and nicely crimpit ruffa,
And Shetland hose.

XVIII.

"Poets and lovers make a fraiss
About the Summer's golden days,
And sunny bowers;
And haver about buzzing bees,
And meadows green, and waving trees,
And blushing flowers.

XIX.

"But certie they would look gay queer,
Were Sol to rule through a' the year,
Their skins to roast;
They'd glad exchange their bees, and bowers,
Their shrubs, and plants, and fragrant flowers,
For clinking frost.

XX.

"Suppose, gudeman, I took the gee,
And no set foot ayont the sea,
Whare a' your joys?
Ay, whare would be your skating, curling,
Your sliding, snawba's, and your hurling,
And heartsome plays?

XXI.

"From Arthur's Seat, I oft did watch,
To see the merry curling match;
Aft at their dinners
I've seen the round of beef and greens
Encircled by a band of friends,
Losers and winners.

XXII.

"And whiles, upon the Calton Hill
I lang hae stood, and laughed my fill,
Till shook my shanks,
To see the school-boys at their plays,
And far ower scant my longest days
For a' their pranks."

XXIII.

Auld Winter, brimming wi' vexation,
Was here cut short in his narration,
For sic a din
Got up—a perfect hobbleshew,
For wife and weans, a merry crew,
Came thronging in.

XXIV.

Cauld Winter would nae langer sit.
"Certie," said he, "it's time to fit;
My loudest blast
Is naething to a woman's tongue."
And, saying this, awa' he flung,
And out he past.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

NO. LV.—A PRIVATE GENTLEMAN OBSTINATELY RESISTS BEING MADE A KING.

We take this narrative of one of Lucien Bonaparte's throne-refusing encounters with his brother, from the 'Memoirs of Madame d'Abrantes,' who said she had heard corresponding statements of it from two quarters, both in perfect accordance. That such passages, sometime or other, must have taken place between the brothers, is clear enough; and the core of the romance remains unquestionable,—viz. that Lucien did prefer his independence and his poetry to a crown,—with what judgment we have all seen by the event! His romance turned out to be the highest proof of his good sense. His world of books contained, after all, a larger and nobler world than Napoleon could hope to conquer; and there, among his treasures, he is found still ruling his magical domain of fancy and domestic peace, while the soldier is in his narrow grave.

"We were informed one morning that the Emperor had set out at four o'clock on a journey, the object and destination of which were alike impenetrable. Yet Italy was the only direction which he could have taken, and, in fact, the principal, though latent, motive of this journey was a reconciliation with Lucien. The Emperor was at length convinced, or rather he had never doubted, that, of all his brothers, Lucien alone could understand and act in concert with him. But Lucien was far from condescending, and the Emperor, who knew his character, was resolved himself to see and converse with him; the brothers consequently gave each other the meeting at Mantua.

Lucien arrived about nine at night in a travelling carriage with M. Boyer, cousin-german of his first wife, and the Count de Chatellon, a friend who resided with him.

'Do not put up; I shall probably return to night,' said Lucien, as he alighted to join his brother.

I have heard the particulars of this extraordinary interview from two quarters, both in perfect accordance.

Napoleon was walking in a long gallery with Prince Eugene, Murat, and Marshal Duroc. He advanced to meet his brother, and held out his hand with every appearance of cordiality. Lucien was affected. He had not seen the Emperor since the day of Austerlitz; and, far from being jealous of the resplendent blaze of his brother's glory, as it now passed before his mental vision, his noble heart heaved with tumultuous joy. For some moments he was incapable of speaking. At length having expressed to Napoleon his pleasure in this meeting, the Emperor made a signal, and the rest of the party withdrew.

'Well, Lucien,' said Napoleon; 'what are your projects? Will you at last go hand in hand with me?'

Lucien regarded him with astonishment, for inquiries about his projects addressed to him who never indulged in any, appeared most strange.

'I form no projects,' replied he at length. 'As for going hand in hand with your Majesty, what am I to understand by it?'

An immense map of Europe lay rolled up on a table before them; the Emperor seized it by one hand, and throwing it open with a graceful action, said to Lucien,—

'Choose any kingdom you please, and I pledge you my word, as a brother and an Emperor, to give it you, and to maintain you in it—for I now ride over the head of every king in Europe. Do you understand me?'

He stopped, and looked expressively at Lucien.

'Lucien, you may share with me that sway which I exercise over inferior minds; you have only to pursue the course that I shall open to you, for the establishment and maintenance of my system, the happiest and most magnificent ever conceived by man; but to insure its execution I must be seconded, and I can only be seconded by my own family: of all my brothers, only yourself and Joseph can efficiently serve me. Louis is an obstinate fool, and Jerome a mere child without capacity. My hopes, then, rest chiefly in you; will you realize them?'

'Before this explanation is carried further, I ought to advertise you,' said Lucien, 'that I am not changed; my principles are still the same as in 1799 and 1803. What I was on my curule chair on the 18th Brumaire, I am at this moment beside the Emperor Napoleon. Now, brother, it is for you to consider how you will proceed.'

'You talk absurdly,' said Napoleon, shrugging his shoulders. 'New times should give a new direction to the ideas. You have chosen a proper opportunity, truly, to come here and rave of your Utopian republic! You must embrace my system, I tell you; follow my path, and to-morrow I make you the chief of a great people. I acknowledge your wife as my sister. I crown her as well as you. I make you the greatest man in Europe next to myself, and I restore you my intire friendship, my brother;' added he, lowering the emphatic tone in which he had just uttered the preceding sentences, to that soft and caressing accent I have never heard but from his lips, and which makes the heart vibrate to its mellow and powerful chords. This man was altogether seducing. Lucien loved him,—he started as he listened, and grew pale.

'I do not sell myself,' said he, in an agitated voice. 'Hear me, my brother, listen to me; for this is an important hour to both of us. I will never be a prefect. If you give me a kingdom, I must rule it according to my own notions, and, above all, in conformity with its wants. The people whose chief I may be shall have no cause to execrate my name. They shall be happy and respected; not slaves, as the Tuscans and all the Italians are. You yourself cannot desire to find in your brother a pliant sycophant, who for a few soft words would sell you the blood of his children; for a people, after all, is but one large family, whose head will be held responsible by the King of Kings for the welfare of all its members.'

The Emperor frowned, and his whole aspect proclaimed extreme dissatisfaction.

'Why then, come to me?' said he at last, angrily; 'for if you are obstinate, so am I, and you know it; at least as obstinate as you can be. Humph! Republic! You are no more thinking of that than I am; and besides, what should you desire it for? You are like Joseph, who bethought himself the other day of writing me an inconceivable letter, coolly desiring I would allow him to enter upon kingly duties. Truly nothing more would be wanting than the re-establishment of the papal tribute.'

And shrugging his shoulders, he smiled contemptuously.

'And why not,' said Lucien, 'if it conduced to the national interests? It is an absurdity, I grant; but, if it was beneficial to Naples, Joseph would be quite right in insisting upon it.'

A variety of motions rapidly succeeded each other on Napoleon's countenance. He paced the gallery with a hurried step, repeating in an accent that evinced strong internal perturbation, 'Always the same! always the same!' Then turning suddenly to his brother, and stamping on the marble floor, he exclaimed with a thundering voice,—

'But once more, sir, why then did you come to meet me? Why these endless contentions? You ought to obey me as your father, the head of your family; and, by heavens, you shall do as I please.'

Lucien was now growing warm, and all the discretion he had summoned to his aid was beginning to evaporate.

'I am no subject of yours,' cried he, in his turn, 'and if you think to impose your iron yoke upon me, you are mistaken; never will I bow my head to it; and remember—hearken to my words, remember what I once told you at Malmaison.'

A long, alarming, almost sinister silence succeeded this burst of generous indignation. The two brothers faced each other, and were separated only by the table on which lay that Europe, the sport of Napoleon's insatuated ambition. He was very pale, his lips compressed, the almost livid complexion of his cheek revealing the tempest within, and his eyes darting glances of fury at Lucien, whose noble countenance must have shown to great advantage in this stormy interview, which was to decide his future fate; nor his alone, but perhaps that of Europe, for who shall conjecture what might have happened, had this really superior man been king of Spain, of Prussia, or of Poland. The Emperor was the first to break silence; he had mastered his passion, and addressed his brother with calmness:

'You will reflect on what I have told you, Lucien; night brings counsel. To-morrow I hope to find you more reasonable, as to the interests of Europe at least, if not your own. Good bye, and good night to you, my brother.'

He held out his hand. Lucien, whose heart was susceptible to every kindly impression, and whose reflections at that moment were of a nature powerfully to awaken them, took his brother's offered hand, and grasped it affectionately between both of his as he reiterated 'Good bye, and a good night to you, my brother—Adieu.'

'Till to-morrow!' said the Emperor.

Lucien shook his head, and would have spoken, but was unable; then opening the door, he rushed from the apartment, re-ascended the carriage, where his friends awaited him, and immediately quitted Mantua.

The brothers met no more till the hour of Napoleon's adversity.

The scene at Malmaison, to which Lucien alluded in this interview, took place shortly before the empire was proclaimed, when Napoleon's intentions were already known to his family, and disappointed in finding himself deceived in his calculations on making Lucien one of his powerful lieutenants, served to widen the breach which the latter's marriage had produced. Lucien who had hoped to see the happy days of the forum restored, and could now only look for those of Augustus, was vehement in his reproaches; accused the Emperor of being faithless to him, and of violating his word; in short, the discussion ended in an open quarrel.

'You are determined to destroy the republic?' said the enraged Lucien; 'well, assassinate her, then;—mount your throne over her murdered remains and those of her children—but mark well what one of those children predicts: This empire, which you are erecting by force, and will maintain by violence, will be overthrown by violence and force, and you yourself will be crushed, thus?' and seizing a screen from the mantel-piece, he crushed it impetuously in his hand, which trembled with rage. Then, as if still more distinctly to mark his resentment, he took out his watch dashed it on the ground, and stamped upon it with the heel of this boot: 'Yes—crushed ground to powder, thus.'

THE CAT BY THE FIRE, AND PICTURES IN ONE'S ROOM.

To the Editor of the London Journal.

MY DEAR MR EDITOR,—As a constant and delighted reader of the LONDON JOURNAL, I can no longer resist the inclination I have hitherto felt to assure you how eagerly expected, and feastingly perused by me, are the admirable leading articles of your Journal. Do not think I am insensible to the value of former and more erudite papers, when I declare your 'Cat by the Fire,' and 'Put up a Picture in your Room,' to be the two I love best. The former is a series of pictures itself—pictures of the best and dearest kind, of home, and English home-comforts and enjoyments. You will not lay aside your wonted kindness to laugh at me for an old Tabby myself, when I confess that my eyes grew dim while reading your portraits of Pussy, for my rug has not now "a cat to it"—my old favourite is dead: he was given to me when he was a kitten, and I a child as playful. Poor Tom! many a game of romps have we had together, and for many a meat-stealing, and pigeon-killing misdemeanour have I, by tears and entreaties, gained thy pardon! I and my cat were faithful companions for ten years; and now, "I could have better spared some nobler friend." If busily engaged in writing, and neglectful of Pussy's gentle hints for notice, he would leap on the table behind my desk, and sit, peeping over the lid, with a look of staid and important gravity worthy of Minerva's owl, until espying a tempting feathered pen among the writing apparatus, after a few preparatory nods and aim-taking, bounce came my unruly companion among my scattered MSS., and with curving paw and frisking tail sent discomfited literature to the right-about. My cat was a sagacious cat, a gentle, docile, affectionate cat, and the finest and handsomest cat in the parish. Oh! a thousand thanks for your 'Cat by the Fire!'

'Put up a Picture in your Room.' Now, my dear Mr Editor, if you could for one moment look into the "sanctum" of your present Correspondent, a glance would prove how perfectly we coincide in opinion on this head. Yet am I no rich picture-collector, with money at the command of every covetous feeling—no resident in an old Baronial mansion, with dozens of courtier-ancestors looking out of their carved frames and elaborate big wigs. No; I am a poor, literature-loving artist, "in a small way," whose (almost) only inducement to the profitable exercise of her own pencil, is the desire to possess transcripts of the glorious works of greater ones; and, in some instances, my own small proficiency has served me, when an opportunity offered, of copying in miniature a picture which pleased or interested me. Yet to your admirable remarks on the utility and luxury of "putting up pictures in one's room," do I owe much of the gratification my little studio now yields me. Being a great admirer of the beauty and grace of Lawrence's heads (though my present estimate of him as a great painter falls short of what it was), I have many of his fair creations around me; but, for the most part, they fail of exciting thoughts or feelings beyond themselves, and therefore have little interest for "this present writing." I made a copy of a lovely portrait of Henrietta-Maria, Queen of Charles the First, from the original by Lely. This recalls an eventful era of our history; and as I seldom find myself the worse for such contemplations, I see the advantage of having pictures in my room. Donna Maria of Portugal, after Lawrence, occupies a place corresponding to the fair Henrietta, and as representing the present, may also serve as a useful memorandum. Were I to touch upon politics, "I could a tale unfold" of my triumphant return home one evening lately, with an engraving of "The Durham" in my muff, which, in a few minutes after, accused by a frame of English heart of oak, was placed above a bas-relief of Napoleon on horseback, the gift of a near and valued friend. If I would be ideally delighted, I turn, and gaze on Hamlet—Lawrence's Kemble-Hamlet—and, "Alas, poor Yorick!" with all of that superb scene echoes in my ears; and with a graver tone, and thoughtful brow, I exclaim—"To this complexion we must come at last!" Shakespeare again—but how different! I love the wild poetic imaginings of the eccentric Fuseli, and here, in his 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' I have his Titania and Bottom, surrounded by a host of merry elves frisking and frolicking and whirling about. Oh "tis a mad sight!" (Did not somebody say this of a cat and valerian?)

Now, over my chiffonier (a pretty name enough for a moveable mahogany cupboard), is an oval frame, divers times regit and "done up" since first tenanted by its now faded occupant, a group of flowers, worked in coloured silks on white satin—the production of my good mamma, when the paragon of little sempstresses at school. What a series of reflections awake here! The schoolmaster had not then gone abroad (nor was he often found at home). The young ladies of that day had no LONDON JOURNALS—no 'Penny Magazines'—no 'Lectures on Education,'—though many for cookery and curtsying,—and often has my good mother related to me how, when only seven years old, she walked the minuet de la cour with her dancing-master at the annual ball, dressed in a frock covered with her own embroidery. Alas! for the young eyes of that day! But I am almost forgetting my largest picture, and, indeed, the only painting in oil I now possess,—the old family picture of my mamma, a pretty demure-looking damsel of eight, drawing a child's carriage, with one little brother in it, and another pushing behind. The painting is good, and as a memorandum of costume alone it is interesting—but I remember so many oft-told tales of the time when this mighty work was done, that I reverence my old picture. But to enumerate all the inhabitants of my study would occupy a small volume. I count about forty pictures, many in handsome frames, some in plain frames, and a few without frames at all. Flowers, painted from nature by myself, recall the blue skies and bright days of summer, when the bees and butterflies came in at the open window, and, caressingly touching my fair models, seemed to approve the selection I had made. A copy in Indian ink of a beautiful moonlight sea-piece, (from an expensive mezzotint plate,) serves as a slight memory of my favourite scene;

"The restless, vast, illimitable sea."

(Now am I not a famous disciple of your school?) But I have as yet no landscape; and it is my favourite subject in painting, but my own original efforts in that line do not go beyond a sketch of scenes I visit, though I succeed tolerably in etching them afterwards. I contemplate the acquisition of the two superb landscapes just published after Constable—are they not beautiful? And though most humble in the scale of art, yet, to affection, how precious are the resemblances I have succeeded in gaining of friends—some now far, far away—and some, at rest!

Then my sanctum is crammed with clericalia of all kinds—casts, stuffed birds and shells, gifts from distant alms, and a modestly-stocked bookcase, containing one treasure worth all the rest—a genuine copy of the first folio Shakespeare, untainted by Malone or his villainous whitewash.

Now, dear Mr Editor, are you satisfied that the writer of this rambling, gossiping "long yarn," is a fit and proper reader of the LONDON JOURNAL? In anxious expectation and reliance on the fulfilment of your promise anent being extremely brilliant and entertaining next year, with all the good old English wishing of this festive season, believe me,

Dear Mr Editor,

Your congenial and constant Reader,

LAURA LATIMER.

EDUCATION OF THE MIDDLE CLASSES.

[Conclusion of the Second Chapter of Mr Simpson's 'Necessity of Popular Education as a National Object.']

CONTENTS:—FALSE MORALITY OF CLASSICS—BARBARISM OF THE ANCIENTS—SCIENTIFIC STUDIES—SCIENCE OF MAN, PHYSIOLOGICAL, MENTAL, AND MORAL, A BLANK IN EDUCATION.

BUT this is not all that may be said on the head of the morality of the classics; there is another view of this topic deeply affecting the weal of society. Morality is placed by the classical authors upon a false and anything but a Christian basis; and yet they are most strenuously advocated by the clergy, especially in England, as the most appropriate discipline for the youthful mind. This is evidently the result of the habit of not inquiring into the nature and consistency of long-established customs. As part of an education professedly Christian, admiration of the ancient heathens is worked up almost to idolatry in the student: their natural selfishness and injustice, called patriotism, are positively recommended as the noblest objects of imitation; the history of their murderous aggressive wars, rapine, and martial glory, is listened to with delight, and made in mimic essay, the pastime of the play-ground of every grammar-school; the sensuality and profligacy that defiles, sometimes with nameless abomination, the pages of the satirical and other poets, which, countenanced for a moment, would meet with and merit stoning by the populace, nay the immoralities of the mythological pantheon itself, as a subject of study in a Christian country, have all, as stated exercises for our youth, afforded matter of amazement to those who perceive moral distinctions, and are accustomed to observe and think consistently. A different standard of morals, another rule of right and wrong, seems by habit to be applied to those privileged tribes of the ancient world, than is acknowledged, theoretically at least, in regard to the modern; so that sensuality, selfishness, injustice, rapacity, cruelty, and crime, are, in the first, not only passed over as of a different specific gravity from what they count for now-a-days, but are pressed upon the opening faculties as the constituents of moral grandeur and practical virtue! This essential barbarism recoils dreadfully on society: Christianity itself is overborne by a spurious morality imbibed from the ancient authors, and society continues selfish, sensual, and belligerent. It is high time that truth were looked in the face, and the world disabused of this superstition, which has too long survived the popish; when a higher moral education shall have taken the bandage from our eyes, it will cease to raise a shout of wonder and scorn to predicate that, morally viewed, the Greeks and Romans were barbarians from the first to the last hour of their history, and that in their own barbarism they were finally extinguished. It will tend to reconcile the reader to this apparently bold thesis, if it should chance to be new to him, to distinguish between the admitted civilisation, and the essential barbarism of the ancients. These communities passed through many stages of social progress. The human intellect never developed itself more brilliantly. In no age or nation have men of more splendid talents appeared—more gifted statesmen, more lofty orators, more graphic historians, more ingenious philosophers, more consummate generals, more able lawyers, more sublime poets, more exquisite artists, and, considering the state of physical science, more skillful mechanicians. Their cities were models of architectural grace and symmetry; their ways and aqueducts were stupendous; their temples, their theatres, their palaces, have no parallels in modern times. Elegance and luxury were carried to their very acmé among them. The Roman armies were the most tremendous engines of human power ever produced by human combination. The description given by Josephus, of the army which invaded Judea and destroyed Jerusalem, impresses us with the idea of the art-military improved to its ne plus ultra in discipline, tactics, promptitude, and co-operation, as if it had been one complicated, yet simply and irresistibly acting machine of iron and steel. We are accustomed to associate all that is graceful with Greece, and all that is powerful with Rome; we were early told that the world was refined by the one, and prostrated by the other; we were trained from boyhood almost to worship their books, and the very languages in which they are written; we are familiar with venerable institutions and vast endowments in our own island, for the study of these languages alone, while Greek and Roman wisdom, valour, patriotism, and virtue, have been to us as household words. It is time for us to try all this by another standard, and one which, had we been educated on right principles, we would have applied long ago. The barbarism of the ancients may be summed up in a word,—CHRISTIAN MORALITY WAS UNKNOWN IN GREECE AND ROME. Mercy and justice did not form the foundation or the actuating principle of their institutions, their polity, or their private life. The virtue of their republics was mere self-exaltation, called patriotism, which was accompanied with gross injustice and cruelty to all other nations; while a pampered appetite for military glory, and a systematic grasping ambition, produced almost perpetual war for conquest and plunder, with all the horrors and miseries of that worst form of crime. The Roman share in these wars, with a few exceptions of retributive invasions by the more powerful victims of their injustice, was exclusively aggressive. The nation, and every individual of which it was composed, either joined in, or heartily sympathised with, these grand outrages of moral principle. Hence war, bloodshed, pride, ambition, with an insatiable rapacity, formed the basis of the Roman character, actuated their policy, controlled their education, and constituted their very being. This is what is meant by Roman barbarism. It differed from the savage state only in the extended intellect and improved combinations which enlarged its range, and increased its power of evil. Poets sung its atrocities as the summit of human glory,—for there is no greater test of barbarism than blindness to its own features, and the mistake of its crimes for virtues; orators lauded the deeds of blood and rapine, in which sometimes as soldiers they had borne a part, and listening senates hung upon their lips, as they fed to fulness the coarsest appetites of national vanity and selfishness. Historians were ready, in their turn, to record in their imperishable pages, the proud crimes of their countrymen; and philosophers systematised a spurious virtue out of the inferior impulses of human nature. Such was the actual national practice from the days of Romulus to those of Constantine. We do not find that even the sage philosophers themselves condemned, and we are left to suppose they countenanced and witnessed, the savage scenes of the amphitheatre, where Pompey slaughtered 500 lions, and Trajan 11,000 wild beasts, and 5000 gladiators, to glut the Roman delight in blood. Whole days were spent in these theatres by the citizens of all ranks, witnessing the combats of men and beasts with breathless interest, and feasting their eyes with torture and death. The custom continued to debase and brutalize the people for centuries. Certainly, there never existed on earth a more sanguinary race than the admired Romans. This thirst of blood added to gross sensuality, and the corruption which arose out of and ministered to it, the falsehood and dishonesty which characterized public and private life, were barbarism in the midst of all the gorgeous ness of physical, luxurious, and literary civilization. Morally, the Romans, and not less the Greeks, were uncivilised, and as the course of the selfish faculties which swayed them is downwards, they gradually sank and ultimately perished.

* The talent bestowed on classical pursuits is sometimes such as would master the sciences and extend their range. The prime list of a great grammar-school often presents wonderful productions of difficulty and labour. The efforts at College are still more heroic, and health and life are not seldom sacrificed in making them.

The grammar-school finished about fifteen, the acquisition of useful practical knowledge may even yet be made, though under great disadvantages. But the feast which Nature spreads is especially withheld from the devoted youth—destined to the classical glories of College. Special, laborious, and expensive care is taken to exclude the chance of his picking up even stray knowledge, by engaging him engrossingly in pursuits which lead away from it. When finished at school, he is said to be "prepared for College," and it is the greatest boast of a grammar-school, that its pupils are well fitted for this advancement, and become renowned for bearing away the University honours. Now "College," in the sense alluded to, does not mean the attainment of physical and moral science, the knowledge of Creation as revealed in the works of God; it means more yet of the dead languages, more yet of these standards of science and morality, the Greeks and Romans; it means advancement in the "higher classics;" a greater elevation still above all vulgar studies which are to be of practical use in the attainment of good and the avoidance of evil in after life.* The school keeps an eye upon its former alumni, and glories in their triumphs in the dead languages, in the rank they take at College, the scholarships, the fellowships they achieve. Nay, this is not all, the school posterously claims to itself the credit of the whole future fame and fortune of its quondam pupil, the whole fruits of that education which he subsequently gave himself, and which the time he wasted within its walls only postponed; while his Greek and Latin have not only contributed nothing to his advancement, but have been most probably almost entirely forgotten by him. There is no part of this solemn mockery of intellectual cultivation more tantalizing than the fact, that classical honours are borne away by efforts, not in the direct, but the inverse ratio of the value of the attainments rewarded. Ambition performs feats almost incredible; it furnishes an impulse which makes light and pleasurable tasks which, without it, would be an intolerable grievance. The literary performances are often of great merit, and were they not all, were they an elegant surplussage to practical wisdom and useful knowledge, they would be so much gained, an additional grace well worth possessing. But when they are all the hard earnings of the noonday and the midnight,—when the same time, talent, and labour, properly directed, would have rewarded the young student with an extent of knowledge, accomplishment, and resource, which few by their own efforts subsequently attain,—we can only account for the dead languages continuing for another day to occupy so long exclusively the seat of education, by reflecting that the men who suffer its continuance were once boys, whom it at one and the same time cheated of sound knowledge, and entrenched in impregnable prejudice.†

* The term higher classics recalls a mode of reasoning adopted by scholars to silence the gainsayer on the score of his incompetency. They tell him he is out of his depth when he questions the supremacy of classical literature, it being the privilege of few to attain to a knowledge of its exquisite beauties and perfections. The first answer to this is, that there could not be a stronger reason for forthwith abandoning the custom of wasting, on such a pursuit, the time of the many; while the second is a challenge to point out any passage in any author, Greek or Latin, which, saying always a certain felicity of expression, may not be given in English, to all the effect it possesses of delighting or improving the thinking or feeling faculties of man.

† As these strictures will very probably be objected to, as referring to grammar-schools as they were, and written in ignorance of the improvements now introduced into them,

If all this shall appear to be strongly stated, if it shall excite, as it will no doubt do, angry feelings, in those attached to the classics by habit and by fame, and angrier still in those linked to them by interest, the writer has two grounds of deprecation: First, he abjures all personal feeling in his strictures on a system of centuries. He knows the talent and the worth of many of his advocates and retainers; to some of them he is closely bound by the ties of friendship and affection. He remembers, with almost filial respect, the venerable men, now no more, who were his kind and sincere instructors; respects the existing generation of classical teachers; and so far is he from wishing to affect their patrimonial status, that he would be the first to compensate them for the loss occasioned to them by the adoption of a system of education more in harmony with the age, and more consistent with the nature and faculties of man.

Secondly, the author claims the shelter from their displeasure of names, which they will certainly join him in venerating. Milton has these words: "Hence appear the many mistakes which have made learning generally so unpleasant and so unsuccessful. First, we do amiss to spend seven or eight years merely in scraping together so much miserable Latin and Greek, as might be learned otherwise easily and delightfully in one year"; and that which casts our proficiency so much behind is, our time lost in too oft idle vacancies given both to schools and universities, partly in preposterous exaction from the empty wits of children, to compose theses, verses, and orations, which are the acts of ripest judgment." In another place, Milton says, "Though a linguist should pride himself to have all the tongues that Babel cleft this world into, yet, if he has not studied the solid things in them, as well as the words and lexicons, he were nothing so much to be esteemed a learned man, as any yeoman or tradesman competently wise in his mother-dialect only."

Locke, 'On Education,' says, "Would not a Chinese, who had notice of our way of breeding, be apt to imagine, that all our young gentlemen were designed to be teachers and professors of the dead languages of foreign countries, and not to be men of business in their own?" Again, the same author says (for he reprobates the practice in several passages), "But though the qualifications requisite to trade and commerce, and the business of the world, are seldom or never to be got at grammar-schools, yet thither not only gentlemen send their younger sons intended for trades, but even tradesmen and farmers fail not to send their children, though they have neither intention nor ability to make them scholars. If you ask them why they do this?

it was thought desirable to obtain some of the recent reports and prize lists which are steadily published by the more important of these seminaries, and all that I have seen indicate as yet paramount the old subjects of study and competition. It is worthy of remark, too, that the improvements claimed are neither more nor less than partial introductions of the very useful knowledge now advocated; in other words, partial displacements of Greek and Latin. In the two great seminaries of Edinburgh, the High School and Academy, there is considerable improvement in this way; but both establishments put their scholarship foremost in their appeal to the public. We find prizes for "best Grecian, best Greek prose, best Greek verses, best Latin verses;" and themes written by boys of fourteen, when the faculties are unfit for the subjects, which it would task the powers of the ablest tacticians, politicians, and philosophers to deal with, such as "Was the attack of Saguntum by Hannibal, and the invasion of Italy, justifiable on the reasons which he alleges?"—Which was the ablest general, Cæsar or Hannibal?—On the progress and decline of commercial nations—Whether was Livy or Herodotus the most correct historian?—On the progress of mankind from barbarism to civilization and refinement.—Whether is aristocracy or democracy ultimately more dangerous to public liberty?—On the manners of the heroic ages," &c. It will astonish a more rationally educated age than our own, that the most enlightened men of the second quarter of the nineteenth century were satisfied with this as the fruit of seven years' labours in their sons; well aware, at the same time, from their own experience, that the self-education, which is to fit for active life, has yet to begin after all the prizes for long and laborious scholastic trifling have been awarded, and all the applauses bestowed.

* On saving time, and other matters, see Letter from Mr Cunningham, head master of the Edinburgh Institution for Languages, &c. App. No. IV.

they think it as strange a question as if you should ask them why they go to church? Custom serves for reason, and has, to those that take it for reason, so consecrated this method that it is almost religiously observed by them; and they stick to it as if their children had scarce an orthodox education unless they learned 'Lilly's Grammar.'" A passage follows on the subject of the special oblivion of Greek: "How many are there of a hundred, even amongst scholars themselves, who retain the Greek they carried from school, or ever improve it to a familiar reading and perfect understanding of Greek authors?"

Gibbon observes that "a finished scholar may emerge from the head of Eton or Westminster, in total ignorance of the business and conversation of gentlemen, in the latter end of the eighteenth century."

Adam Smith makes the remark, "That it seldom happens that a man, in any part of his life, derives any convenience or advantage from some of the most laborious and troublesome parts of his education."

Byron, on the authority of his biographer, Moore, was a bad Greek and Latin scholar at Harrow; hated the drudgery they imposed upon him, and acquired his copious, flexible, and splendid style by extensive English reading.

It is necessary to repeat the qualification of the whole argument,—for nothing is more apt to be forgotten by the advocates of classical studies,—that not a word which has been said can be perverted even to mean absolute hostility to Latin and Greek, to the length of banishing them utterly from education as a pursuit. The study of them (but at a more advanced stage of education, and for a moderate time, as advised by Milton) is necessary for the divine—who must add Hebrew,—the lawyer, and the physician. Nay, more, even the higher classics afford an object which will well reward the kind of genius which is fitted for the pursuit. What is contended for, is the rescue of our idiot youth from the dead languages,—from the engrossing exclusiveness of that one object, during all the period when real knowledge is most naturally and beneficially attainable. It will at once occur to the reader that this qualification is precisely that which is likely to be most unwelcome to the teachers of the dead languages, whose emoluments depend upon the number of their pupils; but this cannot affect the truth of the distinction.

Our scientific studies are unexceptionably provided for at College. In all the branches of natural history, chemistry, and mechanical philosophy, we have the means offered us of the highest attainments. Suppose us to have completely mastered all these branches of physical science, the question remains, What is our access to the science of mind, or, more extensively, the science of Man? To physical man there exist ample means of being introduced; but anatomy and physiology are never dreamed of by any one not destined to the medical profession; the most highly educated gentleman knows as little about his own bodily frame, or its relations to external nature, as the most uninformed of the manual-labour class, and is nearly as ignorant of the conditions of health, though practically, and by habit more than principle, cleaner in his person and dwelling. But it is in the philosophy of mind that our universities present the grand blank.† Yet truth in this science must be arrived at before human affairs can be placed on a sound moral foundation. If it be undeniable, that the true guiding principle of human affairs can only be accordance of human affairs with human faculties, what must not be the extent of the evils which humanity suffers, when yet in ignorance or uncertainty as to the nature of these faculties? Can we wonder at the confusion in speculation and the confusion in action, which prevail around us? Above all, what title have we to expect that education—which is essentially the improvement of the human faculties, the guide to their right use, and the guard against that miserable abuse which far and wide embitters life—can be either theoretically or practically understood, when no two philosophers are agreed as to what the faculties are, and few writers on education have thought of appealing to them, or considered it necessary to take them into account at all in their speculations. But this branch of the subject will be treated more at large in the next chapter; the utmost object of this and the preceding will have been attained, if they shall tend to open our eyes not only to the desolate state of seven-eighths of our countrymen for lack of that knowledge which alone will enable them to co-operate in their own elevation, physical, moral, and intellectual, but not less to the imperfections of our own education, our ignorance of that imperfection, and, the natural result, our unfortunate apathy on the important subject.

* A singularly confirmatory letter from Dr Christison, present professor of Materia Medica in the University of Edinburgh, who obtained the highest honours for Greek, both at school and at college, and nevertheless has nearly forgotten that tongue, was lately published in Mr Combe's 'Lectures on Education.'

† Professor Dugald Stewart's confession on this head has been already referred to.

TABLE TALK.

THE THREE RACANS.

ON the death of Montaigne, his adopted daughter, Mlle. de Gournai, turned her attention to Racan, whom she only knew by his works. The desire of being acquainted with a poet so eminent, and so capable of judging of the merits of others, made her neglect no means of procuring a visit from him; and after some time she succeeded, and the day and hour were appointed. Two of the poet's friends, on being informed of it, seized the opportunity of playing a trick on the lady, and, about an hour previous to the appointed time, one of them appeared at her door, and introduced himself as M. de Racan. Who can do justice to his reception? He talked, and talked, and praised the works she had written, and thanked her for the knowledge they had given him; in short, used all his eloquence to flatter her into the belief that she was a prodigy. After about half an hour's conversation, he made his bow and departed, leaving his hostess very well pleased with M. de Racan. Scarcely had he left the house, when another M. de Racan was announced: and she, conceiving that her late visitor had forgotten something, rose up to receive him the more graciously, when the second friend entered, and made himself known as her appointed visitor. Mlle. de Gournai was astonished; and, after cross examining the pretended poet, informed him of the guest she had just dismissed. The counterfeit Racan of course seemed greatly chagrined at the imposture, and vowed vengeance on the author of it, at the same time convincing the lady that he could be no other than the person he represented, by praising her and her works more outrageously than his predecessor. This second Racan at length quitted her, perfectly satisfied that he was the object of her invitation, and the former one an impostor. The door had scarcely closed upon him, when a third Racan, that is to say the real one, made his appearance, and then the lady lost all patience: "What, more Racans!" she screamed out. She then ordered him to be shown up stairs; and, on his entering her presence, demanded, in the greatest passion, how he dared to insult her so grossly. Racan, who was never very voluble of his tongue, was so astonished at this reception, that he could only answer by stuttering and stammering; and the lady, in the mightiness of her wrath, becoming at once persuaded, by his confusion, that he was an accomplice of her first visitor, took off her slipper, and made such good use of it on the poet's head, that he was glad to make a precipitate retreat.—[A Correspondent has favoured us with this anecdote from the 'Dictionnaire des Portraits Historiques.' A similar story, if our memory does not deceive us, is told of Rousseau,—probably a fact suggested by the former one.]

IMPORTANCE OF COOKERY.

EXPERIENCE has proved that cooking renders food really more nutritious; but to produce all the beneficial effects which it is capable of yielding, skill is required in its exercise. The difference in the apparent quality of the same kinds of food, when prepared in dissimilar ways, is very striking. It is found, that the richness of a soup depends more upon a proper choice of the ingredients, than upon the quantity of solid nutritious matter employed; much more upon the skill of the preparer in concocting the whole, than upon the amount of money laid out in the purchase of materials; while its nutritive qualities are apparently in proportion to its agreeable flavour; thus affording an example of the old proverb that "whatever pleases the palate, nourishes." Since a very small quantity of solid food, when prepared properly, will satisfy hunger, and support life and health, men employed in the most laborious works may, by the art of cookery, be nourished on a comfortable and varied diet, at a very trifling expence. It is supposed, that by a proper attention to the culinary preparation of food, and to the economy of fuel during the process, the expences for the subsistence of a family, especially that of a labouring man, might be diminished nearly one half.—Household Year Book.

THE MISSELTOW.

THE mode of propagation of the 'missetoe' was long a subject of controversy. It was formerly considered to be an excrescence from the tree on which it grew, and consequently produced without seed. In these days, however, we are in no danger of being led astray by the idea that it is a spontaneous production. The fact of its propagation from seed has been long established by conclusive experiments. Seeds inserted in the bark of the white poplar have germinated, and produced the plant: and in some experiments made in a garden at Knaresborough, by Mr Collins, large plants were obtained, upon dwarf apple-trees by rubbing the full ripe berries upon the smooth bark of the shoots. By this process, which may be performed upon the smooth bark of almost any tree, the seeds adhere closely by means of the glutinous pulp in which they are imbedded, and will produce plants the following winter. We are informed by Mr Lees, that he has attempted, without success, to plant the Missetoe on the oak in this country; but he attributes his failure, and probably with justice, to having selected a tree, the bark of which was rugged, for his experiments. Mr Dovaston has lately succeeded in producing it upon the oak, in a neighbouring country, under more favourable circumstances.—The Analyst.

FINE ARTS.

Edwards's Botanical Register, or Ornamental Flower-Garden and Shrubbery. Continued by John Lindley, Ph. D. F.R.S., &c. James Ridgway and Sons.

VERY tidily got up, and very cheap. The defects in this publication, as we had occasion to observe in our notice last week of Curtis's Botanical Magazine, are in the 'colouring.' This we must at present put up with. We believe some endeavours are being made by certain spirited wood-engravers, to discover some method of printing colours at one pressing, and that they have realized some substantial promises of perfecting their attempts. If they ultimately succeed, they will find their services in great request.

A History and Description of the late Houses of Parliament and Ancient Palatial Edifices of Westminster. By John Britton, and Edward W. Brayley. John Weale. No. I.

A WORK which promises to be of minute and accurate research. The illustrations are elaborate and painstaking. It is perhaps hypercritical to remark that they are somewhat mechanical in the execution,—rather meagre in the effect. We see the bricks and mortar that remain of the Houses of Parliament, the damage they have suffered, but the grandeur of the buildings is hardly done justice to; we miss the expression of desolation, of dreariness and silence, which the glaring and roaring fire leaves behind it.

But after all, the most important point is achieved in the carefulness and accuracy with which the drawings are made; and in these respects there appears to be nothing wanting.

We take this opportunity of noticing another of Mr Brayley's works, called the 'Graphical and Historical Illustrator.' We took in several of the numbers, and tried to complete our set, but were unable. Since the completion of the volume, the work was sent to us, and we regretted extremely to hear that it had been found advisable to discontinue it, for it was a favourite of ours. Our neglect of it has been on our conscience some time. It is a pleasant traveller among the old buildings and legends of England, and deserves the regret of the lovers of literature and romance as well as of the mere antiquary.

MUSIC.

The Honey-suckle, Rondo, for the Piano-forte. By Davison. Aldridge.

'THE Honey-suckle,' addressed to Mrs Honey. Good names both, and very fit for a bowery and flowery composition. It is occasionally pretty, perfectly easy, and lying well for the hands. A pleasant exercise for young performers.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

WE regret, for the sake of their graceful and genuine feeling, that we cannot insert the 'Lines by an Absent Husband on a Wife's Birth-day.' But if we did, we should have no excuse for the non-insertion of many contributions in verse, equally good and long.

'Hints for Table Talk,' No. V., next week.

Both of the articles of W. H. M. shall be inserted, if we can find room; but we fear his patience is not so abundant as his flow of remark; and matter presses on us so much since the new year, that we know not what to say to a great many Correspondents whom we respect. Even J. M. C. must make the best of this answer, for the present. And R. D., and A. M. P.

The paper of a fair Correspondent on 'Holly' came too late.

The 'Christmas Ball-room Announcements' of our most rhythmical indefatigable friend, Mr Wilson, come somewhat late in the season; but he is in advance with 'Saint Valentine,' and we cannot help hoping that a due attendance will encourage his dance, in honour of that lively saint, in which the letters forming his name are to be developed 'successively by fourteen young ladies.'

J. A. M. next week.

S. H. E. (18 years of age) is in a fair way to become a sound thinker; and will by-and-by be glad that we agree with his modest doubt, as to the public value of his writings at present.

We must again postpone the sequel to 'Speculations of my Grandfather,' till next week.

We thank S. A. B. for his offer, but we know not what to do with the press of matter already in our possession. The book he speaks of is quite worthy its price. This Correspondent says,—"I was much pleased with your article to 'Put up a Picture in your Room,' and would observe, that the lawyer might have a portrait of Shakspeare in his room, as I think, from internal evidence, it cannot be doubted but that he was a lawyer. If you should be inclined to doubt this, I will send you a few extracts from his plays in support of my opinion."—Our Correspondent's opinion has been before maintained, and with much plausibility; at least so far as goes to show that Shakspeare must have had some initiation in a lawyer's office. There was a good article in particular upon it, in an early number (if we are not mistaken) of the 'Law Magazine.'

A GENTLEMAN-SAINT.

'BEAUTIES OF ST. FRANCIS DE SALES.'

LOOKING over the catalogue, the other day, of Mr Cawthorn's excellent circulating library (which has the books it professes to have,—a rare virtue in such establishments) our curiosity was raised by a volume intitled 'Beauties of St. Francis de Sales.' We sent for it, and found we had started so delicious a saint, that we vowed we must make him known to our readers. He is a true god-send, a man of men, a real quintessence of Christian charity and shrewd sense withal (things not only far from incompatible, but thoroughly amalgamable); in short, a man as sensible as Dr Johnson, with all the piety and patience which the Doctor desired to have, all the lowliness and kind fellowship which it would have puzzled him to behold in a prelate, and all the delicacy and true breeding which would have transported him. Like Fenelon, he was a sort of angel of a gentleman, a species of phoenix which, we really must say, the French Church seems to have produced beyond any other. Not that we undervalue the Hookers and Jewels, and other primitive excellences of our own. Deeply do we love and venerate them. But we like to see a human being develop all the humanities of which he is capable, those of outward as well as inward elegance not excepted; not indeed in the inconsistent and foppish shape of a Sir Charles Grandison (who comes hushing upon us with insinuations of equal perfection in dancing and the decalogue, with soft deprecations of our astonishment, and all sorts of equivocal wordly accomplishments, which the author has furnished him with, on purpose to keep his piety safe—swordsmanship, for one) but in whatsoever, being the true spirit of a gentleman, manifests itself outwardly in consequence, shaping the movements of the commonest and most superficial parts of life to the unaffected elegance of the spirit within, and at the same time refusing no fellowship with honesty of any sort, nor ostentatiously claiming it, but feeling and having it, because of its true, natural, honest heart's blood, and a tendency to relish all things in common with us, "passioned as we."

When a man exhibits this nature, as St Francis de Sales did, and exhibits it too in the shape of a mortified saint of the Romish Church, a lone lodger, a celibatory, entering into everybody else's wishes and feelings, but denying himself some of the most precious to a being so constituted, we feel proud for the sake of the capabilities of humanity—proud because we belong to a species which we are utterly unable to illustrate so in our own persons—proud, and happy, and hopeful that if one human being can do so much, thousands, nay all, by like opportunities, and a like loving breeding, may ultimately do, not indeed the same, but enough—enough for themselves, and enough for the like exalted natures, too, who have the luck to live in such times.

Even if such times are not to come, but are merely among the fancies or necessary activities of the human mind, then still we are grateful for the vision by the way, and, above all, for the exquisite real fellowship.

We need not deprecate any ill construction of our use of the term "gentleman saint." In some sort, we do confess, we use it with a delighted smile on our face, astonished to start such a phenomenon in high life; but while the conversational sense of the word is included, we claim for it, as we have explained, the very largest and truest sense. One of our brave old English dramatists, brave because his humanity misgave him in nothing, dared to call the divinest of beings that have trod the earth—

"The first true gentleman that ever breathed."

Here is another (at far distance) of the same heraldry, his shield—

"heart-shaped, and vermeil dyed."

Fenelon was another, but not so active or persuasive as De Sales. St Vincent de Paul, if we mistake not, the founder of the Sisters of Charity, was a fourth. So, we believe, was St Thomas Aquinas. So, perhaps, was Jeremy Taylor, and certainly Berkeley—the latter, the more unquestionably of the two, because he was the more active in doing good, and manifestly did not care twopence for honours and profits, compared with the chance of benefiting his fellow-creatures. At one time, for this purpose, he petitioned to give up his preferences! Swift has a pleasant passage in furtherance of this object, in which he tells the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, that Dr Berkeley will be miserable in case he is not allowed to give up some hundreds a year.

We will first give the 'General Biographical Dictionary' account of St Francis de Sales, and follow it with a notice of the book before us.

"St Francis de Sales was born at the Castle of Sales, in the diocese of Geneva, August 21, 1567. He descended from one of the most ancient and noble families of Savoy. Having taken a doctor of law's degree at Padua, he was first advocate at Chambéry, then provost of the church of Geneva at Annecy. Claudius de Granier, his bishop, sent him as a missionary into the valleys of his diocese, to convert the Zuinglians and Calvinists, which he is said to have performed in great numbers, and his sermons were attended with wonderful success. The bishop of Geneva chose him afterwards for his coadjutor, but was obliged to use authority before he could be persuaded to accept the office. Religious affairs called him afterwards into France, where he was universally esteemed; and Cardinal du Perron said, 'There were no heretics whom he could not convince, but M. de Geneva must be employed to convert them.' Henry IV, being informed of his merit, made him considerable offers, in hopes of detaining him in France; but he chose rather to return to Savoy, where he arrived in 1602, and found Bishop Granier had died a few days before. St Francis then undertook the reformation of his diocese, where piety and virtue soon flourished through his zeal: he restored regularity in the monasteries, and instituted the order of the Visitation in 1610, which was confirmed by Paul V, 1618, and of which the Baroness de Chantal, whom he converted by his preaching at Dijon, was the foundress. He also established a congregation of hermits in Chablais, restored ecclesiastical discipline to its ancient vigour, and converted numerous heretics to the faith. At the latter end of 1618, St Francis was obliged to go again to Paris, with the Cardinal de Savoy, to conclude a marriage between the Prince of Piedmont and Christina of France, second daughter of Henry IV. This princess, herself, chose de Sales for her chief almoner; but he would accept the place only on two conditions; one, that it should not preclude his residing in his diocese; the other, that whenever he did not execute his office, he should not receive the profits of it. These unusual terms the princess was obliged to consent to; and immediately, as if by way of investing him with his office, presented him with a very valuable diamond, saying, "On condition that you will keep it for my sake." To which he replied, "I promise to do so, madam, unless the poor stand in need of it." Returning to Annecy, he continued to visit the sick, relieve those in want, instruct the people, and discharge all the duties of a pious bishop, till 1622, when he died of an apoplexy at Lyons, December 28, aged fifty-six, leaving several religious works, collected in 2 vols. folio. The most known are, the 'Introduction to a Devout Life,' and 'Philo, or a treatise on the Love of God.' Marsoilier has written his life, (2 vols. 12mo,) which was translated into English by Mr Crathorne. He was canonized in 1665. (Moreri.—Dict. Hist.—Butler.)

The writers of this notice do not seem to have been aware, that Camus, Bishop of Bellay, the disciple and friend of St Francis, wrote a large account of him, "the Beauties" which the work before us professes to give the public. This English volume is itself a curiosity. It is printed at Barnet, and emanates most likely from some public-spirited enthusiast of the Roman Catholic persuasion, who has thought, not without reason, to sow a good seed in these strange opinion-conflicting, yet truth-desiring times, when a little genuine Christianity stands a chance of being well received, from whatever quarter it comes. A friend of ours, smitten with love of the book, has applied for a copy at Messrs Longman's, whose name is in the title page; but it is told that they have not one left; so that if the [Barnet] press do not take Christian pity upon the curious, we know not what is to be done for them, apart from the following extracts; which, however, we take to be quite enough to set any handsome mind upon salutary reflections.

Camus, the Boswell of a saint, is himself a curiosity. He was a man of wit and a satirist, and so far (in the latter respect) not very well fitted for ultra Christian aspiration. But he was also an enthusiastic lover of goodness, and of his great seraphical friend; whom he looked up to with all the congregated humilities of a younger age, a real self-knowledge, and an unaffected modesty. He was naturally as hasty in his temperament as St Francis was the reverse; and was always for getting on too fast, and being angry that others would not be Christian enough; and it is quite delightful to see with what sense and good-humour his teacher reproves him, and sets him in the right way; upon which the young bishop begins over-emulating the older one (for they were both prelates together), trying to imitate his staid manners and deliberate style of preaching; and then St Francis reproves him again, joking as well as reasoning, and showing how he was spoiling the style peculiar to himself (Camus), with no possibility of getting at the style of another man,—the result of his habits and particular turn of mind.

But let the reader see for himself what a nature this man had,—what wisdom with simplicity, what undeviating kindness, what shrewd worldly discernment with unworldly feelings, what capital Johnson-ian good sense, and wit too, and illustration, sometimes as familiar as any table-talk could desire, at others, in the very depth of the heart of sentiment and poetical grace. Observe also what a proper saint he was for every-day, as well as for holidays, and how he could sit down at table and be an ordinary unaffected gentleman among gentlemen, and dine at less elegant tables at home, and say a true honest word, with not a syllable of pretence in it, for your hard-working innkeeper, "publican," and, perhaps, "sinner," as he was.

"Beautiful are the ceremonies of the church!" said a Roman Catholic prelate, when a great wax-candle was brought before him, stuck full of pieces of gold (his perquisite). "Beautiful are the ceremonies of the church!" think we, also, though no Roman Catholic, when we hear the organ roll, and the choir-voiced rising, and see the white wax-candles on the altar, and the dark glowing paintings, full of hopeful or sweet-suffering faces. But most truly beautiful, certainly, must they have been, when they had such a man as this St Francis de Sales ministering at the altar, and making those seraphical visions true, in the shape of an every-day human being. But, to our extracts:—

"In speaking of brotherly correction (says the good Bishop Camus), St Francis gave me a lesson which I have not forgotten. He repeated it often, the better to impress it on my memory. 'That sincerity,' said he, 'which is not charitable, proceeds from a charity which is not sincere.' A worthy saying, worthy of being deeply considered and faithfully remembered.

IT IS BETTER TO REMAIN SILENT THAN SPEAK THE TRUTH ILL-HUMOURDLY, AND SO SPOIL AN EXCELLENT DISH BY COVERING IT WITH BAD SAUCE.

I asked St Francis, if there were no other way by which I might discern from what fountain reproaches flowed. He, whose heart was wrapped up in benevolence, replied, in the true spirit of the great apostle,—'When they are made with mildness—mildness is the sister of love, and inseparable from her. With this idea, St Paul says, She beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things. God, who is charity, guides the meek with his counsel, and teaches his ways to the simple. His spirit is not in the hurricane, the foaming cataract, or the tempestuous winds; but in the soft breath of the gentle zephyr. Is mildness come? said the prophet; then are we corrected. I advise you to imitate the good Samaritan, who poured oil and wine into the wounds of the unhappy traveller. You know that in a good salad there should be more oil than vinegar or salt. Be always as mild as you can; a spoonful of honey attracts more flies than a barrel of vinegar. If you must fall into any extreme, let it be on the side of gentleness. The human mind is so constructed, that it resists rigour, and yields to softness. A mild word quenches anger, as water quenches the rage of fire; and by benignity any soil may be rendered fruitful. Truth, uttered with courtesy, is heaping coals of fire on the head; or, rather, throwing roses in the face. How can we resist a foe whose weapons are pearls and diamonds? Some fruits, like nuts, are by nature bitter, but rendered sweet by being candied with sugar; such is reproof, bitter till candied with meekness, and preserved with the fire of charity.'

St Francis always discouraged professions of humility, if they were not very true and very sincere. 'Such professions,' he said, 'are the very cream, the very essence of pride; the real humble man wishes to be, and not to appear so. Humility is timorous, and starts at her shadow; and so delicate, that if she hears her name pronounced, it endangers her existence. He who blames himself, takes a by-road to praise; and, like the rower, turns his back to the place whither he desires to go. He would be irritated if what he said against himself were believed; but from a principle of pride he desires to appear humble.'

I esteemed my friend (resumes excellent Camus) so highly, that all his actions appeared to me perfect. It came into my head that it would be a very good thing to copy his manner of preaching. Do not suppose that I attempted to equal him in the loftiness of his ideas, in the depth of his arguments, in the strength of his reasonings, in the excellence of his judgment, the mildness of his expressions, the order and just connexion of his periods, or that incomparable sweetness which could soften the hardest heart; no, that was quite beyond my powers. I was like a fly, which, not being able to walk on the polished surface of a mirror, is contented to remain on the frame which surrounds it. I amused myself in copying his gesture, in conforming myself to his slow and quiet manner of pronouncing and moving. My own manner was naturally the very reverse of all this, the metamorphosis was therefore so strange, that I was scarcely to be recognized. I was no longer myself. I contrived to spoil my own original manner, without acquiring the admirable one which I so idly copied.

St Francis heard of this, and one day took an opportunity of saying to me—'Speaking of sermons reminds me of a strange piece of news which has reached my ears. It is reported that you try, in preaching, to adopt the Bishop of Geneva's peculiarities.' I warded off this reproof by saying 'And do you think I have chosen a bad example? What is your opinion of the Bishop of Geneva's preaching?' 'Ha!' said he, 'this grave question attacks reputation. Why, he really does not preach badly; but the fact is, that you are accused of being so bad a mimic, that nothing is to be seen but an unsuccessful attempt, which spoils the Bishop of Bellay, without representing the Bishop of Geneva. So that you ought to do as a bad painter did; he wrote under his picture the name of the objects which they misrepresented.' 'Let them talk,' said I, 'and you will find that, by degrees, the apprentice will become master, and the copies be mistaken for originals.' 'Joking apart,' rejoined my friend, 'you do yourself an injury. Why demolish a well-built edifice to erect one in its stead in which no rules of nature or art are adhered to? and at your age if you once take a wrong bias it will be difficult to set you right again. If natures could be exchanged, gladly would I exchange with you. I do all I can to rouse myself to animation. I try to be less tedious, but the more haste I make the more I impede my course. I have difficulty in finding words, and greater still in pronouncing them. I am as slow as a tortoise. I can neither raise emotion in myself nor in my auditors. All my labour to do so is inefficient. You advance with crowded sail, I make my way with rowing. You fly—I creep. You have mere fire in one finger than I have in my whole body. Your readiness and promptitude are wonderful, your vivacity unequalled, and now people say you weigh each word, count every period, appear languid yourself, and weary your audience. You may well imagine how this well-timed reproof and commendation cured my folly. I returned immediately to my original manner.'

The best fish are nourished in the unpalatable waters of the sea, and the best souls are improved by such opposition as does not extinguish charity.

I asked St Francis what disposition of mind was the best with which to meet death? He coolly replied, 'A charitable disposition.'

'Do not overrate the blessings which God gives to others, and then underrate or despise what are given to yourself. It is the property of a little mind to say, Our neighbour's harvest is always more plentiful than our own, and his flock more prosperous.'

I complained of some great hardships which I had experienced; it was obvious that St Francis agreed in thinking that I had been ill-treated. Finding myself so well seconded, I was triumphant, and exaggerated the justice of my cause in a superfluity of words. To stop the torrent of complaint St Francis said, 'Certainly they are wrong in treating you in this manner. It is beneath them to do so, especially to a man in your condition; but in the whole of the business I see only one thing to your disadvantage.' 'What is that?' 'That you might have been wiser, and remained silent!' This answer came so immediately home to me, that I felt immediately silenced, and found it impossible to make any reply.

[The following was a strange bit of supererogation in the lively Bishop of Bellay. His candour hardly excuses it. Yet it increases our interest in his friend.]

St Francis practised himself the lessons which he taught to others; and during fourteen years that I was under his direction, and made it my study to remark all his actions, and even his very gestures and words, I never observed in him the slightest affectation of singularity. I will confess one of my contrivances when he visited me in my own house, and remained, as his custom was, a week annually, I contrived to bore holes, by which I saw him when alone, engaged in study, prayer, or reading, meditating, dressing, sitting, walking, or writing, when usually persons are most off their guard; yet I could not trace any difference in attitude or manner: his behaviour was ever as sincere and undisguised as his heart. He had, when alone, the same dignified manners as when in society; when he prayed, you would have imagined that he saw himself surrounded by holy angels; motionless, and with a countenance of humble reverence. I never saw him indulge in any indolent attitude (!) neither crossing his legs, nor resting his head on his hand; at all times he presented the same aspect of mingled gravity and sweetness, which never failed to inspire love and respect. He used to say, that our manners should resemble water, best when clearest, most simple, and without taste. However, though he had no peculiarities of behaviour, it appeared so singular that he should have no singularities, that he struck me therefore as very singular.

'WILLINGLY, NOT BY CONSTRAINT.'

This was my friend's favourite saying, and the secret of his government. He used to say that those who would force the human will, exercise a tyrannical odious to God. He never could bear those haughty persons who would be obeyed, whether willingly or not, they cared not; 'Those,' he said, 'who love to be feared, fear to be loved; they themselves are of all people the most abject; some fear them, but they fear everyone. In the royal gallery of Divine Love there is no force—the rowers are all volunteers.' On this principle he always moulded his commands into the softer form of intreaty. St Peter's words—'Feed the flock of God, not by constraint,' he was very fond of. I complained of the resistance I met with in my parochial visits. 'What a commanding spirit you have!' he replied; 'you want to walk on the wings of the wind, and you let yourself be carried away with zeal. Like an ignis-fatrus, it leads to the edge of precipices. Do you seek to shackle the will of man, when God has seen fit to have it free?'

St Francis did not approve of the saying—'Never rely on a reconciled enemy.' He rather preferred a contrary maxim; and said, 'that a quarrel between friends, when made up, added a new tie to friendship; as experience shows, that the calosity formed round a broken bone makes it stronger than before. Those who are reconciled, often renew their friendship with increased warmth: the offender is on his guard against a relapse, and anxious to atone for past unkindness; and the offended glory in forgiving and forgetting the wrongs that have been done to them. Princes are doubly careful of reconquered towns, and preserve them with more care than those the enemy never gained.'

St Francis had particular delight in contemplating a painting of the Penitent Magdalen at the foot of the Cross; and sometimes called it his manual, and his library. Seeing a copy of this picture at Bellay, 'Oh,' said he, 'what a blessed and advantageous exchange the penitent Mary made; she pours tears on the feet of Christ, and from those feet blood streams to wash away all her sins.' To this thought he added another—'How carefully we should cherish the little virtues which spring up at the foot of the cross, since they are sprinkled with the blood of the son of God.'

'What virtues do you mean?' He replied, 'humility, patience, meekness, benignity, bearing one another's burthen, condescension, softness of heart, cheerfulness, cordiality, compassion, forgiving injuries, simplicity, candour; all, in short, of that sort.

They, like unobtrusive violets, love the shade; like them are sustained by dew; and though, like them, they make little show, they shed a sweet odour on all around.

'To obey a ferocious, savage, ill-humoured, thankless master, is to draw clear water from a fountain streaming from the jaws of a brazen lion. As Samson says. It is to find food in the devourer. It is to see God only.' [This is beautiful; and that is a fine bit of poetry about the lion; strength and sweetness meet in it. He is speaking of a master whom it happens to be incumbent on us to obey.]

St Francis highly esteemed those persons who kept inns, and entertained travellers,* provided they were civil and obliging, saying, that no condition in life, he thought, had greater means of serving God and man; for it is a continual exercise of benevolence and mercy, though, like a physician, the fee is paid. [How oddly the following sounds in a Protestant ear, said of a 'Saint Francis!']

One day, after dinner, my friend was amusing us with his entertaining conversation, and the subject of innkeepers being accidentally started, the different persons present very freely gave their opinions on the subject, and one among them declared the whole set to be rogues.

This did not please St Francis; but as it was neither a fit time nor place for reproof, nor was the sarcastic gentleman in a mood to receive it, he turned the discourse by telling the following anecdote:—

'A Spanish pilgrim, little burdened with money, arrived at an inn, where, after having served him very ill, they charged him so much for his bad fare, that he loudly exclaimed at the injustice. However, being the weaker one, he was forced to give way, and be satisfied. He left the inn in anger, and observing that it was facing another inn, and that in the intermediate space a cross had been erected, he soothed his rage by exclaiming, Truly this place is a second Calvary, where the Holy Cross is stationed between two thieves (meaning the two innkeepers). The host of the opposite hotel, without appearing to notice his displeasure, coolly asked what injury he had received from him, which he thus repaid with abuse? Hush, hush, said the pilgrim, my worthy friend, be not offended, you are the good thief; but what say you of your neighbour, who has flayed me alive? This civility,' pursued St Francis, 'soothed the pilgrim's wrath; but we should be careful not to stigmatise whole nations or trades, by terming them rogues, impertinent, &c., for even if we have no individual in view, each individual of the nation or trade is a sufferer by the sarcasm, and cannot like to be so stigmatized.'

To this I must add, that St Francis so highly esteemed innkeepers, that, in travelling, he forbade his servants to dispute about their charges, and ordered them rather to pay than to expostulate; and when told that the bills were unreasonable, and that they asked more than they deserved, he would reply, 'What ought we to reckon in the account for their trouble, care, civility, and frequent disturbances at night? Certainly they cannot be too well paid.' This good-nature of my friend was so well known that the innkeepers were always anxious to present their bills to him rather than to his servants; or else to throw themselves on his liberality, well knowing that he would give more than they could have asked.

POORNESS IN SPIRIT, AND SPIRIT IN POVERTY.

* Of these we have two opposite examples in St Charles Borromeo and St Francis de Sales. St Charles was nephew to the Pope, and very wealthy: he had an income of more than 100,000 crowns besides his considerable patrimony; but, amidst this wealth, he was poor in spirit, he had neither tapestry, plate, nor magnificent furniture:—his table was so frugal, as to be almost austere, and he himself lived chiefly on bread, water, and vegetables. The coffers, which contained his treasures, were the hands of the poor; thus in splendour was he humble.

Our saint had a different spirit: he was rich in his

* The reader is to bear in mind, that these were foreign inns, and in old times, when a tavern-keeper's life was not so easy as it is now.

poverty; of his Bishoprick little remained to him, and his patrimony he let his brothers enjoy. But he never rejected tapestry, plate, nor fine furniture, especially what might adorn the altar, for he loved to adorn the house of God.

THOROUGH LOVE.

We cannot deny that love is, of all mild emotions, the mildest—the very sweetener of bitterness—yet we find it compared to death and the grave; the reason of which is, that nothing is so forcible as gentleness, and nothing so gentle and so amiable as firmness.

'There was a society of holy men,' said St Francis, 'who one day ascended me thus, — Oh, sir, what can we do this year? Last year we failed, and did penance thrice a week; what shall we do now? Must we not do something more, both to testify our gratitude for the blessings we have received during the last year, and also that we may make some progress in the work of God?'

'Very right,' I replied, 'that you should always be advancing; however, your progress will not be made by the methods you propose—of increasing your religious exercises—but by the improved heart and dispositions with which you afford them, trusting in God more and more, and watching yourselves more and more. Last year you fasted three days in each week; if you double the number of fasts this year, every day will be a day of abstinence, and the year following what will you do?—you will be obliged to make weeks of nine days long, or else to fast each day twice over.' [Here follows a strong, and apparently a dangerous meat; yet the essence of sweetness, and even of safety, is in it. But pray ever mark our bold and admirable, as well as amiable, saint.]

'I do not know,' said St Francis, 'how that poor virtue, prudence, has offended me, but I cannot cordially like it—I care for it by necessity, as being the salt and lamp of life. The beauty of simplicity charms me—I would give a hundred serpents for one dove. Both together, they are useful, and scripture enjoins us to unite them; but, as in medical compounds, many drugs must be put together to form a salutary draught, so I would not place any reliance on an equal dose; for the serpent might devour the inoffensive dove. People say, that in a corrupt age like the present, prudence is absolutely requisite to prevent being deceived. I do not blame this maxim, but I believe it is more Christian to let ourselves be devoured, and our goods spoiled, knowing that a better and more lasting inheritance awaits us. A good Christian would rather be robbed than rob others—rather be murdered than murderer—martyred than tyrant;—in a word, it is far better to be good and simple, than shrewd and mischievous.'

'There is a strange inconsistency in the human mind, which leads men to scrutinize with severity the secrets of their fellow-creatures' souls, which it is impossible they should ever clearly discover; while they neglect to examine and probe into the springs of their own conduct, which, if they do not, they certainly ought to know. The first they are forbidden, and the second they are commanded to do.

'This reminds me of a woman remarkable for her waywardness, and constant disobedience to the orders of her husband. She was drowned in a river. On hearing of it, her husband desired that the river should be dragged, in search of the body; he bid his servants go against the current of the stream, observing, We have no reason to suppose that she should have lost her spirit of contradiction.'

St Francis gave an excellent rule, which is, that 'if an action may be considered in more lights than one, always to choose the most favourable. If there is no apology to be found, soften the bad impression it makes, by reflecting that the intention might not have been equally blameable; remember that the temptation might have been greater than you are aware of. Throw the odium on ignorance, carelessness, or the infirmity of human nature, to diminish the scandal.'

True devotion consists in performing the duties of life. St Francis was in the habit of blaming an inconsistency very common in persons more than ordinarily devout, who frequently turn their attention to the attainment of virtues of no use to them in their own sphere of action, and neglect the more needful. This inconsistency he attributed to a distaste, which people often experience for the station in which Providence has placed them, and the duties they are obliged to perform. Great laxity of manner creeps into monasteries, when their inmates devote themselves to the practice of virtues fitted for secular life; and errors are not less likely to make their way into private families, who, from a mistaken and ill-judged zeal, introduce among themselves the austerities and religious exercises of their secluded brethren.

Some persons think they pronounce the highest eulogium in saying of a family who ought to perform the active charities of life, 'it is quite a monastery; they live in it like monks or nuns;' not reflecting that it is trying to find figs on thorns, or grapes on brambles.

Not that exercises of piety are not right and good, but then the time, the place, the persons, the situation; in short, all circumstances must be duly considered. Devotion misplaced ceases to be devotion: it resembles a fish out of water, or a tree in a soil not congenial to its nature.

He compared this error of judgment, so unreasonable and injudicious, to those lovers of luxury who feed on strawberries at Christmas, not contented with delicacies in their proper season. Such heated brains require the physician's discipline rather than the cool voice of sober reason.

AN ADMIRABLE RULE IN SELF-CORRECTION FOR MORDED OR VIOLENT CONSCIENCES.

Since the degree of affection which we are commanded by God to feel for our neighbours ought to be measured by the reasonable and Christian love which we bear towards ourselves; since charity, which is benign and patient, obliges us to correct our neighbours for their failings, with great gentleness; it does not appear right to alter that temper in correcting ourselves, or to recover from a fault, with feelings of bitter and intemperate displeasure.

SCALE OF VIRTUES.

1st. St Francis preferred the virtues most frequently called into action—the commonest; and to exercise which, opportunities are oftentimes found.

2ndly. He did not judge of the greatness and supernatural excellence of a virtue by an external demonstration; forasmuch as what appears a mere trifle may proceed from an exalted sentiment of charity and great assisting grace; while, on the contrary, great show may exist where the love of God operates but slightly, though that is the criterion by which we may judge whether or not a good work becomes acceptable to God.

3rdly. He preferred the virtues of more general influence, rather than those more limited in their good effects (the love of God excepted). For example, he preferred prayer as the star which gives light to every other excellence; piety, which sanctifies all our actions to the glory of God; humility, from which we have a lowly opinion of ourselves and our actions; meekness, which yields to the will of others; and patience, which teaches us to suffer all things: rather than magnanimity, munificence, or liberality; because they embrace fewer objects, and their influence is less generally felt on the heart and temper.

4thly. He was often inclined to doubt the use of dazzling qualities, because by their brilliancy they gave an opening to vain glory, the bane of all intrinsic worth.

5thly. He blamed those who never set any value on virtues till they gained the sanction of fashion, (a very bad judge of such merchandize); thus preferring ostensible to spiritual benevolence; fasting, penances, corporeal austerities, to gentleness, modesty, and self-government, which are of infinitely more value.

6thly. He also reproved those who would not seek to obtain any virtues which were unsuited to their inclinations, to the neglect of what their duties more particularly required, serving God as it pleased themselves, and not in the manner which he commands. So common is their error, that a great number of persons, some very devout, suffer themselves to fall into it.

WE MAY BE VERY REGULAR IN DEVOTION, AND VERY WICKED!

'Do not deceive yourself,' said my friend; 'it is not impossible to be very devout, and yet very wicked.' 'Very hypocritical,' I replied, 'and not sincerely pious.' 'No; I speak of intentional devotion.' This enigma appearing to me inexplicable; I begged he would explain his meaning more clearly. 'Devotion of self and of nature,' he answered, 'is only a morally acquired virtue, and not a heavenly one assisted by grace; otherwise it would be theological, which certainly it is not. It is a quality subordinate to what is termed religion; or, as some say, it is only one of its effects, or fruits, as religion is in itself subordinate to that one of the cardinal virtues called justice, or righteousness.'

'You well know that all moral virtues, and also faith and hope, which are theological, may subsist with sin. They are then without form or life, being deprived of CHARITY, which is their substance, their soul, and on which all their power depends.'

I lamented bitterly to St Francis of the very hard treatment which I had received. 'To any other person,' he said, 'I should apply the unction of consolation, but the consideration of your situation in life, and the sincerity of my affection for you, render any such expression of affection needless. Pity would inflame the wound you have received. I shall, therefore, throw vinegar and salt upon it.' [Is not this affected cruelty, and truly flattering candour, admirable?]

'You said that it required amazing and well-tryed patience to bear such an insult in silence.'

'Certainly, yours cannot be of a very fine temperament, since you complain so loudly.'

'But it is only in your friendly bosom, in the ear of your affection, that I pour out my sorrows. To whom should a child turn for compassion, but to a kind parent?'

'Oh, you babe! Is it fit, do you suppose, for one who occupies a lofty station in the church of Christ, to encourage himself in such childishness? When I was a child, said St Paul, I spake as a child; but when I became a man, I put away childish things. The imperfect articulation, so engaging in an infant, becomes an imperfection, if continued in riper years. Do you wish to be fed with milk and pap, instead of solid food? Have you not teeth to masticate bread, EVEN THE BITTER BREAD OF GRIEF?'

'What! can you delight in bearing on your breast a golden cross, and then let your heart sink beneath the weight of slight affliction, and pour out bitter lamentations?'

WE ARE APT TO GIVE THE NAME OF CALUMNY TO]] UNPLEASANT BUT WHOLESOME TRUTHS.

'Have patience with all things, but chiefly have patience with yourself. Do not lose courage in considering your own imperfections, but instantly set about remedying them;—every day begin the task anew. The best method of attaining to Christian perfection is to be aware that you have not yet reached it; but never to be weary of re-commencing. For, in the first place, how can you patiently bear your brother's burden, if you will not bear your own.'

Secondly. How can you reprove anyone with gentleness, when you correct yourself with asperity?'

Thirdly. Whosoever is overcome with a sense of his faults, will not be able to subdue them: correction, to answer a good end, must proceed from a tranquil and thoughtful mind. [He means a mind made tranquil by its own consciousness of good intention, and a mild consideration of what is best.]

Erasmus said, that when he considered the life and doctrines of Socrates, he was inclined to exclaim, "Sancte Socrates, ora pro nobis" (Saint Socrates, pray for us); that is to put him in the saintly and Christian calendar. We do not live under a Catholic dispensation; but, certainly, while reading this book, we have been inclined to exclaim, "Would to God there were but one Christian church, and such men as Saint Francis de Sales were counted saints by everybody. Not to be imitated by them in bye-gone, ascetical customs, much less in opinions that must have perplexed such natures more than any others, but in the ever-living necessities of charity and good faith, and the hope that such a church may come. And it may, and we believe will; for utility itself will find it indispensable,—to say nothing of those indestructible faculties of man, that are necessary to render utility itself beautiful and useful. If earth is to be made smoother, most assuredly the sky cannot be left out of its consideration, nor will appear less lovely; and we never see an old quiet village church among the trees, under a calm heaven,—such as that for instance of Finchley or Hendon,—without feeling secure that such a time will arrive, with 'Beauties' such as those of St Francis de Sales preached in it, and congregations who have really discovered that "God is love."

SLIDING.

THERE'S much philosophy in skating, sliding,

And playing on the ice at what's called Hocky—

Rare game. I like to see a blithe young jockey,

Just out of school, o'er ponds triumphant riding;—

He's more than paid, though he should get a biding;

He never thinks of saying "What's o'clock, eh?"

But on he speeds, light-footed as a trochee

In sede tertiâ the verse dividing.

What though he sometimes tumbles?—'tis all one;

He makes the best of what were else but gloom,

And chill, and hardship.—Reader, if your doom

In after life with ills be overrun,

That early knowledge may you wise resume,—

Make evils bend, and turn them into fun.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

NO. LV.—SINGULAR OUTRAGE IN A DUEL.

If our 'Romance of Real Life' this week cannot be said to be equally "short and sweet," it may be allowed, like Sir Toby's challenge, to be "curst and brief." We take it from the 'Bubbles of the Brunens,' the author of which has prefaced it with one of those characteristic remarks, which with an air of somewhat superfluous and morbid nicety of fine sense, end in generally giving us really good wholesome doctrine, and showing a great deal of humanity.

Some of our readers, who write to us there-arent, will suppose from the brevity of our Romance this time, that our materials are "drawing to a conclusion;" but we owe it to ourselves and our stores (such as they are) to state, that the case is quite the reverse; that we only put so short a story in the present number, from an anticipation that it will be overflowing with a press of other matter; and that of 'Romances of Real Life' we really see no end. There is really no end to them in life; why should there be in books?

Our author's account of the duel, in which a man stoops to take his nose off the ground, reminds us of the fantastic story in Ariosto, of the magician, who had the privilege of picking up his head again when any one cut it off, and whom we always fancy adjusting it by a tenure of the nose; just as a gentleman, with finger and thumb, elegantly adjusts his cocked-hat. (See Orlando Furioso. Cant. 15. st. 65, &c.) Let us not mention the fine Italian poet, however, without doing justice to that wonderful spirit of verisimilitude, by which he renders his most fantastic stories delightful. The magician has a fatal lock of hair on his head, which if once cut off, puts an end to the resumability of the head. Astolfo, in the course of the fight with him, which takes place on horseback, contrives, after cutting off his head, to get possession of it, and keep it by dint of sight, the headless magician pelting after him in vain. The knight, not knowing how to discover the lock, scalps the head at once, to save time; its face suddenly turns pale, as the scalping passes the fatal point; and Astolfo, looking behind him, sees the pursuing trunk fall to the ground. This is the way in which great poets write what some people think foolish things. The foolish things have finer things in them than such critics would ever dream of.

"It is seldom or never (says our bather at the Brunens) that I pay the slightest attention to dinner conversation, the dishes, ninety-nine times out of a hundred, being, in my opinion, so very much better; however, much against my will, I overheard some people talking of a duel, which I will mention, hoping it may tend to show by what disgusting, fiend-like sentiments this practice can be disgraced.

A couple of Germans, having quarrelled about some beautiful lady, met with sabres in their hands to fight a duel. The ugly one, who was of course the most violent of the two, after many attempts to deprive his hated adversary of his life, at last aimed a desperate blow at his head, which, though it missed its object, yet fell upon, and actually cut off, the good-looking man's nose. It had scarcely reached the ground, when its owner feeling that his beauty was gone, instantly threw away his sword, and, with both arms extended, eagerly bent forwards with the intention to pick up his own property and replace it; but the ugly German no sooner observed the intention, than, darting forwards, with the malice of the devil himself, he jumped upon the nose, and, before its master's face, crushed it and ground it to atoms!"

HINTS FOR TABLE TALK.

[No. V.]

SHAKING HANDS — CHIROLOGY — THE FRIENDLY SHAKE — THE SHAKE CEREMONIAL — THE SHAKE BOISTEROUS — THE SAILOR'S SQUEEZE — THE SHAKE THEATRICAL — THE ELECTIONEERING SHAKE — THE LOVER'S MANUAL EMBRACE — DIVERS PARTICULARS CONNECTED WITH THE SUBJECT — AN APOLOGY.

As this is our first meeting in the year 1835, I must be excused for the lateness of my compliments, but "better late than never," so "Good New Year to you, Mr Editor! Good New Year to you, gentle Reader!" Now imagine that we have shaken hands in token of mutual good will—forgiveness of whatsoever wrong may have passed, and of forbearance and hope for the future.

Shaking hands is, I think, without exception, one of the most expressive of our social customs. In grasping the hand of your friend, how every finger elaps its fellow—grows warm in the embrace, and seems loth to be parted. The action is strictly mutual—both hands assume exactly the same form; the one has not a firmer hold than the other—but they are twined like a weaver's knot.

There are several distinguishing characteristics of a real, good, hearty, friendly shake of the hand, which distinguish it from the mere matter-of-form, lukewarm apologies for the symbol of friendship. Indeed a very little examination will show that a shake of the hand comes so directly from the heart, that the feelings of one party towards another may be judged by it with a tolerable degree of correctness. Let us then examine into the several characters of hand shakings, and see whether there be not materials for a new theory, perhaps as plausible as Craniology or Physiology, and which we may call Chirolology. I have some hopes that it will not be the lowest on the poll as a candidate for a near connection with Phrenology.

To commence, then, let us take first—The shake of true friendship. Suppose a sudden and unexpected recognition of a couple of young men, between whom friendship has grown insensibly and gradually, and is therefore the more sincere. They have been playfellows—schoolfellows, and the events of life having separated them for a time, they now meet. They are just at the age when the heart is warmest;—they have seen enough of the selfishness of the world to make amity valuable, but yet not sufficient to sear their hearts against it. Observe! Simultaneous with the glow of pleasure which suffuses their faces upon recognition, is the raising and extending the hand. They seem to say each one to the other—

"Here's a hand my trusty frier,
An' g'ies a hand o' thine!"

They approach—the hands are locked in the grip of concord, and joy produces, almost involuntarily, a hearty shake. The hands seem loth to part, as loth as the hearts of which they are the representatives. The grasp is gradually loosened; the hands slowly slip out of each other, and, arriving at the tip of the finger, the one lingers a moment ere it lets the other drop. But you will observe that this hearty shake was not such as would be apt to dislocate your shoulder, nor the grasp like the bite of a vice, that forces the blood to, and almost out of, the fingers' ends; true friendship is incapable of giving pain; such an idea would be as absurd as to measure the extent of a man's ability by the number of injuries he had done you.

Secondly, let us consider—The shake ceremonial. By this I mean such a shake as one often would give and receive after the satisfactory arrangement of some business, or after a first introduction to a man whose new acquaintanceship had not excited any interest in you, and with whom you part careless whether you should ever meet again or no; or such as you would bestow upon one who pesters you with professions of friendship which you know to be insincere, but whose proffered hand you cannot in common politeness refuse; or such as you would give a distant relation whom you only know by sight; or at meeting and parting with a fellow club member (either clubs of the West-End, or otherwise); or such as on visiting an old Anti-Malthusian you are obliged to give his spouse, and five grown-up daughters, and four grown-up sons; and indeed in a hundred other instances which it would be tedious to name. It is almost a misnomer to call this shake a shake: it merely consists in one party taking the other's hand,—raising it about an inch, or inch and a half,—lowering it again, and then separating; oft-times not even so much as that—merely making a pretence to join hands, and 'tis done with. I have never read Chesterfield, but I should think, from the idea I have of him, that he prohibits shaking hands, except between intimate friends, as too great a freedom with one with whom you are a stranger, and as too great a condescension on your part to one who is almost a stranger to you. As an enemy to all mockery, deceit, or pretence, I must give it as my opinion that only friends should shake hands; such is my practice; a bow of recognition and at parting is my custom with casual acquaintances; but, of course, I never refuse a proffered hand.

Thirdly,—The shake boisterous; a shake which puts you in danger of a dislocated shoulder, and which makes your hand tingle for the next hour or two. These are the shakes of your riotous Toms, Dicks, and Harrys—your college chums, whose delight is in mischief, and whose element is a row. These fellows, after having put you to worse torture than the thumb-screw, if you chance to wince a bit, or make a wry face, exclaim in a most consolatory tone of affected surprise, "What, my dear fellow, have I hurt you? Beg pardon—'twas the warmth of my friendship for you, you know!" Hang such friendship! say I; if you cannot express your friendship in a more friendly way, I had rather be without it; at least without such like proofs of it. As the Dustman said to the Coalheaver who slapped him on the back with a "How are ye, my hearty!"—"If you considers yourself a gemman, behave as siah!" so would I say to Tom, "If you call yourself a friend, act as such." But Tom only does it for "a lark," and that he may amuse himself by looking at you trying to keep a placid countenance whilst he is torturing you. Tom's father thinks him a sad fellow, but says he has a good heart at bottom, and will be steady when he gets older. His trick at hand-shaking is one he brags of, and I have seen him with a kindred spirit, grasping hands, and trying who could bear the most pain, and who would flinch under the torture first. He, however, sometimes "catches a tartar," and then deservedly gets his knuckles well rubbed for his pains.

This squeezing of hands is, I believe, particularly a sailor's trick; and with them may perhaps be somewhat excusable, as well as many other customs not tolerated in civilized society. They mayhap think they are grasping a marlin-spike; or else want to prove to you how tight they can hand a rope, and their cornuted palms give you forcible evidence of their power. Young Middeys are generally initiated in this practice, by the boatswain, perhaps, or his own compeers, and on his first visit home, on leave of absence, gives his brothers and sisters proofs of his prowess, and laughs heartily when they cry out, "Oh!" at the same time admonishing them to cry out before they are hurt, not afterwards, as it is then useless, and a waste of breath.

Fourthly,—The shake-theatrical. The manual salute which is practised on the stage, I never saw any where else; it is not to be met with in any other scene of the stage of the world than the Thespian. One fellow takes the right hand of another, and embeds it in his own left hand; he then looks at it—holds it out from him for a second—raises his right hand, and brings it down again 'like a sledge hammer on an anvil, and with a slap that resounds like the smack of a drayman's whip,—an energetic shake follows. This somewhat smacks of the pedagogue's saws, and palmas qui meruit ferat. This is one of the points in which the gentry of the sock and buskin do not copy nature.

While we are upon shakes that want sincerity—that lack of heartiness, we will consider—The electioneering shake. This is a compound of several characters of shakes; it partakes of the shake condescending, the shake obsequious, the shake friendly, and the boisterous shake. The skilful tactician tempers his shake of hand as well as his language, to the person with whom he has to deal; but any one, with a moderate share of penetration, at once perceives its want of heart, and the total absence of all life from the salutation. The soft, small, tapering-fingered aristocratic hand of the right honourable candidate is buried and almost annihilated in the horn-hard hand of the labourer or artisan; and were it not impelled by interest, would shrink from the touch. The honest elector too, is not altogether proof against the flattery and condescension of the great man, and retains a firmer and a longer hold, and gives a heartier shake on his part, than is altogether palatable to the gentleman who is now the beggar, whose present part to play is the solicitation of a favour. The voter afterwards seems to have a greater respect for his honoured right hand than for its more neglected neighbour; he takes greater care of it; guarding it from injury in his breeches pocket. He holds his head also some few inches higher; speaks to his wife and children in a somewhat more imperious tone for the next half hour. It is sometime, perhaps two or three hours before he can make up his mind to dispel the odour of gentility upon his hand by touching a saw, or a shovel, or a pick-axe, or a loom; and there is a moment's hesitation in grasping the proffered hand of his favourite shopmate upon their next meeting. All these whims, however, are dispelled by the time his vote is registered, and the "Electioneering shake," is remembered by the elector, only when politics are discussed at the club; and by the elected totally forgotten, till the king sends the M.P. to pay another visit to his constituents.

I come now to the consideration of a more agreeable branch of the subject—The lover's shake. Love is the quintessence of friendship; as then it is a pleasure to grasp the hand of a friend in true amity, the delight of the lover's manual embrace must be proportionally fraught with joy. It is a misnomer to call it the "lover's shake," I have more correctly denominated it a "manual embrace." The pleasure is too delightful to part with it so transiently as a shake of the hand implies. When lovers meet alone, their hands are locked together from the moment of meeting to the time of parting. They wander in some shady grove, or by some murmuring stream "hand 'in hand." Milton beautifully, but simply, describes our first parents,—

"So hand in hand they passed—the loveliest pair."

Then, when, after sweet communings, lovers are obliged to part, though but for a time, what a world of affection is evinced in his warm earnest pressure of her hand, and her more gentle, but not less loving return! But I must curb my flowing quill, which is just in a humour to grow eloquent upon the subject. The bounds of propriety must not be overstepped in the length of these heterogeneous observations; a rhapsody on love would be more fitting to commence than to close an article.

A great deal more might be said upon joining hands; the antiquity of the custom; "though hand join in hand, the wicked shall not go unpunished," which takes it back to Bible times; the question also, whether it is preferable to the French custom of kissing? the joining hands at the nuptial ceremony, the blood coming from the heart to the ring finger; the symbol of union among bands of banditti or patriots, the "Hand in Hand Insurance;" and a host of other relative matter, not forgetting the hand of the Indicator, (which, by the bye, only offers you one finger to shake.)* As this does not pretend to be a regular dissertation, I shall take the liberty of leaving all that might be said upon these branches of the subject, unsaid, at least for the present.

But, says the reader, you have not yet applied all these premises to the proposed system of "Chirology." Gentle reader, oblige me by doing so yourself, each in the manner that may best suit his fancy. Or, inclination permitting, I will perhaps do so on some future occasion.

I have a word to say before I, for a time, lay down my pen. Do not accuse me of presumption or inconsistency in shaking hands with you and the Editor at the commencement of the article, while, at the same time, I say that only intimate friends should thus salute. Remember it was only an imaginary shake—a shake through faith; believing, as I do, that your hearts feel some regard, some small portion of friendship (provided you are not critics), for your humble servant, a

BOOKWORM.

* No symbol, we beg leave to say, of the Indicator's practice. As this "Index" has been alluded to by our Correspondent, and, from its frequent appearance before the public in connection with the writer, has become identified with him in the minds of some readers, we take this opportunity of stating, in reference to questions which have been put accordingly, that we write for no periodical at present, but the LONDON JOURNAL, nor, with the exception of a forthcoming article in the 'New Monthly,' have written for any, ever since it was set up.—ED.

THE WHOLE SUM AND SUBSTANCE OF THE PHILOSOPHY OF HEALTH.

The body is to be preserved in a state of health two ways; by moderate diet and reasonable exercise; for the nature of sublunary things is so gliding, that if we continually repair not what time consumes, by little and little, they waste to nothing; and yet so as the excess render it not drowsy, and indisposed to contemplation; nor the too slender diet weak and languishing; that neither luxury soften it, nor negligence pollute it. Exercise follows nourishment, though they seem to follow and wheel about one another; for we exercise and eat; eat and exercise; the one to prepare us for meat, the other to awake nature, and keep the body's part in motion; and we should so use them, that the body may be the better; and the mind never the worse.—De Vais.

THE WEEK.

BIRTH-DAYS.

February 8, 1612. At Strensham, in Worcester-shire, the son of a farmer, Samuel Butler, the most learned and witty of satirical poets, the banterer of the Puritans. Charles the Second used to carry Hudibras about in his pocket, yet had not the spirit to do anything for its author, who lived poor and died so, rich only in a mind teeming with thought and imagery. He had a friend, however, who stood by him in life and death, and who decently buried him. When poor selfish Charles died, pieces of his remains (out from the embalming) were found floating about in kitchen sinks.

— 9, 1700. Daniel Bernouilli, professor of medicine and natural philosophy at Basil, a celebrated mathematician, like his father. His reputation may be estimated by the following anecdote. He fell in, during a journey, with a fellow-traveller, who, being struck with his conversation, asked his name. "I am Daniel Bernouilli," answered he with simplicity. "And I," replied the other, thinking to keep up the joke, "am Sir Isaac Newton."

— 10, 1670. At Bardsey Grange, near Leeds, in Yorkshire, of an ancient family, William Congreve, the wittiest of English dramatists. The Duchess of Marlborough (heiress of the Duke) was so fond of his company, that not being able to endure the sight of his empty chair at table, she had an image made of him in wax, and used to drink to it as if he were alive. This looks well for him; and yet there is an apparent heartlessness in his plays, which makes us unwilling to repeat in other words what we have said of his genius in the 'Supplement' to this Journal, No. 3, Chapter the Fourth.

Same day, 1706. In Broad street, near the Bank, (where his father, afterwards the celebrated Bishop, was rector of St Peter Le Poor) Benjamin Hoadly, author of the comedy of the 'Suspicious Husband.' He was an eminent physician, and a good-natured, benevolent man. His play has been thought as profligate as those of Congreve; but there is an animal spirit in it, and a native under-current of good feeling, very different from the sophistication of Congreve's fine ladies and gentlemen. Congreve writes like a rake upon system; Hoadly, like a wild light-hearted youth from school.

CHARACTERS OF SHAKSPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

NO. IV.—HAMLET.

THIS is that Hamlet the Dane, whom we read of in our youth, and whom we seem almost to remember in our after-years; he who made that famous soliloquy on life, who gave the advice to the players, who thought "this goodly frame, the earth, a steril promontory, and this brave o'er-hanging firmament, the air, this majestical roof fretted with golden fire, a foul and pestilent congregation of vapours;" whom "man delighted not, nor woman neither;" he who talked with the grave-diggers, and moralized on Yorick's skull; the school-fellow of Rosencrantz and Guildenstern at Wittenberg; the friend of Horatio; the lover of Ophelia; he that was mad and sent to England; the slow avenger of his father's death; who lived at the court of Horwendillus five hundred years before we were born, but all whose thoughts we seem to know as well as we do our own, because we have read them in Shakspeare.

Hamlet is a name: his speeches and sayings but the idle coinage of the poet's brain. What then, are they not real? They are as real as our own thoughts. Their reality is in the reader's mind. It is we who are Hamlet. This play has a prophetic truth, which is above that of history. Whoever has become thoughtful and melancholy through his own mishaps or those of others; whoever has borne about with him the clouded brow of reflection, and thought himself "too much i' th' sun;" whoever has seen the golden lamp of day dimmed by envious mists rising in his own breast, and could find in the world before him only a dull blank with nothing left remarkable in it; whoever has known "the pangs of despised love, the insolence of office, or the spurs which patient merit of the unworthy takes;" he who has felt his mind sink within him, and sadness cling to his heart like a malady, who has had his hopes blighted and his youth staggered by the apparitions of strange things; who cannot be well at ease, while he sees evil hovering near him like a spectre; whose powers of action have been eaten up by thought, he to whom the universe seems infinite, and himself nothing; whose bitterness of soul makes him careless of consequences, and who goes to a play as his best resource to shove off, to a second remove, the evils of life by a mock-representation of them—this is the true Hamlet.

We have been so used to this tragedy that we hardly know how to criticise it any more than we should know how to describe our own faces. But we must make such observations as we can. It is the one of Shakspeare's plays that we think of oftenest, because it abounds most in striking reflections on human life, and because the distresses of Hamlet are transferred, by the turn of his mind, to the general account of humanity. Whatever happens to him we apply to ourselves, because he applies it so himself as a means of general reasoning. He is a great moraliser; and what makes him worth attending to is, that he moralises on his own feelings and experience. He is not a common-place pedant. If 'Lear' shows the greatest depth of passion, 'Hamlet' is the most remarkable for the ingenuity, originality, and unstudied development of character. Shakspeare had more magnanimity than any other poet, and he has shown more of it in this play than in any other. There is no attempt to force an interest: everything is left for time and circumstances to unfold. The attention is excited without effort, the incidents succeed each other as matters of course, the characters think and speak and act just as they might do, if left intirely to themselves. There is no set purpose, no straining at a point. The observations are suggested by the passing scene—the gusts of passion come and go like sounds of music borne on the wind. The whole play is an exact transcript of what might be supposed to have taken place at the court of Denmark, at the remote period of time fixed upon, before the modern refinements in morals and manners were heard of. It would have been interesting enough to have been admitted as a by-stander in such a scene, at such a time, to have heard and seen something of what was going on. But here we are more than spectators. We have not only "the outward pageants and the signs of grief;" but "we have that within which passes show." We read the thoughts of the heart, we catch the passions living as they rise. Other dramatic writers give us very fine versions and paraphrases of nature: but Shakspeare, together with his own comments, gives us the original text, that we may judge for ourselves. This is a very great advantage.

The character of Hamlet is itself a pure effusion of genius. It is not a character marked by strength of will or even of passion, but by refinement of thought and sentiment. Hamlet is as little of the hero as a man can well be: but he is a young and princely novice, full of high enthusiasm and quick sensibility—the sport of circumstances, questioning with fortune and refining on his own feelings, and forced from the natural bias of his disposition by the strangeness of his situation. He seems incapable of deliberate action, and is only hurried into extremities on the spur of the occasion, when he has no time to reflect, and in the scene where he kills Polonius, and again, where he alters the letters which Rosencrantz and Guildenstern are taking with them to England, purporting his death. At other times, when he is most bound to act, he remains puzzled, undecided, and sceptical, dallies with his purposes, till the occasion is lost, and always finds some pretence to relapse into indolence and thoughtfulness again. For this reason he refuses to kill the King when he is at his prayers, and by a refinement in malice, which is in truth only an excuse for his own want of resolution, defers his revenge to some more fatal opportunity, when he shall be engaged in some act "that has no relish of salvation in it."

"He kneels and prays,
And now I'll do't, and so he goes to heaven,
And so am I reveng'd: that would be seen'd.
He kill'd my father, and for that
I, his sole son, send him to heaven.
Why this is reward, not revenge.
Up sword, and know thou a more horrid time,
When he is drunk, asleep, or in a rage."

He is the prince of philosophical speculations, and, because he cannot have his revenge perfect, according to the most refined idea his wish can form, he misses it altogether. So he scruples to trust the suggestions of the Ghost, contrives the scene of the play to have surer proof of his uncle's guilt, and then rests satisfied with this confirmation of his suspicions, and the success of his experiment, instead of acting upon it. Yet he is sensible of his own weakness, taxes himself with it, and tries to reason himself out of it.

"How all occasions do inform against me,
And spur my dull revenge! What is a man,
If his chief good and market of his time
Be but to sleep and feed? A beast; no more.
Sure he that made us with such large discourse,
Looking before and after, gave us not
That capability and god-like reason
To rust in us unus'd: now whether it be Bestial oblivion, or some craven scruple
Of thinking too precisely on the event,—
A thought which quarter'd, hath but one part wisdom,
And ever three parts coward:—I do not know
Why yet I live to say, this thing's to do;
Sith I have cause, and will, and strength, and means
To do it. Examples gross as earth excite me:
Witness this army of such mass and charge,
Led by a delicate and tender prince,
Whose spirit, with divine ambition puff'd,
Makes mouths at the invisible event,
Exposing what is mortal and unsure
To all that fortune, death, and danger dare,
Even for an egg-shell. 'Tis not to be great,
Never to stir without great argument;
But greatly to find quarrel in a straw,
When honour's at the stake. How stand I then,
That have a father killed, a mother stain'd,
Excitements of my reason and my blood,
And let all sleep, while to my shame I see
The imminent death of twenty thousand men,
That for a fantasy and trick of fame,
Go to their graves like beds, fight for a plot
Whereon the numbers cannot try the cause,
Which is not tomb enough and continent
To hide the slain?—O, from this time forth,
My thoughts be bloody or be nothing worth!"

Still he does nothing; and this very speculation on his own infirmity only affords him another occasion for indulging it. It is not for any want of attachment to his father or abhorrence of his murder that Hamlet is thus dilatory, but it is more to his taste to indulge his imagination in reflecting upon the enormity of the crime and refining on his schemes of vengeance, than to put them into immediate practice. His ruling passion is to think, not to act: and any vague pretence that flatters this propensity instantly diverts him from his previous purposes.

The moral perfection of this character has been called in question, we think, by those who did not understand it. It is more interesting than according to rules: amiable though not faultless. The ethical delineations of "that noble and liberal casuist" (as Shakspeare has been well called) do not exhibit the drab-coloured quakerism of morality. His plays are not copied either from 'The Whole Duty of Man,' or from 'The Academy of Compliments!' We confess, we are a little shocked at the want of refinement in those who are shocked at the want of refinement in Hamlet. The want of punctilious exactness in his behaviour either partakes of the "license of the time," or else belongs to the very excess of intellectual refinement in the character, which makes the common rules of life, as well as his own purposes, sit loose upon him. He may be said to be amenable only to the tribunal of his own thoughts, and is too much taken up with the airy world of contemplation to lay as much stress as he ought on the practical consequences of things. His habitual principles of action are unhinged and out of joint with the time. His conduct to Ophelia is quite natural in his circumstances. It is that of assumed severity only. It is the effect of disappointed hope, of bitter regrets, of affection suspended, not obliterated, by the distractions of the scene around him! Amidst the natural and preternatural horrors of his situation, he might be excused in delicacy from carrying on a regular courtship. When "his father's spirit was in arms," it was not a time for the son to make love in. He could neither marry Ophelia, nor wound her mind by explaining the cause of his alienation, which he durst hardly trust himself to think of. It would have taken him years to have come to a direct explanation on the point. In the harassed state of his mind, he could not have done otherwise than he did. His conduct does not contradict what he says when he sees her funeral,—

"I loved Ophelia! forty thousand brothers
Could not with all their quantity of love
Make up my sum."

Nothing can be more affecting or beautiful than the Queen's apostrophe to Ophelia on throwing flowers into the grave,—

"Sweet to the sweet, farewell."

I hop'd thou should'st have been my Hamlet's wife:
I thought thy bride-bed to have decked, sweet maid,
And not have strew'd thy grave."

Shakspeare was thoroughly a master of the mixed motives of human character, and he here shows us the Queen, who was so criminal in some respects, not without sensibility and affection in other relations of life. Ophelia is a character almost too exquisitely touching to be dwelt upon. Oh rose of May! oh flower too soon faded! Her love, her madness, her death, are described with the truest touches of tenderness and pathos. It is a character which nobody but Shakspeare could have drawn in the way that he has done, and to the conception of which there is not even the smallest approach, except in some of the old romantic ballads. Her brother, Laertes, is a character we do not like so well: he is too hot and choleric, and somewhat rodomontade. Polonius is a perfect character in its kind; nor is there any foundation for the objections which have been made to the consistency of this part. It is said that he acts very foolishly and talks very sensibly. There is no inconsistency in that. Again, that he talks wisely at one time and foolishly at another; that his advice to Laertes is very sensible, and his advice to the King and Queen on the subject of Hamlet's madness very ridiculous. But he gives the one as a father, and is sincere in it; he gives the other as a mere courtier, a busy-body, and is accordingly officious, garrulous, and impertinent. In short, Shakspeare has been accused of inconsistency in this and other characters, only because he has kept up the distinction which there is in nature, between the understandings and the moral habits of men, between the absurdity of their ideas and the absurdity of their motives. Polonius is not a fool, but he makes himself so. His folly, whether in his actions or speeches, comes under the head of impropriety of intention.

We do not like to see our author's plays acted, and least of all, 'Hamlet.' There is no play that suffers so much in being transferred to the stage. Hamlet himself seems hardly capable of being acted. Mr Kemble unavoidably falls in this character from a want of ease and variety. The character of Hamlet is made up of undulating lines; it has the yielding flexibility of "a wave o' th' sea." Mr Kemble plays it like a man in armour, with a determined inveteracy of purpose, in one undeviating straight line, which is as remote from the natural grace and refined susceptibility of the character, as the sharp angles and abrupt starts which Mr Kean introduces into the part. Mr Kean's Hamlet is as much too splanetic and rash as Mr Kemble's is too deliberate and formal. His manner is too strong and pointed. He throws a severity, approaching to virulence, into the common observations and answers. There is nothing of this in Hamlet. He is, as it were, wrapped up in his reflections, and only thinks aloud. There should, therefore, be no attempt to impress what he says upon others by a studied exaggeration of emphasis or manner; no talking at his hearers. There should be as much of the gentleman and scholar as possible infused into the part, and as little of the actor. A pensive air of sadness should sit reluctantly upon his brow, but no appearance of fixed and sullen gloom. He is full of weakness and melancholy, but there is no harshness in his nature. He is the most amiable of misanthropes.

SPENSER'S ANGUISH ON THE DEATH OF HIS CHILD.

DURING one of the rebellions of the unhappy Irish, the author of the Faerie Queene, who had been secretary to a Lord Lieutenant, resided in a house which was part of the forfeited estate of the Earl of Desmond. It was burnt to the ground, and his infant child in it. What effect this must have had upon a man, who, to the natural tenderness of a father, joined all the sensibility of a poet, is here intimated in one of the most affecting dialogues and bursts of passion we ever read. The passage is in the appendix to Mr Landor's beautiful book about Shakspeare. Essex's half-playful kindness, and arch anticipations of the possibilities of ordinary comfort, before he is aware of the real state of the case, admirably prepare for its dreadfulness, when it is disclosed; and the paroxysm of the wretched father is truly awful. His heart seems caught, and made mad, in the fire that consumed his infant.

SPENSER. Interrogate me, my lord, that I may answer each question distinctly, my mind being in utter confusion, at what I have seen and undergone.

Essex. Give me thy account and opinion of these very affairs, as thou leavest them; for I would rather know one part well, than all imperfectly; and the violence of which I have heard within the day surpass belief. Why weepest thou, my gentle Spenser? Have the rebels reached thy house?

SPENSER. They have plundered and utterly destroyed it?

Essex. I grieve for thee, and will see thee righted.

SPENSER. In this they have little harmed me.

Essex. How! I have heard it reported that thy grounds are fertile, and thy mansion large and pleasant.

SPENSER. If river, and lake, and meadow ground, and mountain, could render any place the abode of pleasantness, pleasant was mine, indeed! On the lovely banks of Mullis, I found deep contentment: under the dark alders did I muse and meditate. Innocent hopes were my gravest cares, and my playfullest fancy was with kindly wishes. Ah! surely of all cruelties, the worst is to extinguish our kindness. Mine is gone; I love the people and the land no longer. My lord, ask me not about them; I may speak injuriously.

Essex. Think rather, then, of thy happier hours and busier occupations; these likewise may instruct me.

SPENSER. The first seeds I sowed in the garden, ere the old castle was made habitable for my lovely bride, were acorns from Penshurst. I planted a little oak before my mansion at the birth of each child. My sons, I said to myself, shall often play in the shades of them when I am gone; and every year shall they take the measure of their growth, as fondly as I take theirs.

Essex. Well, well; but let not this thought make thee weep so bitterly.

SPENSER. Poison may ooze from beautiful plants; deadly grief from dearest reminiscences. I must grieve; I must weep. It seems the law of God, and the only one that men are not disposed to controvert. In the performance of this alone do they effectually aid one another.

Essex. Spenser! I wish I had at hand any argument or persuasions of force sufficient to remove thy sorrow: but really I am not in the habit of seeing men grieve at anything, except the loss of favour at court, or of a hawk, or of a buck-hound. And were I to wear out my condolences to a man of thy discernment in the same round, roll-call phrases we employ with one another upon these occasions, I should be guilty, not of insincerity, but of insolence. True grief hath ever something sacred in it; and when it visiteth a wise man and a brave one, is most holy. Nay, kiss not my hand; he whom God visiteth, hath God with him. In his presence what am I?

SPENSER. Never so great, my lord, as at this hour, when you see aright who is greater. May He aid your counsels, and preserve your life and glory.

Essex. Where are thy friends? are they with thee?

SPENSER. Ah, where, indeed! Generous, true-hearted Philip, where art thou! whose presence was unto me peace and safety, whose smile was contentment, and whose praise renown. My lord, I cannot but think of him among still heavier losses: he was my earliest friend, and would have taught me wisdom.

Essex. Pastoral poetry, my dear Spenser, doth not require tears and lamentations. Dry thine eyes; rebuild thine house: the queen and council, I venture to promise thee, will make ample amends for every evil thou hast sustained. What! does that inforce thee to wail still louder?

SPENSER. Pardon me, bear with me, most noble heart! I have lost what no council, no queen, no Essex can restore.

Essex. We will see that! There are other swords, and other arms, to wield them, besides a Leicester's and a Raleigh's. Others can crush their enemies, and serve their friends.

SPENSER. O my sweet child! and of many so powerful, many so wise and so beneficent, was there none to save thee? None! none!

Essex. I now perceive that thou now lamentest what almost every father is destined to lament. Happiness must be bought, although the payment must be delayed. Consider the same calamity might have befallen thee here in London. Neither the houses of ambassadors, nor the palaces of kings, nor the altars of God himself, are asylums against death. How do I know but under this very roof there may sleep some latent calamity, that in an instant shall cover with gloom every inmate of the house, and every far dependant?

SPENSER. God avert it!

Essex. Every day, every hour of the year, do hundreds mourn what thou mourest.

SPENSER. Oh no, no, no! Calamities there are around us; calamities there are all over the earth; calamities there are in all seasons; but none in any season, none in any place, like mine.

Essex. So say all fathers; so say all husbands. Look at any old mansion-house, and let the sun shine as gloriously as it may on the golden vases, on the arms recently quartered over the gateway, on the embayed window, and on the happy pair that happily are toying at it; nevertheless, thou mayest say, that of a certainty the same fabric hath seen much sorrow within its chambers, and heard many wailings: and each time this was the heaviest stroke of all. Funerals have passed along through the stout-hearted knights upon the wainscot, and amidst the laughing nymphs upon the arras. Old servants have shaken their heads, as if somebody had deceived them, when they found that beauty and nobility could perish. Edmund! the things that are too true, pass by us as if they were not true at all; and when they have singled us out, then only do they strike us. Thou and I must go too. Perhaps the next year may blow us away with its fallen leaves.*

SPENSER. For you, my lord, many years (I trust) are waiting; I never shall see those fallen leaves.

* It happened so.

No leaf, no bud will spring upon the earth before I sink into her breast for ever.

ESSEX. Thou, who art wiser than most men, should bear with patience, equanimity, and courage, what is common to all.

SPENSER. Enough! enough! enough! Have all men seen their infants burnt to ashes before their eyes?

ESSEX. Gracious God! Merciful Father! what is this?

SPENSER. Burnt alive! burnt to ashes! burnt to ashes! The flames dart their serpent tongues through the nursery window; I cannot quit thee, my Elisabeth! I cannot lay down our Edmund. Oh these flames! they persecute, they hiss upon my brain, they taunt me with their fierce, foul voices, they carp at me, they wither me, they consume me, throwing back to me a little of life, to roll and suffer in, with their fangs upon me.—Ask me, my lord, the things you wish to know from me—I may answer them—I am now composed again. Command me, my gracious lord! I would yet serve you—soon I shall be unable. You have stooped to raise me up; you have borne with me; you have pitied me, even like one not powerful; you have brought comfort, and will leave it with me; for gratitude is comfort.

Oh! my memory stands all a tip-toe on one point: when it drops from it, then it perishes. Spare me; ask me nothing; let me weep before you in peace—the kindest act of greatness.

ESSEX. I should rather have dared to mount into the midst of the conflagration, than I now dare entreat thee not to weep. The tears that overflow thy heart, my Spenser, will stanch and heal it in their sacred streams, but not without hope in God.

SPENSER. My hope in God is, that I may soon see again what he has taken from me. Amidst the myriads of angels, there is not one so beautiful: and even he, if there be any, who is appointed my guardian, could never love me so. Ah! these are idle thoughts, vain, wandering, distempered dreams. If there were ever guardian angels, he who so wanted one, my helpless boy, would not have left these arms upon my knees.

ESSEX. God help and sustain thee, too gentle Spenser! I never will desert thee. But what am I? Great they have called me! Alas! how powerless, then, and infantile, is greatness in the presence of calamity!

Come, give me thy hand: let us walk up and down the gallery. Bravely done! I will envy no more a Sidney or a Raleigh.

TABLE TALK.

—Malherbe, the French poet, was very free of his speech. The Archbishop of Rouen having desired of him, as a great favour, that he would be present at a sermon which he was to preach, had invited him to dinner. When the cloth was taken away, Malherbe fell fast asleep; and the bishop waking him to carry him to the sermon, he desired to be excused, for that he found he should have "a comfortable nap without it."

POWER OBTAINED BY KINDNESS.

The exercise of positive efficient benevolence towards inferiors, brings with it increase of the power which constitutes superiority. Of two men occupying a position of equality as regards others, the man who contributes most to the happiness of those others, will infallibly become the most influential; will dispose of a greater quantity of service. He will strengthen his position by augmenting the number of his good deeds. Every benefit conferred on others will be prolific to himself. And the benefits conferred on others increase the power of others; and the increase of power in the hands of those willing to do him service, is the increase of his own power. The compound interest brought to effective benevolence by deeds of benevolence, is happily limitless; of the seeds scattered by the husbandry of virtue, few will turn out barren.—Bentham's Deontology.

PERSISTENCE IN A FAVOURITE OBJECT.

In conducting one of his geometrical surveys, it is animating to see the fortitude and skill displayed by Delambre, the astronomer. In a letter to Lalande, written in 1797, he thus expresses himself:—"I had about six hours' work, and I could not do it in less than ten days. In the morning I mounted to the signal, which I left at sunset. The nearest inn was that at Sullers, to which it took me three hours to go, and as much to return, and the road was the worst I have met with. At last I resolved to take up my lodging in a neighbouring cow-house; I say neighbouring, because it was only at the distance of an hour's walk. During these ten days I could not take off my clothes; I slept upon hay, and lived on milk and cheese. All this time I could hardly ever get sight of the two objects at once; and during the observations, as well as in the long intervals which they left, I was alternately burned by the sun, frozen by the wind, and drenched by the rain. I passed thus ten or twelve hours every day, exposed to all the inclemency of the weather; but nothing annoyed me so much as the inaction."—Portrait Gallery.

ANGER.

That which most tickles us in this passion is the seeming justice of it, and that it appears to excuse itself by the malice of another. We ought not, however, to entertain it; for to commit the correction of an offence to anger, were to punish vice by itself. Reason, which should govern, will admit no such officers as execute at their own license without her authority: to her, violence is improper who will (like nature) do all by the compass. She conceives that such violent motions only proceed from the imbecility of such as have them; who, like children and old men, trip and run when they think to walk.—Du Vair.

INTERESTING DEDICATION.

To Thomas Caldecott, of the Middle Temple, Esq., who materially assisted in the completion of the present volume. This 'Treatise on English Versification' is affectionately dedicated by his schoolfellow in Winchester College, and friend of seventy years standing.—The Author, W. C., Oxford, April 5, 1827. —[The Rev. William Crowe, Public Orator of the University. A punster, who was by when this dedication was read out loud, said (but with no want of reverence) that he thought it time for a friend of so long "standing" to take a chair.]

JOSEPH WARTON AND POPE'S COUSIN.

The sex in general were partial to him; and the editor has frequently seen the young, the handsome, and the gay, deserted by the belles, to attract the notice of the Doctor: whilst he was, on his part, thoroughly accessible, and imparted his lively sallies and instructive conversation with the most gallant and appropriate pleasantry. He was a great admirer of beauty; nor was it in his nature to use a rude expression to a female. He had, moreover, a great tenderness and love for children, and fully exemplified the maxim, that wherever there are a uniform tenderness to the female sex, and an indulgent notice of children, there is a warm and feeling heart. His politeness to the ladies, however, was once put to a hard test. He was invited, whilst Master of Winchester, to meet a relative of Pope, who, from her connection with the family, he was taught to believe could furnish him with much valuable and private information. Incited by all that eagerness which so strongly characterized him, he, on his introduction, sat immediately close to the lady, and, by inquiring her consanguinity to Pope, entered at once on the subject, when the following dialogue took place:—"Pray, sir, did you not write a book about my cousin Pope?"—"Yes, madam."—"They tell me 'twas vastly clever. He wrote a great many plays, did not he?"—"I have heard only of one attempt, madam."—"Oh, no, I beg your pardon, that was Mr Shakspeare: I always confound them."—"This was too much even for the Doctor's gallantry: he replied "Certainly, madam;" and, with a bow, changed his seat to the contrary side of the room, where he sat, to the amusement of a large party, with such a mingled countenance of archness and chagrin, such a struggle between his taste for the ridiculous, and his natural politeness, as could be portrayed but by his speaking and expressive countenance. In a few minutes he quitted the company, but not without taking his leave of the lady in the most polite and unaffected manner.—Wool's Life of Warton.

PLEASANT EXPOSTULATION OF GOETHE'S MOTHER WITH HERSELF.

Yesterday, however, I could not bear myself any longer, and so I scolded myself heartily, and said "Shame on thee, old Rätthin (Counsellor), thou hast had happy days enough in the world, and thy Wolfgang to boot; and now, when the evil day comes, thou must e'en take it kindly, and not make these wry faces. What dost thou mean by being so impatient and naughty when it pleases God to lay the cross upon thee? What, then! thou wantest to walk on roses for ever? now when thou art past the time, too—past seventy!" Thus, you see, I talked to myself, and directly after my heart was lighter, and all went better, because I myself was not so naughty and disagreeable.—Recollections of Goethe.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE LONDON JOURNAL, ON HIS MOTTO,

("TO ASSIST THE INQUIRING, ANIMATE THE STRUGGLING, AND SYMPATHISE WITH ALL.")

True friend! thou dost indeed assist
Th' inquiring in their souls' distress;
When error wraps them like a mist
In its drear, mazy wilderness,
Then comest thou, with out-stretch'd hands and heart,
The mist is pass'd—and world! how sweet thou art!

Kind friend! thy words do animate
The struggling, when their spirits fail;
Even though equal to our fate,
The mind will sometimes seem to quail,
With low, pale voice thus whispering in our ear,
"How useless are thy efforts! how severe!"

Dear friend! aye thou dost sympathise
With all who tread the common earth;
The poor, rich, ignorant or wise,
Their hopes, their sufferings, their mirth,
All find thy heart an ever-open home:
Ah! never may itself, unshelter'd, roam!

••• Thankful as we are, personally, to the writer of these verses, readers like him (and fortunately we have many) will believe us when we say, that we publish them quite as much for the evidence they afford of the salutary effect of hopeful writing upon good hearts.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

'Ugolino' and the 'Iron Mask' shall be turned to account, as D. G. wishes.

R. H. R. (whom we are glad we please) says, in reference to our want of room for more correspondence, that we might employ a smaller type. On the other hand, we have readers (not aged ones either) who complain that our type is too small, and that they cannot read it by candle-light. What are we to do?

An inquiry has been made respecting the 'Reflector.' R. A., of No. 17, Aske's Hospital, Hoxton, says he has a copy of it to dispose of, in excellent condition.

We should like to publish some of the stanzas of 'Thoughts on an Infant's Death,'—indeed all of them, for the sake of the general writing of the author. But the poem has too little of his originality, considering its length.

HORATIANA.

BY ROBERTON WEBBE.

[THE Editor of this Journal believes he may say, that in the various periodicals which he has conducted, it has been his good fortune to introduce more talent and genius to the public than any other; he means such as have made out a lasting case with their names, or where they have not yet done so, are in the way to do it, and have had their pretensions admitted by the few who make fame. Not only are the splendid names of SHELLEY and KEATS in his list, but the reader would be surprised if he knew how many eminent ones in learning, in criticism, and in politics, now flourishing, and therefore not abruptly to be mentioned, began their career in the pages of the 'Examiner' and the 'Reflector.' Nor will the 'Tatler' want its names; nor the LONDON JOURNAL. It has ever been his boast that he has been a sort of literary Robin Hood, and got companions to act under him who have beaten him at his own weapons, and he now, in introducing his young friend, Mr Webbe (whose name, for very good reasons, he has prevailed upon him to let be known), takes the liberty with him of saying, that he is a far better scholar than himself, a writer as well as reader of elegant Latin verse; and that he joins to this accomplishment others which, being greater, it might disconcert him too much to predicate thus openly, and when he is about to speak for himself. The Editor, indeed, need not have said anything at all; but liberties of a similar kind are taken with friends at election meetings and dinner parties, in the overflow of party zeal and port wine; and he does not see why the privilege of uttering cordial truths should be denied to moments less equivocal. The indulgence is at all events in agreement with the doctrines inculcated in the LONDON JOURNAL, and he trusts that there is no hearty reader but will feel obliged to him for giving way to it.]

"Οὗτος δὲ ἔως ἰσχυροῦς τὴν φύσιν ἔσχει, ὥστ' ἐν ἅπασιν τοῖς ἱεραμένοις τελεσιότατος
ἵναι." Isocr. Epist. IV.

PERHAPS there is no one amongst the old poets whom it is so possible to feel a love for as Horace. There is a sociality in wit and pleasantry inadmissible in any other departments of poetry, and when these are joined to a warm feeling of humanity, and a mind furnished at once with everything that is delightful in invention and exquisite in taste, they cause our affections to bound from the writings to the man, and endear him to us personally in a manner which more exalted merits fail to do. But though few have ever more incontestably established a title to the rank of poet than Horace, it is not the bard of "empyrean conceit," it is not the bard "soaring in the high regions of his fancy, with his garland and singing-ropes about him," that we meet with in him. With all his great and varied powers he never evinces that strength of wing that could have sustained him in the more elevated parts of the poetical element. His feelings indeed were warm enough—his polished imagination would have ensured a grace to whatever he had attempted—his judgment would have secured it from all great defects, but he wanted that depth of sentiment and grandeur of conception—the "mens diviniore atque os," &c. (the diviner mind and the large-coming utterance) as he who penned that admirable definition could hardly have been ignorant, without which there is no furor, no epic glory, without which the buskin is but a sorry shoe.

I believe Horace to have been always in love with his art, but it was a divided attachment. We see many a town-bred lover so imposed upon by the allurements of artificial beauty as sometimes to confound adventitious with personal charms, and pay that devotion to his mistress which is due to the man-tua maker. In the same manner Horace, I think, was so much devoted to the outward attractions of the poetical art as sometimes to overlook matter of more vital concern, and to forget that poetry, like his own Pyrrha, "simplex munditiis," is not unfrequently "when unadorned adorned the most." He does not appear to have had any ideas of poetry apart from numbers, and, if so, all that ridicule of classical association and classical influence in which he indulges, must, I think, be considered in some measure as recoiling upon himself, since it would appear from this that he drew his notions of the art, not from his own undirected inquiries concerning it, which would inevitably have led him to a higher conception of its spiritual nature, but rather from a too passive regard to what had been done. His admiration of the manifold excellencies of the living art was so profound, so lively on the other hand his perception of all that belonged to false taste, and he was besides so admirable a practical critic, that he was very naturally withdrawn from a more philosophical view of the nature of poetry, to treat of poetry as it was. It is astonishing with what closeness, and, as I may say, professional diligence he has applied himself, in that incomparable monument of common sense the 'Art of Poetry,' to an explanation of all the tools of the trade and their several uses. Never for a moment does he lose sight of the grand business of verse-making. Observe how he introduces Homer to us. "With respect to singing of wars and heroes," says he, "Homer has shown us in what metre that can be done." He did not say "Homer has shown us that these are the themes only to be grasped by the very highest reach of genius—that they demand a comprehension and a power which no rules of mine nor of any other critic can define, much less impart—he has shown us with what a more than mortal grandeur such subjects may be invested, and what a godlike majesty of utterance must belong to the man who aspires to succeed to such a throne as his." Horace does not say anything of this sort; but, says he, "Homer has shown us in what metre that can be done." Then what an exquisite spirit of affectation there is in all he tells us about the different species of poetical measures in use or out of use. Of the elegiac—meaning to say that it was formerly only used for plaintive subjects but was afterwards adopted for those of a cheerful kind also, he delivers himself thus:—"At first only lamentation was admitted, but subsequently a happier strain prevailed; the wish fulfilled was received into the verse." Then, in the next line, I confess I am doubtful of the exact meaning intended by the word exiguus as applied to elegos. We find that word not unfrequently employed in a sense of disparagement, but it is by no means to be supposed that Horace meant any slight to longs and shorts, his dear Tibullus' chosen measure: neither can he mean "small" in its relative sense, since he cannot intend to speak here with any exception as regards large elegies! To suppose that he meant to convey some reference to the comparative humbleness of the subjects usually embraced by that style of poetry, seems to be going too far about for a meaning. I may be wrong, but I can never help fancying there is a sly affectation lurking in the word, as if he used it in a caressing way—a loving diminutive, "little elegies," as we say "little dears." Then let us see what he has to say of his own dearly beloved iambus. It is impossible to imagine a more matter-of-fact, business-like, commercial way of writing than that with which he begins his account of the iambus. "Syllaba longa brevis," &c. might be a bit picked at hazard out of the Eton Grammar, yet only observe what a whimsical strain of conceit he immediately gets into. He wants to tell you that, whereas formerly the verse consisted of six feet, all of them iambuses, it had been common of late to mix spondees up with them, except only in the second and fourth feet of the line; a plain piece of information one would think. The latter part of it he delivers in the following fashion:—"Recently however, in order that it (the iambus) might be enabled to come upon the ear with more of deliberation and force, it consented in the most handsome and accommodating manner to receive certain stout spondees into its paternal charge; not however that it would carry its familiarity with them so far as to yield either the second or fourth seat to them."

* I believe it is always considered justifiable, and it is assuredly very desirable, to depart from the order or even the terms of the original, when the spirit may be more truly preserved by a deviation.

Nothing surely so plainly bespeaks that a man is doating on his art, as this same fondling, spoilt-child way of speaking of it—these affectionate personifications!

In treating of the Drama, Horace betrays, no less clearly, how large a share he held in those classical prepossessions which he had so ridiculed in others, always paying the same obsequious and unhesitating devotion to everything emanating from the Greek school; and this without seeming to be aware of it himself—at least, so it appears to me. His first observation on the subject of the drama (I still confine myself to the didactic poem) informs us how admirable a measure the iambic trimeter is for walking the stage on all sizes. "Both sock and buskin," he says, "appropriated this foot; it is such a capital one for dialogue, and so good for drowning the noise in the pit,†—besides, it seems as if it was made on purpose to be acted to." The next remark on this subject comes in, I am afraid, for the ambiguous praise of being an unimpeachable truth:—"A comic subject," he observes, "don't love to be set forth in tragic verses!" And then, on a little reconsideration of the matter, he makes this remarkable addition:—

* Or rather on all threes, for though six-footed it had properly only three positive accents; whence (Sat. lib. i. 10.) of Pollio who wrote historical plays, "Pollio celebrates the exploits of kings, thrice striking the foot" (pede ter percussio).

† A "noise in the pit" does not seem a very close translation of populares strepitus, certainly; yet I am inclined to think it tolerably correct, for as that portion of the Roman theatre which answers to our "Pit" was called popularia, in contradistinction to orchestra—the "Stage boxes," as we should say—populares here will not signify, in its usual wide sense, belonging to the people, but belonging to the Pit people in particular, those occupying the popularia.

"Also, the supper of Thyesta (to wit, a tragic subject) is very indignant at being related in verses of a comic kind!" It may be observed, that in the exceptions which he makes to this rule—as where he alludes, very properly, to the fact, that the characters in tragedy are often thrown into situations in which the lofty accents of the Tragic Muse are no longer consistent with nature, and ordinary and even commonplace words may be much more suitably and characteristically employed—in these exceptions, while you think he is tending to some original and independent views of his own, he is all the time only reducing to precept the examples of those masters of the drama, whose works and whose passages he has in his eye the whole way through—those "exemplaria Græca" which he so eloquently recommends to us all.

After this, and sundry receipts given for making characters—such as Achilles to be impetuous, Medea to be cruel, &c.—he takes occasion to glance at the possibility of original genius; but it is with an evident uneasiness, and a sort of nervous impatience of the prospect he himself has opened. By way of providing against this alarming contingency, he proposes certain rules to be observed by those who "dare to form a new character;" but soon perceiving the unprofitableness of prescribing for such wrongheaded people, he desists from further counsel, leaving them to shift for themselves. He then again exclaims against the dangers of novelty, recommends poaching on other men's grounds, suggests the expediency of turning Homer's 'Iliad' into a five-act piece, and finally delivers the prettiest defence of stealing extant in any language; for what he says amounts to this—that any man may make free with public property (publica materies) if he chooses, with impunity, and that it is his own fault if he is found out, for that it is always possible to disguise a theft in such a manner as to elude detection and make the ideas of others pass for one's own; that all that is necessary to this end is, that he should take care to avoid too great a closeness of imitation, not making it a word-for-word business (non verbum verbo reddere), which might have an awkward appearance, but concealing the plagiary under some judicious variation or reconstruction; and in this way a second-hand article may be got up to look as good as new!

Perhaps I have got into some cross-grained humour, but I own I can perceive no extraordinary absurdity in that opening line which our critic next cites as so rare a specimen of bathos—

"Of Priam's fortune, and that noble war,
I'll sing," &c.

It appeared that Homer always preferred to open with an appeal to the muse; whereupon Horace, with that unconditional surrender of himself to classic authority, with which he taxes others—and with which others may tax him,—immediately determines that every other mode of beginning a poem must be and shall be, held unlawful and unpardonable. "Sing, Muse, the man" may be a better commencement, but surely no one can say he perceives that mighty difference between the two examples which Horace pretends to find.

Most of his rules relating to dramatic composition display the same tone of mind, the same rooted adherence to custom and precedent. Every play is to consist of precisely five acts "neither more nor less" (neve minor neve sit productior);—only three people or, at the utmost, four are to be engaged in conversation on the stage at one time;—the chorus is just to say so much and no more, to a certain effect and no other, &c., in short "whatever was, was right," whatever had been, was to be;—for all these rules and regulations, what are they but a mere enumeration of the actual principles of the Greek plays?

I used to wonder why Horace spoke always so sneeringly of Plautus, a writer of most uncommon merit, and who is surely to be ranked immeasurably higher than his successor, Terence, whether we consider the claims of originality—which is only to say genius—or of wit. But it happened, unfortunately, that his Latin was a century and a half old in Horace's time, and exhibited on its surface that incrustation of time, which, though in the eyes of the more genuine connoisseur it might seem only the gladdening bee's wing of a good old vintage, was to the spoliated crisis of 'Tibur' a worthless rust. Here at least he was not swayed by the witching influence of time, nor by the force of opinion. The plays of Plautus were in especial good esteem in the Augustan age, and it is well known that they maintained their footing on the stage with undiminished honour to a very much later period. No one can suspect Horace of quarrelling with Plautus on the score of indelicacy. We are not informed that he himself ever became a very eminent convert to modesty. His unfavourable opinion of Plautus, then, confessedly rests on no other ground than his style. We may take the style, as well as the matter, of Plautus and of Nævius to have had much about the same relation to the style and matter of the Augustan age that Ben Jonson's and Shakespeare's have to those of the present day. The style rough, quaint, and in part obsolete; the matter frequently coarse, sometimes gross—a comparison from which, of course, the question of merit or genius is altogether excluded. As to indelicacy, we have only to go as far back as to our own Congreve to be satisfied that, in that respect at least, the English stage has undergone, within a century, a much greater reformation than the Roman stage could boast of in the whole period from the time of Plautus to that of Horace. The allusion made to the comic poet in the Arte Poetica affords, I think, no bad illustration of the general strain of Horace's critical reflections.* "But your ancestors," he says, "praised the versification of Plautus as well as his wit; indeed, they used to admire both one and the other with a readiness quite unaccountable, not to say ridiculous—at least, if you or I know anything about the matter, if we can distinguish wit from buffoonery, or know how to prove proper verses with our fingers and our ears!" Now, really, Mr Horace, pardon me, but really this smells of the shop!—"on our fingers!" I presume you are facetious, but still—"on our fingers!" The secrets, Sir—pray respect the secrets of the trade. What! are we to have our ceremonies exposed to the public gaze, our sacred rites revealed, our cherished institutions laid bare to the profane eyes of the vulgar? Sir, you touch us nearly—we fear you never heard of vested interests; let me say, such unseasonable blabbing is in the highest degree unconstitutional and dangerous, and such as might, for aught I know, bring into contempt the very fabric of our poetocracy!

What makes it so strange that Horace should stigmatise the style of Plautus in this unqualified manner is, that he raises no such outcry against others of the old school whose language was, at least, as far removed from the polished standard of the Augustan age. In his critical doctrines, Horace generally appears to do little more than echo the opinions current amongst well-educated people; therein, however, as in many other features, strongly resembling our own Twickenham bard, who, seldom originating much himself, was yet able to give such a lustre and beauty to objects of ordinary contemplation, and to exhibit them in a light so novel and brilliant as rather seemed a new creation than an adoption. Yet surely the admirers of Plautus formed no sect or schism in the literary world at any period. Not to insist on the many strong and indisputable evidences we have of the admiration in which his writings were held, it may be observed, that it was to his style especially that that admiration was directed. It was said by Varro, that if the Muses spoke Latin it would be the Latin of Plautus; yet Horace could not make it go "on his fingers!" Besides this general slight, he seems to insinuate elsewhere (2 lib. 1 epist.) that Plautus only wrote for money—such, at least, is the meaning to be gathered from the text;

* Since writing this article I have fallen in with the following spirited passage from Camerarius, the learned German, (Dissert. de Comæd. Plauti) quoted in 'Dunlop's History of Roman Literature.' It refers to this very criticism of Horace. "Immo illi proavi merito, et recte ac sapienter Plautum laudant et admirati fuerunt, tuque (sc. Horat.) ad Græcitate, omnia, quasi regulam, poemata gentis tue exigens, immerito, et perperam, atque inoportunè censas."

but it must be owned that a considerable obscurity pervades the passage in question—a fault with which, as his biographer, Suetonius, has justly remarked, he is in general by no means chargeable (quo vitio minime tenebatur); and, taking all things into account, it is impossible not to suspect that this passage has suffered damage or mutilation in some stage of its journey down to posterity, probably over the dangerous cross-roads of transcription.* If not, then we must understand the following animadversion as applying as well to Plautus as to the person of whom it is more immediately spoken. "All he thought about was, how to fill his pocket; and whether his piece succeeded, or whether it was damned, it was all one to him, when that object was secured!" This is very shocking, if true, as they say. However, I have no heart to quarrel with the old fellow for anything he says in the above-cited epistle, in consideration of the admirable, and no doubt richly-merited, castigation he administers to the play-going idiots of his time; a time at which, it would appear, that common sense and common understanding were as religiously abjured by the theatrical public as they are in England at this moment; indeed, with the slightest imaginable change in the wording, there is not a line of what he says on the subject that might not just as well have been written yesterday; there could not be a more natural series of reflections for any newspaper critique on our present exhibitions. In "Sape etiam audacem, &c." I discover a decided allusion to Sheridan Knowles; who, with all his confidence and courage, both as an author and actor, was obliged to retreat from the major theatres at last, no longer caring to share the stage with devils and rascals. Then what a slap at the dress circle is that "Verum equitis quoque, &c."—and how lamentably true!

[This article will be concluded in one more paper.]

* The three lines following "Adspice, Plautus" are surely intended in a favourable sense, both to Plautus and Dorsennus; and if we then substitute Non tamen adstricto percurrat in the place of "Quam non adstricto percurrat," should we not obtain a general sense much more conformable to the natural course of reasoning, than by attempting to make the whole six lines convey a continuous censure?

CHARACTERS OF SHAKESPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

[No. V.—TEMPEST.]

THERE can be little doubt that Shakespeare was the most universal genius that ever lived. "Either for tragedy, comedy, history, pastoral-comical, historical-pastoral, scene indivisible or poem unlimited, he is the only man. Seneca cannot be too heavy, nor Plautus too light for him." He has not only the same absolute command over our laughter and our tears, all the resources of passion, of wit, of thought, of observation, but he has the most unbounded range of fanciful invention, whether terrible or playful, the same insight into the world of imagination that he has into the world of reality: and over all there presides the same truth of character and nature, and the same spirit of humanity. His ideal beings are as true and natural as his real characters; that is, as consistent with themselves, or if we suppose such beings to exist at all, they could not act, speak, or feel otherwise than as he makes them. He has invented for them a language, manners, and sentiments of their own, from the tremendous imprecations of the Witches in 'Macbeth,' when they do "a deed without a name," to the sylph-like expressions of Ariel, who "does his spiriting gently;" the mischievous tricks and gossiping of Robin Goodfellow, or the uncouth gabbling and emphatic gesticulations of Caliban in this play.

The 'Tempest' is one of the most original and perfect of Shakspeare's productions, and he has shown in it all the variety of his powers. It is full of grace and grandeur. The human and imaginary characters, the dramatic and the grotesque, are blended together with the greatest art, and without any appearance of it. Though he has here given "to airy nothing a local habitation and a name," yet that part which is only the fantastic creation of his mind, has the same palpable texture, and coheres "seemingly" with the rest. As the preternatural part has the air of reality, and almost haunts the imagination with a sense of truth, the real characters and events partake of the wildness of a dream. The stately magician, Prospero, driven from his dukedom, but around whom (so potent is his art) airy spirits throng numberless to do his bidding; his daughter Miranda ("worthy of that name") to whom all the power of his art points, and who seems the goddess of the isle; the princely Ferdinand cast by fate upon the haven of his happiness in this idol of his love; the delicate Ariel; the savage Caliban, half brute, half demon; the drunken ship's crew—all are connected parts of the story, and can hardly be spared from the place they fill. Even the local scenery is of a piece and character with the subject. Prospero's enchanted island seems to have risen up out of the sea; the airy music, the tempest-tost vessel, the turbulent waves, all have the effect of the landscape back-ground of some fine picture. Shakspeare's pencil is (to use an allusion of his own) "like the dyer's hand, subdued to what it works in." Everything in him, though it partakes of "the liberty of wit," is also subjected to "the law" of the understanding. For instance, even the drunken sailors, who are made reeling-ripe, share, in the disorder of their minds and bodies, in the tumult of the elements, and seem on shore to be as much at the mercy of chance as they were before at the mercy of the winds and waves. These fellows with their seawit are the least to our taste of any part of the play: but they are as like drunken sailors as they can be, and are an indirect foil to Caliban, whose figure acquires a classical dignity in the comparison.

The character of Caliban is generally thought (and justly so) to be one of the author's masterpieces. It is not indeed pleasant to see this character on the stage any more than it is to see the god Pan personated there. But in itself it is one of the wildest and most abstracted of all Shakspeare's characters, whose deformity whether of body or mind is redeemed by the power and truth of the imagination displayed in it. It is the essence of grossness, but there is not a particle of vulgarity in it. Shakspeare has described the brutal mind of Caliban in contact with the pure and original forms of nature; the character grows out of the soil where it is rooted uncontrolled, uncouth and wild, uncramped by any of the meannesses of custom. It is "of the earth, earthy." It seems almost to have been dug out of the ground, with a soul instinctively superadded to it answering to its wants and origin. Vulgarity is not natural coarseness, but conventional coarseness, learnt from others, contrary to, or without an intire conformity of natural power and disposition; as fashion is the common-place affectation of what is elegant and refined without any feeling of the essence of it. Schlegel, the admirable German critic on Shakspeare, observes that Caliban is a poetical character, and "always speaks in blank verse." He first comes in thus:—

"CALIBAN. As wicked dew as e'er my mother brush'd

With raven's feather from unwholesome fen,
Drop on you both: a south-west blow on ye,
And blister ye all o'er!

PROSPERO. For this, be sure, to-night thou shalt have cramps,
Side-stitches that shall pen thy breath up; urchins
Shall for that vast of night that they may work,
All exercise on thee: thou shalt be pinch'd
As thick as honey-combs, each pinch more stinging
Than bees that made 'em.

CALIBAN. I must eat my dinner.

This island's mine by Sycorax my mother,
Which thou tak'st from me. When thou camest first,
Thou stroak'dst me, and mad'st much of me;
would'st give me

Water with berries in't; and teach me how
To name the bigger light and how the less
That burn by day and night; and then I lov'd thee,
And show'd thee all the qualities o' th' isle,
The fresh springs, brine-pits, barren place and fertile:

Curs'd be I that did so! All the charms
Of Sycorax, toads, beetles, bats, light on you!
For I am all the subjects that you have,
Who first was mine own king; and here you styme
In this hard rock, whilst you do keep from me
The rest o' th' island."

And again, he promises Trinculo his services thus, if he will free him from his drudgery.

"I'll show thee the best springs; I'll pluck thee berries,

I'll fish for thee, and get thee wood enough.
I prythee let me bring thee where crabs grow,
And I wish my long nails will dig thee pig-nuts:
Show thee a jay's nest, and instruct thee how
To snare the nimble marmoset: I'll bring thee
To clust'ring filberds; and sometimes I'll get thee
Young scamels from the rock."

In conducting Stephano and Trinculo to Prospero's cell, Caliban shows the superiority of natural capacity over greater knowledge and greater folly; and, in a former scene, when Ariel frightens them with his music, Caliban to encourage them accounts for it in the eloquent poetry of the senses,—

"Be not afraid, the isle is full of noises,
Sounds, and sweet airs, that give delight and hurt not.
Sometimes a thousand twanging instruments
Will hum about mine ears, and sometimes voices,
That if I then had wak'd after long sleep,
Would make me sleep again; and then in dreaming,
The clouds methought would open, and show riches
Ready to drop upon me: when I wak'd
I cried to dream again."

[This is not more beautiful than it is true. The poet here shows us the savage with the simplicity of a child, and makes the strange monster amiable. Shakspeare had to paint the human animal rude and without choice in its pleasures, but not without the sense of pleasure or some germ of the affections. Master Barnardine in 'Measure for Measure,' the savage of civilized life, is an admirable philosophical counterpart to Caliban.]

Shakspeare has, as it were by design, drawn off from Caliban the elements of whatever is ethereal and refined, to compound them in the unearthly mould of Ariel. Nothing was ever more finely conceived than this contrast between the material and the spiritual, the gross and delicate. Ariel is imaginary power, the swiftness of thought personified. When told to make good speed by Prospero, he says, "I drink the air before me." This is something like Puck's boast on a similar occasion, "I'll put a girdle round about the earth in forty minutes." But Ariel differs from Puck in having a fellow feeling in the interests of those he is employed about. How exquisite is the following dialogue between him and Prospero!—

"ARIEL. Your charm so strongly works 'em,
That if you now beheld them, your affections
Would become tender.

PROSPERO. Dost thou think so, spirit?

ARIEL. Mine would, sir, were I human.

PROSPERO. And mine shall.

Hast thou, which art but air, a touch, a feeling
Of their afflictions, and shall not myself,
One of their kind, that relish all as sharply,
Passion'd as they, be kindlier moved than thou art?"

It has been observed that there is a peculiar charm in the songs introduced in Shakspeare, which, without conveying any distinct images, seem to recall all the feelings connected with them, like snatches of half-forgotten music heard indistinctly and at intervals. There is this effect produced by Ariel's songs, which (as we are told) seem to sound in the air, and as if the person playing them were invisible. We shall give one instance out of many of this general power.

"Enter FERDINAND; and ARIEL invisible, playing and singing.

ARIEL'S SONG.

Come unto these yellow sands,
And then take hands:
Curt'sied when you have, and kiss'd,
(The wild waves whist;)
Foot it fealty here and there;
And sweet sprites the burden bear.

[Burden dispersedly.

Hark, hark! bowgh-wowgh: the watch-dogs
Bowgh-wowgh. [bark,

ARIEL. Hark, hark! I hear
The strain of strutting chancicleer
Cry cock-a-doodle-doo.

FERDINAND. Where should this music be? in air or earth

It sounds no more: and sure it waits upon
Some god o' th' island. Sitting on a bank
Weeping against the king my father's wreck,
This music crept by me upon the waters,
Allaying both their fury and my passion
With its sweet air; thence I have follow'd it
Or it hath drawn me rather:—but 'tis gone.—
No, it begins again.

ARIEL'S SONG.

Full fathom five thy father lies,
Of his bones are coral made:
Those are pearls that were his eyes,
Nothing of him that doth fade,
But doth suffer a sea change,
Into something rich and strange.
Sea-nymphs hourly ring his knell—
Hark! now I hear them, ding-dong bell.
[Burden ding-dong.

FERDINAND. The ditty does remember my drown'd father.

This is no mortal business, nor no sound
That the earth owns: I hear it now above me."

The courtship between Ferdinand and Miranda is one of the chief beauties of this play. It is the very purity of love. The pretended interference of Prospero with it heightens its interest, and is in character with the magician, whose sense of preternatural power makes him arbitrary, tetchy, and impatient of opposition.

The 'Tempest' is a finer play than the 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' which has sometimes been compared with it; but it is not so fine a poem. There are a greater number of beautiful passages in the latter. Two of the most striking in the 'Tempest' are spoken by Prospero. The one is that admirable one when the vision which he has conjured up disappears, beginning "The cloud-capp'd towers, the gorgeous palaces," &c., which have been so often quoted, that every school-boy knows it by heart; the other is that which Prospero makes in abjuring his art,—

"Ye elves of hills, brooks, standing lakes and groves,

And ye that on the sands with printless foot
Do chase the ebbing Neptune, and do fly him
When he comes back; you demi-puppets, that
By moon-shine do the green sour ringlets make,
Whereof the ewe not bites; and you whose pastime
Is to make midnight mushrooms, that rejoice
To hear the solemn curfew, by whose aid
(Weak masters tho' ye be) I have be-dimm'd
The noon-tide sun, call'd forth the mutinous winds,
And 'twixt the green sea and the ear'd vault
Set roaring war; to the dread rattling thunder
Have I giv'n fire, and rifted Jove's stout oak
With his own bolt; the strong-bas'd promontary
Have I made shake, and by the spurs pluck'd up
The pine and cedar: graves at my command
Have wak'd their sleepers; op'd, and let 'em forth
By my so potent art. But this rough magic

I here abjure; and when I have requir'd
Some heav'nly music, which ev'n now I do,
(To work mine end upon their senses that
This airy charm is for) I'll break my staff,
Bury it certain fadoms in the earth,
And deeper than did ever plummet sound,
I'll drown my book."

We must not forget to mention among other things in this play, that Shakspeare has anticipated nearly all the arguments on the Utopian schemes of modern philosophy.

"GONZALO. Had I the plantation of this isle,
my lord—

ANTONIO. He'd sow't with nettle-seed.

SEBASTIAN. Or docks or mallows.

GONZALO. And were the king on't, what would I do?

SEBASTIAN. 'Scape being drunk, for want of wine.

GONZALO. I' th' commonwealth I would by contraries

Execute all things: for no kind of traffic
Would I admit; no name of magistrate;
Letters should not be known; wealth, poverty,
And use of service, none; contract, succession,
Bourn, bound of land, tilth, vineyard, none;
No use of metal, corn, or wine, or oil;
No occupation, all men idle, all,
And women too; but innocent and pure:
No sovereignty.

SEBASTIAN. And yet he would be king on't.

ANTONIO. The latter end of his commonwealth forgets the beginning.

GONZALO. All things in common nature should produce

Without sweat or endeavour. Treason, felony,
Sword, pike, knife, gun, or need of any engine
Would I not have; but nature should bring forth,
Of its own kind, all foison, all abundance
To feed my innocent people!

SEBASTIAN. No marrying 'mong his subjects?

ANTONIO. None, man; [all idle; whores and knaves.

GONZALO. I would with such perfection govern, sir,

T' excel the golden age.

SEBASTIAN. Save his majesty!"

LIVELY GLANCES AT MEN AND THINGS IN PORTUGAL.

(From the 'Sketches' of Captain Alexander.)

A PROPER VALET.

I WAITED a considerable time at the Duke de Terceira's (the distinguished Villa Flor), to present a letter from Admiral Sartorius. His excellency was out riding; and while sitting in an ante-room, a sleek-looking English groom put his head in at the door, in order to be spoken to. He was the beau ideal of the domestic of a captain of the guards; one of the smooth-haired, long-vested, well-fed fellows, with little of work, and plenty of sauce for everyone but their own master. I asked him why he left London?

"Why, sir, since the Reform Bill, town has got very dull; my last master got into the Bench, and the nobility have all gone abroad; so I came over here to the duke."

There was a loud talking and laughing of servants in an adjoining apartment, with a clatter of knives and forks, and a little girl ran into the room. "That's the daughter of the lady's maid," said the groom. "She's looked on as one of the family;—very different with us at home, sir."

I inquired how he liked his place.

"Oh! they use me very well, sir; I'm just the same as the duke,—same dishes, separate tables, and so on; but if they don't treat me as they ought to do, I'll leave the establishment and set up for myself."

"As what?"

"As a veterinary surgeon, sir; I know something of the business, and they are d—d ignorant about horses in Portugal, sir."

THE LATE DON PEDRO.

An officer of the English squadron told me that when these lines for the defence of Lisbon were first commenced, he walked out one day to see them; and on looking about he came upon two Portuguese officers, one of whom had three stripes of lace on the cuff of his surtout. He was immediately sharply accosted by the striped gentleman, and asked, (in French) "What he was about there?" The Englishman replied, "that curiosity had prompted him to see what was going on."

"Have you permission from the commandant?"

"None."

"Well, you can't remain here."

"That's very strange. In the time of Miguel I might have expected this; but now I thought an English uniform was sufficient passport."

"Well, well! what do you think of the lines?"

"Why, I am no great judge of these matters; but as far as I can understand the nature of the defences, they seem to be very well contrived."

On this the interrogator moved on, and his companion (apparently an aide-de-camp) addressed the Englishman, and said, "Do you know whom you have been talking to?"

"No."

"Why that is his Imperial Majesty."

"Well, I am sorry I did not know it was Don Pedro, for I fear I spoke rather bluntly to him."

Accordingly, he approached his Majesty, and made an apology; on which Don Pedro frankly cried out, "Oh! never mind apologies; go where you like, you're an Englishman; I'm glad to see you," and shook hands.

ADMIRAL NAPIER.

Viscount Cape St Vincent, the gallant Napier, having arrived from his successful expedition to the North (when Camilla, Valença, Viana, &c. had fallen into his hands), I waited on his Excellency, having an introduction to him from his distinguished cousin, the Right Honourable Sir Alexander Johnstone.

I went to the naval arsenal, opposite to which is the curious stone pillar, where the nobles used to be executed; and in the principal room, the walls of which were covered with tapestry, representing marine subjects, I found clerks busy at long tables, and on looking out at a window, I saw shipwrights and other workmen busily engaged about a line-of-battle ship, and a corvette on the stocks. There was no sleeping over the work here; and there was evidently some master-spirit which kept all hands in active employ.

I was shown into a room where sat the admiral: His excellency is five feet in height, spare made, with black hair and whiskers, straight nose, and sallow complexion; his age about fifty. He was dressed in a blue surtout and trowsers, white vest, socks and shoes, and had a frank off-hand and decided air about him.

The Minister of Marine (Marjochi) came in—a tall, respectable-looking gentleman. The admiral immediately attacked the minister, to give me information about Africa; to see if in his bureau there were any documents which could be of use to me. The minister promised, in a day or two, to supply me with what was requisite.

The admiral kept me for a considerable time with him, talking occasionally and getting through a great deal of business; he seemed to be as ready with the pen as with his sword.

The admiral sometimes made a triumphal entry to a place, seated on an ass or mule, cocked hat athwart ships, and cutlass by his side. At one of the towns of the Algarve, where the Mayor and corporation came off to pay him homage, and had prepared a laurel crown for his excellency, he impatiently called out, whilst waiting in the cabin to receive them, "Come, bear a hand with the ceremony."

Talking of small fry,—improvement has taken place in the education of children; schools on the Lancasterian principle are now common, as also schools for infants. The government is giving much attention to education, and it is to be hoped much good will be done.

THE WEEK.

BIRTH-DAYS AND OTHER ANNIVERSARIES.

FEBRUARY 11, 1657. At Rouen, Bernard Le Boirer de Fontenelle, son of an advocate of parliament, and nephew of Corneille; a man of universal literature, chiefly known to posterity as a popularizer of astronomy, and one who by a temperament at once lively and tranquil succeeded in preserving a naturally delicate constitution to the age of nearly a hundred, with no other infirmity than a little deafness. His equable temper subjected him to a charge of want of feeling; and a ludicrous story has been told of his having a friend come to dine with him, who expired as the meal was preparing; upon which Fontenelle, who in consideration of his friend's taste had ordered some fish to be fried partly in butter and partly in oil, jumped up, and called out to the cook, "The whole with oil! The whole with oil." Madame d'Abrantes, on the authority of a personal friend of Fontenelle's, treats this story as a jealous fabrication; and most probably it was nothing better. It is not like the conduct of a man, one of whose maxims was, that "we ought to be sparing of superfluities to ourselves, in order to be able to supply necessities to others;" and whose whole character had the general reputation of corresponding with his professions.

Same day, 1732. In the parish of Washington, in Virginia, of an ancient family of Cheshire, George Washington, one of the founders, and First President, of the United States;—one of those rare characters for prudence in the smallest things, and success in the greatest, which keeps a man's fame with posterity suspended between doubt and admiration,—between doubt whether his success was not mainly owing to negative qualities and to the circumstances which rendered them of sovereign benefit, and admiration of the vigor, perseverance, and public disinterestedness with which he secured and ennobled it. The greatest suspicion of Washington's want of genius arises from the dry formality of his manners, and the minute and steward-like attention he paid to the smallest details throughout his life, public and private. His claim to grandeur of reputation consists in his public virtue, rather than his talents as a soldier, which however suitable to the exigency, are thought not to have been severely put to the test by the generals sent against him. The most awkward thing in his disfavour as a man of a very enlarged mind and an abstract lover of liberty, is his retention of his black slaves on his estate, and his inability, or disdain, to say a word in defence of it, when he was asked the reason. But in this also he might have sacrificed his real feelings to notions of existing necessity, and for the better security of liberty to all hereafter. Yet the positive contempt with which the majority of his countrymen regard their black fellow-creatures to this day, is not an argument in favour of that hypothesis. We must add, that it is the greatest blot upon their character, and quite unworthy the advances they have made in so many other respects.

— 14. St Valentine's Day. See an admirable article upon it, in our extracts this week from Mr Lamb. We rejoice to see that the day is still noticed in the new and improved almanacs. Such anniversaries must not be abolished, any more than youth and love itself. Besides, what would become of our school-friend and playmate, the "little god of love," Cupid himself, if he were to go out of the "Valentines" with their bleeding hearts, all stuck through with arrows? for he is now to be found nowhere else. The very French poets have cut him.

— 15, 1674. At Dijon, where his father was chief registrar of the Chamber of Accounts, Prosper Jolyot de Crebillon, one of the four celebrated French tragic writers,—Corneille, Racine, and Voltaire, being the others. We cannot speak of his writings from knowledge; but their severe subjects, and the manner in which he handled them, procured him the title of the French Æschylus. He was a man of a high and independent spirit, and therefore a piece of playful flattery came with the more grace from him. When he went in his old age to thank the king's mistress, Madame de Pompadour, for a pension she had procured him, he was introduced into her bed-room (a French custom), and was in the act of kissing her hand, when the monarch came in (Louis XV). "Alas, madame!" exclaimed the venerable poet, "the King has surprised us; I am undone." Louis was diverted with this sally, and ever afterwards befriended him. Crebillon died at the age of eighty-eight.

— 16, 1497. At Bretten upon the Rhine, Philip Melancthon, the most amiable of the Lutheran reformers. His real name was Schwartzerd (Black Earth), which, agreeably to a custom of German literati in those times, he translated into Greek,—Melancthon having the same meaning in that language. His father was an armourer. His mother, being old at the time of the Reformation, and having timid doubts of the propriety of quitting the ancient faith, the son, with true Christian liberality, advised her to retain it.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

LVIII. HONEST ULTRA-DEVOTION.

NICHOLAS FERRAR, the son of a London merchant, at the conclusion of the sixteenth century (says the 'Lounger'), inherited from his mother a delicate constitution, but a vigorous mind, and eagerly devoted his early life to literary occupation. Religious books being first put into his hand made an impression on his mind, which never was removed, and when only six years old, he was able to repeat by heart a considerable portion of the 'Old and New Testaments,' the 'English Chronicle,' and Fox's 'Book of Martyrs.' At the age of eight he was placed under the tuition of a worthy clergyman, near Newbury in Berkshire, whose discipline was so successful, or the aptness of his scholar so great, that, being considered as qualified for an University, he was sent, when thirteen years old, to Clare Hall in Cambridge, where Dr Linsell, afterwards Bishop of Peterborough, became his tutor. To use the words of Mr Ferrar's right reverend biographer (for he was not only instructed, but his life has been written by a bishop), it was soon observed that Ferrar's candle was the first lighted, and the last extinguished in that college. This sedentary drudgery was not likely so improve a tender habit, and being under the necessity of applying for medical advice, his physician recommended travelling, in the hope of calling off for a time his unceasing application to books. The Princess Elizabeth, one of the daughters of King James the First, who had married the Count Palatine, being at that moment on her way to Germany, Mr Ferrar was permitted to join the suite of her highness, and accompanied them part of the way. They landed in Holland, and after accompanying his countrymen to the borders of Germany, as he proposed going considerably to the north of the Palatinate, he took his leave; visiting Munster, Hanover, and Cassel, leaving no place till all that was to be seen or heard had been explored. At Leipsic, finding his health better, he remained several months, again applied to his books, and, to qualify himself for making further progress as well as profit in travelling, improved himself in the modern languages.

He now resolved to see Italy, not indeed by the direct road, but visiting such places as were likely to gratify his curiosity, or afford opportunities of improving his mind, and adding to his knowledge. He continued a few days at Dresden, and made a considerable deviation for the purpose of visiting Prague, Ratisbon, Augsborg, Munich, Saltabourg, Inspruck, and Trent. At that period, Europe was under considerable dread of that awful scourge, the plague, and Mr Ferrar was obliged near the Italian frontier to undergo the precautionary secession, something similar to quarantine. It was at the time, that season of the year, when the Christian church enjoins for a certain period fasting and prayer, as a salutary and impressive memorial of the patience, trials, and forbearance of Jesus Christ. Our pious traveller passed the greater part of the forty days during Lent in abstinence and devout meditation, on a mountain almost covered with rosemary and wild thyme, descending regularly every evening to make a moderate meal on fish. This temporary solitude first gave Mr Ferrar a relish for mental abstraction and contemplative devotion, imparted a peculiar tincture to his faith, his conduct, and his manners, and ultimately decided the singular manner in which he passed the after-part of his life. These impressions were also further confirmed by his narrowly escaping a sudden and violent death; this mercy he never forgot, but indelibly fixed it on his mind by an anniversary practice of fasting, prayer, and thanksgiving.

Having sufficiently guarded against the dangers of pestilential affection to himself, or communicating it to others, a precaution in many respects troublesome, tedious, and vexatious, but against which no man ought to object, Mr Ferrar passed on to the once renowned, but decayed University of Padua. He here attended a course of medical lectures, which qualified him to be useful afterwards to his country neighbours. After a stay of four months, he quitted Padua precipitately, terrified by real or imaginary dangers, from certain Jesuits, who, with the Pope, the devil, and the pretender, were once the bugbears, the raw-head and bloody-boxes of England, and probably not without reason.

He repaired without delay to Rome, and, after seeing whatever was worthy of notice in the ecclesiastical metropolis or its environs, made a retrograde movement to the mercantile sea-port of Leghorn, and in a few days, embarking in a felucca, crossed that part of the Mediterranean which is called the Sea of Genoa, and landed at Marseilles. After remaining in that city three weeks, he re-embarked in an English vessel for the Spanish port of St Sebastian. Being disappointed in his expectation of a pecuniary remittance at this place, he walked to Madrid, where he heard that his mother, now a widow, was involved in trouble. In the eagerness of filial affection, he took the earliest opportunity of sailing for England; and, after a five years' absence from his native country, landed at Dover with a constitution considerably amended, and large additions of information, learning, and science.

Mr Ferrar could not restrain the pious gratitude and patriotic rapture he felt. The instant he jumped on shore, he fell on his knees on the beach, returned thanks to the Almighty for that protecting providence which had sheltered him from perils by land and perils by sea, and then kissed his native soil. By the established goodness of his character, and a large share of natural sagacity, he was enabled to extricate his family from their difficulties, which had been produced or augmented by a litigious attorney. In 1624 he was chosen a member of the House of Commons, and in this capacity took an active part against the treasurer, Sir Lionel Cranfield, who, from the humble station of a Custom-house officer, had by his fiscal projects so ingratiated himself with King James, that he gave him a lord treasurer's staff, and created him a peer of the realm. Sir Lionel had been accused by his enemies, I know not how justly, of corruptly conniving at certain injurious monopolies. But Mr Ferrar, in Parliament or on his travels, in his closet or the world, never lost sight of what appears to have been, at a very early period, the favourite wish and purpose of his heart—religious retirement, and the devoting himself wholly to God—forgetting, as too many of his predecessors in the same path have done, that those exertions should seem to be most pleasing to the Creator which imitate his attributes and are productive of social utility. In this plan of retirement he was powerfully aided by his mother, who felt and indulged similar propensities, and being possessed of the house and manor of Little Gidding, in Huntingdonshire, had apt means in her hands of putting into execution this favourite purpose.

As the first step Mr Ferrar procured himself to be ordained by Dr Laud; then taking leave of London, and finally adjusting every affair likely to require his presence in the metropolis, he prepared to depart with his mother, his elder brother, his sister, her husband, a Mr Colet, and their fifteen children, of whom six sons and three daughters were married. This religious colony, consisting, with the servants, of upwards of forty persons, quitted London, and by easy journeys repaired to Little Gidding.

The house, which had for many years been in the occupation of a farmer, they found in a ruinous and neglected state—the garden a wilderness—pigs had been kept in a pleasure house, and the church was converted into a barn. Provoked at what he considered as profane misapplication, Mr Ferrar would not sleep till he saw the house of God cleared of its contents, and actually performed divine service in it by candle-light before the family retired to rest. It was afterwards completely repaired within and without.

To make a large roomy mansion, which had been so long left to decay, a fit habitation for a large and respectable family, was a work of time, labour, and expence; even to subside them required some skill, effort, and contrivance. For this purpose the land, which in those days produced an annual rent of five hundred pounds, was kept in hand, and agricultural superintendence was assigned to such individuals of the family as were qualified for the task by knowledge, health, age, and inclination. Timber in the meantime was cut down, and other necessary materials procured, capacious barns, &c. were erected, and the whole of the premises completely repaired; additional household stuff was purchased, and a sufficient stock of fuel and other stores laid in. But no occupation was permitted to interfere with the purpose of Mr Ferrar's retirement. The whole family were expected to attend public worship, every morning, Mr Ferrar officiating himself, and, to prevent this duty interfering with those of the house and farm, the house rose at five during the winter, and at four o'clock in summer time. Part of the house was appropriated to the purposes of a school, to which masters were assigned, and here the children of the family, and those of the neighbourhood who would conform to rule, were taught to read and write, grammar and arithmetic, and the duties and principles of religion. Occasional amusement was not prohibited them; little prizes being sometimes given to those who excelled in learning; also to those who could run, jump, swim, and drive an arrow nearest to the mark.

The young women of the house were clothed alike in black stuff; and such time as was not employed in church or domestic duty, was dedicated to the infirm, aged, and diseased; for which purpose medicines and all conveniences for dispensing them were at hand, Mr Ferrar being qualified to give advice and directions in administering the medicines employed. The female part of the family employed themselves at the proper season in distilling cordial waters and working carpets and cushions for the church and parlours. As a hint to such as sometimes visited Little Gidding, the following inscription was placed in the hall at which everyone entered:—"He, who by gentle reproof and kind remonstrance strives to make us better, is welcome; but he who goeth about so disturb us in that which ought to be the chief business of every Christian, is a burthen while he stays, and his own conscience shall witness against him when he departs."

On another conspicuous pannel appeared these words:—"He, who is willing to be a cheerful participator with us in that which is good, confirms us in the same, and acts as a friend, but he who bitterly censures us when absent, and makes a show of approbation when in our presence, incurs the double guilt of flattery and slander, and violates the bond of Christian charity."

The laws of hospitality were not forgotten by Mrs Ferrar or her son, many of the nobility, clergy, and other travellers, calling on them; King Charles I, on his march to the north, visited them, and the Bishop of Lincoln was sometimes their guest.

Watching, a very ancient discipline in the Christian church, if not contemporary with its rise, was looked upon by Mr Ferrar as an indispensable part of his religious duty. To this end, he had different oratories for the sexes, in which, from nine till past twelve, he and others took their turns of repeating psalms, passages of scripture, and occasionally singing to the organ, which was set in a low stop, that notice might not be excited, nor the house disturbed. There, for many years, lived this singular character, and in his last moments, elevated by hope or deranged by debility, he insisted on having had celestial communication.

By his relations he was called scrupitic, and accounted little less than a saint: by a late writer he is termed an useless enthusiast, and Little Gidding, an Armenian Nunnery; the Papists said he was a Puritan, and the Puritans abused him as a Papist. To make Mr Ferrar's example the rule of life would be absurd, though it were to be wished, that among the majority of persons of his rank and condition, so much could be found of that piety pleasing to God, and so little of that depravity which brings misery and degradation to man. In another point of view, Mr Ferrar was to be praised; although he practised ceremonies, &c., which some may consider as absolutely enjoined by the Christian faith, he did not regard them in the light of what have been called, by the old controversialists, works of supererogation; which might authorise or wipe away practical transgression; he did not one jot relax in his endeavour to be what he was, a man pure in morals and of strict integrity, a dutiful son, an affectionate brother, a kind neighbour, and an honest man. Happy would it be for the world, if all, who like him have fasted and prayed, would imitate the correctness of his life, and still happier, if those who set at nought all ritual observance, would prove by a discharge of their social duties that human virtue stands in need of no aid from revelation to stimulate us by hope and fear to salutary exertion.

MUSIC.

The Musical Magazine. No. I. F. de Perquet and Cooper; Simpkin and Marshall.

We are glad to welcome a periodical devoted to the interests of music, which appears likely to last, and be of service to the art. Periodicals dedicated to either of the fine arts have too commonly originated among such persons as, being scarcely successful in their own profession, have endeavoured to eke out their resources with a precarious and ill-judged inroad upon the field of literature, and, having proved unequal to the task they have been educated to perform, imagine they can succeed better in a more difficult labour, for which they are fitted neither by their original taste, their education, nor their habits. Such being the case, jealousy on the one side produces a tendency to decry the powers of those who have attained the envied point of fame and prosperity, and sympathy, on the other, creates a false estimate of the claims of brothers in adversity; while a spirit of truckling to the prejudices and whims of patron dilettanti, flattering their little dabbling efforts in art, completes the shabbiness of the parasitical fortune-hunting intruder in the republic of letters. Instead of being devoted to the interests of the art, periodicals have been rather devoted to the interests of a clique among its professors, appealing to a body of men too small, too insignificant and impoverished, to support even the expenses of the publication. The public will never take an interest in the complaints and difficulties of men who accuse it of injustice; neglected worth gains nothing by publishing its own degradation, and expatiating upon its own value. Public approbation and public support are not to be obtained for the asking; they must be bought at an equivalent. If the public, that huge creature, do not see its own interest, the feeble voice of a neglected servant will be long repeated—long echoed by other single voices, till it grow into a clamour, before the world will hear it; a longer while than a man's life endures. As well might a flower withering in the shade call out to the sun to turn its broad face upon it. But how often is real power crushed in its abiding place, dying alone? There is no ground for supposing that it is often. How many men overrate their own abilities, and fancy rather that the world is a deaf one that will not hear, not that their own voices are feeble, and their matter not worth attending to? Are there not many—are not most of those who so perpetually weary us with complaints of injury and neglect composed of such individuals? and are such men, so feeble, so prejudiced, so mistaken in themselves and others, to be the arbiters of successful rivals, or the champions of their art? Who would trust a rejected suitor for a character of his mistress's husband? Unsuccessful pretenders, too, are generally tiresome. We seldom sympathise with them; if we do there is no pleasure in the sympathy, and we shuffle it away as fast as we can, pained with the pain, annoyed by the bad temper.

Such have been the periodicals in the service of the arts,—such the causes of their failure. That there are many professors of music, and many amateurs who would be glad of a vehicle for information and intelligence cannot be denied; but the professors could not relish the invidious complaints of their discontented brothers, nor the public interest themselves in their private bickerings. A work, therefore, by keeping the interests of the art chiefly in view, in which those of the public and the professors are included, would not be obnoxious to the dangers which have proved so generally fatal to its predecessors. We hope that the 'Musical Magazine' will prove itself of a healthy constitution; it has begun most auspiciously. We have a second edition of the first number before us, and that first number is copious, various, amusing, liberal, and cheap. The critical portion of the work appears accurate and impartial. We take the article on Neukomm to be a very fair estimate of his abilities. The highly interesting and edifying account of the disinterested and enthusiastic M. Kaupert, extracted from the 'Evangelical Magazine,' we reserve to make further comment on in a future number. The subject is too highly interesting to be slightly passed over. There is some original music, too, a ballad by Lee, and a waltz by Beethoven. The subject of the ballad is a little meagre, but it is prettily treated; and the latter part is very pleasing. Beethoven's waltz is beautifully flowing, and rich in the harmony.

The 'Musical Magazine,' however, should keep itself above suspicion. There is a passage at page 16, under the head of 'Musical Chit-Chat,' which might be taken equivocally. The criticisms on the press, in a subsequent paragraph, would have been better omitted, or more explicitly worded. General accusations are not always just to individuals; and the magazine itself extracts one of its best paragraphs from a newspaper, the 'Atlas.' The following anecdote will amuse our readers: it is not the only one to be found in the columns of the 'Musical Magazine.'

"MUSIC WON THE CAUSE."

Anseume, a gentleman of very limited income, hired a small house at Bagnolet, and invited his friends once or twice a week to come and amuse themselves there. On these occasions, each brought some provisions: one wine, another cold meat, another patties, another game. It unluckily happened that Anseume, as absent in mind as straitened in his finances, had forgotten, for a whole year, to pay his rent. The landlord made a descent upon him precisely on the day that his friends Collé, Panard, Piron, Gillet, the painter Watteau, the musician Degueville, and other epicures, had assembled there. These gentlemen, according to custom, had brought plenty of provender, but no money; and the landlord imperiously demanded his rent of two hundred crowns. What was to be done, in order to assist their friend? They immediately set about cooking the meat and poultry; they levied contributions on the fruit and vegetables of the gardens; Watteau drew a beautiful and inviting sign, and Degueville borrowed a violin of the parish beadle; in short, they got up a cabaret and a fête champêtre. The appearance of these new cooks, who served their customers in habits of embroidered velvet, with swords by their sides, had a curious effect, and greatly diverted the company, which was so numerous, that the receipts amounted to five hundred crowns. Anseume paid his landlord, and his distress was converted into joy and gladness. But now a question arose that was discussed with no small earnestness and interest. To which of his guests was the host most indebted? Those who played the parts of cooks declared that without their labours there would have been nothing for the public to eat. Watteau laid no little stress on the invitation held out by his sign; and Degueville insisted that, without his music, the people's attention would not have been drawn to the sign; and that, even if they had noticed it, and come in, there would have been no mirth and spirit, little eaten, and that little scantily and reluctantly paid for. The dispute began to grow warm, when Degueville seized the violin, played them all into good humour, and was at length allowed to be the victor."—P. 13.

ST VALENTINE'S DAY.

HAIL to thy returning festival, old Bishop Valentine! Great is thy name in the rubric, thou venerable Arch-flamen of Hymen! Immortal Go-between! who and what manner of person art thou? Art thou but a name, typifying the restless principle which impels poor humans to seek perfection in union? or wert thou indeed a mortal prelate, with thy tippet and thy rochet, thy apron on, and decent lawn sleeves? Mysterious personage! like unto thee, assuredly, there is no other mitred father in the calendar; not Jerome, nor Ambrose, nor Cyril; nor the consigner of undipt infants to eternal torments, Austin, whom all mothers hate; nor he who hated all mothers, Origen; nor Bishop Bull, nor Archbishop Parker, nor Whitgift. Thou comest attended with thousands and ten thousands of little Loves, and the air is Brush'd with the hiss of rustling wings.

Singing Cupids are thy choristers and thy precentors; and instead of the crosier, the mystical arrow is borne before thee.

In other words, this is the day on which those charming little missives, yoleped Valentines, cross and intercross each other at every street and turning. The weary and all forspent twopenny postman sinks beneath a load of delicate embarrassments, not his own. It is scarcely credible to what an extent this ephemeral courtship is carried on in this loving town, to the great enrichment of porters, and detriment of knockers and bell-wires. In these little visual interpretations, no emblem is so common as the heart,—that little three-cornered exponent of all our hopes and fears,—the bestuck and bleeding heart; it is twisted and tortured into more allegories and affectations than an opera hat. What authority we have in history or mythology for placing the head-quarters and metropolis of god Cupid in this anatomical seat rather than in any other, is not very clear; but we have got it, and it will serve as well as any other. Else we might easily imagine, upon some other system which might have prevailed for anything which our pathology knows to the contrary, a lover addressing his mistress, in perfect simplicity of feeling, "Madam, my liver and fortune are intirely at your disposal;" or putting a delicate question, "Amanda, have you a midriff to bestow?" But custom has settled these things, and awarded the seat of sentiment to the aforesaid triangle, while its less fortunate neighbours wait at animal and anatomical distance.

Not many sounds in life, and I include all urban and all rural sounds, exceed in interest a knock at the door. It "gives a very echo to the throne where Hope is seated." But its issues seldom answer to this oracle within. It is so seldom that just the person we want to see comes. But of all the clamorous visitations the welcome in expectation is the sound that ushers in, or seems to usher in, a Valentine. As the raven himself was hoarse that announced the fatal entrance of Duncan, so the knock of the postman on this day is light, airy, confident, and befitting one that bringeth good tidings. It is less mechanical than on other days; you will say, "That is not the post, I am sure." Visions of Love, of Cupids, of Hymens!—delightful eternal common-places, which "having been will always be;" which no school-boy nor school-man can write away; having your irreversible throne in the fancy and affections—what are your transports, when the happy maiden, opening with careful finger, careful not to break the emblematic seal, bursts upon the sight of some well-designed allegory, some type, some youthful fancy, not without verses—

Lovers all,
A madrigal,

or some such device, not over abundant in sense— young Love disclaims it,—and not quite silly— something between wind and water, a chorus where the sheep might almost join the shepherd as they did, or as I apprehend they did, in Areadia.

All Valentines are not foolish; and I shall not easily forget thine, my kind friend (if I may have leave to call you so) E. B.—E. B. lived opposite a young maiden, whom he had often seen, unseen, from his parlour window in C—s street. She was all joyousness and innocence, and just of an age to enjoy receiving a Valentine, and just of a temper to bear the disappointment of missing one with good humour. E. B. is an artist of no common powers; in the fancy parts of designing, perhaps inferior to none; his name is known at the bottom of many a well executed vignette in the way of his profession, but no further; for E. B. is modest, and the world meets nobody half-way. E. B. meditated how he could repay this young maiden for many a favour which she had done him unknown; for when a kindly face greets us, though but passing by, and never knows us again, nor we it, we should feel it as an obligation; and E. B. did. This good artist set himself to work to please the damsel. It was just before Valentine's day three years since. He wrought, unseen and unsuspected, a wondrous work. We need not say it was on the finest gilt paper with borders—full, not of common hearts and heartless allegory, but all the prettiest stories of love from Ovid, and older poets than Ovid (for E. B. is a scholar). There was Pyramus and Thisbe, and besure Dido was not forgot, nor Hero and Leander, and swans more than sang in Cayster, with mottoes and fanciful devices, such as beseeemed,—a work in short of magic. Iris dipt the woof. This on Valentine's eve he commended to the all-swallowing indiscriminate orifice—(O, ignoble trust!)—of the common post; but the humble medium did its duty, and from his watchful stand, the next morning, he saw the cheerful messenger knock, and by and by the precious charge delivered. He saw, unseen, the happy girl unfold the Valentine, dance about, clap her hands, as one after one the pretty emblems unfolded themselves. She danced about, not with light love, or foolish expectations, for she had no lover; or, if she had, none she knew that could have created those bright images which delighted her. It was more like some fairy present; a God-send, as our familiarly pious ancestors termed a benefit received, where the benefactor was unknown. It would do her no harm. It would do her good for ever after. It is good to love the unknown. I only give this as a specimen of E. B. and his modest way of doing a concealed kindness.

Good-morrow to my Valentine, sings poor Ophelia; and no better wish, but with better auspices, we wish to all faithful lovers, who are not too wise to despise old legends, but are content to rank themselves humble diocesans of old Bishop Valentine and his true church.

GOOD QUOTATION ABOUT "FACTS."

There are more false facts, than false theories current in the world.—Alexander's Sketches in Portugal.

SPECULATIVE AND ASSIMILATING GOSSIP.

FREQUENTLY as my brother and myself sit over the fire, with our feet on the fender, and a meerschaum pending from our lips, we get gossiping upon various subjects, mystifying ourselves with wild German questions, and racking our brains to discover the undiscoverable. One of our favourite questions—one which has afforded our wits many an hour of delightful torture, and which, from its nature, is capable of affording us many more—is the perpetual motion. Oh, the innumerable and brilliant theories we have built, like the card palaces of our childhood! but only to be destroyed by some unconsidered meddling law of nature, as they were by the spherical limestone missile of some young urchin. Yet even as then we could not but admire the precision of his destructive aim, so could we not withhold our admiration of that beautiful and immutable law, which had fallen upon the apparently solid structure of our theory, when it had risen to a height producing extacy, and crushed it and our hopes together. Then would we quit the subject, mentally vowing never more to have anything to do with the slippery rascal; but it was only to return to it again at a future period with renewed vigour.

Another subject of our choice was the squaring of the circle, which possessed the same advantages as the perpetual motion, that of being, from its difficulty, an inexhaustible source of speculation. What trigonometrical constructions have been raised with geometrical precision! How the sine of every conceivable angle has been multiplied into tangent, secant, and radius! How the rectangles, under tangent and co-tangent, sine and co-sine, have been divided and multiplied by every imaginable segment of radius! How long lines of decimals have, as it were, "stretched out to the crack of doom," conveying an idea of the infinitely little! With what perseverance did X always maintain his incognito! We could never discover that he was related to anyone. He generally went by the name of the Unknown, and was rather a burly fellow, being frequently called X square. We sometimes thought that he was equal to A * * * and B * * *; but this impression we were obliged to discard, as we had frequently found him mixed up with a set of W.'s and C. A. D. S.

I could mention many other curious questions upon which we speculated. One other I remember was the following. Suppose a hole bored through the diameter of the earth, and let a body, the ends of which shall be of different density, be dropped into it. It is understood that the hole is of sufficient width to allow the body to change its position in its progress. The questions we took delight in arguing were,—Would the body acquire sufficient impetus to overcome the attraction of the earth, and find an exit at the other end; and if so, in what direction would it make its exit, the denser or the less dense end foremost? And when and where would it finally rest? A knotty point and a curious.

Sometimes we would endeavour to arrive at the solution of a difficulty, by experiment; when most woful disasters would occasionally occur, particularly when it related to some question in chemistry.

These wilder investigations we would occasionally lay aside, and take up those to which we could find a more satisfactory conclusion. Or we would hunt down some poor, almost obsolete word, until we made him confess his original meaning and derivation. One of our latest subjects of conversation was the analogy between drawing and writing. And we drew parallels between the two.

The brilliant paintings of the old masters, replete with vigour and life, convey to the eye all the pith of the painter's imagination of the subject which he delineated. So do the works of the old esteemed writers, in the clearness of their thoughts and the purity of their diction, convey at once to the understanding those impressions which they felt and were desirous of leaving behind them. Then there are the more modern paintings, rich in colouring, faithful in delineation, and true to life, but generally to the life of the present day; fertile in imaginative historical design. These may be compared to the modern writings, full of vivid descriptions of modern manners and sentiment, and abounding in fiction and historical details.

These are general resemblances; there are others more particular, such as the firm unflinching style of old heraldic drawings, how closely do they resemble the quaint, stiff, antiquated manner of the old heralds; such, for instance, as Guillim. Again, look at the phraseology of medical works, and compare it with anatomical illustrations; how ghastly and horrible; how nervous does the reading of the one and the sight of the other make one. The outline drawings of such a master-hand and imagination as is possessed by Retsch, tell a tale as well as words. His illustrations of Goethe's 'Faust' are known and admired by everyone, as also his illustrations of some of Shakspeare's plays. But one of his last, his illustrations of Schiller's song of the 'Bell,' requires no words. Were it placed before an improvisatore, he would sing it with perhaps little variation from the original song. It produces upon one the same effect as reading Schiller's own song, or La Motte Fouqué's 'Undine.' A smile hangs upon the lips; and one finds all the better feelings of our nature growing strong within one. Could the business of the world be carried on, with the tale or the drawings ever present in the remembrances of mankind, it would doubtless be a better and a happier world.

Some of our present writers resemble individual, or a class of, painters. Theodore Hook is like the old Dutch painters. Their merit lies in the faithfulness with which they depict the minutiae of life. As Hook describes every object a room contains, and allows no personages of his story to present themselves without a minute and full account of their appearance and toilet, so do the Dutch painters enter into all those little details, with which it is so delightful to meet, and which give so much truth to their paintings. Their fraus are never without pin-cushions, nor their pin-cushions without pins.

Bulwer's writings are sometimes like the hasty bold sketch of a Sir J. Reynolds or T. Lawrence.

H. B. is the illustrator on stone of the 'Don Juan' of Byron.

That incorrigible punster, T. Hood, should ride in a sociable with George Cruikshank.

The advertisement style of writing, the Rowland's Macassar Oil, Pearl Cream, and Anti-Corrosive Oriental Pearl Dentifrice, I think, we may liken to that style of wood-cut which is seen pasted upon the walls about town soon after Christmas, and is supposed to represent the principal scene in the Pantomime.

These resemblances, if such they appear to the reader, might by increased in number; but that I now leave to himself, should he feel so disposed.

POOR BLIND MAN.

THE heart bath eyes,—and the poor man who looks
On man or the world but with the bodily eye,
Shall feel no beauty in the summer sky,
Nor hear sweet Syrinx in the reedy brooks,
Nor see in the grey forest's glimmering nooks
Ideal beauty passing stately by—
To him the truth of fiction is a lie,
And prose without a purpose Poet's books—
Then let the consecrating heart be mine,
Mother of beauty, and love, and bright-eyed Hope,
And Faith triumphant—the Kaleidoscope,
(And joyous Faith, the bard's Kaleidoscope)
Whose revelations haply are divine.
When my life dorkling to the west shall slope,
Oh, may its light illumine my decline.

FINE ARTS.

Queen Esther, after Guercino. Drawn on stone, with a Steel Pen, by Miss Augusta Cole. C. Tilt.

GUERCINO is seldom vigorous, either in design or execution; but in all he has put forth, there is a grace, and an amiable beauty, more generally and thoroughly intelligible than sublimer things, which will always be dear to such as have eyes to see, and heart to feel its sweetness. In spite of an obliquity of vision (whence his appellation Guercino, squinting), he was handsome and elegant in person, with a most agreeable expression of countenance; he looks like a gentleman, and a kind and intelligent man. The character of his pictures is accordant with that of his appearance.

The design before us, which we suppose is copied from a drawing, is as deficient as any in strength, but replete with sweetness. Ahasuerus is the blandest of kings and husbands. The bold and flowing execution of the copy is a surprising contrast to the petty stiffness and hardness of the materials in which it is worked.

INTERCOURSE WITH STRANGERS.

[We have much pleasure in inserting the following letter of a Correspondent, who puts forward his sound, tabular philosophy, in right recommendatory taste between smile and earnest. Verily the icy surface of English manners beginneth to thaw under the influence of this our sunny Journal, and to disclose the riches they contain.]

2nd February 1835.

DEAR SIR,—I have a sort of ambition to scrawl a few lines to you (whether you insert them in your Journal or not, I am indifferent), just to wish you success, and to say how much I admire your delightful publication; and to crave your attention to what I consider falls particularly within your province of reprobation, as a spreader of universal brotherhood.

Every one must have observed the suspicion and reserve with which we look upon strangers, and how very jealous we are of their advances. I cannot but conceive this to be a very unfortunate feature in our society, and one which increasing enlightenment ought to, and will, remedy. A little more liberality would be the means of extending good fellowship, and perhaps of bringing together intimately parties who might derive the highest advantage (intellectually at least) by a knowledge of each other. I have known myself, and have frequently heard of, close friendship originating in a casual conversation between the acts at a theatre, or in a stage-coach—where parties have separated mutually pleased with each other—have met again—had their former good opinion confirmed—and become friends. I might relate two striking occurrences of this sort amongst my own acquaintance, but presume almost every one must have had a similar experience. Do you not think, Mr Editor, that when people—strangers to each other—chance to come in contact, each should endeavour to recommend himself to the other, if only for the sake of passing a pleasant half hour? How numerous are the neutral topics of general conversation, without venturing upon politics or other controversial matters. The fair sex are unfortunately, by the usages of society, precluded from commencing a conversation with strangers; but no polite “lord of the creation” would dream of reducing them to this dilemma. I have some recollection of your making mention of this subject sometime ago—I think with reference to Mrs Somerville—and know that at the time I cordially agreed with you. And I am convinced, my dear Mr Editor, your heart (as mine) feels a yearning towards an intelligent, good natured-looking lady, whether she be, as the song saith, “fair, or brown as a berry,” and that you long to talk with her, and hear her remarks and opinions. And from the social and humane style of your writing I am equally certain that you would not frown upon a salutation from a decent-looking specimen of the rougher sex, such as “Pleasant weather, sir,” &c. &c. I cannot help thinking that you already do a great deal towards abolishing this most unnecessary frigidity, for after reading one of your delightful and heart-enlarging articles, and noticing, as I do every week, the benignant assurance of your motto, that you “sympathise with all,” I look round me with a vast deal of benevolence for my fellow-creatures. A few days ago, for instance, I was taking my chop at a dining-house in the city—(“my custom always in the afternoon!”) and had just run through one of your Journals, when I observed a gentleman opposite me looking about him in rather a perplexed manner, as if in want of something. Now, under ordinary circumstances, my John Bullism would probably have taken no further notice of what a stranger might be doing or requiring, but just then I was “brimful of kindness,” and, to the great astonishment of the party in question, and those present generally, I bounced up with “Shall I have the pleasure of handing you the mustard, sir?” Now this “mordant” article happened to be the precise object of the gentleman’s anxiety, and he therefore thanked me with “You are very polite, sir,” and since—

Mr Editor! this is a serious subject: ponder on it. Reader! go thou and do likewise!

Salve et Vale!

Cris.

RELUGAS.*

Art thou a dreamer of the noontide hour,
Who shap’st out piles fantastically proud
As the wind fashions from the shifting cloud?
Is not this scene above thy fancy’s power?
Calm beauty here hath built herself a bower—
The traveller who doth not linger here
Lacks all the finer sympathies—the tear
Of sensibility is not his dower—
Oh, sweet Relugas! beautiful thou art,
What though thou liest as a deserted nest
Thy image haunts, shall ever haunt my breast,
Even to the tender gushing of the heart;
Ere thy dear image from my soul depart
Be mine the place of everlasting rest.

TABLE TALK.

GENERAL BENEVOLENCE NO ARGUMENT AGAINST PARTICULAR, BUT THE REVERSE.

To the diffusive spirit of benevolence it has been commonly objected, that it weakens the ties of friendly and family relations, and gives less of enjoyment to the many than it takes from the few. But why should it? Is it found by experience that the really philanthropic man is the man most wanting in domestic affections? Are the tone and temper which constitute benevolence likely to find no fit exercise among those who are habitually in contact with them? Or must not the social principle be essentially strong and influential, when it enables its possessor to act upon the wide field of public happiness? In general, so far from neglecting the enjoyments of those immediately dependent on him, the true lover of his race brings into the circle of their enjoyments the re-action of the beneficent influences, which he exercises on the vaster scale; his contributions to the happiness of mankind are so much in addition to the happiness he creates in his own social sphere. Let no man apprehend for himself or others, that he can produce too much good, or remove too much evil. It is not on the side of expansive benevolence that his mistakes are likely to be made. Let him do all the good he can, and wherever he can, he will never do too much for his own happiness, or the happiness of others.—Bentham’s Deontology.

POLITE WRITING, AND FINE-LADY BENIGNITY!

My aunt admitted into the abbey none but her own relations, and my only companions were the two sisters of the Duc d’Haricourt, one of whom married the Comte de Clery Créqy, and the other became a nun at Caen; the eldest, Mademoiselle de Beuvron was a pretty and elegant person, to whom I fear her husband had done injustice by having her imprisoned by a ‘lettre de cachet.’ The younger, whom they called Mademoiselle de Chatelleret, was not nearly as good or as elegant as her sister. When I heard, some time afterwards, that she had died in all the glory of holiness, I felt surprised, and I did not ask for any of her relics. There were besides, at the convent, a bevy of the demoiselles d’Hontelot, who were always dressed alike in serge of the sabbie colour, (and who always placed themselves, like the pipes of an organ, according to their size and age; but as they were brought up there from charity, and were very proud and especially silly, they were rarely admitted into Madame’s little circle, and I had no intimacy with them. Mademoiselle de Chatelleret used to call them the works of Mother Gigogne in seven volumes; and the Abbess learned that they regularly passed two or three hours a day counting their red spots.—Memoirs of the Marchioness de Créqy.

ARITHMETIC OF DEDICATIONS.

An author of the name of Rangouze having printed a collection of letters without page or number, the binder gave the precedence according to his direction, so that every one to whom he presented his book, finding the letters to him taking place of all the others, could not but richly acknowledge such a distinction. His letters were justly called “golden,” as he boasted that, one with another, they brought him nearly thirty pistoles each. For a thorough subtlety at dedication, however, commend us to an Italian physician, who dedicated every book of his commentary on Hippocrates to as many different persons, and the table of contents likewise!

HOW TO GROW RICH BY GIVING.

It may be laid down as a general principle, that a man becomes rich in his own stock of pleasures, in proportion to the amount he distributes to others. His opulence will be the offspring of his generosity. Every time he creates to himself a pleasure by the communication of a pleasure, or the suppression of a pain, he increases the sum of his own happiness, directly, speedily, surely. Every time he renders a service to another, he augments the amount of his own happiness, indirectly, remotely, slowly; but in both cases his well-being will be added to by his benevolence.—Bentham’s Deontology.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE kindly and eloquent notice of the LONDON JOURNAL in a new paper, the ‘Dover Chronicle,’ is one of those that have touched us most nearly. The writer particularly gratifies us by quoting the passages which pleased us most in the writing.

The suggestion of ONE OF OUR WARMEST WELL-WISHERS shall be considered, as in duty bound.

Had the writer of the letter from Stockton, signed J. B., known all the circumstances that preceded and followed the publication of the work he speaks of, and all which the author has said of it, in the course of subsequent writings (to say nothing of that more attentive perusal which he confesses has not been given to its pages), it is trusted that he would have seen reason for qualifying the conclusions which he has come to, and which the author candidly regrets he ever hazarded in any generous mind, however provoked by misrepresentation.

QUÆSTOR, JUN. is informed, that the first volume of the LONDON JOURNAL does contain the Supplements.

We should gladly have inserted the lines on ‘Love, Wine, and Song,’ but for reasons lately given are unwilling to be thought to do injustice to numerous similar contributions of equal merit.

Due attention will be paid to the remarks of a fair correspondent on ‘Voices,’ and the pamphlet sent us by our namesake; and to the letter, written in pencil, on the state of music in England.

A QUESTION TO MEN OF BUSINESS, IS YOUR "SUCCESS SUCCESSFUL?"

WITH SOME REMARKS ON THE INTEREST OF PARENTS
IN THEIR CHILDREN'S EDUCATION.

(BEING THE SEQUEL OF 'SPECULATIONS ON MY GRANDFATHER'.)

THERE are certain important objects towards which men, in coming into life, are all supposed to aim, or towards which their attention is to be directed; on the one side, virtue and talents, by which the esteem and respect of society are to be gained; and, on the other, a certain competency and station in life which are to insure their holder ease and reasonable distinction. But the former of these acquirements, capacity and virtue, as a general rule, we may state to be unattainable by any person if neglected in youth, and left to his own bias; and, that the latter objects are as certainly to be attained by personal exertions alone, if the foundation of honour and capacity has been timely laid. In other words, a man may make his own fortunes, but he cannot himself form the individual capable of achieving them with honour.

Reason, therefore, points out to us the course which their feelings and natural affection would lead men to pursue, the course which is the most simple and pleasant in performance, and the correct and only true one. And what is that course? That, leaving future exaltation in life to their own exertions, men should devote themselves to the healthy, physical, and moral training of their children; or, consider that exaltation rather as a secondary consideration, than as the primary object (for there lies the evil), as life, in most cases, affords time for the effecting of both. And where the former object only is attained, a young person, whose faculties, mental, and corporeal, are fully developed by the care which demands, at least, the superintendence of a parent, if left at that moment unprovided and unfriended in the world, is better endowed than the slighted boy to whom a father has left the produce of years of toil—years devoted to the pursuit of riches, and the neglect of the education and preparation of his heir. In fact, this parent is like a decocter of medicinal poisons, who, keeping his son in ignorance of his art, leaves at his death, the key of his laboratory in the hands of the unpractised youth. He enters—tastes of everything, and dies.

It may here be objected to me, that I am arguing against fancied evils—that parents divide, at the very least, their time between the training and the enriching of their children. I shall be happy if every body, upon strict examination, find this to be the real state of the case. But I deny that it is so; and examination, or mere observation, will prove to all that my assertion is nearest the truth. The higher classes, of course, are not implicated in these observations. Where neglect does exist among them, it bears a deeper taint than that of the merchant or tradesman; for the latter have the excuse that they are labouring in what appears to them to be the likeliest mode of ensuring the happiness of their children—a worldly provision; but the former have no excuse, save that pleasure and selfish enjoyment have an eloquence deeper and more persuasive in their ears than the voice of natural duty.

Putting aside, then, all classes, except those which are stationary and established in certain spots—as men of business, men holding clerkships, and others similarly situated—we shall find that very many of these, from one reason or another, decline the personal superintendence of their children's education. Many are sent away to distant schools, for months at a time, and a few (more fortunate!) to public schools in the parent's vicinity. Pleased with this last step in improvement, men who have the sense to go so far are contented, and sit down well satisfied, for their children are under their own eye. Good. But does that eye really watch them? Is it upon their every act—does it read their hearts, and study their thoughts? If the eye of the parent does not act thus, it is to little avail that the child is within its reach. On the contrary, there is great danger in a watch, when that watch sleepeth.

I repeat, does the eye act thus? "No, how can it? 'Business must be attended to.' I have every confidence in Dr—, or in Professor—. The boy has trifling faults, but really I have no time to conquer them. Time will abate them."

This is the answer I get. Ask another after his son, and the reply is, "Oh! he is going on very well I dare say by this time; he was a terrible dunce, to be sure, but [one has no time to look after these things, you know. I have not seen him for these three months. By the way, I have been working night and day for the last month, and shall lay by for him a few more odd hundreds. Let his master furnish his head—his mother look after his health, I'll look to the lining of his purse." There is the evil; and, between the three, the chances are that, thirty years after, the proceeds will be a diseased and impoverished fool.

"But, granting men in general the will, have they power or capacity to educate or rather to superintend the education of their children?" Perhaps not in the details. But let them do their best; the world will afford another generation after them, and their sons, so educated, will carry on the holy work in their turn. And besides, a very great deal comes with love and ardent determination. Granting that they employ other heads than their own, constant attention will teach them to detect what is wrong, and to distinguish whether it springs from the master or from the scholar. Men are shrewd enough in judging of the capabilities of one another in business, and of the degree of credit which they may give to a stranger—there is nothing about those who trade in education which renders them invulnerable to like scrutiny. Common sense is often better than apprenticeship. If a man cannot judge, "of his own knowledge," of the extent of that of another, who may perhaps know more, and yet not enough, there are others more capable, in whose judgment and honour he can confide. If left ignorant, and thrown intirely on his own resources, he can judge by effects: if he cannot prove the master's Latinity or Atticism, he can, at least, discover how much the pupil profits; he can always judge of the sentiments and mode of thinking and acting of the instructor by their fruits in the instructed, and these latter are the important points, after all. "These things demand much of a man's time!" I know it—it is for that time that I contend. "But his attention is due to other matters." There is no other matter so important, after a man has provided for the physical wants of his family.

The life of an individual was devoted to the training and education of Emile. This is extravagant; but it is but one of the extreme points to which men have flown, and Rousseau's proposal was certainly the least preposterous, and the most amiable. He would thus have men spend their time intirely on the well-bringing up of their offspring (none but a parent could follow up his idea), whereas men have chosen to depute the task intirely to others.

It may very possibly be said, that the kind of parental devotion here argued for, is out of the way and romantic, and that no man in his senses, who had the business of life to attend to, could entertain it for a moment. But what does the business of life prove to be, if contemplated in toto—his position as a member of society, and the finite nature of man, considered? Is it merely the advancement of a man's self, or the introduction, on his part, of beings fitted to take up the ideas, and to carry on the work of the father? He who has the noblest ends in view for the benefit of society, need not repine when called upon to leave them, if he can leave behind him a son capable of prosecuting his good work. The world is doubly his debtor. It benefits by his works, and, moreover, he has perpetuated his virtues and his talents—(genius is not the question.) But it is a sorrowful consideration, which I think will prove true, that most of us feel that the good which is not done in our time—good that is not done by us, might as well not be done at all. So much for our philanthropy. This is, however, a principle which any man would blush to acknowledge; therefore I am not bound to give it any consideration; but repeat—that men, taught by experience their own defects and failings towards the world, should take care that he who is to succeed them shall be prepared to act his part better; or, on the other hand, that men whose abilities have rendered them a blessing in their generation, should labour that their immediate descendant fall not short in the same noble course.

Looking at the question quite on the worldly side, it will prove that where talent and good principles have been cultivated, a fortune of their own beginning, fostered by their own industry, has reached a greater height than when commenced under what are termed "happier auspices." There is nothing like beginning well; and a man who begins the world only with spirit, the growth of a good education, with loving friends—ever the proceeds of a good education, and the industry generated as much by good education as by necessity, is the man who begins well. There can be no doubt as to what is here included in the term good education:—a thorough education in goodness, and sound training, mental and corporeal.

Let us imagine a half-educated and not very young man, toiling night and day for a sum which he destines for a beloved child. Meanwhile, he is careful, as the world goes, as to his bringing up. It would be a painful task to catechize him on his aim and end, for his own replies must put his illusion to flight. It is his wish to leave a competency behind, or rather, as is more often the case, riches—swelled to the utmost extent his length of life shall admit. He is a man of sense: let me ask him, whether he respects others by reason of their possessions, farther than as buyers and employers? No. Riches, then, do not even purchase the respect of these whom respect is anything but a name, or a courteous term for flattery. Let me ask him, whether his thousands in cash shield him from as many racking cares and anxieties, to which he was not subject when a younger man? No; on the contrary, he almost suspects that his cares have gathered with his wealth. In short, did he ever discover that gold could purchase either love, health, youth, or peace of mind? No—no—no: he will tell you that he is no fool! I must suppose, however, for his own consistency's sake, that he has discovered a mart; and in that case for the love of heaven let him purchase those inestimable treasures himself, and lay them up for his heir; for the chances are, that the latter will forget them, and expend his wealth in commodities of a very different character.

"It is necessary, he will next say, that he should guard against accidents: how does he know that his boy will ever be able to toil for himself?" A very just precaution, truly. And while we are upon accidents, he would do better still to guard against the possibility of that child's not being fit for anything in case of the accident of his losing all his easily-gained fortune. This is a kind of accident which falls out every day. "But men in business bring their children up in business, and they are consequently not left to the mercy of chance." Unfortunately, in cases like the one which I am supposing, business has been rendered a matter of indifference to the youth; he considers it a wearisome and unworthy employment, and takes the first opportunity to retire from it, as a blot on the escutcheon that he contemplates.

"It is his wish," he says, "that his son should make his way into good society, and be the equal of his company in after-life." But if it is intended to commence and to proceed by the introduction which wealth affords to all, how mistaken are the means! for a man cannot live for ever upon an introduction,—not even of such a powerful friend. His own qualifications will be brought to the test. Again, much depends on my objector's ideas as to what constitutes equality in society, even where birth is overlooked. What will render his son the equal of the best company? Is it that he shall be able to vie with any other person in doing credit to the cutting-out talents of a tailor; or, in the super-fineness of his broad-cloth? or shall he be on a par with his neighbour in the splendour of his equipage, or the livery of his servants? If his friend dine off plate, that he shall be able to produce his silver service also, only more splendid? If another build a wing to his house, he can immediately add two to his mansion? Are these his ideas of being on an equality with the world? The proofs of the emptiness of ambition like this are almost too common to need repetition. For having taken a decided step in advance of the individual who only boasts his plain service, he will begin to discover with disgust that his silver is eclipsed by another's gold. Having built his two wings, he finds that mansion, wings, and all, is but a sorry hut, in comparison with the palace of some neighbouring Cressus.

Having thus taken much thought for his son, and left him the produce of his toil, that "no man may look down upon him," and left him nothing else; the latter may chance to discover, if gifted with common sense, that to form one of a circle, not more than his equals in age and natural talents, and listen while others discourse on subjects of which he is totally ignorant, is to be below his company.

From want of reading, experience, habit, and observation, to be unable to yield information on any of the many topics incident to conversation, is to be below his company.

To visit the workshop of the industrious in manufactures, and, having eyes, see not to any purpose of comprehension or instruction, is to be there below his company.

Disqualified by want of ability, to have no "voice in the commonwealth," is to be below the mark in society.

These failures he will speedily discover himself; and there are many other defaults in his title to equality, which the world will speedily discover for him. Among many worse, I name one: If, when the world is struggling all but unanimously towards the same noble end, the amelioration of the mental existence of man, he, from ignorance, or motives of self-interest, shall be the one to choke up the wholesome current; then surely will he be below the company of his fellow men.

I have noticed, in a minor way, that a man, even in privacy, seated with book in hand alone, where he could least dread a competitor, may still find himself below his company. He is not prepared for his author; and the slightest approach to erudition or poetic feeling in what he is reading throws him out. That is rather degrading, where opportunities have been lost!

Thus I have endeavoured to prove the futility of all attempts for the future welfare of our sons, which are not based on a thorough training in good principles and education. Much might be said on the miseries parents ensure for themselves, when they erect a golden calf as the object of the love and aspiration of their children; in so doing, they fly from the right point in two ways—they misapply their time, as has been shown, and they throw temptation in the way of those who are the least prepared to encounter it. How much, how very much, of family dissension, the most hateful of hatreds, takes its rise from this source! But this is a picture that every man can best colour for himself.

It would be agreeable to enlarge, as a relief to the scene, on the happiness felt by those who take right views, and act accordingly, of their duties towards their families. But the thing has been done so often, and so well, that the reader's recollection will be the best authority I can refer to on the subject. Two names I must be allowed to cite anon. But these is yet another subject.

It may appear to some, that too much stress is here laid upon the influence of reading, or upon the inaptitude of a man for study. Such persons would not think so, if that love had ever touched them—if they had ever been indebted to study for one burst of enthusiasm—for one consoling or forgetful hour—for having weaned them from one weakness, or acted as a counter-allurement to one vice. If I say that pure and refined tastes are the best guardians a man can invoke around his child, I shall provoke the charge of saying what everybody knows; but, surely, they are in contradiction with themselves who, knowing this, also care not to see their children studious. Gibbon declared that he would not exchange his love of reading for the treasures of the Indies: and we are not to suppose that it was because he was indebted to his studies for the materials of his great work, that he so loved his books. They had been his friends from youth. His 'History' is worth the ransom of imperial Rome, but I doubt whether the philosopher would not have sacrificed that—or rather an equal fame, to his love of mental acquirement. Happily the pursuits were the same.

"Les premiers jours du printemps ont moins de grâce que la vertu naissante d'un jeune homme." The first days of spring have less of beauty than the growing virtues of a young man. These are the words of one of the most truth-telling and unfeigned of writers—Rochefoucauld. I leave my readers to draw their own conclusions from his observations, and proceed to quote some beautiful lines from a right-thinking native poet, bearing on the same subject:—

"The shepherd on Tornaro's misty brow,
And the swart seaman, sailing far below,
Not undelighted watch the morning ray
Purpling the orient—till it breaks away,
And burns and blazes into glorious day;
But happier still is he who bends to trace
That sun, the soul, just dawning in the face;
The burst, the glow, the animating strife,
The thoughts and passions stirring into life;

The forming utterance, the inquiring glance,
The giant waking from his tenfold trance,
Till up he starts as conscious whence he came,
And all is light within the trembling frame!
What then a Father's feelings? Joy, and fear
In turn prevail; joy meet; and through the year
Temp'ring the ardent, urging night and day
Men who shrink back or wander from the way,
Praising each highly,—from a wish to raise
Their merits to the level of his praise,
Onward in their observing sight he moves,
Fearful of wrong, in awe of whom he loves!
Their sacred presence who shall dare profane?
Who, when He slumbers, hope to fix a stain?
He lives a model, in his life to show,
That, when he dies and through the world they go,
Some men may pause and say, when some admire,
"They are his sons, and worthy of their sire!"

CHARLES LAMB.

[THIS interesting tribute to the memory of its excellent subject, now, we believe, first given intire in a periodical work, is from the pen of the "Bookseller of the Poets," Mr Moxon,—himself (and with no disparagement either in the antithesis) a Poet among Booksellers;—a rare title, and very encouraging for his literary brethren.]

WITHIN a few months of each other we have lost two remarkable men—Samuel Taylor Coleridge and Charles Lamb. They were schoolfellows, read together, first published together, and were undivided even in Death! When we last saw the latter—and recollection—he said he was ever thinking of his friend. He is now with him and for ever! It is of Charles Lamb only that we wish to speak.

No man was ever more sincerely regretted, or will be longer remembered, by his friends. Happily we see the brighter after our sorrows; and the object of our grief, in a short time, becomes a star that we can gaze at with pleasure. Fair, fair shall be the flowers that spring over thy tomb, dear, gentle Elia! sweet shall be the song—sweet as thine own—that shall lure the wanderer to the spot where thy urn receives the tears of the stranger. Thither my feet shall repair in spring time and in harvest; thither will I lead thy votaries, and there shall they drink of the lucid waters that well from the memory of thy gentle life, thou kindest of human creatures!

Perchance, Reader, it was not thy good fortune to know our inimitable friend. Thou hast not been with him in his walks; and to walk with him was to converse with the immortal dead,—with Chaucer and with Sidney,—with Spenser and with Shakespeare,—with Buxton and with Sir Thomas Brown,—with Fuller and with Jeremy Taylor,—and with Milton, and these elder dramatists, who were to him a first love, and, as such, cherished through life. Thou hast not been his guest; nor sat among his books—goodly folios in quaint bindings—in rooms scantily furnished, but rich in the gifts of genius, walls hung round with Raphaels and Da Vincis, with Poussins and Titians, and the works of the incomparable Hogarth! Thou wert not a visitor in the temple, nor an evening listener to choice—hardly choice where all were good—passages from Milton, over the finest of which the worshipping spirit of the reader always wept; but his tears were those of admiration, drops that blotted out, as it were, ages of neglect! On his old favourites his eyes rested even in death! Sacred to the owner will be the volume he last bent over, with its page folded down—so ever let it remain—on thy life, all-accomplished Sidney! From thyself, if aught earthly in heaven be permitted, perchance he may learn thy story, and there walk side by side with those whom in idea he lived with while on earth. Nor hast thou seen him a solitary, wandering among the cloisters of Christ's Hospital—nor in the Quadrangles at Oxford, nor at Twickenham, where he often spent his holidays—red-letter days as he called them—nor at Hampton Court, which he preferred—so truly

English was his mind—to Versailles; nor in the India House, where he was loved for his goodness of heart, and for his jokes and his puns—he was a punster, and a good one;—nor in his ramblings in the neighbourhood of Cheshunt, and Southgate, and Ware, and Tottenham High Cross, and on the banks of the Lea, thinking of Walton and his plain-mindedness! nor latterly at Waltham, nor at Winchmore, nor in the green lanes about Enfield, where, on a summer's evening, he would walk with his amiable sister, his almost inseparable companion of forty years.

As, Reader, thou hast not seen the living Elia—would that thou hadst, for thou wouldst ever have remembered his sweet smile, and the gentleness of his heart—turn to his books, there thou mayst imagine him, kinder than he was thou canst not; and he will yet guide thee to old haunts and to familiar faces, which thou wilt hereafter think of with delight. He will conduct thee to the Old South-Sea House—once his own—and to Oxford, where thou wilt meet with George Dyer (George is worthy thy knowing), or he will sit with thee the old year out, and quote the old poets, and that beautiful line in his friend's ode—

“I saw the skirts of the departing year;”

or he will introduce thee to Mrs Battle, who, next to her devotions, loved a game at whist; or he will pleasantly shake his cap and bells with thee on the first of April; or accompany thee to a Quakers' Meeting; or describe to thee the Old and the New Schoolmaster; or tell a delightful story—no fiction—of Valentine's Eve, or take thee with him, Bridget Elia by his side—thou wilt love Bridget—on a visit to his relations,

or he will discourse to thee on modern gallantry, or point out to thee the old Benchers of the Inner Temple; or describe to thee his first visit to Old Drury, and introduce thee to his old favourites—now forgotten; or thou shalt hear him—for he loved those whom none loved—speak in the purest strain of humanity in praise of chimney-sweepers, “innocent blacknesses,” as he calls them, and of beggars, and lament the decay of the latter; or he will rouse thy fancy, and make thy mouth water with his savoury dissertation on roast pig (many were the porklings that graced his table, kind presents from admiring and unknown correspondents); or take thee with him in the old Margate Hoy to the seaside, or introduce thee to his friend Captain Jackson; or discourse to thee of himself—the convalescent and the superannuated man; or on old china, or on old books—on the latter with what relish! or of Barbara S. (Miss Kelly), or of Alice (his first love), or of Bridget Elia (his sister), or tell thee the sweet story of Rosamund Gray. Let these, reader, if thou art a lover of thy Kind and of the beautiful, have a by-place in thy mind; they will not only please thy imagination, but enlarge thy heart, its sphere of action, and its humane capabilities. They will lead thee to new sources of delight—springs fresh as the waters of Horeb; and thou wilt become acquainted with men famous in their generation. Occasionally, if thou art a reader of modern books only, thou mayest imagine him quaint, but thou wilt find him free from conceits, and always natural. Others may have affected the language of an older age, but with him it was no adoption.

He always spoke as he wrote, and did both as he felt; and his Letters—they were unpremeditated—are in the style of his other writings; they are in many respects equal, in some superior, to his Essays; for the bloom, the freshness of the author's mind, is still upon them. In his humour there is much to touch the heart and to reflect upon; it is of a serious cast, somewhat like that of Cervantes. In the jokes which he would throw out, the offspring of the moment, there was often more philosophy than in the premeditated sayings of other men. He was an admirable critic, and was always willing to exercise the art he so much excelled in for the fame of others. We have seen him almost blind with poring over the endless and illegible manuscripts that were submitted to him. On these occasions, how he would long to find out something good, something that he could speak kindly of; for to give another pain (as he writes in a letter now before us) was to give himself greater! He lived in the past, yet no man ever had a larger share of sympathy for those around him. He loved his friends, and showed it substantially by numberless tokens, and was as sincerely loved in return. He had, like other men, his failings; but they were such, that he was loved rather for them than in spite of them. Enemies he had none. For upwards of forty years he devoted his life to the happiness of his sister, for whom he had a most affectionate regard, and for whose comfort he would gladly have laid down his own life; and she, not less devoted, for him would have sacrificed her own. He preferred—we use his own words—even her occasional wanderings to the sense and sanity of the world.

Their minds were congenial, so were their lives, and they beautifully walked together—theirs was a blended existence—to the hour of his dissolution. His charities, for his humble means, surpassed those of most men. He had for some years upon his bounty three pensioners! Generous and noble must have been the heart of him that, out of his slender income, could allow his old schoolmistress thirty pounds per annum! What self-denial! What folios this sum would have purchased for him! Well we remember the veneration with which we used to look upon the old lady—for she remembered Galsmith! He had once lent her his poems to read. We often lament that he did not give them to her; but the author of the ‘Vicar of Wakefield’ was poor.

Kind surely must have been the disposition of him who sought out the nurse that attended the last moments of Coleridge, (whom living he adored and dead thus honoured,) that on her head he might pour out the overflowings of the irresistible goodness of his nature. He gave her five pounds; but this we did not learn from himself! These were but trifles; yet of each was the life of this the most amiable of men made up.

His tastes, in many respects, were most singular. He preferred Wardour street and Seven Dials to fields that were Elysian. The disappearance of the old clock from St Dunstan's Church drew tears from him; nor could he ever pass without emotion the place where Exeter Change once stood. The removal had uphealed a reality in Gay. The passer-by, he said, no longer saw “the combs dangle in his face.” This almost broke his heart. He had no taste for flowers or green fields; he preferred the high road. The Garden of Eden, he used to say, must have been a dull place. He had a strong aversion to roast beef and to fowls, and to any wines but port or sherry. Tripe and cow-beef were to him delicacies—rare dainties!

All his books were without portraits; nor did he ever preserve, with two exceptions, a single letter. He had a humorous method of testing the friendship of his visitors; it was, whether in their walks they would taste the tap of mine host at the Horse-Shoe, or at the Rose and Crown, or at the Rising Sun! But a member of the Temperance Society, on these occasions, could not have been more abstemious. A single glass would suffice. We have seen ladies enter with him—the fastidious Barbara S.; and great poets—the author of the ‘Excursion’ himself! He was no politician, though, in his youth, he once assisted to draw through the streets Charles James Fox! Nor was he a man of business. He could not pick up a trunk, nor tie up a parcel. Yet he was methodical, punctual in his appointments, and an excellent pay-master. A debt haunted him! He could not live in another person's bank! He wished to leave a friend a small sum of money; but “to have done with the thing,” as he said, gave it him before-hand! If an acquaintance dropped in of an evening before supper, he would instantly, without saying a word, put on his hat, and go and order an extra supply of porter. He has done this for us a hundred times! Relics and keepsakes had no charm for him! A traveller once brought him some scorns from an ilex that grew over the tomb of Virgil. He threw them at the hackney-coachmen as they passed by his window! And there is a story, that he once sent to an artist of his acquaintance for a whole series of the British Admirals; but for what publication we never heard!

But we are wandering from our object, which was simply to record, that, of all the men we ever knew, Charles Lamb was, in every respect, the most original, and had the kindest heart.

THE WEEK.

BIRTH DAYS.

FEBRUARY 18, 1677. At Paris, son of the illustrious Cassini, the founder of a family of astronomers, Giacomo Cassini, an enricher of the science with many valuable discoveries. His death was of that unexpected sort, for a man of a long and peaceful life, which looks like a mockery of human calculations. He died of a fall, at the age of eighty.

—19, 1564. At Pisa, or Florence, son of a noble Florentine, who was a scientific man also, and an accomplished musician, Galileo Galilei, the great precursor of Newton, and the greatest discoverer in mechanical geometry since the time of Archimedes. He rendered the discovery of the telescope applicable to astronomical purposes, brought geometry to the aid of the doctrine of motion, invented the pendulum, discovered the gravity of the air, the satellites of Jupiter, the inequalities of the surface of the moon, and established the Copernican and Pythagorean system of the universe, by proving that the earth moved round the sun. For this last discovery he was persecuted by the Jesuits, who, forgetting their own professions of being teachers, and idly subjecting the grandeur of the character of Scripture to literal interpretations of some of its texts, brought him under the tyranny of the Inquisition, by whom he was kept in qualified imprisonment for the remaining few years of his life, latterly at his own house. He was also sentenced to repeat the Seven Penitential Psalms every week for the space of three years; and it was suspected, from the state of his hands, that he had been put to the torture, and sworn not to reveal it. The writer of the present paragraph saw one of the fingers of these hands preserved under a glass case in the middle of the Laurentian library at Florence, pointing to heaven, and now almost an object of worship with the descendants of those by whom he was persecuted. It was during his confinement at his house that he was visited, among other celebrated travellers, by Milton; who describes him as suffering imprisonment “for thinking otherwise in astronomy than the Dominican friars.” The great poet's allusion to him in ‘Paradise Lost’ is well known: but it is as difficult not to quote it, as for a musician to see an organ open, and not touch the keys.

He scarce had ceas'd, when the superiour bend
Was moving towards the shore; his ponderous shield,
Ethereal temper, massy, large, and round,
Behind him cast. The broad circumference
Hung on his shoulders like the moon, whose orb
Through optic glass the Tuscan artist views
At evening from the top of Fesolá,
Or in Valdarno, to descry new lands,
Rivers, or mountains, in her spotty globe.

Galileo, besides being a profound natural philosopher, was a general amateur of the fine arts, a musician, and a man of wit. He played beautifully on the lute; delighted in architecture, in painting, and in husbandry; had a taste for design; was the author of several facetious poems (gathered into the Italian collections); was a capital companion, full of sense and pleasantry; and, as might be expected from such a combination of the solid and airy, was an enthusiastic lover of Ariosto, and took his part in the famous critical dispute respecting the merits of that fine poet and those of the more artificial Tasso. His stature was small, but his aspect venerable.

Same day, 1732. At Trinity College, Cambridge,

under the roof of his maternal grandfather, Dr Bentley (the famous scholar), Richard Cumberland, the comic dramatist, son and grandson of a bishop. His comedies verge upon the sentimental and the ideal (Goldsmith calls them "Tragedy giving a rout"); but there is occasionally more force and vivacity than would be expected from a certain air of authority and pretension; and his 'West Indian,' which led the way to the romantic generosity of the young gentlemen in modern comedies, has some of the good-natured animal spirits of Hoadley. Mr Cumberland, among others not so good, wrote also a pleasant novel called 'Henry.' His poetry is unworthy the rest of his reputation. We remember seeing him, in his latter years, going along the street. His appearance was highly respectable and gentlemanly, with an earnest countenance. The portrait in his 'Memoirs' must have been very like him, at the time it was painted.

— 20, 1694. At Paris, the son of a notary, Marie Francis Arouet de Voltaire, the most universal genius of the French nation. In the several departments of literature which he adorned, with the exception of that of wit and raillery, he was surpassed by many individuals; and in no one respect, perhaps, were his acuties of the very highest order, except as a detector of absurdity—and even in that respect his discrimination was not perfect, too often confounding the local and relative with the universal. In short, his philosophy was in no respect as deep as he and his friends supposed it. Yet, as a dramatist, he generally ranks as inferior only to Corneille and Racine; as an historian, his rank lies betwixt the two extremes of his idolators and his enemies, and has no mean place after all; he was one of the readiest and most elegant artificial poets, and writers of vers de société, that have appeared; he made his countrymen popularly acquainted with the progress of science and natural philosophy, especially the Newtonian; and, above all, he was a great puller down of superstition, and hastened those reformation in religion and government which will end in building up a far better system than he could anticipate, crowned with Christian aspirations of which he knew nothing, though he was a better Christian in some respects than he thought himself, being a very humane and public-spirited man—albeit irritable and vain-glorious. There was so little real poetry in him of a high order, which demands a thorough depth and sincerity of nature, that he wrote a scandalous poem on the subject of Joan of Arc, whom, as a great man, superior to the prejudices of all times, he ought to have held in reverence. This extraordinary individual—with a frame originally so weak that it was feared he would have died soon after his birth, and with a person always meagre and apparently fragile, but great animal spirits—lived to be upwards of eighty-five years of age, and is thought at last to have hastened his death by drinking too much coffee in order to keep himself on the alert for a new publication. He was the sayer of some of the most exquisite bon-mots on record, from among which we hastily give the first that comes to mind as a specimen. He was praising Haller, the German, to somebody, and the other saying that Haller by no means thought so well of him—"Ah," returned the ready old wit, "perhaps we are both of us mistaken." Perhaps Voltaire may be briefly and not unjustly characterized as the only man who ever obtained a place in the list of the great names of the earth by an aggregation of secondary abilities. He was the god of cleverness.

Same day, 1716. At Hereford, where his father, an officer in the army, was on a recruiting party, David Garrick, the most universal stage genius that has appeared in England. His family was of French origin, the grandfather, a merchant, having fled from the neighbouring country at the revocation of the edict of Nantes. It is, therefore, perhaps to French blood that we owe his excellence in the comic part of his genius: the tragic part England will claim for itself. We need not repeat here what has been said of him so often, and is still daily being said, in memoirs and stage-criticism. We doubt not, both from tradition, and from the very objections made to his style by contemporaries who are noticed in the latest accounts of him, that he deserves almost all that has been said of him as a true actor, both in tragedy and comedy, and a restorer of nature to the stage; though we take leave to doubt, from what is known of his own nature and its predominant qualities, which were more lively than profound, that he was upon the whole inferior both in tragic depth, and in exquisiteness of poetical recitation (where the lines required it) to our late lamented Kean. Their very faces go to show the difference. They both had remarkably fine eyes, but the look of Garrick (you may see it in Reynolds's portrait) was the more sparkling; Kean's the more earnest and the more internal. Cumberland, in his autobiography, gives a lively specimen of Garrick's good-nature and love of admiration (a very pardonable thing in a player, especially one so flattered). The great actor was invited to a dinner party, where they missed him when the dinner came on table. On looking out of window, he was observed transporting a negro-boy by imitating a turkey-cock! whose airs, and gobbles, and sudden rushes, he so gave to the life, that the boy cried out in an ecstasy—"Do it again, Massa Garrick; do it again!" And Garrick did it again.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

ORIGIN OF MALLETT'S 'EDWIN AND EMMA.'

THIS touching ballad, the author of which had a genuine faculty for that sort of writing, far superior to what he probably thought his superior compositions, has been somewhat neutralized in its effect by its trite repetition from the pages of Enfield's 'Speaker;' though to complain of such results from those publications would be doing them great injustice—since you cannot at once make a good thing common, and yet expect it to retain, among its other beneficial consequences, a perpetual novelty. But grown people, when their attention is freshly excited, may read well-known productions with a new relish; and, in this hope, we have repeated the ballad, as well as the true story on which it is founded. Mallett's account of the heroine's death is not so affecting as the real circumstance—her suddenly screaming out, at hearing the death-bell of her lover, "that her heart was burst"—but it is not wanting in pathos, especially the first line; and there is a vein of natural elegance throughout the poem.

Could any of our friends oblige us with a copy of Mickle's ballad of "Cumnor Hall?" It is not to be found in the ordinary editions of his poems.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM THE CURATE OF BOWES, IN YORKSHIRE, TO MR COPPERTHWAIT, AT MARRICK.

"As to the affair mentioned in yours, it happened long before my time. I have, therefore, been obliged to consult my clerk, and another person in the neighbourhood, for the truth of that melancholy event. The history of it is as follows:—

"The family name of the young man was Wrightson; of the young maiden, Railton. They were both much of the same age—that is, growing up to twenty. In their birth there was no disparity: but in fortune, alas! she was his inferior. His father, a hard old man, who had by his fortune acquired a handsome competency, expected and required that his son should marry suitably. But, as 'amor vincit omnia,' his heart was unalterably fixed on the pretty young creature already named. Their courtship, which was all by stealth, unknown to the family, continued about a year. When it was found out, old Wrightson, his wife, and particularly their crooked daughter, Hannah, flouted at the maiden, and treated her with notable contempt; for they held it as a maxim, and a rustic one it is, 'that blood was nothing without groats.'

"The young lover sickened, and took to his bed about Shrove Tuesday, and died the Sunday seven-night after.

"On the last day of his illness, he desired to see his mistress. She was civilly received by the mother, who bid her welcome—when it was too late. But her daughter Hannah lay at his back, to cut them off from all opportunity of exchanging their thoughts.

"At her return home, on hearing the bell toll out for his departure, she screamed aloud that her heart was burst, and expired some moments after.

"The then curate of Bowes* inserted it in his register, that 'they both died of love, and were buried in the same grave, March 15, 1714.'

"I am, dear Sir,
Yours, &c."

EDWIN AND EMMA.

Mark it, Cesario, it is true and plain;
The spinsters and the knitters in the sun,
And the free maids that weave their thread with bones,
Do use to chant it. It is silly sooth,
And dallies with the innocence of love,
Like the old age.—Shakespeare's Twelfth Night.

Far in the windings of a vale,
Fast by a sheltering wood,
The safe retreat of health and peace,
An humble cottage stood.

There beauteous Emma flourished fair,
Beneath a mother's eye;
Whose only wish on earth was now }
To see her blest, and die.

The softest blush that nature spreads
Gave colour to her cheek;
Such orient colour smiles through heaven,
When vernal mornings break.

Nor let the pride of great ones scorn
This charmer of the plains:
That sun, who bids their diamonds blaze,
To paint our lily deigns.

Long had she filled each youth with love,
Each maiden with despair;
And though by all a wonder owned,
Yet knew not she was fair;

Till Edwin came, the pride of swains,
A soul devoid of art;
And from whose eye, serenely mild,
Shone forth the feeling heart.

A mutual flame was quickly caught—
Was quickly, too, revealed;
For neither bosom lodged a wish
That virtue keeps concealed.

What happy hours of home-felt bliss
Did love on both bestow!
But bliss too mighty long to last,
Where fortune proves a foe.

His sister—who, like envy form'd,
Like her in mischief joy'd—
To work them harm, with wicked skill,
Each darker art employ'd.

The father, too, a sordid man,
Who love nor pity knew,
Was all unfeeling as the clod
From whence his riches grew.

Long had he seen their secret flame,
And seen it long unmoved:
Then with a father's frown at last
Had sternly disapprov'd.

In Edwin's gentle heart, a war
Of differing passions strove:
His heart, that durst not disobey,
Yet could not cease to love.

Denied her sight, he oft behind
The spreading hawthorn crept,
To snatch a glance, to mark the spot
Where Emma walked and wept.

* Bowes is a small village in Yorkshire, where, in former times, the Earls of Richmond had a castle. It stands on the edge of that vast and mountainous tract, named by the neighbouring people Stanemore, which is always exposed to wind and weather, desolate and solitary throughout.—Camb. Brit.

Oft too on Stanmore's wintry waste,
Beneath the moonlight shade,
In sighs to pour his soften'd soul,
The midnight mourner strayed.

His cheek, where health with beauty glow'd,
A deadly pale o'ercast:
So fades the fresh rose in its prime,
Before the northern blast.

The parents now with late remorse,
Hang o'er his dying bed,
And weary heaven with fruitless vows,
And fruitless sorrows shed.

'Tis past! he cried—but if your souls
Sweet mercy yet can move,
Let these dim eyes once more behold,
What they must ever love.

She came; his cold hand softly touched,
And bathed with many a tear:
Fast falling o'er the primrose pale,
So morning dews appear.

But oh! his sister's jealous care,
A cruel sister she!
Forbade what Emma came to say;
"My Edwin, live for me!"

New homeward as she hopeless wept
The church-yard path along,
The blast blew cold, the dark owl scream'd
Her lover's funeral song.

Amid the falling gloom of night,
Her startling fancy found
In every bush his hovering shade,
His groan in every sound.

Alone, appall'd, thus had she passed
The visionary vale—
When lo! the death-bell smote her ear,
Sad sounding in the gale!

Just then she reached with trembling step,
Her aged mother's door—
He's gone, she cried; and I shall see
That angel-face no more.

I feel, I feel this breaking heart
Beat high against my side—
From her white arm down sunk her head;
She shivering sigh'd, and died.

CHARACTERS OF SHAKSPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

NO. VI.—ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA.

This is a very noble play. Though not in the first class of Shakspeare's productions, it stands next to them, and is, we think, the finest of his historical plays, that is, of those in which he made poetry the organ of history, and assumed a certain tone of character and sentiment, in conformity to known facts, instead of trusting to his observations of a general nature, or to the unlimited indulgence of his own fancy. What he has added to the history, is upon a par with it. His genius was, as it were, a match for history as well as nature, and could grapple at will with either. This play is full of that pervading comprehensive power by which the poet could always make himself master of time and circumstances. It presents a fine picture of Roman pride and Eastern magnificence: and in the struggle between the two, the empire of the world seems suspended, "like the swan's-down feather,

"That stands upon the swell at full of tide,
And neither way inclines."

The characters breathe, move, and live. Shakspeare does not stand reasoning on what his characters would do or say, but at once becomes them, and speaks and acts for them. He does not present us with groups of stage-puppets or poetical machines making set speeches on human life, and acting from a calculation of ostensible motives, but he brings living men and women on the scene, who speak and act from real feelings, according to the ebb and flow of passion, without the least tincture of the pedantry of logic or rhetoric. Nothing is made out by inference and analogy, by climax and antithesis, but everything takes place just as it would have done in reality, according to the occasion.—The character of Cleopatra is a master-piece. What an extreme contrast it affords to Imogen! One would think it almost impossible for the same person to have drawn both. She is voluptuous, ostentatious, conscious, boastful of her charms, haughty, tyrannical, fickle. The luxurious pomp and gorgeous extravagance of the Egyptian queen are displayed in all their force and lustre, as well as the irregular grandeur of the soul of Mark Antony. Take only the first four lines that they speak as an example of the regal style of love-making.

"CLEOPATRA. If it be love, indeed, tell me how much?"

ANTONY. There's beggary in the love that can be reckon'd.

"CLEOPATRA. I'll set a bourn how far to be belov'd."

ANTONY. Then must thou needs find out new heav'n, new earth."

The rich and poetical description of her person, beginning—

"The barge she sat in, like a burnish'd throne,
Burnt on the water; the poop was beaten gold,
Purple the sails, and so perfum'd, that
The winds were love-sick"—

seems to prepare the way for, and almost to justify the subsequent infatuation of Antony when, in the sea-fight at Actium, he leaves the battle, and "like a doating mallard" follows her flying sails.

Few things in Shakspeare (and we know of nothing in any other author like them) have more of that local truth of imagination and character than the passage in which Cleopatra is represented conjecturing what were the employments of Antony in his absence. "He's speaking now, or murmuring—Where's my serpent of old Nile?" Or again, when she says to Antony, after the defeat at Actium, and his summoning up resolution to risk another fight—"It is my birth-day; I had thought to have held it poor; but since my lord is Antony again, I will be Cleopatra." Perhaps the finest burst of all is Antony's rage after his final defeat, when he comes in and surprises the messenger of Caesar kissing her hand—

"To let a fellow that will take rewards,
And say, God quit you, be familiar with,
My play-fellow, your hand; this kingly seal,
And plighter of high hearts."

It is no wonder that he orders him to be whipped; but his low condition is not the true reason: there is another feeling which lies deeper, though Antony's pride would not let him show it, except by his rage; he suspects the fellow to be Caesar's proxy.

Cleopatra's whole character is the triumph of the voluptuous, of the love of pleasure and the power of giving it, over every other consideration. Octavia is a dull foil to her, and Fulvia a shrew and shrill-tongued. What a picture do those lines give of her—

"Age cannot wither her, nor custom steal
Her infinite variety. Other women cloy
The appetites they feed, but she makes hungry
Where most she satisfies."

What a spirit and fire in her conversation with Antony's messenger who brings her the unwelcome news of his marriage with Octavia! How all the pride of beauty and of high rank breaks out in her promised reward to him—

"There's gold, and here
My bluest veins to kiss!"

She had great and unpardonable faults, but the beauty of her death almost redeems them. She learns from the depth of despair the strength of her affections. She keeps her queen-like state in the last disgrace, and her sense of the pleasurable in the last moments of her life. She tastes a luxury in death. After applying the asp, she says with fondness—

"Dost thou not see my baby at my breast,
That sucks the nurse asleep?
As sweet as balm, as soft as air, as gentle.
Oh, Antony!"

It is worth while to observe that Shakspeare has contrasted the extreme magnificence of the descriptions in this play with pictures of extreme suffering and physical horror, not less striking—partly perhaps to excuse the effeminacy of Mark Antony, to whom they are related as having happened, but more to preserve a certain balance of feeling in the mind. Caesar says, hearing of his conduct at the court of Cleopatra,—

"Antony,
Leave thy lascivious wassails. When thou once
Wert beaten from Mutina, where thou slew'st
Hirtius and Pansa, consuls, at thy heel
Did famine follow, whom thou fought'st against,
Though daintily brought up, with patience more
Than savages could suffer. Thou did'st drink
The stale of horses, and the gilded puddle
Which beasts would cough at. Thy palate then did deign
The roughest berry on the rudest hedge,
Yes, like the stag, when snow the pasture sheets,
The barks of trees thou browsed'st. On the Alps,
It is reported, thou did'st eat strange flesh,
Which some did die to look on: and all this,
It wounds thine honour that I speak it now,
Was borne so like a soldier, that thy cheek,
So much as lank'd not."

The passage after Antony's defeat by Augustus where he is made to say—

"Yes, yes; he at Philippi kept
His sword e'en like a dancer; while I struck
The lean and wrinkled Cassius, and 'twas I
That the mad Brutus ended"—

is one of those fine retrospections which show us the winding and eventful march of human life. The jealous attention which has been paid to the unities both of time and place has taken away the principle of perspective in the drama, and all the interest which objects derive from distance, from contrast, from privation, from change of fortune, from long-cherished passion; and contracts our view of life from a strange and romantic dream, long, obscure, and infinite, into a smartly contested, three hours' inaugural disputation on its merits by the different candidates for theatrical applause.

The latter scenes of 'Antony and Cleopatra' are full of the changes of accident and passion. Success and defeat follow one another with startling rapidity. Fortune sits upon her wheel more blind and giddy than usual. This precarious state and the approaching dissolution of his greatness are strikingly displayed in the dialogue between Antony and Eros:

"ANTONY. Eros, thou yet behold'st me?"

EROS. Ay, noble lord.

ANTONY. Sometime we see a cloud that's dragonish,

A vapour sometime, like a bear or lion,
A towered citadel, a pendent rock,
A forked mountain, or blue promontory
With trees upon't, that nod unto the world
And mock our eyes with air. Thou hast seen these signs.

They are black vespers' pageants.

EROS. Ay, my lord.

ANTONY. That which is now a horse, even with a thought

The rack dissimms, and makes it indistinct
As water is in water.

EROS. It does, my lord.

ANTONY. My good knave, Eros, now thy captain is

Even such a body," &c.

This is, without doubt, one of the finest pieces of poetry in Shakspeare. The splendour of the imagery, bright solitary star of your lives—ye mild and happy pair—which shewed you in the light of intellect, and in the obscurity of your station! This was to you instead of riches, instead of rank, instead of glittering attainments: and it was worth them all together. You insulted none with it; but, while you wore it as a piece of defensive armour only, no insult likewise would reach you through it. Demus et saluamur.

Of quite another stamp was the then accountant, John Tipp. He neither pretended to high blood, nor in good truth cared one fig about the matter. He "thought an accountant the greatest character in the world, and himself the greatest accountant in it." Yet John was not without his hobby. The fiddle relieved his vacant hours. He sang certainly, with other notes than to the Orphean lyre. He did, indeed, scream and scrape most abominably. His fine suit of official rooms in Threadneedle street, which without anything very substantial appended to them were enough to enlarge a man's notions of himself that lived in them (I know not who is the occupier of them now), resounded fortnightly to the notes of a concert of "sweet breasts," as our ancestors would have called them, culled from club-rooms and orchestras—chorus singers—first and second violoncellos—double basses—and clarionets—who ate his cold mutton, and drank his punch, and praised his ear. He ate like Lord Midas among them. But at the desk Tipp was quite another sort of creature. Thence all ideas that were purely ornamental were vanished. You could not speak of anything romantic without rebuke. Politics were excluded. A newspaper was thought too refined and abstracted;—the whole duty of man consisted in writing off dividends warrants. The striking of the annual balance in the company's books (which perhaps differed from the balance of last year in the sum of 25*l.* 6*d.*) occupied his days and nights for a month previous. Not that Tipp was blind to the deadness of things (as they call them in the city) in his beloved house, or did not sigh for a return of the old stirring days when South-Sea hopes were young—(he was indeed equal to the wielding of any the most intricate accounts of the most flourishing company in these or those days): but to a genuine accountant the difference of proceeds is as nothing. The fractional farthing is as dear to his heart as the thousands which stand before it. He is the true actor, who, whether his part be a prince or a peasant, must act it with like intensity. With Tipp form was everything. His life was formal. His actions seemed ruled with a ruler. His pen was not less erring than his heart. He made the best executor in the world: he was plagued with incessant executorships accordingly, which excited his spleen and soothed his vanity in equal ratios. He would swear (for Tipp swore) at the little orphans, whose rights he would guard with a tenacity like the grasp of the dying hand that commended their interests to his protection. With all this there was about him a sort of timidity—(his few enemies used to give it a worse name)—something which, in reference to the dead, we will place, if you please, a little on this side of the heroic. Nature certainly had been pleased to endow John Tipp with a sufficient measure of the principle of self-preservation. There is a cowardice which we do not despise, because it has nothing base or treacherous in its elements; it betrays itself, not you: it is mere temperament; the absence of the romantic and the enterprising; it sees a lion in the way, and will not, with Fortinbras, "greatly find quarrel in a straw," when some supposed honour is at stake. Tipp never mounted the box of a stage-coach in his life; or leaned against the rails of a balcony; or walked upon the ridge of a parapet; or looked down a precipice; or let off a gun; or went upon a water-party; or would willingly let you go if he could have helped it: neither was it recorded of him, that for lucre, or for intimidation, he ever forsook friend or principle.

who never enteredst thy office in a morning, or quittedst it in mid-day—(what didst thou in an office?)—without some quirk that left a sting! Thy gibes and thy jokes are now extinct, or survive but in two forgotten volumes, which I had the good fortune to rescue from a stall in Barbican not three days ago; and found thee terse, fresh, epigrammatic, as alive. Thy wit is a little gone by in these fastidious days! thy topics are staid by the "new-born gauds" of the time—but great thou used to be in Public Ledgers and in Chronicles, upon Chatham, and Shelburne, and Rockingham, and Howe, and Burgoyne, and Clinton, and the war which ended in the tearing from Great Britain her rebellious colonies,—and Keppel, and Wilkes, and Sawbridge, and Bull, and Dunning, and Pratt, and Richmond,—and such small politics.

A little less facetious and a great deal more obstreperous, was fine rattling, rattle-headed Plumer. He was descended,—not in a right line, reader, (for his lineal pretensions, like his personal, favoured a little of the sinister bend) from the Plumers of Hertfordshire. So tradition gave him out; and certain family features not a little sanctioned the opinion. Certainly, old Walter Plumer (his reputed author) had been a rake in his days, and visited much in Italy, and had seen the world. He was uncle, bachelor-uncle, to the fine old whig still living, who has represented the county in so many successive Parliaments, and has a fine old mansion near Ware. Walter flourished in George the Second's days, and was the same who was summoned before the House of Commons about a business of franks with the old Duchess of Marlborough. You may read of it in Johnson's 'Life of Cave.' Cave came off cleverly in that business. It is certain our Plumer did nothing to discountenance the rumour. He rather seemed pleased whenever it was, with all gentleness, insinuated. But, besides his family pretensions, Plumer was an engaging fellow, and sang gloriously.—

Not so sweetly sang Plumer as thou sangest, mild, child-like, pastoral M—, a flute's breathing less divinely whispering than thy Arcadian melodies, when, in tones worthy of Arden, thou didst chant that song sung by Amiens to the banished Duke, which proclaims the winter wind more lenient than for a man to be ungrateful. Thy sire was old surly, M—, the unapproachable churchwarden of Bishopsgate. He knew not what he did when he begat thee, like spring, gentle offspring of blustering winter;—only unfortunate in thy ending, which should have been mild, conciliatory, swan-like.—

Much remains to sing. Many fantastic shapes rise up, but they must be mine in private: already I have fooled the reader to the top of his bent;—else could I omit that strange creature, Woollett, who existed in trying the question, and bought litigations? and still stranger, imimitable, solemn Hapworth, from whose gravity Newton might have deduced the law of gravitation. How profoundly would he nib a pen— with what deliberation would he wet a wafer!—

But it is time to close—night's wheels are rattling fast over me—it is proper to have done with this solemn mockery.

Reader, what if I have been playing with thee all this while?—peradventure the very names which I have summoned up before thee are fantastic—insubstantial—like Henry Pimpernel, and Old John Naps of Greece:—

Be satisfied that something answering to them has had a being. Their importance is from the past.

THE DOCTRINE OF THE BELOVED DISCIPLE.

Some time before St John's decease he was so enfeebled with old age as to be obliged to be carried into the different churches; and being unable to deliver any long discourse, his custom was to say on these occasions, "My dear children, love one another." On being asked why he told them only one thing, he answered, "Nothing else is needed."—Our Lord's Love of the Father.

FINE ARTS.

A Review of the Lives and Works of some of the most Eminent Painters, with Remarks on the Opinions and Statements of former writers. By G. J. Nieuwenhuys. Hooper, 1835.

MR NIEUWENHUYTS has prefixed a title-page to his work, that rather misleads one as to its real nature: it would lead us to imagine the book to be a work of biographical criticism: it is, however, more properly a sort of antiquary-rationnel of the pictures which have, at one time or another, been in the possession of Mr Nieuwenhuys, enriched with such biographical scraps and anecdotes as he has met with in the course of his very extensive business as a picture-dealer,—at least, such is what we gather from the book itself. Mr Nieuwenhuys's criticism is chiefly composed of all the standard opinions and truisms current in the profession; not that we imagine him to be deficient in genuine taste; but his feeling and knowledge in the art would appear to be greater than his power of expressing or analysing it. The critical portion of the work therefore is deficient both in novelty and in that mastery over the theoretical as well as the practical, which is requisite in a critic.

He writes, however, with a true love of his subject; he describes all the pictures he mentions—he has collected all he can about them,—and about the painters; and appears to have the same sort of interest in pictures, that a schoolmaster has in his boys; he lives by them and in them, he talks of them, has them about him; and, even after they have left him, appears to keep his eye upon them, wherever they go, with an affectionate solicitude for their safety, and a pride in their fame.

The descriptions which abound in the work are pleasing from the beauty of the subjects, and the gusto with which they are written; the anecdotes scattered over it, are many of them new, exceedingly pleasant, and told in a straightforward, gossiping sort of style, the very best the author could have adopted. Mr Nieuwenhuys should have written it all in this way, and made it a memoir of his adventures as a dealer in pictures; he should have told us all about them—the places he found them in, the people who possessed them, their condition, and more about the prices they have fetched at different times.

At the beginning of the book is a fragmentary memoir of Rembrandt, the materials for which the author was at some pains to pick up at Amsterdam. We would extract a list of Rembrandt's efforts, which were seized when he was insolvent, but it is too long for our columns. The fact at the work is one of the articles set down. Rembrandt however did not die in poverty, though he appears never to have been rich. We shall conclude with one or two extracts—specimens of the anecdotes—sprinkled over the work.

"With regard to the date of Rembrandt's birth, we have no other authority than that of Houbraken, who mentions that the year 1606, which was particularly fertile in excellent artists, gave birth also to Rembrandt Van Ryn on the 15th of December, in the neighbourhood of Leyden. He was the only child of Herman Gerritsen Van Ryn and Neukje Willems Van Zwieterbroek, who possessed the cow-mill which was situated between Leyerderp and Kowkerk. From this humble habitation rose one of the greatest men which the genius of the art ever nursed. His parents observing his early inclinations for study, did not neglect the cultivation of his mind, and for that purpose they resolved to send him to the Latin school at Leyden, in order to bring him up to a learned profession; but his predominant taste for painting caused them to alter their views, and place him with Jacob Iraksen Van Zwanenburg, who instructed him in the rudiments of his art during three years that he remained with him. From this period Houbraken is in doubt who was his principal master, for he informs us that he passed six months with P. Lastman at Amsterdam. * * * His remarkable progress, however, attracted the attention of many amateurs, for he was assured by Houbraken that, about that period, he sold one of his pictures to a gentleman at the Hague for one hundred guilders, which was a tolerably large price at that time. He was so satisfied with the remuneration, that he resolved not to return home on foot—the mode of travelling by which he had reached the Hague—but departed in the diligence, elated with joy at being able to announce the good news to his parents. Fearing to lose his money, he would not descend from the vehicle when the passengers stopped on the road to take refreshments, but remained alone in the coach, when the horses, being left free, took fright and ran away to Leyden, and on his alighting at the inn where the animals were accustomed to stop daily, everyone was astonished that young Rembrandt, travelling without a coachman, had arrived in safety. Declining to give any explanation of what had happened, he left the coach and hastened to his father's habitation, which was situated at a short distance from the city."—P. 5.

"Rubens, being constantly occupied throughout the day, sought the recreation of a walk almost every evening; during this absence, his scholars never omitted the opportunity of viewing the progress he had made in the course of the day, which the old servant of Rubens, named Valveken, enabled them to do, with the understanding of his receiving some emolument from the young men for the permission: this was annually given. By these means they had the advantage of studying the way in which their master prepared his works and his manner of finishing them. On one occasion, the young artists were so eager to view the progress of a picture, that, in pressing forward for closer examination, they pushed Diepenbreck against the painting, when part of the arm and the face, which Rubens had just finished, were unfortunately much injured. The greatest consternation seized them, and, dreading the displeasure of their master, John Van Hoeck, with admirable presence of mind, said, "My dear comrade, there is not a moment to be lost; by some means we must endeavour to repair this unlucky accident; we have still three hours left; the most able among us must take the palette, and strive to do his best. For my part, I vote that Van Dyck undertake it; for he is the only one likely to succeed. This was instantly and unanimously approved of. Van Dyck, the only one diffident of his own success, took the pencil with fear and hesitation, but restored the injured parts so imitatively that several writers state even Rubens, on seeing his picture the following day, observed, in the presence of some of his pupils, "This arm and face (alluding to those repainted by Van Dyck) are not the worst part of my performance yesterday." The anecdote may be true; but that Rubens should have taken Van Dyck's work for his own appears to me a matter of doubt. I am more inclined to believe that, having received information of the circumstance, and admiring the talent displayed by Van Dyck, he took this delicate method of complimenting his gifted scholar."—P. 108.

"Van Dyck having determined on visiting England, resolved to take Haarlem in his way, that he might introduce him to Hals, and prevail upon him, if possible, to accompany him on his voyage. Having arrived at Haarlem, and found the dwelling of the painter, he learnt he was at the tavern, and despatched a message there to inform him that a person was waiting to have his portrait taken. On this, Hals immediately returned home, when Van Dyck observed that he was a stranger remaining but a short time in the city, and could not spare more than a couple of hours to sit for his picture. "That will be quite enough," answered Hals, and taking the first canvass that came in his way, began his task with such spirit, that before the time agreed on had elapsed, he requested the stranger to see how he had proceeded with his work. The sitter experienced great satisfaction, and was astonished in how short a period he had produced so exact a likeness. "In truth," continued he, "painting appears to me a very easy matter—I have a strong desire to try if I can take your portrait; do me the favour of taking my place." Hals, surprised, sat down, without well comprehending his meaning; he soon discovered, however, that the stranger was not a novice in the use of the palette, and in anxious expectation awaited the completion of the performance. On viewing it he was overcome with joy; "You are Van Dyck," cried he, embracing him, "for he alone is capable of painting thus;" and the two artists formed a friendship under the singular circumstance above related; but Van Dyck was unable to prevail on the painter to follow him to England, Hals declaring he was too happy among his friends at Haarlem to quit them; that ambition had no charms to repay him for their loss; and that he desired no other lot than what it had been his fortune to enjoy there."—P. 108.

MARY.

I watched thy fairy form in infancy
Expand in beauty 'neath a mother's eye;
I dreamed not then that thou couldst ever be
Aught but a child to me.

I mind, of old, in the long summer day,
I loved to see thee at thy childish play:
A spell of deeper yet of gentler power
Came with a future hour.

I watched the bud unfolding, day by day,
Unconsciously, till it became the flower;
I knew, then, thou wert altered; and I knew
That I was altered too.

I loved thee! ere I knew it, friendship grew
A name too cold—a holier radiance threw
Its influence o'er the altar of my heart
Love only could impart.

I loved thee!—long concealed within my breast,
(Like miser's gold, disturbing all his rest)
The secret lay—'twas whispered only when
I knew I was beloved again.

TABLE TALK.

THE "DEAR INVALID," AFFECTIONS OF AN OLD
WOMAN OF THE WORLD.

My aunt had made a party to go and visit Madame du Deffaud with Madame de Bourbon Buset, and they expected to find her unhappy, as Monsieur de Pont de Verle was dying, and he had been for twelve or fifteen years in her good graces. After the first compliments were over, Madame de Bourbon Buset, who always acted the part of a woman of great feelings, asked her after the dear invalid. "Ah, heavens! I was thinking of that," said the old marquise directly, "but I have only one footman here at present, and I was going to send one of my women to inquire after him."—"Madame, it rains in torrents," replied the other, "and I beg you will let her go in my carriage."—"Ah! you are too good. I thank you," replied the marquise, with a delighted air of courtesy. "Annette," she said, to a femme-de-chambre, who answered the bell, "go and inquire after our poor invalid. The Comtesse de Bourbon Buset will allow you to go in her carriage on account of the rain. You will tell her servants this, and, of course, you will not allow either of her footmen to take the trouble of going with you. I am very grateful, and much affected by your kind interest in my favourite," she added; "he is very amiable, clever, lively, tender, and affectionate. You doubtless know it was Madame de Châtelet who procured him for me." The two friends looked at each other, and did not dare to reply to such ill-timed words and confidence. The carriage returns. "Well, how did you find him?"—"As well, madame, as possible."—"Did he eat to-day?"—"He wished to amuse himself by biting an old shoe, but Monsieur de Lyonnais would not allow it."—"What an odd fancy for an invalid," said my aunt. "Does he walk now?" replied the marquise. "Ah, that I cannot say, madame, for he was rolled round; but I saw to-day that he knew me, for he wagged his tail?"—"Monsieur de Pont de Verle!" said her visitors. "No, no, it is my little dog I am speaking of; but," added she, addressing her servant in a harsh and cross tone, "you must not forget to send and inquire after the Chevalier de Pont de Verle."—Memoirs of the Marchioness de Créquy.—[It is to be recollected, however, that Madame du Deffaud was an object of envy for her wit, and her powers of conversation; and these jokes, however good, may have been inventions.]

A HOUSE FULL OF NOBLESSE.

My father ordered me some jam and bread, and then we set off from the Hotel de Breteuil, which was, and is still, opposite to the garden of the Tuilleries, a situation that seemed to me so enchanting, that I screamed with joy, which made them say that I was as natural as possible. This pretty house is composed, as you know, but of seven or eight rooms on each story, but all these rooms are decorated and gilded with the greatest richness, and this is the way the apartments were distributed between the Breteuils. The Marquise de Breteuil Sainte Croix occupied the same ground floor, of which she had reserved two or three rooms for her mother the Marechale de Thomonde, who was maid of honour to the Queen of England (James the Second's wife) and elder sister of the Marechale de Berwick. The mother and daughter had a magnificent lodging in the new castle at Saint Germain's, and the one she gave them at the Hotel de Breteuil was only as a resting place at Paris. My aunt, the Baronne de Breteuil Preilly, lived in the first story of her hotel with her husband, whose library had usurped three rooms. The second was occupied only by the Dowager Comtesse de Breteuil Charmaux, my other aunt, who was the elder sister of the baronne, and one of the Fronlays by birth, as well as her sister and me. She would not share her beautiful apartments with anyone, and always thought that the Breteuils did not do enough for her. The third story was inhabited by the Commandeur de Breteuil Chanteclér, who gave a lodging to the Bishop de Rennes (Messire Auguste de Breteuil Conty) whenever this one thought to have business at Paris, which did not fail to happen often. My aunt's five children occupied the fourth story, and my cousin Emily, who was afterwards the Marquise de Châtelet (Voltaire's friend), was obliged to give me up her apartment, which looked on the Tuilleries. They changed hers into three little rooms, which looked upon the rue Dauphine, and this (en passant be it said) she never forgave me.—Memoirs of the Marchioness de Créquy.—[Emily's non-forgiveness of her cousin may have been a figment of the marchioness's brain. People of an ill-regulated temper, or breeding, are continually mistaking the fancies of their own egotism for facts, to another person's disadvantage.]

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

M. B. on 'Education' will have been read, before this notice appears in print; and the result shall be known next week.

¶ The same of the article intitled 'How are we to get happily married?'

A notice of the pencilled article on 'Music' we keep for some remarks, which we propose to write on that subject in the course of a week or two.

—The letter of G. H. L. has highly gratified us: but he forgets that we were enumerating specimens of clerical excellence alone, and not laical.

¶ The manuscripts of our estimable and most considerate friend G. F. will have been forwarded as he desires, with many thanks and much real penitence.

.. ALFRED the first opportunity."

The Editor feels great interest in the biography that has been sent him, translated from the German, and intitled 'Heinrich Stilling'; and next week hopes to give the result of its perusal.

We will see if we cannot "get up" an article on our old friends the 'Gypsies,' agreeably to the wishes of J. S.

CHARACTERS OF HANDEL—MONTAIGNE—MARTIAL
(with a banter upon him)—SHROVE TUESDAY, AND
ITS PANCAKES—WALLER—DAVENANT—OTWAY.

FEBRUARY 24 (accidentally omitted last week), 1684. At Halle, in Saxony, George Frederick Handel, the Jupiter of music; not the less warranting that title, from including in his genius the most affecting tenderness as well as the most overpowering grandeur: for the father of gods and men was not only a thunderer, but a love-maker. Handel was the son of a physician; and, like Mozart, began composing for the public in his childhood. He was the grandest composer that is known to have existed, wielding, as it were, the choirs of heaven and earth together; and as Mozart said of him, "striking you, whenever he pleased, with a thunderbolt." His Hallelujahs open the heavens. He utters the word "Wonderful," as if all their trumpets spoke together. And then, when he comes to earth, to make love amidst nymphs and shepherds (for the beauties of all religions found room in his breast), his strains drop milk and honey, and his love is the youthfulness of the Golden Age. We see his Acis and Galatea, in their very songs, looking one another in the face in all the truth and mutual homage of the tenderest passion; and poor jealous Polyphemus stands in the background, blackening the scene with his gigantic despair. Christian meekness and suffering attain their last degree of pathos in 'He shall feed his flock,' and 'He was despised and rejected.' We see the blush on the smitten cheek mingling with the hair. Handel had a large, heavy person, and was occasionally vehement in his manners. He eat and drank too much (probably out of a false notion of supporting his excitement), and thus occasionally did harm to mind as well as body. But he was pious, generous, independent, and, like all great geniuses, a most thorough lover of his art, making no compromises with its demands and its dignity for the sake of petty conveniences. There is occasionally to be found a quaintness and stiffness in his style, owing to the fashion of the day; and he had not at his command the instrumentation of the present times, which no man would have turned to more overwhelming account; but what is sweet in his compositions, is sweeter in no other; and what is great, is greater than in any.

—28. 1533. At the chateau of Montaigne, in Perigord, of a noble family, Michel de Montaigne, the father of modern essay-writing, and one of the most original of thinkers. His father, to help him to an equable turn of mind, used to have him waked during his infancy with a flute. He was a philosopher of the material order, and as far sighted perhaps that way as any man that ever lived, having the temperament between jovial and melancholy, which is so favourable for seeing fair play to human nature; and his good-heartedness rendered him an enthusiastic friend, and a believer in the goodness of others, notwithstanding his insight into folly, and his living in a coarse and licentious age, of the freedoms of which he partook. But for want of something more imaginative and spiritual in his genius, his perceptions stopped short of the very first points, critical and philosophical. He knew little of the capabilities of the mind, out of the pale of its more manifest influences from the body; his taste in poetry was logical, not poetical; and he ventured upon openly despising romances ('Amadis de Gaul,' &c.) which was hardly in keeping with the modest wisdom of his motto, Que sais-je? (What do I know?) Montaigne, who loved his father's memory, always rode out in a cloak which had belonged to him, and would say of it, that he seemed to feel "wrapped up in his father" (il me semble m'envelopper de lui). Some writers have sneered at this saying, and at the deductions drawn from it respecting the amount of his filial affection; but the truth is, it does him as much honour as anything he ever said, for depth of feeling as well as vivacity of expression.

March 1, 30. At Bilbilis, in Celtiberia (Bubiera, in the modern Arragon), Marcus Valerius Martialis, the most profuse of epigrammatists, some of them (as he says himself) good, many poor enough, and many very bad. His best epigrams of the biting order are not to be compared with those of Catullus in delicacy of style or satire; but some have become favourites with posterity, as in that instance, translated (among others) by Sir John Harrington:—

The golden hair that Galla wears
Is hers; who would have thought it?
She swears 'tis hers, and true she swears,
For I know where she bought it.

His very best epigrams, in our opinion, are some of his grave ones,—those which answer to the original meaning of the word epigram,—an inscription. We here give a translation of one from the 'Indicator.' It is a "favourable specimen" of the best part of his nature, and furnishes a relief to such of his readers as stumble upon the loathsome indecencies permitted by the license of his age.

EPITAPH ON EROTION.

Hic festinata requiescit Erotion umbra,
Crimine qui fati sexta peremit hyema.
Quisquis eris nostri post me regnator agelli,
Manibus exiguus annua justa dato.
Sic Lare perpetuo, sic turba sospite, solus
Flebilis in terra ait lapis iste tua.

Underneath this greedy stone
Lies little sweet Erotion,
Whom the Fates, with hearts as cold,
Nipp'd away at six years old.
Thou, whoever thou mayst be,
That hast this small field after me,
Let the yearly rites be paid
To her little slender shade;
So shall no disease or jar
Hurt thy house, or chill thy Lar;
But this tomb here be alone,
The only melancholy stone.

As to some inconceivably pointless and twaddling epigrams, written by Martial, such as would appear to have been concocted by the dullest of old gentlemen and diners-out, and overseemingly carried about in his pocket, they have been admirably bantered by our friend, Mr Egerton Webbe, in the following imitations; which, however, have this drawback, that being good jokes upon bad ones, they cannot possibly convey the same impression. Mr Webbe has not forgotten the solemn turn of the heads—'De Flavio'—'De Eodem'—'Ad Antonium de Lepido'—&c. nor the ingenious art with which the epigrammatist contrives to have a reason asked him, for what he is bent upon explaining. We think these imitations so good, that liking to enjoy good things in company, we have not only been reading them (like the supposed old gentleman) to everybody at hand, but have been fancying ourselves present with all the friends whom we have been in the habit of relishing such passages with; and we venture to add, that Blackwood's editor, the best anthologist living, will like them. The scholarly reader need not be reminded, that the lines must be read with due deliberation, and as if in solid foretaste of their pungency.

CONCERNING JONES.

Jones eats his lettuces undressed;
D'you ask the reason? 'tis confessed,—
That is the way Jones likes them best.

TO SMITH—CONCERNING THOMSON.

Smith, Thomson puts no claret on his board;
D'you ask the reason?—Thomson can't afford.

TO GIBBS—CONCERNING HIS POEMS.

You ask me if I think your poems good;
If I could praise your poems, Gibbs,—I would.

CONCERNING THE SAME.

Gibbs says his poems a sensation make;—
But Gibbs, perhaps, is under a mistake.

TO THOMSON—CONCERNING DIXON AND JACKSON.

How Dixon can with Jackson bear,
You ask me, Thomson, to declare;—
Thomson, Dixon's Jackson's heir.

This last line, with its three successive patronymies, is exquisite.

—3. Shrove Tuesday. Easter Even. Called in some places, Pancake Tuesday. Shrove-tide is Shrive or Shrift tide; that is, the time of Confession, sins being specially confessed at this season in the Romish church. As the Carnival was also at this time, our jovial Protestant ancestors retained the jollity, when they had given up the confession, and pancake-eating is a remnant of it.

Not to eat pancakes on a Shrove Tuesday is a sort of irreligion: even though, like confession, it may go against some stomachs of a criminal weakness, especially in these sedentary times. Delicate pancakes, not too thin, tossed up by a proper hand (for they ought to be literally tossed in the pan, otherwise part of the old charm is wanting), brought up hot and hot, rolled up on one's plate, slightly touched with an acid, and cut across in that state, lump by lump, are to our taste the finest possible eating, of the paste or pudding order. We think we could dine, the whole year round (supposing the gods would provide us with such goods at all seasons) upon a pancake for our pudding, a bird for the meat, and old port for the drink. But what matters this epicureanism to our sedentary faculties? We thrive better on water than wine; cannot eat a bird with the right pleasure, unless sure that it was handsomely killed; and would fain, with beloved Shelley, see all the world eating vegetables, and getting as harmless and strong, as horses do on their hay-diet. There would be enough mortal necessity remaining, to strengthen our thoughts and hinder us from growing effeminate. The barbarous custom of throwing at cocks on this day, has gone out, thanks to the progress of knowledge; yet which was a tolerably large price at that time. He was so satisfied with the remuneration, that he resolved not to return home on foot—the mode of travelling by which he had reached the Hague—but departed in the diligence, elated with joy at being able to announce the good news to his parents. The sitter experienced great satisfaction, and was astonished in how short a period he had produced so exact a likeness. "In truth," continued he, "painting appears to me a very easy matter—I have a strong desire to try if I can take your portrait; do me the favour of taking my place." Hals, surprised, sat down, without well comprehending his meaning; he soon discovered, however, that the stranger was not a novice in the use of the palette, and in anxious expectation awaited the completion of the performance. On viewing it he was overcome with joy; "You are Van Dyck," cried he, embracing him, "for he alone is capable of painting thus;" and the two artists formed a friendship under the singular circumstances above related; but Van Dyck was unable to prevail on the painter to follow him to England, Hals declaring he was too happy among his friends at Haarlem to quit them; that ambition had no charms to repay him for their loss; and that he desired no other lot than what it had been his fortune to enjoy there."—P. 103.

MARY.

I watched thy fairy form in infancy
Expand in beauty 'neath a mother's eye;
I dreamed not then that thou couldst ever be
Aught but a child to me.

I mind, of old, in the long summer day,
I loved to see thee at thy childish play:
A spell of deeper yet of gentler power
Came with a future hour.

I watched the bud unfolding, day by day,
Unconsciously, till it became the flower;
I knew, then, thou wert altered; and I knew
That I was altered too.

I loved thee! ere I knew it, friendship grew
A name too cold—a holier radiance threw
Its influence o'er the altar of my heart
Love only could impart.

I loved thee!—long concealed within my breast,
(Like miser's gold, disturbing all his rest)
The secret lay—'twas whispered only when
I knew I was beloved again.

TABLE TALK.

THE "DEAR INVALID." AFFECTIONS OF AN OLD
WOMAN OF THE WORLD.

My aunt had made a party to go and visit Madame du Deffaud with Madame de Bourbon Busset, and they expected to find her unhappy, as Monsieur de Pont de Verle was dying, and he had been for twelve or fifteen years in her good graces. After the first compliments were over, Madame de Bourbon Busset, who always acted the part of a woman of great feelings, asked her after the dear invalid. "Ah, heavens! I was thinking of that," said the old marquise directly, "but I have only one footman here at present, and I was going to send one of my women to inquire after him."—"Madame, it rains in torrents," replied the other, "and I beg you will let her go in my carriage."—"Ah! you are too good. I thank you," replied the marquise, with a delighted air of courtesy. "Annette," she said, to a femme-de-chambre, who answered the bell, "go and inquire after our poor invalid. The Comtesse de Bourbon Busset will allow you to go in her carriage on account of the rain. You will tell her servants this, and, of course, you will not allow either of her footmen to take the trouble of going with you."—"I am very grateful, and much affected by your kind interest in my favourite," she added; "he is very amiable, clever, lively, tender, and affectionate. You doubtless know it was Madame de Châtelet who procured him for me." The two friends looked at each other, and did not dare to reply to such ill-timed words and confidence. The carriage returns. "Well, how did you find him?"—"As well, madame, as possible."—"Did he eat to-day?"—"He wished to amuse himself by biting an old shoe, but Monsieur de Lyonnais would not allow it."—"What an odd fancy for an invalid," said my aunt. "Does he walk now?" replied the marquise. "Ah, that I cannot say, madame, for he was rolled round; but I saw to-day that he knew me, for he wagged his tail?"—"Monsieur de Pont de Verle!" said her visitors. "No, no, it is my little dog I am speaking of; but," added she, addressing her servant in a harsh and cross tone, "you must not forget to send and inquire after the Chevalier de Pont de Verle."—Memoirs of the Marchioness de Créquy.—[It is to be recollected, however, that Madame du Deffaud was an object of envy for her wit, and her powers of conversation; and these jokes, however good, may have been inventions.]

A HOUSE FULL OF NOBLESSE.

My father ordered me some jam and bread, and then we set off from the Hotel de Breteuil, which was, and is still, opposite to the garden of the Tuilleries, a situation that seemed to me so enchanting, that I screamed with joy, which made them say that I was as natural as possible. This pretty house is composed, as you know, but of seven or eight rooms on each story, but all these rooms are decorated and gilded with the greatest richness, and this is the way the apartments were distributed between the Breteuils. The Marquise de Breteuil Sainte Croix occupied the same ground floor, of which she had reserved two or three rooms for her mother the Marechale de Thomonde, who was maid of honour to the Queen of England (James the Second's wife) and elder sister of the Marechale de Berwick. The mother and daughter had a magnificent lodging in the new castle at Saint Germain's, and the one she gave them at the Hotel de Breteuil was only as a resting place at Paris. My aunt, the Baronne de Breteuille Preilly, lived in the first story of her hotel with her husband, whose library had usurped three rooms. The second was occupied only by the Dowager Comtesse de Breteuil Charmeaux, my other aunt, who was the elder sister of the baronne, and one of the Fronlays by birth, as well as her sister and me. She would not share her beautiful apartments with anyone, and always thought that the Breteuils did not do enough for her. The third story was inhabited by the Commandeur de Breteuil Chantecler, who gave a lodging to the Bishop de Rennes (Messire Auguste de Breteuil Conty) whenever this one thought to have business at Paris, which did not fail to happen often. My aunt's five children occupied the fourth story, and my cousin Emily, who was afterwards the Marquise de Châtelet (Voltaire's friend), was obliged to give me up her apartment, which looked on the Tuilleries. They changed hers into three little rooms, which looked upon the rue Dauphine, and this (en passant be it said) she never forgave me.—Memoirs of the Marchioness de Créquy.—[Emily's non-forgiveness of her cousin may have been a figment of the marchioness's brain. People of an ill-regulated temper, or breeding, are continually mistaking the fancies of their own egotism for facts, to another person's disadvantage.]

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

M. B. on 'Education' will have been read, before this notice appears in print; and the result shall be known next week.

¶ The same of the article intitled 'How are we to get happily married?'

A notice of the pencilled article on 'Music' we keep for some remarks, which we propose to write on that subject in the course of a week or two.

—The letter of G. H. L. has highly gratified us: but he forgets that we were enumerating specimens of clerical excellence alone, and not laical.

* The manuscripts of our estimable and most considerate friend G. F. will have been forwarded as he desires, with many thanks and much real penitence.

.. ALFRED the first opportunity.

The Editor feels great interest in the biography that has been sent him, translated from the German, and intitled 'Heinrich Stilling;' and next week hopes to give the result of its perusal.

We will see if we cannot "get up" an article on our old friends the 'Gypsies,' agreeably to the wishes of J. S.

CHARACTERS OF HANDEL—MONTAIGNE—MARTIAL
(with a banter upon him)—SHROVE TUESDAY, AND
ITS PANCAKES—WALLER—DAVENANT—OTWAY.

FEBRUARY 24 (accidentally omitted last week), 1684. At Halle, in Saxony, George Frederick Handel, the Jupiter of music; not the less warranting that title, from including in his genius the most affecting tenderness as well as the most overpowering grandeur: for the father of gods and men was not only a thunderer, but a love-maker. Handel was the son of a physician; and, like Mozart, began composing for the public in his childhood. He was the grandest composer that is known to have existed, wielding, as it were, the choirs of heaven and earth together; and as Mozart said of him, "striking you, whenever he pleased, with a thunderbolt." His Hallelujahs open the heavens. He utters the word "Wonderful," as if all their trumpets spoke together. And then, when he comes to earth, to make love amidst nymphs and shepherds (for the beauties of all religions found room in his breast), his strains drop milk and honey, and his love is the youthfulness of the Golden Age. We see his Acis and Galatea, in their very songs, looking one another in the face in all the truth and mutual homage of the tenderest passion; and poor jealous Polyphemus stands in the background, blackening the scene with his gigantic despair. Christian meekness and suffering attain their last degree of pathos in 'He shall feed his flock,' and 'He was despised and rejected.' We see the blush on the smitten cheek mingling with the hair. Handel had a large, heavy person, and was occasionally vehement in his manners. He eat and drank too much (probably out of a false notion of supporting his excitement), and thus occasionally did harm to mind as well as body. But he was pious, generous, independent, and, like all great geniuses, a most thorough lover of his art, making no compromises with its demands and its dignity for the sake of petty conveniences. There is occasionally to be found a quaintness and stiffness in his style, owing to the fashion of the day; and he had not at his command the instrumentation of the present times, which no man would have turned to more overwhelming account; but what is sweet in his compositions, is sweeter in no other; and what is great, is greater than in any.

—28. 1533. At the chateau of Montaigne, in Perigord, of a noble family, Michel de Montaigne, the father of modern essay-writing, and one of the most original of thinkers. His father, to help him to an equable turn of mind, used to have him waked during his infancy with a flute. He was a philosopher of the material order, and as far sighted perhaps that way as any man that ever lived, having the temperament between jovial and melancholy, which is so favourable for seeing fair play to human nature; and his good-heartedness rendered him an enthusiastic friend, and a believer in the goodness of others, notwithstanding his insight into folly, and his living in a coarse and licentious age, of the freedoms of which he partook. But for want of something more imaginative and spiritual in his genius, his perceptions stopped short of the very first points, critical and philosophical. He knew little of the capabilities of the mind, out of the pale of its more manifest influences from the body; his taste in poetry was logical, not poetical; and he ventured upon openly despising romances ('Amadis de Gaul,' &c.) which was hardly in keeping with the modest wisdom of his motto, Que sçais-je? (What do I know?) Montaigne, who loved his father's memory, always rode out in a cloak which had belonged to him, and would say of it, that he seemed to feel "wrapped up in his father" (il me semble m'envelopper de lui). Some writers have sneered at this saying, and at the deductions drawn from it respecting the amount of his filial affection; but the truth is, it does him as much honour as anything he ever said, for depth of feeling as well as vivacity of expression.

March 1, 30. At Bilbilis, in Celtiberia (Bubiera, in the modern Arragon), Marcus Valerius Martialis, the most profuse of epigrammatists, some of them (as he says himself) good, many poor enough, and many very bad. His best epigrams of the biting order are not to be compared with those of Catullus in delicacy of style or satire; but some have become favourites with posterity, as in that instance, translated (among others) by Sir John Harrington:—

The golden hair that Galla wears
Is hers; who would have thought it?
She swears 'tis hers, and true she swears,
For I know where she bought it.

His very best epigrams, in our opinion, are some of his grave ones,—those which answer to the original meaning of the word epigram,—an inscription. We here give a translation of one from the 'Indicator.' It is a "favourable specimen" of the best part of his nature, and furnishes a relief to such of his readers as stumble upon the loathsome indecencies permitted by the license of his age.

EPITAPH ON EROTION.

Hic festinata requiescit Erotion umbra,
Crimine qui fati sexta peremit byema.
Quinquis eris nostri post me regnator agelli,
Manibus exiguis annua justa dato.
Sic Lare perpetuo, sic turba sospite, solus
Flebilis in terra sit lapis iste tua.

Underneath this greedy stone
Lies little sweet Erotion,
Whom the Fates, with hearts as cold,
Nipp'd away at six years old.
Thou, whoever thou mayst be,
That hast this small field after me,
Let the yearly rites be paid
To her little slender shade;
So shall no disease or jar
Hurt thy house, or chill thy Lar;
But this tomb here be alone,
The only melancholy stone.

As to some inconceivably pointless and twaddling epigrams, written by Martial, such as would appear to have been concocted by the dullest of old gentlemen and diners-out, and overseen by some sure that it was handsomely killed; and would with beloved Shelley, see all the world eating and getting as harmless and strong, as their hay-diet. There would be enough of vitality remaining, to strengthen our thoughts from growing effeminate. The barbarism of throwing at cocks on this day, has the program of knowledge; yet the ingenious art with which the epigrammatist contrives to have a reason asked him, for what he is bent upon explaining. We think these imitations so good, that liking to enjoy good things in company, we have not only been reading them (like the supposed old gentleman) to everybody at hand, but have been fancying ourselves present with all the friends whom we have been in the habit of relishing such passages with; and we venture to add, that Blackwood's editor, the best anthologist living, will like them. The scholarly reader need not be reminded, that the lines must be read with due deliberation, and as if in solid foretaste of their pungency.

CONCERNING JONES.

Jones eats his lettuces undressed;
D'you ask the reason? 'tis confessed,—
That is the way Jones likes them best.

TO SMITH—CONCERNING THOMSON.

Smith, Thomson puts no claret on his board;
D'you ask the reason?—Thomson can't afford.

TO GIBBS—CONCERNING HIS POEMS.

You ask me if I think your poems good;
If I could praise your poems, Gibbs,—I would.

CONCERNING THE SAME.

Gibbs says his poems a sensation make;—
But Gibbs, perhaps, is under a mistake.

TO THOMSON—CONCERNING DIXON AND JACKSON.

How Dixon can with Jackson bear,
You ask me, Thomson, to declare;—
Thomson, Dixon's Jackson's heir.

This last line, with its three successive patronymies, is exquisite.

—3. Shrove Tuesday. Easter Even. Called in some places, Pancake Tuesday. Shrove-tide is Shrive or Shrift tide; that is, the time of Confession, sins being specially confessed at this season in the Romish church. As the Carnival was also at this time, our jovial Protestant ancestors retained the jollity, when they had given up the confession, and pancake-eating is a remnant of it.

Not to eat pancakes on a Shrove Tuesday is a sort of irreligion: even though, like confession, it may go against some stomachs of a criminal weakness, especially in these sedentary times. Delicate pancakes, not too thin, tossed up by a proper hand (for they ought to be literally tossed in the pan, otherwise part of the old charm is wanting), brought up hot and hot, rolled up on one's plate, slightly touched with an acid, and cut across in that state, lump by lump, are to our taste the finest possible eating, of the paste or pudding order. We think we could dine, the whole year round (supposing the gods would provide us with such goods at all seasons) upon a pancake for our pudding, a bird for the meat, and old port for the drink. But what matters this epicureanism to our sedentary faculties? We thrive better on water than wine; cannot eat a bird with the right pleasure, and are sure that it was handsomely killed; and would with beloved Shelley, see all the world eating and getting as harmless and strong, as their hay-diet. There would be enough of vitality remaining, to strengthen our thoughts from growing effeminate. The barbarism of throwing at cocks on this day, has the program of knowledge; yet do not even purchase the respect of those whom respect is anything but a name, or a courteous term for flattery. Let me ask him, whether his thousands in cash shield him from as many racking cares and anxieties, to which he was not subject when a younger man? No; on the contrary, he almost suspects that his cares have gathered with his wealth. In short, did he ever discover that gold could purchase either love, health, youth, or peace of mind? No—no—he will tell you that he is no fool! I must suppose, however, for his own consistency's sake, that he has discovered a mart; and in that case for the love of heaven let him purchase those inestimable treasures himself, and lay them up for his heir; for the chances are, that the latter will forget them, and expend his wealth in commodities of a very different character.

"It is necessary, he will next say, that he should guard against accidents: how does he know that his boy will ever be able to toil for himself?" A very just precaution, truly. And while we are upon accidents, he would do better still to guard against the possibility of that child's not being fit for anything in case of the accident of his losing all his easily-gained fortune. This is a kind of accident which falls out every day. "But men in business bring their children up in business, and they are consequently not left to the mercy of chance." Unfortunately, in cases like the one which I am supposing, business has been rendered a matter of indifference to the youth; he considers it a wearisome and unworthy employment, and takes the first opportunity to retire from it, as a blot on the escutcheon that he contemplates.

"It is his wish," he says, "that his son should make his way into good society, and be the equal of his company in after-life." But if it is intended to commence and to proceed by the introduction which wealth affords to all, how mistaken are the means! for a man cannot live for ever upon an introduction,—not even of such a powerful friend. His own qualifications will be brought to the test. Again, much depends on my objector's ideas as to what constitutes equality in society, even where birth is overlooked. What will render his son the equal of the best company? Is it that he shall be able to vie with any other person in doing credit to the cutting-out talents of a tailor; or, in the super-fineness of his broad-cloth? or shall he be on a par with his neighbour in the splendour of his equipage, or the livery of his servants? If his friend dine off plate, that he shall be able to produce his silver service also, only more splendid? If another build a wing to his house, he can immediately add two to his mansion? Are these his ideas of being on an equality with the world? The proofs of the emptiness of ambition like this are almost too common to need repetition. For having taken a decided step in advance of the individual who only boasts his plain service, he will begin to discover with disgust that his silver is eclipsed by another's gold. Having built his two wings, he finds that mansion, wings, and all, is but a sorry hut, in comparison with the palace of some neighbouring Croesus.

Having thus taken much thought for his son, and left him the produce of his toil, that "no man may look down upon him," and left him nothing else; the latter may chance to discover, if gifted with common sense, that to form one of a circle, not more than his equals in age and natural talents, and listen while others discourse on subjects of which he is totally ignorant, is to be below his company.

From want of reading, experience, habit, and observation, to be unable to yield information on any of the many topics incident to conversation, is to be below his company.

To visit the workshop of the industrious in manufactures, and, having eyes, see not to any purpose of comprehension or instruction, is to be there below his company.

Disqualified by want of ability, to have no "voice in the commonwealth," is to be below the mark in society.

These failures he will speedily discover himself; and there are many other defaults in his title to equality, which the world will speedily discover for him. Among many worse, I name one: If, when the world is struggling all but unanimously towards the same noble end, the amelioration of the mental existence of man, as, from ignorance, or motives of self-interest, shall be the one to choke up the wholesome current; then surely will he be below the company of his fellow men.

I have noticed, in a minor way, that a man, even in privacy, seated with book in hand alone, where he could least dread a competitor, may still find himself below his company. He is not prepared for his author; and the slightest approach to erudition or poetic feeling in what he is reading throws him out. That is rather degrading, where opportunities have been lost!

Thus I have endeavoured to prove the futility of all attempts for the future welfare of our sons, which are not based on a thorough training in good principles and education. Much might be said on the miseries parents ensure for themselves, when they erect a golden calf as the object of the love and aspiration of their children; in so doing, they fly from the right point in two ways—they misapply their time, as has been shown, and they throw temptation in the way of those who are the least prepared to encounter it. How much, how very much, of family dissension, the most hateful of hatreds, takes its rise from this source! But this is a picture that every man can best colour for himself.

It would be agreeable to enlarge, as a relief to the scene, on the happiness felt by those who take right views, and act accordingly, of their duties towards their families. But the thing has been done so often, and so well, that the reader's recollection will be the best authority I can refer to on the subject. Two names I must be allowed to cite anon. But these is yet another subject.

It may appear to some, that too much stress is here laid upon the influence of reading, or upon the inaptitude of a man for study. Such persons would not think so, if that love had ever touched them—if they had ever been indebted to study for one burst of enthusiasm—for one consoling or forgetful hour—for having weaned them from one weakness, or acted as a counter-allurement to one vice. If I say that pure and refined tastes are the best guardians a man can invoke around his child, I shall provoke the charge of saying what everybody knows; but, surely, they are in contradiction with themselves who, knowing this, also care not to see their children studious. Gibbon declared that he would not exchange his love of reading for the treasures of the Indies: and we are not to suppose that it was because he was indebted to his studies for the materials of his great work, that he so loved his books. They had been his friends from youth. His 'History' is worth the ransom of imperial Rome, but I doubt whether the philosopher would not have sacrificed that—or rather an equal fame, to his love of mental acquirement. Happily the pursuits were the same.

"Les premiers jours du printemps ont moins de grâce que la vertu naissante d'un jeune homme." The first days of spring have less of beauty than the growing virtues of a young man. These are the words of one of the most truth-telling and unfeigned of writers—Rochefoucauld. I leave my readers to draw their own conclusions from his observations, and proceed to quote some beautiful lines from a right-thinking native poet, bearing on the same subject:—

"The shepherd on Tornaro's misty brow,
And the swart seaman, sailing far below,
Not undelighted watch the morning ray
Purple the orient—till it breaks away,
And burns and blazes into glorious day;
But happier still is he who bends to trace
That sun, the soul, just dawning in the face;
The burst, the glow, the animating strife,
The thoughts and passions stirring into life;

The forming utterance, the inquiring glance,
The giant waking from his tenfold trance,
Till up he starts as conscious whence he came,
And all is light within the trembling frame!
What then a Father's feelings? Joy and fear
In turn prevail; joy must; and through the year
Tempering the ardent, winging night and day
Men who shrink back or wander from the way,
Praising each highly,—from a wish to raise
Their merits to the level of his praise,
Onward in their observing sight he moves,
Fearful of wrong, in awe of whom he loves!
Their sacred presence who shall dare profane?
Who, when He slumbers, hope to fix a stain?
He lives a model, in his life to show,
That, when he dies and through the world they go,
Some men may pause and say, when some admire,
'They are his sons, and worthy of their sire!'

CHARLES LAMB.

[This interesting tribute to the memory of its excellent subject, now, we believe, first given intire in a periodical work, is from the pen of the "Bookseller of the Poets," Mr Moxon,—himself (and with no disparagement either in the antithesis) a Poet among Booksellers;—a rare title, and very encouraging for his literary brethren.]

WITHIN a few months of each other we have lost two remarkable men—Samuel Taylor Coleridge and Charles Lamb. They were schoolfellows, read together, first published together, and were undivided even in Death! When we last saw the latter—and recollection!—he said he was ever thinking of his friend. He is now with him and for ever! It is of Charles Lamb only that we wish to speak.

No man was ever more sincerely regretted, or will be longer remembered, by his friends. Happily we see the brighter after our sorrows; and the object of our grief, in a short time, becomes a star that we can gaze at with pleasure. Fair, fair shall be the flowers that spring over thy tomb, dear, gentle Elia! sweet shall be the song—sweet as thine own—that shall hush the wanderer to the spot where thy urn receives the tears of the stranger. Thither my feet shall repair in spring time and in harvest; thither will I lead thy votaries, and there shall they drink of the lucid waters that well from the memory of thy gentle life, thou kindest of human creatures!

Peregrine, Reader, it was not thy good fortune to know our inimitable friend. Thou hast not been with him in his walks; and to walk with him was to converse with the immortal dead,—with Chaucer and with Sidney,—with Spenser and with Shakespeare,—with Burton and with Sir Thomas Brown,—with Fuller and with Jeremy Taylor,—and with Milton, and these elder dramatists, who were to him a first love, and, as such, cherished through life. Thou hast not been his guest; nor sat among his books—goodly felices in quaint bindings—in rooms scantily furnished, but rich in the gifts of genius, walls hung round with Raphael and Da Vinci, with Poussin and Titian, and the works of the incomparable Hogarth! Thou wert not a visitor in the temple, nor an evening listener to choice—hardly choice where all were good—passages from Milton, over the finest of which the worshipping spirit of the reader always wept; but his tears were those of admiration, drops that blotted out, as it were, ages of neglect! On his old favourites his eyes rested even in death! Sacred to the owner will be the volume he last bent over, with its page folded down—so ever let it remain—on thy life, accomplished Sidney! From thyself, if aught earthly in heaven be permitted, perchance he may learn thy story, and there walk side by side with those whom in idea he lived with while on earth. Nor hast thou seen him a solitary, wandering among the cloisters of Christ's Hospital—nor in the Quadrangles at Oxford, nor at Twickenham, where he often spent his holidays—red-letter days as he called them—nor at Hampton Court, which he preferred—so truly

English was his mind—to Vivantes; nor in the India House, where he was loved for his goodness of heart, and for his jokes and his puns—he was a punster, and a good one;—nor in his ramblings in the neighbourhood of Cheshunt, and Southgate, and Ware, and Tottenham High Cross, and on the banks of the Lea, thinking of Walton and his plain-mindedness! nor latterly at Waltham, nor at Winchmore, nor in the green lanes about Enfield, where, on a summer's evening, he would walk with his amiable sister, his almost inseparable companion of forty years.

As, Reader, thou hast met seen the living Elia—would that thou hadst, for thou wouldst ever have remembered his sweet smile, and the gentleness of his heart—turn to his books, there thou mayst imagine him, kinder than he was thou canst not; and he will yet guide thee to old haunts and to familiar faces, which thou wilt hereafter think of with delight. He will conduct thee to the Old South-Sea House—once his own—and to Oxford, where thou wilt meet with George Dyer (George is worthy thy knowing), or he will sit with thee the old year out, and quote the old poets, and that beautiful line in his friend's ode—or he will introduce thee to Mrs Battle, who, next to her devotions, loved a game at whist; or he will pleasantly shake his cap and bells with thee on the first of April; or accompany thee to a Quakers' Meeting; or describe to thee the Old and the New Schoolmaster; or tell a delightful story—no fiction—of Valentine's Eve, or take thee with him, Bridget Elia by his side—thou wilt love Bridget—on a visit to his relations,

or he will discourse to thee on modern gallantry, or point out to thee the old Benchers of the Inner Temple; or describe to thee his first visit to Old Drury, and introduce thee to his old favourites—now forgotten; or thou shalt hear him—for he loved those whom none loved—speak in the purest strain of humanity in praise of chimney-sweepers, “innocent blackness,” as he calls them, and of beggars, and lament the decay of the latter; or he will rouse thy fancy, and make thy mouth water with his savoury dissertation on roast pig (many were the porklings that graced his table, kind presents from admiring and unknown correspondents); or take thee with him in the old Margate Hoy to the seaside, or introduce thee to his friend Captain Jackson; or discourse to thee of himself—the convalescent and the superannuated man; or on old china, or on old books—on the latter with what relish! or of Barbara S. (Miss Kelly), or of Alice (his first love), or of Bridget Elia (his sister), or tell thee the sweet story of Rosamund Gray. Let these, reader, if thou art a lover of thy Kind and of the beautiful, have a by-place in thy mind; they will not only please thy imagination, but enlarge thy heart, its sphere of action, and its humane capabilities. They will lead thee to new sources of delight—springs fresh as the waters of Horeb; and thou wilt become acquainted with men famous in their generation. Occasionally, if thou art a reader of modern books only, thou mayest imagine him quaint, but thou wilt find him free from conceits, and always natural. Others may have affected the language of an older age, but with him it was no adoption.

He always spoke as he wrote, and did both as he felt; and his Letters—they were unpremeditated—are in the style of his other writings; they are in many respects equal, in some superior, to his Essays; for the bloom, the freshness of the author's mind, is still upon them. In his humour there is much to touch the heart and to reflect upon; it is of a serious cast, somewhat like that of Cervantes. In the jokes which he would throw out, the offspring of the moment, there was often more philosophy than in the premeditated sayings of other men. He was an admirable critic, and was always willing to exercise the art he so much excelled in for the fame of others. We have seen him almost blind with poring over the endless and illegible manuscripts that were submitted to him. On these occasions, how he would long to find out something good, something that he could speak kindly of; for to give another pain (as he writes in a letter now before us) was to give himself greater! He lived in the past, yet no man ever had a larger share of sympathy for those around him. He loved his friends, and showed it substantially by numberless tokens, and was as sincerely loved in return. He had, like other men, his failings; but they were such, that he was loved rather for them than in spite of them. Enemies he had none. For upwards of forty years he devoted his life to the happiness of his sister, for whom he had a most affectionate regard, and for whose comfort he would gladly have laid down his own life; and she, not less devoted, for him would have sacrificed her own. He preferred—we use his own words—even her occasional wanderings to the sense and sanity of the world.

Their minds were congenial, so were their lives, and they beautifully walked together—their was a blended existence—to the hour of his dissolution. His charities, for his humble means, surpassed those of most men. He had for some years upon his bounty three pensioners! Generous and noble must have been the heart of him that, out of his slender income, could allow his old schoolmistress thirty pounds per annum! What self-denial! What folios this sum would have purchased for him! Well we remember the veneration with which we used to look upon the old lady—for she remembered Galdsmith! He had once lent her his poems to read. We often lament that he did not give them to her; but the author of the ‘Vicar of Wakefield’ was poor.

Kind surely must have been the disposition of him who sought out the nurse that attended the last moments of Coleridge, (whom living he adored and dead thus honoured,) that on her head he might pour out the overflowings of the irresistible goodness of his nature. He gave her five pounds; but this we did not learn from himself! These were but trifles; yet of such was the life of this the most amiable of men made up.

His tastes, in many respects, were most singular. He preferred Wardour street and Seven Dials to fields that were Elysian. The disappearance of the old clock from St Dunstan's Church drew tears from him; nor could he ever pass without emotion the place where Exeter Change once stood. The removal had spoiled a reality in Gay. The passer-by, he said, no longer saw “the combs dangle in his face.” This almost broke his heart. He had no taste for flowers or green fields; he preferred the high road. The Garden of Eden, he used to say, must have been a dull place. He had a strong aversion to roast beef and to fowls, and to any wines but port or sherry. Tripe and cow-beef were to him delicacies—rare dainties!

All his books were without portraits; nor did he ever preserve, with two exceptions, a single letter. He had a humorous method of testing the friendship of his visitors; it was, whether in their walks they would taste the tap of mine host at the Horse-Shoe, or at the Rose and Crown, or at the Rising Sun! But a member of the Temperance Society, on these occasions, could not have been more abstemious. A single glass would suffice. We have seen ladies enter with him—the fastidious Barbara S.; and great poets—the author of the ‘Excursion’ himself! He was no politician, though, in his youth, he once assisted to draw through the streets Charles James Fox! Nor was he a man of business. He could not pick up a trunk, nor tie up a parcel. Yet he was methodical, punctual in his appointments, and an excellent pay-master. A debt haunted him! He could not live in another person's bank! He wished to leave a friend a small sum of money; but “to have done with the thing,” as he said, gave it him before-hand! If an acquaintance dropped in of an evening before supper, he would instantly, without saying a word, put on his hat, and go and order an extra supply of port. He has done this for us a hundred times! Relics and keepsakes had no charm for him! A traveller once brought him some scorns from an ilex that grew over the tomb of Virgil. He threw them at the hackney-coachman as they passed by his window! And there is a story, that he once sat to an artist of his acquaintance for a whole series of the British Admirals; but for what publication we never heard!

But we are wandering from our object, which was simply to record, that, of all the men we ever knew, Charles Lamb was, in every respect, the most original, and had the kindest heart.

THE WEEK.

NINTH DAYS.

FEBRUARY 18, 1677. At Paris, son of the illustrious Cassini, the founder of a family of astronomers, Giacomo Cassini, an enricher of the science with many valuable discoveries. His death was of that unexpected sort, for a man of a long and peaceful life, which looks like a mockery of human calculations. He died of a fall, at the age of eighty.

— 19, 1564. At Pisa, or Florence, son of a noble Florentine, who was a scientific man also, and an accomplished musician, Galileo Galilei, the great precursor of Newton, and the greatest discoverer in mechanical geometry since the time of Archimedes. He rendered the discovery of the telescope applicable to astronomical purposes, brought geometry to the aid of the doctrine of motion, invented the pendulum, discovered the gravity of the air, the satellites of Jupiter, the inequalities of the surface of the moon, and established the Copernican and Pythagorean system of the universe, by proving that the earth moved round the sun. For this last discovery he was persecuted by the Jesuits, who, forgetting their own professions of being teachers, and idly subjecting the grandeur of the character of Scripture to literal interpretations of some of its texts, brought him under the tyranny of the Inquisition, by whom he was kept in qualified imprisonment for the remaining few years of his life, latterly at his own house. He was also sentenced to repeat the Seven Penitential Psalms every week for the space of three years; and it was suspected, from the state of his hands, that he had been put to the torture, and sworn not to reveal it. The writer of the present paragraph saw one of the fingers of these hands preserved under a glass case in the middle of the Laurentian library at Florence, pointing to heaven, and now almost an object of worship with the descendants of those by whom he was persecuted. It was during his confinement at his house that he was visited, among other celebrated travellers, by Milton; who describes him as suffering imprisonment “for thinking otherwise in astronomy than the Dominican friars.” The great poet's allusion to him in ‘Paradise Lost’ is well known; but it is as difficult not to quote it, as for a musician to see an organ open, and not touch the keys.

He scarce had ceas'd, when the superiour fiend
Was moving towards the shore; his ponderous shield,
Ethereal temper, massy, large, and round,
Behind him cast. The broad circumference
Hung on his shoulders like the moon, whose orb
Through optic glass the Tuscan artist views
At evening from the top of Fesolè,
Or in Valdarno, to descry new lands,
Rivers, or mountains, in her spotty globe.

Galileo, besides being a profound natural philosopher, was a general amateur of the fine arts, a musician, and a man of wit. He played beautifully on the lute; delighted in architecture, in painting, and in husbandry; had a taste for design; was the author of several facetious poems (gathered into the Italian collections); was a capital companion, full of ease and pleasantry; and, as might be expected from such a combination of the solid and airy, was an enthusiastic lover of Ariosto, and took his part in the famous critical dispute respecting the merits of that fine poet and those of the more artificial Tasso. His stature was small, but his aspect venerable.

Same day, 1792. At Trinity College, Cambridge,

under the roof of his maternal grandfather, Dr Bentley (the famous scholar), Richard Cumberland, the comic dramatist, son and grandson of a bishop. His comedies verge upon the sentimental and the ideal (Goldsmith calls them "Tragedy giving a rout"); but there is occasionally more force and vivacity than would be expected from a certain air of authority and pretension; and his 'West Indian,' which led the way to the romantic generosity of the young gentlemen in modern comedies, has some of the good-natured animal spirits of Hoedley. Mr Cumberland, among others not so good, wrote also a pleasant novel called 'Henry.' His poetry is unworthy the rest of his reputation. We remember seeing him, in his latter years, going along the street. His appearance was highly respectable and gentlemanly, with an earnest countenance. The portrait in his 'Memoirs' must have been very like him, at the time it was painted.

— 20, 1694. At Paris, the son of a notary, Marie Francis Arouet de Voltaire, the most universal genius of the French nation. In the several departments of literature which he adorned, with the exception of that of wit and raillery, he was surpassed by many individuals; and in no one respect, perhaps, were his acuties of the very highest order, except as a detector of absurdity—and even in that respect his discrimination was not perfect, too often confounding the local and relative with the universal. In short, his philosophy was in no respect as deep as he and his friends supposed it. Yet, as a dramatist, he generally ranks as inferior only to Corneille and Racine; as an historian, his rank lies betwixt the two extremes of his idolators and his enemies, and has no mean place after all; he was one of the readiest and most elegant artificial poets, and writers of vers de société, that have appeared; he made his countrymen popularly acquainted with the progress of science and natural philosophy, especially the Newtonian; and, above all, he was a great puller down of superstition, and hastened those reformations in religion and government which will end in building up a far better system than he could anticipate, crowned with Christian aspirations of which he knew nothing, though he was a better Christian in some respects than he thought himself, being a very humane and public-spirited man—albeit irritable and vain-glorious. There was so little real poetry in him of a high order, which demands a thorough depth and sincerity of nature, that he wrote a scandalous poem on the subject of Joan of Arc, whom, as a great man, superior to the prejudices of all times, he ought to have held in reverence. This extraordinary individual—with a frame originally so weak that it was feared he would have died soon after his birth, and with a person always meagre and apparently fragile, but great animal spirits—lived to be upwards of eighty-five years of age, and is thought at last to have hastened his death by drinking too much coffee in order to keep himself on the alert for a new publication. He was the sayer of some of the most exquisite bon-mots on record, from among which we hastily give the first that comes to mind as a specimen. He was praising Haller, the German, to somebody, and the other saying that Haller by no means thought so well of him—"Ah," returned the ready old wit, "perhaps we are both of us mistaken." Perhaps Voltaire may be briefly and not unjustly characterized as the only man who ever obtained a place in the list of the great names of the earth by an aggregation of secondary abilities. He was the god of cleverness.

Same day, 1716. At Hereford, where his father, an officer in the army, was on a recruiting party, David Garrick, the most universal stage genius that has appeared in England. His family was of French origin, the grandfather, a merchant, having fled from the neighbouring country at the revocation of the edict of Nantes. It is, therefore, perhaps to French blood that we owe his excellence in the comic part of his genius: the tragic part England will claim for itself. We need not repeat here what has been said of him so often, and is still daily being said, in memoirs and stage-criticism. We doubt not, both from tradition, and from the very objections made to his style by contemporaries who are noticed in the latest accounts of him, that he deserves almost all that has been said of him as a true actor, both in tragedy and comedy, and a restorer of nature to the stage; though we take leave to doubt, from what is known of his own nature and its predominant qualities, which were more lively than profound, that he was upon the whole inferior both in tragic depth, and in exquisiteness of poetical recitation (where the lines required it) to our late lamented Kean. Their very faces go to show the difference. They both had remarkably fine eyes, but the look of Garrick (you may see it in Reynolds's portrait) was the more sparkling; Kean's the more earnest and the more internal. Cumberland, in his autobiography, gives a lively specimen of Garrick's good-nature and love of admiration (a very pardonable thing in a player, especially one so flattered). The great actor was invited to a dinner party, where they missed him when the dinner came on table. On looking out of window, he was observed transporting a negro-boy by imitating a turkey-cock! whose airs, and gobbles, and sudden rushes, he so gave to the life, that the boy cried out in an ecstasy—"Do it again, Massa Garrick; do it again!" And Garrick did it again.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

ORIGIN OF MALLET'S 'EDWIN AND EMMA.'

THIS touching ballad, the author of which had a genuine faculty for that sort of writing, far superior to what he probably thought his superior compositions, has been somewhat neutralized in its effect by its trite repetition from the pages of Enfield's 'Speaker;' though to complain of such results from those publications would be doing them great injustice—since you cannot at once make a good thing common, and yet expect it to retain, among its other beneficial consequences, a perpetual novelty. But grown people, when their attention is freshly excited, may read well-known productions with a new relish; and, in this hope, we have repeated the ballad, as well as the true story on which it is founded. Mallet's account of the heroine's death is not so affecting as the real circumstance—her suddenly screaming out, at hearing the death-bell of her lover, "that her heart was burst"—but it is not wanting in pathos, especially the first line; and there is a vein of natural elegance throughout the poem.

Could any of our friends oblige us with a copy of Mickle's ballad of "Cumnor Hall?" It is not to be found in the ordinary editions of his poems.

EXTRACT OF A LETTER FROM THE CURATE OF BOWES, IN YORKSHIRE, TO MR COPPERTHWAITE, AT MARRICK.

"The family name of the young man was Wrightson; of the young maiden, Railton. They were both much of the same age—that is, growing up to twenty. In their birth there was no disparity: but in fortune, alas! she was his inferior. His father, a hard old man, who had by his fortune acquired a handsome competency, expected and required that his son should marry suitably. But, as 'amor vincit omnia,' his heart was unalterably fixed on the pretty young creature already named. Their courtship, which was all by stealth, unknown to the family, continued about a year. When it was found out, old Wrightson, his wife, and particularly their crooked daughter, Hannah, flouted at the maiden, and treated her with notable contempt; for they held it as a maxim, and a rustic one it is, 'that blood was nothing without groats.'

"The young lover sickened, and took to his bed about Shrove Tuesday, and died the Sunday seven-night after.

"On the last day of his illness, he desired to see his mistress. She was civilly received by the mother, who bid her welcome—when it was too late. But her daughter Hannah lay at his back, to cut them off from all opportunity of exchanging their thoughts.

"At her return home, on hearing the bell toll out for his departure, she screamed aloud that her heart was burst, and expired some moments after.

"The then curate of Bowes* inserted it in his register, that 'they both died of love, and were buried in the same grave, March 15, 1714.'

"I am, dear Sir,
Yours, &c."

EDWIN AND EMMA.

Mark it, Cesario, it is true and plain;
The splinters and the knitters in the sun,
And the free maids that weave their thread with bones,
Do use to chant it. It is silly sooth,
And dallies with the innocence of love,
Like the old age.—Shakspeare's Twelfth Night.

Far in the windings of a vale,
Fast by a sheltering wood,
The safe retreat of health and peace,
An humble cottage stood.

There beauteous Emma flourished fair,
Beneath a mother's eye;
Whose only wish on earth was now }
To see her blest, and die.

The softest blush that nature spreads
Gave colour to her cheek:
Such orient colour smiles through heaven,
When vernal mornings break.

Nor let the pride of great ones scorn
This charmer of the plains:
That sun, who bids their diamonds blaze,
To paint our lily deigns.

Long had she filled each youth with love,
Each maiden with despair;
And though by all a wonder owned,
Yet knew not she was fair;

Till Edwin came, the pride of swains,
A soul devoid of art;
And from whose eye, serenely mild,
Shone forth the feeling heart.

A mutual flame was quickly caught—
Was quickly, too, revealed;
For neither bosom lodged a wish
That virtue keeps concealed.

What happy hours of home-felt bliss
Did love on both bestow!
But bliss too mighty long to last,
Where fortune proves a foe.

His sister—who, like envy form'd,
Like her in mischief joy'd—
To work them harm, with wicked skill,
Each darker art employ'd.

The father, too, a sordid man,
Who love nor pity knew,
Was all unfeeling as the clod
From whence his riches grew.

Long had he seen their secret flame,
And seen it long unmoved:
Then with a father's frown at last
Had sternly disapproved.

In Edwin's gentle heart, a war
Of differing passions strove:
His heart, that durst not disobey,
Yet could not cease to love.

Denied her sight, he oft behind
The spreading hawthorn crept,
To snatch a glance, to mark the spot
Where Emma walked and wept.

* Bowes is a small village in Yorkshire, where, in former times, the Earls of Richmond had a castle. It stands on the edge of that vast and mountainous tract, named by the neighbouring people Stanemore, which is always exposed to wind and weather, desolate and solitary throughout.—Camb. Brit.

Of too on Stanmore's wintry waste,
Beneath the moonlight shade,
In sighs to pour his soften'd soul,
The midnight mourner strayed.

His cheek, where health with beauty glow'd,
A deadly pale o'ercoat:
So fades the fresh rose in its prime,
Before the northern blast.

The parents now with late remorse,
Hang o'er his dying bed,
And weary heaven with fruitless vows,
And fruitless sorrows shed.

'Tis past! he cried—but if your souls
Sweet mercy yet can move,
Let these dim eyes once more behold,
What they must ever love.

She came; his cold hand softly touched,
And bathed with many a tear:
Fast falling o'er the primrose pale,
So morning dews appear.

But oh! his sister's jealous care,
A cruel sister she!
Forbade what Emma came to say;
"My Edwin, live for me!"

New homeward as she hopeless wept
The church-yard path along,
The blast blew cold, the dark owl scream'd
Her lover's funeral song.

Amid the falling gloom of night,
Her startling fancy found
In every bush his hovering shade,
His groan in every sound.

Alone, appall'd, thus had she passed
The visionary vale—
When lo! the death-bell smote her ear,
Sad sounding in the gale!

Just then she reached with trembling step,
Her aged mother's door—
He's gone, she cried; and I shall see
That angel-face no more.

I feel, I feel this breaking heart
Beat high against my side—
From her white arm down sunk her head;
She shivering sigh'd, and died.

CHARACTERS OF SHAKESPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

NO. VI.—ANTONY AND CLEOPATRA.

This is a very noble play. Though not in the first class of Shakspeare's productions, it stands next to them, and is, we think, the finest of his historical plays, that is, of those in which he made poetry the organ of history, and assumed a certain tone of character and sentiment, in conformity to known facts, instead of trusting to his observations of a general nature, or to the unlimited indulgence of his own fancy. What he has added to the history, is upon a par with it. His genius was, as it were, a match for history as well as nature, and could grapple at will with either. This play is full of that pervading comprehensive power by which the poet could always make himself master of time and circumstances. It presents a fine picture of Roman pride and Eastern magnificence: and in the struggle between the two, the empire of the world seems suspended, "like the swan's-down feather,

"That stands upon the swell at full of tide,
And neither way inclines."

The characters breathe, move, and live. Shakspeare does not stand reasoning on what his characters would do or say, but at once becomes them, and speaks and acts for them. He does not present us with groups of stage-puppets or poetical machines making set speeches on human life, and acting from a calculation of ostensible motives, but he brings living men and women on the scene, who speak and act from real feelings, according to the ebbs and flows of passion, without the least tincture of the pedantry of logic or rhetoric. Nothing is made out by inference and analogy, by climax and antithesis, but everything takes place just as it would have done in reality, according to the occasion.—The character of Cleopatra is a master-piece. What an extreme contrast it affords to Imogen! One would think it almost impossible for the same person to have drawn both. She is voluptuous, ostentatious, conscious, boastful of her charms, haughty, tyrannical, fickle. The luxurious pomp and gorgeous extravagance of the Egyptian queen are displayed in all their force and lustre, as well as the irregular grandeur of the soul of Mark Antony. Take only the first four lines that they speak as an example of the regal style of love-making.

"CLEOPATRA. If it be love, indeed, tell me how much?"

ANTONY. There's beggary in the love that can be reckon'd.

"CLEOPATRA. I'll set a bourn how far to be lov'd.

ANTONY. Then must thou needs find out new heav'n, new earth."

The rich and poetical description of her person, beginning—

"The barge she sat in, like a burnish'd throne,
Burnt on the water; the poop was beaten gold,
Purple the sails, and so perfum'd, that
The winds were love-sick"—

seems to prepare the way for, and almost to justify the subsequent infatuation of Antony when, in the sea-fight at Actium, he leaves the battle, and "like a doating mallard" follows her flying sails.

Few things in Shakspeare (and we know of nothing in any other author like them) have more of that local truth of imagination and character than the passage in which Cleopatra is represented conjecturing what were the employments of Antony in his absence. "He's speaking now, or murmuring—Where's my serpent of old Nile?" Or again, when she says to Antony, after the defeat at Actium, and his summoning up resolution to risk another fight—"It is my birth-day; I had thought to have held it poor; but since my lord is Antony again, I will be Cleopatra." Perhaps the finest burst of all is Antony's rage after his final defeat, when he comes in and surprises the messenger of Cæsar kissing her hand—

"To let a fellow that will take rewards,
And say, God quit you, be familiar with,
My play-fellow, your hand; this kingly seal,
And plighter of high hearts."

It is no wonder that he orders him to be whipped; but his low condition is not the true reason: there is another feeling which lies deeper, though Antony's pride would not let him show it, except by his rage; he suspects the fellow to be Cæsar's proxy.

Cleopatra's whole character is the triumph of the voluptuous, of the love of pleasure and the power of giving it, over every other consideration. Octavia is a dull foil to her, and Fulvia a shrew and shrill-tongued. What a picture do those lines give of her—

"Age cannot wither her, nor custom steal
Her infinite variety. Other women cloy
The appetites they feed, but she makes hungry
Where most she satisfies."

What a spirit and fire in her conversation with Antony's messenger who brings her the unwelcome news of his marriage with Octavia! How all the pride of beauty and of high rank breaks out in her promised reward to him—

"There's gold, and here
My bluest veins to kiss!"

She had great and unpardonable faults, but the beauty of her death almost redeems them. She learns from the depth of despair the strength of her affections. She keeps her queen-like state in the last disgrace, and her sense of the pleasurable in the last moments of her life. She tastes a luxury in death. After applying the asp, she says with fondness—

"Dost thou not see my baby at my breast,
That sucks the nurse asleep?
As sweet as balm, as soft as air, as gentle.
Oh, Antony!"

It is worth while to observe that Shakspeare has contrasted the extreme magnificence of the descriptions in this play with pictures of extreme suffering and physical horror, not less striking—partly perhaps to excuse the effeminacy of Mark Antony, to whom they are related as having happened, but more to preserve a certain balance of feeling in the mind. Cæsar says, hearing of his conduct at the court of Cleopatra,—

"Antony,
Leave thy lascivious wassails. When thou once
Wert beaten from Mutina, where thou slew'st
Hirtius and Pansa, consuls, at thy heel
Did famine follow, whom thou fought'st against,
Though daintily brought up, with patience more
Than savages could suffer. Thou did'st drink
The stale of horses, and the gilded puddle
Which beast would cough at. Thy palate then did deign

The roughest berry on the rudest hedge,
Yea, like the stag, when snow the pasture sheets,
The barks of trees thou browsed'st. On the Alps,
It is reported, thou did'st eat strange flesh,
Which some did die to look on: and all this,
It wounds thine honour that I speak it now,
Was borne so like a soldier, that thy cheek,
So much as lank'd not."

The passage after Antony's defeat by Augustus where he is made to say—

"Yes, yes; he at Philippi kept
His sword e'en like a dancer; while I struck
The lean and wrinkled Cassius, and 'twas I
That the mad Brutus ended"—

is one of those fine retrospections which show us the winding and eventful march of human life. The jealous attention which has been paid to the unities both of time and place has taken away the principle of perspective in the drama, and all the interest which objects derive from distance, from contrast, from privation, from change of fortune, from long-cherished passion; and contracts our view of life from a strange and romantic dream, long, obscure, and infinite, into a smartly contested, three hours' inaugural disputation on its merits by the different candidates for theatrical applause.

The latter scenes of 'Antony and Cleopatra' are full of the changes of accident and passion. Success and defeat follow one another with startling rapidity. Fortune sits upon her wheel more blind and giddy than usual. This precarious state and the approaching dissolution of his greatness are strikingly displayed in the dialogue between Antony and Eros:

"ANTONY. Eros, thou yet behold'st me?
Eros. Ay, noble lord.

ANTONY. Sometime we see a cloud that's dragonish,

A vapour sometime, like a bear or lion,
A towered citadel, a pendent rock,
A forked mountain, or blue promontory
With trees upon't, that nod unto the world
And mock our eyes with air. Thou hast seen
these signs.

They are black vespers' pageants.

Eros. Ay, my lord.

ANTONY. That which is now a horse, even with a thought

The rack dislimns, and makes it indistinct
As water is in water.

Eros. It does, my lord.

ANTONY. My good knave, Eros, now thy captain is

Even such a body," &c.

This is, without doubt, one of the finest pieces of poetry in Shakspeare. The splendour of the imagery,

The semblance of reality, the lofty range of picturesque objects hanging over the world, their evanescent nature, the total uncertainty of what is left behind, are just like the mouldering schemes of human greatness. It is finer than Cleopatra's passionate lamentation over his fallen grandeur, because it is more dim, unstable, unsubstantial. Antony's headstrong presumption and insatuated determination to fight by sea instead of land, meet a merited punishment; and the extravagance of his resolutions, increasing with the despatch of his circumstances, is well commented upon by Cleopatra.

"I see men's judgments are
A parcel of their fortunes, and things outward
Do draw the inward quality after them
To suffer all alike."

The repentance of Enobarbus after his treachery to his master is the most affecting part of the play. He cannot recover from the blow which Antony's generosity gives him, and he dies broken-hearted "a master-leaver and a fugitive."

Shakspeare's genius has spread over the whole play a richness like the overflowing of the Nile.

THE LADY'S FAREWELL TO THE FALSE KNIGHT.

Farewelle, Syr Knyghte, but thynke not sorrowe
For thy false vowe, wille dwelle wyth mee,
For ere the dawninge of to-morrowe,
Wille banishe ev'rye thoughte of thee.

Lette others walke in broken vowe,
And shunne delighe to bouthe despaise,
I deeme suche fickle thynges as thou,
Not worthe the sheddynge of a teare.

I wille not weepe in londeys towne,
Tilke twine freche flourrets in mie hayre,
And hastene forth to lighted bowre,
And bee the varie gayest there.

My voyce the foremoste in the songe
When mynstrelle straynes the sowle entranse,
My foote the lighteste in the thronge,
That defilie tryppe in merrie daunce.

For there be knyghtes as brave as thou,
As gallaundie in masque who shyne,
And manie a harte I weene whose vowe,
Wille prove at leaste as true as thine.

I thanke thee, too, for, by mie trothe,
Two lemons have I learned from thee—
The value of a lover's othe,
The lengthe of Love's eternitie!

SPECIMENS OF WIT, HUMOUR, AND ORIGINALITY OF CHARLES LAMB.

No. II.

THE SOUTH-SEA HOUSE.

READERS, in thy passage from the Bank, where thou hast been receiving thy half-yearly dividends (supposing thou art a lean annuitant like myself), to the 'Flower Pot,' to secure a place for Dalston, or Shacklewell, or some other thy suburban retreat northerly, didst thou never observe a melancholy-looking, handsome, brick and stone edifice, to the left, where Threadneedle street abuts upon Bishopsgate? I dare say thou hast often admired its magnificent portals, ever gaping wide, and disclosing to view a grave court, with cloisters, and pillars, with few or no traces of goets-in or comers-out—a desolation something like Balcutha's.*

This was once a house of trade, a centre of busy interests; the throng of merchants was here—the quick pulse of gain; and here some forms of business are still kept, though the soul be long since fled. Here are still to be seen stately porticoes; imposing staircases; offices roomy as the state apartment in palaces—deserted, or thinly peopled with a few struggling clerks; the still more sacred interiors of court and committee-rooms, with venerable faces of bandies, deer-keepers—dissectors, seated in firm, on solemn days (to proclaim a dead dividend), at long worm-eaten tables that have been mahogany, with tarnished gilt-leather coverings, supporting many silver inkstands long since dry;—the ebon waistcoat hung with pictures of deceased governors and sub-governors of Queen Anne and the two first monarchs of the Brunswick dynasty;—large charts, which subsequent discoveries have antiquated;—dusty maps of Mexico, dim as dreams;—and soundings of the Bay of Panama!—The long passages hung with buckets, appended, in idle row, to walls, where substances might defy any, short of the last, conflagration;—with vast ranges of collarage-undersell, where dollars and pieces of eight once lay, as "unsunned heap," for Mammon to have selected his solitary heart withal,—long since dissipated, or scattered into air at the blast of the breaking of that famous BURL.

Such is the South-Sea House. At least, such it was forty years ago, when I knew it,—a magnificent relic! What alterations may have been made in it since, I have had no opportunities of verifying. Time, I take for granted, has not freshened it. No wind has resuscitated the face of the sleeping waters. A thicker crust by this time stagnates upon it. The modes, that were then battering upon its obsolete ledges and day-books, have rusted from their depredations, but other light generations have succeeded, making fine fretwork among their single and double entries. Layers of dust have accumulated (a superincumbent of dirt!) upon the old layers, that seldom used to be disturbed, save by some curious finger, now and then, inquisitive to explore the mode of book-keeping in Queen Anne's reign; or, with less hallowed curiosity, seeking to unveil some of the mysteries of that tremendous hoax, whose extent the petty speculators of our day look back upon with the same expression of incredulous admiration, and hopeless ambition of rivalry, as would become the puny face of modern conspiracy, contemplating the Titan size of Vaux's superhuman plot.

Peace to the names of the BURL! silence and desolation are upon thy walls, proud house, for a memorial!

Situated as thou art, in the very heart of stirring and living commerce;—amid the fret and fever of speculation,—with the Bank and the 'Change and the India House about thee, in the hey-day of present prosperity, with their important faces, as it were, insulting thee, their poor neighbour out of business,—to the idle and merely contemplative,—to such as me, old house! there is a charm in thy quiet,—a cessation—a coolness from business—an indolence almost cloistral—which is delightful! With what reverence have I paced thy great bare rooms and courts at eventide! They spoke of the past:—the shades of some dead accountant, with visionary pen in ear, would flit by me, stiff as in life. Living accounts and accountants puzzle me. I have no skill in figuring; but thy great dead tomes, which scarce three degenerate clerks of the present day could lift from their enshrining shelves, with their old fantastic flourishes, and decorative rubric interlacings—their sums in triple columniations, set down with formal superfluity of cyphers, with pious sentences at the beginning, without which our religious ancestors never ventured to open a book of business, or bill of lading—the costly vellum covers of some of them almost persuading us that we are got into some better library—are very agreeable and edifying spectacles. I can look upon these defunct dragons with complacency. Thy heavy odd-shaped ivory-handled penknives (our ancestors had everything on a larger scale than we have hearts for) are as good as anything from Heracleum. The pounce boxes of our days have gone retrograde.

The very clerks which I remember in the South-Sea House—I speak of forty years back—and an air very different from those in the public offices that I have had to do with since. They partook of the genius of the place!

They were mostly (for the establishment did not admit of superfluous salaries) bachelors. Generally (for they had not much to do) persons of a serious and speculative turn of mind. Old-fashioned, for a reason mentioned before. Humorists, for they were of all descriptions; and, not having been brought together in early life (which has a tendency to assimilate the members of corporate bodies to each other), but, for the most part, placed in this house in ripe or middle age, they necessarily carried into it their separate habits and oddities, unqualified, if I may so speak, as into a common stock. Hence they formed a sort of Noah's ark. Odd fishes. A lay-monastery. Domestic retainers in a great house, kept more for show than use. Yet pleasant fellows, full of chat—and not a few among them had arrived at considerable proficiency on the German flute.

The cashier at that time was one Evans, a Cambro-Briton. He had something of the choleric complexion of his countrymen stamped on his visage, but was a worthy sensible man at bottom. He wore his hair, to the last, powdered and frizzed out, in the fashion which I remember to have seen in caricatures of what were termed, in my young days, Maccaronies. He was the last of that race of beaux. Melancholy as a 'gib-cat over his counter all the forenoon, I think I see him, making up his cash (as they call it) with tremulous fingers, as if he feared everyone about him was a defaulter; in his hypochondry ready to imagine himself one; haunted, at least, with the idea of the possibility of his becoming one: his tristful visage clearing up a little over his roast neck of veal at Anderton's at two (where his picture still hangs, taken a little before his death by desire of the master of the coffee-house, which he had frequented for the last five-and-twenty years), but not attaining the meridian of its animation till evening brought on the hour of tea and visiting. The simultaneous sound of his well-known rap at the door with the stroke of the clock announcing six, was a topic of never-failing mirth in the families which this dear old bachelor gladdened with his presence. Then was his forte, his glorified hour! How would he chirp and expand over a muffin! How would he dilate into secret history! His countryman, Pennant himself, in particular, could not be more eloquent than he in relation to old and new London—the site of old theatres, churches, streets, gone to decay—where Rosamond's Pond stood—the Mulberry-gardens—and the Conduit in Cheap—with many a pleasant anecdote, derived from paternal tradition, of those grotesque figures which Hogarth has immortalized in his picture of 'Noon,'—the worthy descendants of those heroic confessors, who, flying to this country, from the wrath of Louis the Fourteenth and his dragoons, kept alive the flame of pure religion in the sheltering obscurities of Hag-lane, and the vicinity of the Seven Dials?

Deputy, under Evans, was Thomas Tame. He had the air and stoop of a nobleman. You would have taken him for one, had you met him in one of the passages leading to Westminster-hall. By stoop, I mean that gentle bending of the body forwards, which, in great men, must be supposed to be the effect of an habitual condescending attention to the applications of their inferiors. While he held you in converse, you felt strained to the height in the colloquy. The conference over, you were at leisure to smile at the comparative insignificance of the pretensions which had just awed you. His intellect was of the shallowest order. It did not reach to a saw or a proverb. His mind was in its original state of white paper. A sucking babe might have posed him. What was it then? Was he rich? Alas, no! Thomas Tame was very poor. Both he and his wife looked outwardly gentlefolks, when I fear all was not well at all times within. She had a neat meagre person, which it was evident she had not sinned in over-pampering; but in its voice was noble blood. She traced her descent by some labyrinth of relationship, which I never thoroughly understood,—much less can explain with any heraldic certainty at this time of day,—to the illustrious, but unfortunate house of Derwentwater. This was the secret of Thomas's stoop. This was the thought—the sentiment—the bright solitary star of your lives—ye mild and happy pair—which cheered you in the night of intellect, and in the obscurity of your station! This was to you instead of riches, instead of rank, instead of glittering attainments: and it was worth them all together. You insulted none with it; but, while you wore it as a piece of defensive armour only, no insult likewise would reach you through it. Deus et salu-

Of quite another stamp was the then accountant, John Tipp. He neither pretended to high blood, nor in good truth cared one fig about the matter. He "thought an accountant the greatest character in the world, and himself the greatest accountant in it." Yet John was not without his hobby. The fiddle relieved his vacant hours. He sang certainly, with other notes than to the Orphean lyre. He did, indeed, scream and scrape most abominably. His fine suit of official rooms in Threadneedle street, which without anything very substantial appended to them were enough to enlarge a man's notions of himself that lived in them (I know not who is the occupier of them now), resounded fortnightly to the notes of a concert of "sweet breasts," as our ancestors would have called them, culled from club-rooms and orchestras—obovous singers—first and second violoncellos—double basses—and clarionets—who ate his cold mutton, and drank his punch, and praised his ear. He sate like Lord Midas among them. But at the desk Tipp was quite another sort of creature. Thence all ideas that were purely ornamental were vanished. You could not speak of anything romantic without rebuke. Politics were excluded. A newspaper was thought too refined and abstracted;—the whole duty of man consisted in writing off dividends warrants. The stocking of the annual balance in the company's books (which perhaps differed from the balance of last year in the sum of 25*l.* 1*s.* 6*d.*) occupied his days and nights for a month previous. Not that Tipp was blind to the deadness of things (as they call them in the city) in his beloved house, or did not sigh for a return of the old stirring days when South-Sea hopes were young—(he was indeed equal to the winking of any the most intricate accounts of the most flourishing company in these or those days): but to a genuine accountant the difference of proceeds is as nothing. The fractional farthing is as dear to his heart as the thousands which stand before it. He is the true actor, who, whether his part be a prince or a peasant, must act it with like intensity. With Tipp form was everything. His life was formal. His actions seemed ruled with a ruler. His pen was not less erring than his heart. He made the best executor in the world: he was plagued with incessant executorships accordingly, which excited his spleen and soothed his vanity in equal ratios. He would swear (for Tipp swore) at the little orphans, whose rights he would guard with a tenacity like the grasp of the dying hand that commended their interests to his protection. With all this there was about him a sort of timidity—(his few enemies used to give it a worse name)—a something which, in reference to the dead, we will place, if you please, a little on this side of the heroic. Nature certainly had been pleased to endow John Tipp with a sufficient measure of the principle of self-preservation. There is a cowardice which we do not despise, because it has nothing base or treacherous in its elements; it betrays itself, not you: it is more temperant; the absence of the romantic and the enterprising; it sees a lion in the way, and will not, with Fortinbras, "greatly find quarrel in a straw," when some supposed honour is at stake. Tipp never mounted the box of a stage-coach in his life; or leaned against the rails of a balcony; or walked upon the ridge of a parapet; or looked down a precipice; or let off a gun; or went upon a water-party; or would willingly let you go if he could have helped it: neither was it recorded of him, that for lucre, or for intimidation, he ever forsook friend or principle.

who never enteredst thy office in a morning, or quittedst it in mid-day—(what didst thou in an office?)—without some quirk that left a sting! Thy gibes and thy jokes are now extinct, or survive but in two forgotten volumes, which I had the good fortune to rescue from a stall in Barbican not three days ago; and found thee terse, fresh, epigrammatic, as alive. Thy wit is a little gone by in these fastidious days! thy topics are staled by the "new-born gauds" of the time—but great thou used to be in Public Ledgers and in Chronicles, upon Chatham, and Shelburne, and Rockingham, and Howe, and Burgoyne, and Clinton, and the war which ended in the tearing from Great Britain her rebellious colonies,—and Keppel, and Wilkes, and Sawbridge, and Bull, and Dunning, and Pratt, and Richmond,—and such small politics.

A little less facetious and a great deal more obstreperous, was fine rattling, rattle-headed Plumer. He was descended,—not in a right line, reader, (for his lineal pretensions, like his personal, favoured a little of the sinister bend) from the Plumers of Hertfordshire. So tradition gave him out; and certain family features not a little sanctioned the opinion. Certainly, old Walter Plumer (his reputed author) had been a rake in his days, and visited much in Italy, and had seen the world. He was uncle, bachelor-uncle, to the fine old whig still living, who has represented the county in so many successive Parliaments, and has a fine old mansion near Ware. Walter flourished in George the Second's days, and was the same who was summoned before the House of Commons about a business of franks with the old Duchess of Marlborough. You may read of it in Johnson's "Life of Cave." Cave came off cleverly in that business. It is certain our Plumer did nothing to discountenance the rumour. He rather seemed pleased whenever it was, with all gentleness, insinuated. But, besides his family pretensions, Plumer was an engaging fellow, and sang gloriously.—

Not so sweetly sang Plumer as thou sangest, mild, child-like, pastoral M—, a flute's breathing less divinely whispering than thy Arcadian melodies, when, in tones worthy of Arden, thou didst chant that song sung by Amiens to the banished Duke, which preclaims the winter wind more lenient than for a man to be ungrateful. Thy sire was old surly, M—, the unapproachable churchwarden of Bishops-gate. He knew not what he did when he begat thee, like spring, gentle offspring of blustering winter;—only unfortunate in thy ending, which should have been mild, conciliatory, swan-like.—

Much remains to sing. Many fantastic shapes rise up, but they must be mine in private: already I have fooled the reader to the top of his bent;—else could I omit that strange creature, Woollett, who existed in trying the question, and brought litigations? and still stranger, inimitable, solemn Hapworth, from whose gravity Newton might have deduced the law of gravitation. How profoundly would he nib a pen—with what deliberation would he wet a wafer!—

But it is time to close—night's wheels are rattling fast over me—it is proper to have done with this solemn mockery.

Reader, what if I have been playing with thee all this while?—peradventure the very names which I have summoned up before thee are fantastic—insubstantial—like Henry Pimpernel, and Old John Naps of Greece:—

Be satisfied that something answering to them has had a being. Their importance is from the past.

THE DOCTRINE OF THE BELOVED DISCIPLE.

Some time before St John's decease he was so enfeebled with old age as to be obliged to be carried into the different churches; and being unable to deliver any long discourse, his custom was to say on these occasions, "My dear children, love one another." On being asked why he told them only one thing, he answered, "Nothing else is needed."—Christ's Love of his Fathers.

PINE ARTS.

A Review of the Lives and Works of some of the most Eminent Painters, with Remarks on the Opinions and Statements of former writers. By C. J. Nieuwenhuys. Hooper. 1835.

MR NIEUWENHUYTS has prefixed a title-page to his work, that rather misleads one as to its real nature: it would lead us to imagine the book to be a work of biographical criticism: it is, however, more properly a sort of catalogue raisonné of the pictures which have, at one time or another, been in the possession of Mr Nieuwenhuys, enriched with such biographical scraps and anecdotes as he has met with in the course of his very extensive business as a picture-dealer,—at least, such is what we gather from the book itself. Mr Nieuwenhuys's criticism is chiefly composed of all the standard opinions and truisms current in the profession; not that we imagine him to be deficient in genuine taste; but his feeling and knowledge in the art would appear to be greater than his power of expressing or analysing it. The critical portion of the work therefore is deficient both in novelty and in that mastery over the theoretical as well as the practical, which is requisite in a critic.

He writes, however, with a true love of his subject; he describes all the pictures he mentions,—he has collected all he can about them,—and about the painters; and appears to have the same sort of interest in pictures, that a schoolmaster has in his boys; he lives by them and in them, he talks of them, has them about him; and, even after they have left him, appears to keep his eye upon them, wherever they go, with an affectionate solicitude for their safety, and a pride in their fame.

The descriptions which abound in the work are pleasing from the beauty of the subjects, and the gusto with which they are written; the anecdotes scattered over it, are many of them new, exceedingly pleasant, and told in a straightforward, unassuming style, the very best the author could have adopted. Mr Nieuwenhuys should have written it all in this way, and made it a memoir of his adventures as a dealer in pictures; he should have told us all about them—the places he found them in, the people who possessed them, their condition, and more about the prices they have fetched at different times.

At the beginning of the book is a fragmentary memoir of Rembrandt, the materials for which the author was at some pains to pick up at Amsterdam. We would extract a list of Rembrandt's effusions, which were raised when he was insolvent, but it is too long for our columns. The list at the end is one of the articles set down. Rembrandt however did not die in poverty, though he appears never to have been rich. We shall conclude with one or two extracts—specimens of the anecdotes—sprinkled over the work.

"With regard to the date of Rembrandt's birth, we have no other authority than that of Houbraken, who mentions that the year 1606, which was particularly fertile in excellent artists, gave birth also to Rembrandt Van Ryn on the 15th of December, in the neighbourhood of Leyden. He was the only child of Herman Gerritzen Van Ryn and Neeltje Willems Van Zwieterbroek, who possessed the saw-mill which was situated between Leyerderp and Kowkerk. From this humble habitation rose one of the greatest men which the genius of the art ever nursed. His parents observing his early inclinations for study, did not neglect the cultivation of his mind, and for that purpose they resolved to send him to the Latin school at Leyden, in order to bring him up to a learned profession; but his predominant taste for painting caused them to alter their views, and place him with Jacob Irazken Van Zwamenburg, who instructed him in the rudiments of his art during three years that he remained with him. From this period Houbraken is in doubt who was his principal master, for he informs us that he passed six months with P. Lastman at Amsterdam. . . . His remarkable progress, however, attracted the attention of many amateurs, for he was assured by Houbraken that, about that period, he sold one of his pictures to a gentleman at the Hague for one hundred guilders.

CHARACTERS OF HANDEL—MONTAIGNE—MARTIAL
(with a banter upon him)—SHROVE TUESDAY, AND
ITS PANCAKES—WALLER—DAVENANT—OTWAY.

FEBRUARY 24 (accidentally omitted last week), 1684. At Halle, in Saxony, George Frederick Handel, the Jupiter of music; not the less warranting that title, from including in his genius the most affecting tenderness as well as the most overpowering grandeur: for the father of gods and men was not only a thunderer, but a love-maker. Handel was the son of a physician; and, like Mozart, began composing for the public in his childhood. He was the grandest composer that is known to have existed, wielding, as it were, the choirs of heaven and earth together; and as Mozart said of him, "striking you, whenever he pleased, with a thunderbolt." His Hallelujahs open the heavens. He utters the word "Wonderful," as if all their trumpets spoke together. And then, when he comes to earth, to make love amidst nymphs and shepherds (for the beauties of all religions found room in his breast), his strains drop milk and honey, and his love is the youthfulness of the Golden Age. We see his Acis and Galatea, in their very songs, looking one another in the face in all the truth and mutual homage of the tenderest passion; and poor jealous Polyphemus stands in the background, jealous the scene with his gigantic despair. Christian meekness and suffering attain their last degree of pathos in 'He shall feed his flock,' and 'He was despised and rejected.' We see the blush on the smitten cheek mingling with the hair. Handel had a large, heavy person, and was occasionally vehement in his manners. He eat and drank too much (probably out of a false notion of supporting his excitement), and thus occasionally did harm to mind as well as body. But he was pious, generous, independent, and, like all great geniuses, a most thorough lover of his art, making no compromises with its demands and its dignity for the sake of petty conveniences. There is occasionally to be found a quaintness and stiffness in his style, owing to the fashion of the day; and he had not at his command the instrumentation of the present times, which no man would have turned to more overwhelming account; but what is sweet in his compositions, is sweeter in no other; and what is great, is greater than in any.

—28. 1533. At the chateau of Montaigne, in Perigord, of a noble family, Michel de Montaigne, the father of modern essay-writing, and one of the most original of thinkers. His father, to help him to an equable turn of mind, used to have him waked during his infancy with a flute. He was a philosopher of the material order, and as far sighted perhaps that way as any man that ever lived, having the temperament between jovial and melancholy, which is so favourable for seeing fair play to human nature; and his good-heartedness rendered him an enthusiastic friend, and a believer in the goodness of others, notwithstanding his insight into folly, and his living in a coarse and licentious age, of the freedoms of which he partook. But for want of something more imaginative and spiritual in his genius, his perceptions stopped short of the very first points, critical and philosophical. He knew little of the capabilities of the mind, out of the pale of its more manifest influences from the body; his taste in poetry was logical, not poetical; and he ventured upon openly despising romances ('Amadis de Gaul,' &c.) which was hardly in keeping with the modest wisdom of his motto, Que sçais-je? (What do I know?) Montaigne, who loved his father's memory, always rode out in a cloak which had belonged to him, and would say of it, that he seemed to feel "wrapped up in his father" (il me semble m'envelopper de lui). Some writers have sneered at this saying, and at the deductions drawn from it respecting the amount of his filial affection; but the truth is, it does him as much honour as anything he ever said, for depth of feeling as well as vivacity of expression.

March 1, 30. At Bilbilis, in Celtiberia (Bubiera, in the modern Arragon), Marcus Valerius Martialis, the most profuse of epigrammatists, some of them (as he says himself) good, many poor enough, and many very bad. His best epigrams of the biting order are not to be compared with those of Catullus in delicacy of style or satire; but some have become favourites with posterity, as in that instance, translated (among others) by Sir John Harrington:—

The golden hair that Galla wears
Is hers; who would have thought it?
She swears 'tis hers, and true she swears,
For I know where she bought it.

His very best epigrams, in our opinion, are some of his grave ones,—those which answer to the original meaning of the word epigram,—an inscription. We here give a translation of one from the 'Indicator.' It is a "favourable specimen" of the best part of his nature, and furnishes a relief to such of his readers as stumble upon the loathsome indecencies permitted by the license of his age.

EPITAPH ON EROTION.

Hic festinata quiescit Erotion umbra,
Crimine qui fati sexta peremit hyems.
Quisquis eris nostri post me regnator agelli,
Manibus exiguus annua justa dato.
Sic Lare perpetuo, sic turba sospite, solus
Flebilis in terra sit lapis iste tua.

Underneath this greedy stone
Lies little sweet Erotion,
Whom the Fates, with hearts as cold,
Nipp'd away at six years old.
Thou, whoever thou mayst be,
That haast this small field after me,
Let the yearly rites be paid
To her little slender shade;
So shall no disease or jar
Hurt thy house, or chill thy Lar;
But this tomb here be alone,
The only melancholy stone.

As to some inconceivably pointless and twaddling epigrams, written by Martial, such as would appear to have been concocted by the dullest of old gentlemen and diners-out, and overseemingly carried about in his pocket, they have been admirably bantered by our friend, Mr Egerton Webbe, in the following imitations; which, however, have this drawback, that being good jokes upon bad ones, they cannot possibly convey the same impression. Mr Webbe has not forgotten the solemn turn of the heads—'De Flavio'—'De Eodem'—'Ad Antonium de Lepido'—&c. nor the ingenious art with which the epigrammatist contrives to have a reason asked him, for what he is bent upon explaining. We think these imitations so good, that liking to enjoy good things in company, we have not only been reading them (like the supposed old gentleman) to everybody at hand, but have been fancying ourselves present with all the friends whom we have been in the habit of relishing such passages with; and we venture to add, that Blackwood's editor, the best anthologist living, will like them. The scholarly reader need not be reminded, that the lines must be read with due deliberation, and as if in solid foretaste of their pungency.

CONCERNING JONES.

Jones eats his lettuces undressed;
D'you ask the reason? 'tis confessed,—
That is the way Jones likes them best.

TO SMITH—CONCERNING THOMSON.

Smith, Thomson puts no claret on his board;
D'you ask the reason?—Thomson can't afford.

TO GIBBS—CONCERNING HIS POEMS.

You ask me if I think your poems good;
If I could praise your poems, Gibbs,—I would.

CONCERNING THE SAME.

Gibbs says his poems a sensation make;—
But Gibbs, perhaps, is under a mistake.

TO THOMSON—CONCERNING DIXON AND JACKSON.

How Dixon can with Jackson bear,
You ask me, Thomson, to declare;—
Thomson, Dixon's Jackson's heir.
This last line, with its three successive patronymics, is exquisite.

—3. Shrove Tuesday. Easter Even. Called in some places, Pancake Tuesday. Shrove-tide is Shrive or Shrift tide; that is, the time of Confession, sins being specially confessed at this season in the Romish church. As the Carnival was also at this time, our jovial Protestant ancestors retained the jollity, when they had given up the confession, and pancake-eating is a remnant of it.

Not to eat pancakes on a Shrove Tuesday is a sort of irreligion: even though, like confession, it may go against some stomachs of a criminal weakness, especially in these sedentary times. Delicate pancakes, not too thin, tossed up by a proper hand (for they ought to be literally tossed in the pan, otherwise part of the old charm is wanting), brought up hot and hot, rolled up on one's plate, slightly touched with an acid, and cut across in that state, lump by lump, are to our taste the finest possible eating, of the paste or pudding order. We think we could dine, the whole year round (supposing the gods would provide us with such goods at all seasons) upon a pancake for our pudding, a bird for the meat, and old port for the drink. But what matters this epicureanism to our sedentary faculties? We thrive better on water than wine; cannot eat a bird with the right pleasure, unless sure that it was handsomely killed; and would fain, with beloved Shelley, see all the world eating vegetables, and getting as harmless and strong, as horses do on their hay-diet. There would be enough mortal necessity remaining, to strengthen our thoughts and hinder us from growing effeminate. The barbarous custom of throwing at cocks on this day, has gone out, thanks to the progress of knowledge; yet just subeided—but to be serious, then—Horace! “with all thy faults I love thee still.” Though thou art—first of all—a most dirty-minded individual, inasmuch that “Through needles’ eyes it easier for a camel is To pass, than certain cantos into families,”—

though thou art, next of all, a most consummate coxcomb, and [didst sometimes write with such a spirit of affectation and conceit, that I only wonder some people were not tempted to toss the little man in a blanket to recall him to his senses,—though, thirdly, the organ of intolerance and prejudice was somewhat freely developed on thy little scone,—and though, lastly, thou didst oftentimes labour under many strange fancies and follies of thine own brewing,—yet, take thee for all in all, thou art a jewel, a gem; faithful as a friend, wise and judicious as an adviser, and, as a companion, indubitably the most delightful, affable, and fascinating in the world.

I am conscious of having amused myself here rather unscrupulously at the poet’s expense, and that, like persons “on the other side of the house,” I have been speaking all on one side of the question, and that the most favourable; so true it is, as our philosophical author himself observes—

“Such is the nature of the human mind,
That what provokes our ridicule, we find
We learn more soon, more gladly recollect,
Than all that claims our praise or our respect.”

How gladly, if time and space permitted, would I atone for my impertinence, how cheerfully—not recant, but—compensate, by dwelling with the same attention and much more delight, upon the merits, charms and excellencies, general and peculiar, of the great lyricist. “Annihilate both space and time, ye Gods, and make two lovers happy,” was the speech of some gentle Damon once, about full moon; so say I, for nothing could make me happier than to be able, at this very moment, to present a full and particular account, critical and analytical, of “the beauties” of Horace, as an appropriate set-off against this undutiful article. But alas! neither the pages of this Magazine, I apprehend, nor—gentle reader—your obliging patience is infinite, wherefore I must bring my speculations to a close.

As a lyrical poet, Horace is unequalled for the elegance of his sentiments and expressions, the peculiar refinement of his language, and the polished ease and exquisite harmony of his numbers. As a satirist he displays an observation of human nature which without being profound or very philosophical, is replete with truth and justice; at the same time that he exhibits himself as a man of wit and a humourist, he never ceases to inculcate the love of virtue and the contempt of vice, and this, not unfrequently, in language so admirable, that we can neither question the sincerity of his sentiments, nor refuse to acknowledge, that in the power of expressing them with force and eloquence, he has few superiors. As a critic, Horace is acute, knowing, full of good sense, full of judgment, overflowing with the love of his art, and most comfortably at home; but he neither displays much originality nor much depth of feeling. I believe him never to have experienced a grand emotion; never to have known a lofty passion. He had no natural pathos or sublimity; if a stray gleam flickers here or there, it emanates from a borrowed, not a native light. Hence his partial view of poetry, a view bounded by the horizon of authority, and seen through the mist of artificial restriction; hence his inability to clear from his eyes the fleshly film of this material world; hence his inordinate observance of the outward and perishable frame-work of poetry, and his want of capacity or desire to investigate its hidden principles; hence it is that he preferred playing in the sunshine, on the pleasant banks of the stream, rather than worship the solemn scenery at its fount.

With respect to the ode above-mentioned it is a very remarkable one; for although I think the description I have given of its infamous spirit is not at all

“Disce enim cecidisse, meminitque libentis illud Quod quis decideret, quàm quod probat et venerat.”

overdrawn, yet it will be observed, it joins nothing of a comic sort to the rest of its features; so that we have the full scope of its inhuman meaning staring us in the face, without a single flower of wit or humour to conceal its nakedness. We generally find such a subject dressed up in the light strains of satire and railery, or—even more appropriately—in the broad colours of burlesque, that however great the ill-will may be, it may at least be saved from the disgrace of barbarity; but here we have nothing of the kind, all appears to be downright and serious; like a man who takes up the gloves, as if in play, and then hits with all his might. It is written likewise with his usual elegance of language, rather elaborately, and with every grace and ornament of poetry to enhance its effect; this I think still more demonstrative of the unchristian spirit which dictated it, since it proves that he bestowed time and care upon it, and therefore wrote, not from the impulse of passion, but from the deliberation of enmity and malice prepense. Such is the original—let me intreat the reader to overlook the faults of the translation.

EPODON LIBER.

ODE X. IN MÆVIUM PORTAM.

See from the port the luckless vessel glide,
That bears the wretched Mævius from our shores;
Oh! with thy fiercest blasts lashing the tide
On every side,
Remember South wind! sharply to invest,
Disperse the cables, East wind! and the oars,
Blow, North wind! join thy fury to the rest;
Such fury as the plains attest,
With many a riven oak bespread.
And when his stormy head—
The terror of our ships—
Orion dips,
Then may no friendlier star arise to save,
Nor win the soul a moment from despair,
But still the front of death be there.
Seas not less dreadful rave,
Than opened once an universal grave,
When the incensed Minerva, thunder-armed,
On Ajax and his impious crew
Dealt vengeance due.
Oh, then my Mævius I turn to you;
Your trembling lips apart and sore alarmed,
Methinks I see you then pale shivering stand:
Yea, while the rest undaunted still essay
To keep the wrathful element at bay,
Shriek loudly with dishonourable fear.
And when your shattered bark no more can stay
The boar’s Ionian’s rage, you all unmann’d
With clamorous prayers assail the Thunderer’s ear,
Who turns his ear away!
Oh! that we soon may hear
Your bones lie rotting on some foreign strand,
Within the searching raven’s ken;
Then to the tempest’s praise,
A temple will I raise;
The goat, the lamb—what sacrifice too dear
When Gods accord such happiness to men?—
Shall reek upon the altar then.*

CHARACTERS OF SHAKESPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

NO. VII.—JULIUS CÆSAR.

JULIUS CÆSAR was one of three principal plays by different authors, pitched upon by the celebrated Earl of Halifax to be brought out in a splendid manner by subscription, in the year 1707. The other two were the ‘King and No King’ of Fletcher, and Dryden’s ‘Maiden Queen.’ There perhaps might be political reasons for this selection; as far as regards our author. Otherwise, Shakespeare’s ‘Julius Cæsar’ is not equal, as a whole, to either of his other plays taken from the Roman history. It is inferior in interest to ‘Coriolanus,’ and both in interest and power to ‘Antony and Cleopatra.’ It however abounds in admirable and affecting passages, and is remarkable for the profound knowledge of character, in which Shakespeare could scarcely fail. If there is any exception to this remark, it is in the hero of the piece himself. We do not much admire the representation here given of Julius Cæsar, nor do we think it answers to the portrait given of him in his Commentaries. He makes several vapouring and rather pedantic speeches, and does nothing. Indeed, he has nothing to do. So far the fault of the character might be the fault of the plot.

The spirit with which the poet has entered at once into the manners of the common people, and the jealousies and heart-burnings of the different factions, is shown in the first scene, when Flavius and Marullus, tribunes of the people, and some citizens of Rome, appear upon the stage.

“FLAVIUS. Thou art a cobbler, art thou?”

COBBLER. Truly, sir, all that I live by is the awl: I meddle with no tradesman’s matters, nor woman’s matters, but withal, I am indeed, sir, a surgeon to old shoes; when they are in great danger, I recover them.

FLAVIUS. But wherefore art not in thy shop to day? Why dost thou lead these men about the streets?

COBBLER. Truly, sir, to wear out their shoes, to get myself into more work. But indeed, sir, we make holiday to see Cæsar, and rejoice in his triumph.”

Fit to this specimen of quaint low humour immediately follows that unexpected and animated burst of indignant eloquence, put into the mouth of one of the angry tribunes.

“MARULLUS. Wherefore rejoice! What conquest brings he home?

What tributaries follow him to Rome,
To grace in captive-bonds his chariot-wheels?
Oh you heard hearts, you cruel men of Rome!
Knew you not Pompey? Many a time and oft
Have you climbed up to walls and battlements,
To towers and windows, yea, to chimney-tops,
Your infants in your arms, and there have sat
The live-long day, with patient expectation,
To see great Pompey pass the streets of Rome:
And when you saw his chariot but appear,
Have you not made a universal shout,
That Tiber trembled underneath his banks
To hear the replication of your sounds,
Made in his concave shores?
And do you now put on your best attire?
And do you now cull out an holiday?
And do you now strew flowers in his way
That comes in triumph over Pompey’s blood?
Begone—
Run to your houses, fall upon your knees,
Pray to the Gods to intermit the plague,
That needs must light on this ingratitude.”

The well-known dialogue between Brutus and Cassius, in which the latter breaks the design of the conspiracy to the former, and partly gains him over to it, is a noble piece of high-minded declamation. Cassius’s insisting on the pretended effeminacy of Cæsar’s character, and his description of their swimming across the Tiber together, “once upon a raw and gusty day,” are among the finest strokes in it. But perhaps the whole is not equal to the short sion of his soul; whilst, with all his boasts of superior wisdom, he poured forth on every occasion of envy, contradiction, or irritation, a torrent of foul invective; and always in a greater proportion, if the person he attacked appeared to excel him in person, fortune, morals, or understanding.

Having proved himself grossly deficient in every Christian requisite, and disguising, under the philosophic garb, an overbearing spirit as well as a depraved heart; after repeated but ineffectual admonitions to amend, he was expelled from the Christian church.

Again thrown loose on society, he travelled on foot into Egypt, and having, by vicious or preposterous conduct, closed every avenue to fair fame, he assumed the character of a cynic, he affected the dress and manners of Diogenes, inflicted on himself corporal chastisement, and insisted that, to a philosopher, all words and all actions, as long as they did not violate moral justice, or diminish the great mass of public happiness, were equally indifferent.

He neglected or despised the decencies of dress, language, and gesture; performing publicly, without shame, actions, which prejudice and propriety, in civilized societies, have covered with a thick veil.

Such conduct was neither imitated nor approved in a country warmly attached to ritual observance, and which has been called the mother of superstition. The disappointed cynic was driven with ignominy from the banks of the Nile, and, repairing to Rome, soothed his chagrin and gratified his pride, that pride which, in the human heart, puts on such a variety of forms, by loading with abuse the customs, &c. of the country, which tolerated his insolence.

He attacked that excellent emperor and man, Titus Antoninus, who proved that he was the true philosopher by listening with patience to his impudent haranguer; and if any of the charges against him were true, by amending his conduct.

A prefect of the city, whose temper was very irritable, drove our unfortunate declaimer from the capitol; and, after passing through several cities of Greece unnoticed or despised, he fixed his abode at Athens, where he attracted the notice of A. Gellius, who has recorded several of their conversations.

One of his favourite topics was to inveigh against what he called the folly of wrapping up the names of things, the harmless propensities of nature, in refined phrase and delicate expression; he would perhaps have agreed with a certain writer that there was an increase of sin, since bad women were called women of pleasure, and the crime of adultery softened in the modish denomination of crim. con.

More vain in his particular way than any man alive, he grossly attacked the public spirit of Herodes Atticus, a citizen, who, diffusing his wealth in laudable exertion, and ornamenting his country by magnificent structures, reflected credit on the magnificence of a private man; many of the comforts and even luxuries of life within the reach of the poorest individual.

The territory on which the Olympic games were exhibited has been for ages a burning sand, the death of many a candidate from dust and heat; a spot rendered classical by poets, and affording a land-mark to the chronologist and historian, was scantily supplied with water; a reproach to the avarice, the poverty, or the taste of the Greeks.

The quick-sighted zeal of Herodes provided for the defect; he conducted, at a vast expense of money, a copious stream, supplied from distant springs by an aqueduct, which, uniting magnificence with utility, was the wonder and ornament of his country.

A work, which it was difficult to speak or even think of without praise, which excited general approbation, was considered by Peregrinus as a good opportunity to exert his talent at satire and abuse.

He attacked Herodes as vain-glorious and ostentatious, in thus lavishing his wealth on an undertaking which only helped to make the combatants effeminate: he asserted that it was more useful to the state, though a few lives were lost, to harden them by exposure to heat and thirst, than to suffer the defenders of their country to enjoy the indulgencies of coolness and shade.

After much declamation in favour of self-denial, it was observed that, on the next celebration of the games, he was foremost in the crowd which pressed forward to enjoy the stream.

The office of a censurer of mankind, whatever his motives, is not of a kind to conciliate affection, but the inconsistencies of Peregrinus made him contemptible; a circumstance highly mortifying to a man hunting after popularity, and ambitious of posthumous fame.

Rendered desperate by disappointment, he resolved, on the fervour of false philosophy, to astonish the world, and build his reputation on what he judged an imperishable basis, by putting an end to his existence on a funeral pile.

Being questioned as to the end he had in view, he said, that he meant to hold forth to the world an impressive example; to teach men to despise death, and to bear pain with firmness and composure.

It was in vain he was told that a fear of death was implanted in our bosoms for the wisest purposes, and that it was everyone's first duty to perform the offices of society in that post in which Providence had placed him.

"If he imagines," said Lucian, on hearing of his design, "that there is anything so very heroic in committing himself to the flames, I can furnish him with a long list of fools and madmen who have excelled in this his favourite exit."

"In the blaze of a fierce fire, as suffocation is immediate, sensation ceases on the spot; but on any occasions which rouses their zeal or animates their devotion, the Indian Brahmins literally roast themselves by slow fires, voluntarily exposing themselves to the agonies of death for several hours."

"If his passion arises merely from being tired of life, he need only return to his own country, where, as a parricide and an adulterer, he will instantly receive the reward of his crimes."

With all his firmness, the cynic appears to have dreaded the fate to which he had devoted himself. He was not without hopes that by the interference of his associates his proposed death would be prevented.

But general expectation being roused, his absolute and positive refusal to undergo that which he had offered, besides lowering him in the esteem of his followers, his failure would have exposed him to the risk of being torn to pieces by the populace, who, on such occasions, are not disposed to submit quietly to an impostor, who sports with their feelings and insults their credulity.

Finding he could expect nothing from their humanity, he appealed to their superstition; spoke of celestial communication, &c., which forbade the execution of his purpose; but he had gone too far to retreat, and finding that he had no alternative, but the death he had chosen, or a more shocking one, he prepared the pile with his own hands.

On the day appointed, and during the vast concourse of the Olympic games, he appeared with a train of attendants, addressed the people, and asserted that the evils he had suffered, and the pains he had endured, were sufficient testimonies of his attachment to philosophy without the present proof.

He then spoke on the vanity of life, and the glory of devoting ourselves to death for the benefit of others, but was interrupted by the shouts of his friends, who exclaimed that such a man ought to live for the sake of his country, for the instruction and edification of mankind. These words were instantly overpowered by the voices of a very considerable majority, who insisted that a non-performance of that which he had promised was unworthy of the character he had assumed, that a philosopher ought to set an example of consistency and faith.

"Conduct him to the pile!" re-echoing on every side, filled our philosopher with terror and dismay.

Convinced that nothing but death, in the manner he had proposed, would satisfy the merciless multitude, in a tremor, produced by agitation of body and mind, he sunk on the ground: repeated faintings, succeeded by a fever, made it necessary to postpone the business.

A physician, who was sent for to administer relief, informed him, that if he was so anxiously bent upon death, he might save himself the trouble and ceremony of publicly inflicting it on himself, for that the fever, if unsubdued, would soon release him from his cares.

Peregrinus, not relishing the proposal, told his medical friend, that merely to die in his bed was not the thing he wanted; that so common a mode of going out of the world, unnoticed and unapplauded, had neither the charm of novelty, nor the attraction of popular admiration.

After a struggle of several weeks, between his fears, his disease, and his pride, the fever left him, and he positively fixed the time and place at which he would execute his purpose.

On the 16th July, A.D. 165, and in the 236th Olymp., such was the formal style in which it was announced, he ascended for the last time a pile, which he had constructed with his own hands. Three miles from Olympia, on the evening of a serene day, and the moon shining with a silver light, Peregrinus presented himself to the public eye, with a long train of followers, and others, whom curiosity or admiration had attracted. Laying aside his mantle, his wallet and his staff, he set fire to the fabric he had formed of fir and other materials; then scattering incense around him, and turning his face to the south, he exclaimed in a loud voice, "Genii of my ancestors, open your arms to receive me!" and, leaping into the flames, was soon reduced to ashes.

Thus terminated the career of a man who may be said to have rendered himself extraordinary by his crimes, and the manner of his death.

HINTS FOR TABLE TALK.

No. VI.

BEFORE BREAKFAST—THE BREAKFAST TABLE—A SKETCH
—COFFEE-CUP CHAT—COFFEE-DRINKING—TOO HOT
—GETTING AN APPETITE—ARABIAN NIGHTS—DIALOGUE CONDEMNED—APPEAL.

By some mistake or other I got up a little sooner than usual the other morning. When I entered my parlour the room had a clean but cold look which half inclines to make you shiver, like the sun in a clear wintry day. The hearth was unsullied with ashes, and the coals in the grate, though blazing, were black and square. The fire was yet in its infancy, and the flames and smoke gambolled in the chimney like childhood. Betty was just in the act of unfolding the damask table-cloth. With a scientific sweep it was outspread in the air, and descended on to the table as gently as a flake of snow. Nature's own hand gave grace to the drapery at the corners, and the edge of every fold formed an illustration of Hogarth's line of beauty.

It was necessary to my comfort that I should employ myself until breakfast was ready, bearing in mind the thousand times repeated lines of Watts' 'Busy Bee'—

"For Satan finds some mischief still,
For idle hands to do."

Which is somewhat contradicted by an old saying—"that it is better to do mischief than be idle." I was not in a humour to read, and it was against my grain to sit looking at my fingers. Pens, ink, and paper were lying invitingly on the side table, but to write before breakfast was out of the question, so I began to act the limner, and sketch the scene before me—the breakfast table. The table, covered with the cloth, was the first thing, then as the cups and saucers, bread, butter, eggs, egg cups, plates, and all the necessary et cetera were placed upon it by Betty, I placed them on paper with pen and ink. You see the sketch on the opposite page, dear Mr Editor, and could the reader see coffee, a cup of which the Vizir's daughter held in her hand.

THEO. Ha! ha! ha! All artists do not attend very closely to appropriateness of custom and costume.

JENTAC. Coffee seems to be so connected in my mind with Arabia, that I cannot divest myself of the idea.

THEO. Wine, sherbet was their coffee, cakes and fruit their bread and butter, and dates their eggs.

Thus far had I proceeded, when I suggested to myself, that, in writing in such a strain, I was likely to have nothing more than "my labour for my pains." That it was too thick and muddy for any one to wade through. That it was "flat and unprofitable," and so "weary," or rather "wearisome," as to require all the animating powers of the subject—coffee—to arouse the reader. The time is gone by when "amusing and instructive dialogues" would be tolerated. It would require a first-rate pen, and a thousand times more wit than you possess, good myself, to render the thing bearable. Besides, the breakfast-table is not the place for such conversation. The pair who would sit down for an hour at a time, and propose, as in the dialogue, would deserve nothing less than to be made President and Vice of a Temperance Society (and no disparagement to that, either). Moreover, the buffoonery respecting the "hot coffee" is very miserable. Such nonsense is only tolerated in 'Blackwood.' The original is poor, and detracts greatly from the merits of those inimitable colloquies, and every copy must be shocking.*

Thus did I condemn what myself had written; and there followed a wavering of mind whether the flames should consume it or not. I did not like the idea of so much clean paper being sullied to no purpose, and so the decision was, to refer to the London Journalist for judgment, who will perhaps consider the matter worth putting to a jury of readers.

So here you have it, Mr Editor, with prologue and epilogue. Is the verdict to be "guilty" or "not guilty"? whether from judge or jury, I bow to the decision.

BOOKWORM.

* We are not acquainted with all the dialogue of this sort in 'Blackwood'; but with respect to what we have seen of it, we must differ with our friend BOOKWORM. The animal spirits are genuine, and these are half the secret in all "admirable fooling." The rest must consist of subtle intimations of thought; and there is no want of those.—ED.

MORE POETS ON THE ICE.

[We have the greater pleasure in giving insertion to the following communication of one of our fair Readers, inasmuch as it speaks of Mr Heraud's 'Judgment of the Flood,' a poem which it has been upon our conscience not to have quoted sooner.]

DEAR SIR,—It is with much pleasure that I perused, in No. 44, your article, 'Ice with Poets upon it.' Nothing can be more delightful than those same poets whom you have exhibited so gracefully cutting figures on the ice. Shelley, Wordsworth, Milton, Redi, and Phillips play their parts with equal honour to their original skill and your critical taste. You, of course, are not unaware of the fine use which Cowper has made of the subject in 'The Task,' since you have mentioned the fancy of Catherine the Second: the quotation was, however, too trite for such pages as yours, which rightly affect the choice and the recherché. But, as a lover of German literature, I cannot let the occasion pass without alluding to the beautiful descriptions connected with skating in some odes of Klopstock.

The 'Odes' of Klopstock, says a writer in the 'Foreign Review,'—written for relaxation during the composition of 'The Messiah'—exhibit the writer as a man, a poet, a lover, a friend, a husband, a patriot, and a Christian. Neither has he been ashamed to register his favourite amusements. In the exercise of skating and horse-riding he much delighted, nor has he left them uncelebrated.

The following is a translation of one of his 'Odes' on the former theme. It is intitled

THE ICE-COURSE.

Too oft is in eternal night
The great name of inventors tomb'd;
What they, inquisitive,
Discover'd, we enjoy;
But them doth honour guarden too?

Who nam'd to thee the daring man
Who first on mast uplifted sail?
Ah! passed not away
E'en the renown of him
Who for the very feet found wings?

And shall he not immortal be,
Who found for us both health and joys—
Which ne'er the horse bestow'd,
Courageous in the course—
Which e'en the dance possesses not?

And shall my name immortal be?
I to the slipping steel invent
Its cunning dance. Along
It flies with lighter swing,
In circles fairer to behold.

Thou knowest each alluring sound
Of music, therefore to the dance
Give melody. Both moon
And forest hear the sound,
When hasty flight its horn commands.

Oh youth! who know'st to animate
The water-cothurn, and more swift Dancest. Leave to the town
Its chimney. Come with me
Where beckons thee the crystal's plain.

How it in vapours shrouds its light!
How softly winter's coming day
Illumes the lake! Like stars
The shining rime o'erstrew'd
The night above the crystal's plain.

How still about us the white field!
How sounds by the young frost the path!
Far thy cothurn's sound
Betrays thee unto me,
When, fleet one, from the sight thou hast'at!

Have we not for the feast enough
Of bread?—of joyful wine? The air
Of winter, for the meal,
Sharpens the appetite;
Wings on the feet still more—still more!

Turn thee unto the left. I will
Me to the right half-circling turn.
Take thou the swing as thou
May'st see me take it. So!
And now fly swiftly past me—fly!

Thus we the serpentine career
Upon the long shore soaring go.
Be not too artful. That Position I love not,
Nor Preisler would it imitate.

Whereto art listening from the shore?
Unskilful skaters yonder sound—
Over the ice not yet
The hoof and load have passed,
Nor yet the nets gone under it.

At other times, thy ear marks all—
Hear how the death-tone plains upon
The flood! How sounds it now
Thus differently!—How
Sounds it when miles down gapes the frost!

Backward!—Let not the glittering path
Seduce thee from the shore to go;
For where it hides yon deep,
Haply, the waters stream—
Haply, the fountains bubble up.

Death streams out from the wave unheard!
Death rushes from the secret fount!
Tho' lightly as this leaf
Thou glidest thither. Ah!
Youth, thou may'st sink and perish yet!

The literal fidelity with which this translation seems to be executed (to say nothing of the peculiarities of Klopstock's lyrical compositions) gives the above a quaint turn of expression, which, however, will not be displeasing to the Reader, who will take the trouble to understand the ode, and imagine himself in the situation of the skaters described in it.

Another piece of Klopstock's, called 'The Art of Tialf'—a giant who is said to have invented the art of skating (according to the Scandinavian mythology) is of still more intricate structure. It has, nevertheless, been highly praised by Madame de Stael, and well deserves her eulogy. In the December number (1881) of 'Fraser's Magazine' a translation of this ode is given, but it is too long for quotation, and I am afraid, would with difficulty be rendered intelligible. It is composed in a kind of dialogue between three bards, and is distinguished by much life and character. The heroine of the lyric drama is conveyed in a sledge down the ice-torrent surrounded with skaters, and listening to a youth behind, who joyously impels forward the car, in which she reposes. "The youth the maiden loves, and she loves him, they celebrate to-day their nuptial-day."

The translations of these very difficult pieces, I have been told, were executed by Mr Heraud, the author of those two singularly extraordinary poems—'The Judgment of the Flood,' and 'The Descent into Hell,' to whose pen we are also indebted for the two articles in the 'Foreign Review,' and 'Fraser's Magazine,' in which they occur. Neither has he forgotten the subject itself in his own poetry. There is an allusion in 'The Judgment of the Flood' to that infernal ice described by Milton, in the passage quoted by you from 'The Paradise Lost.' The allusion occurs in Mr Heraud's description of 'Dudael'; it is as follows:—

"The Sarzar sped

His ice-bolts through the wide waste wilderness,
And, from his black surcharged cloud aloft,
Made desolation yet more desolate
With cold, whereto the cold within the land
Of Hades, or the frozen tracts of Hell
Were comparable only; so intense,
Extreme, and bitter; and it smote all things,
And in the heart of all things mortal burn'd;
Tree, bole and branches, with the writhen bolt
Of winter blasted, leafless, barkless, sapless,
Base and of life devoid; and herb and weed
Wither'd; and in their headlong torrent floods
Congeal'd, and stiffen'd to a stony sheet.
The wild steed stood aghast, whom rein had ne'er
Check'd, now by more than human vigour cur'd,
And in the human veins the vigorous blood
Was shackled, and the rivers of the heart
Were as a seal'd fountain, and the veins
Parch'd became brittle like to glass, and broke,
Or harden'd into marble. Over them
The ice-wind wrought its work; but on the ground
They clasp'd the bosom of maternal earth,
Unconscious, and the spirit's misery
Had made the flesh insensible to change."

Take also the following scene from 'The Descent into Hell':—

"Hell slowly unfolds her adamant door—
Hell hath her gates unfolded. Lo! as it were
A mausoleum wide as chaos, or

The Ninth of Space, an infinite Sepulchre,
Yet wall'd about; the Ward of Death and Sin
Not silent; sleep with Hope, is alien here.

Lo! shadowy thrones and phantoms there-within Inaugurate, crown'd strangely. Spectres vast
As of blue ice compact, and making din

As shadowy, phantom sounds, their voice a blast
Heard o'er the polar wild's vacuity,
That goes unquestion'd on, lost and aghast,

Seeking for ought to guide its voyage by,
One barren stamp, a solitary stone,
Half-shriek—half-whistle, and finds no reply.

SUNDAY IN LONDON.

[THE Editor having been busy with a new poem which he is about to publish, intitled 'Captain Sword and Captain Pen,' takes the liberty of substituting for his usual leading article the following remarks under the above title, which he wrote some time ago for the 'Weekly True Sun,' and which the proprietors of that paper (with the liberality that characterises them in all their dealings) have kindly permitted him to reprint. They appeared when the newspaper in question was young, and had nothing of its present sale; so that they will be new to by far the greater part of our readers. The rest will have the kindness to put up with the repetition for the sake of their old acquaintance, the author.]

It is astonishing what a deal of good stuff, of some sort or another, inherent or associated, there is in every possible thing that can be talked of; and how it will look forth out of the dulllest windows of common-place, if sympathy do but knock at the door.

There is that house for instance, this very Sunday, No. 4 Ballycroft row, in the Smithy; did you ever see such a house, so dull, so drearily insipid, so very rainy-bad-Sunday like? old, yet not so old as to be venerable; poor, yet not enough so to be pitied; the bricks black; the place no thoroughfare; no chance of a hackney-coach going by; the maid-servant has just left the window, yawning. But now, see who is turning the corner, and comes up the row. Some eminent man, perhaps? Not he. He is eminent for nothing, except among five or six fellow-apprentices, for being the best hand among them at turning a button. But look how he eyes, all the way, the house we have been speaking of—see how he bounds up the steps—with what a face, now cast down the area, and now raised to the upper windows, he gives his humble yet impressive knock—and lo! now look at the maid-servant's face, as she darts her head out of the window, and instantly draws it back again, radiant with delight. It is Tom Hicks, who has come up from Birmingham a week before she expected him. The door is opened almost as soon as the face is seen; and now is there love and joy in that house, and consequently a grace in the street, and it looks quite a different place, at least in the eyes of the loving and the wise.

This is our secret for making the dulllest street in the metropolis, nay the squalidest and worst, put forth some flower of pleasantness (for the seeds of good find strange corners to grow in, could people but cultivate them): and if our secret is not productive to everybody, it is no fault of ours: nay, for that matter, it is none of theirs; but we pity them, and have reason to think ourselves richer. We happened to be walking through some such forlorn-looking street with the late Mr Hazlitt, when we told him we had a charm against the melancholy of such places; and on his asking what it was, and being informed, he acknowledged, with a look between pleasure and sorrow, that it was a true one. The secret came home to him; but he could have understood, though he had not felt it. Fancy two lovers, living in the same street, either of whom thinks it a delight to exist in the same spot, and is happy for the morning if one look is given through the window-pane. It puts your thoughts in possession of the highest and most celestial pleasure on earth. No "milk-white thorn that scents the evening gale" is necessary to it, though it is a very fitting accompaniment. The dulllest street, the dulllest room upon earth, is sufficient, and becomes a spot radiant beyond the dreams of princes. Think of George the Fourth in the midst of all the splendour of Windsor Castle, and then of this poor maid-servant, with her health, her youth, and her love, looking in the eyes of the man she is fond of, and hardly able to speak for gratitude and joy. We grant that there is no comparison, in one sense, between the two individuals, the poor old King, with his efforts at being fine and happy, and the poor young girl, with her black worsted stockings and leaping bosom, as happy as her heart can make her. But the contrast may serve to remind us that we may attribute happiness wrongly in fine places, and miss it erroneously in common ones. Windsor Castle is sufficient beauty to itself, and has poetical memories; but in the commonest street we see there may be the richest real joy.

Love is not peculiar to London on Sundays: they have it even in Edinburgh, notwithstanding what a fair charmer in 'Tait's Magazine' tells us, with such a staid countenance, of the beatitudes of self-reflection into which her countrymen retire on that day. Otherwise, out of love alone, we might render our dull-looking metropolitan Sabbath the brightest day in the week. And so it is, and in Edinburgh too, and all the Sabbath-day world over; for though, seriously speaking, we do not deny the existence of the tranquil and solitary contemplations just alluded to, yet assuredly they are as nothing compared to the thoughts connected with every-day matters; and love, fortunately, is an every-day matter, as well as money. Our Sunday streets look dull enough, Heaven knows, especially in the more trading parts of the metropolis. At the west end of the town, in Marylebone, and the squares, it looks no duller than it does on other days; and taking the spirit of the thing, there is no real Sunday among the rich. Their going to church is a lounge and a show; their meals are the same as at other times; their evenings the same; there is no difference in the look of their houses outside. But in the city, the Strand, &c., the shutting-up of the shops gives an extreme aspect of dullness and melancholy to the streets. Those windows, full of gaiety, and colour, and bustle, being shut, the eyes of the houses seem put out. The clean clothes and comparatively staid demeanour of the passengers make no amends for the loss; for with the exception of special friends and visitors, lovers in particular, it is well understood in London that Sunday is really a dull day to most people. They have outlived the opinions which gave it an interest of a peculiar sort, and their notions of religion have become either too utilitarian or too cheerful to admire the old fashion of the day any longer. Rest, with insipidity, is its character in the morning, newspaper reading excepted: church is reckoned dull, perhaps attended out of mere habit "and for the sake of example," or avoided from day to day, till non-attendance becomes another habit: dinner under any circumstances is looked to with eagerness as the great relief; the day then brightens up with the help of an extra dish, pudding, or friend; and the visits of friends help to make the evening as lively as it well can be without the charm of business and money-taking. Should there be no visitors, the case is generally helpless. The man and wife yawn, or are quiet, or dispute; a little bit of book is read, till the reader complains of "weak eyes," or says that it is unaccountable how sleepy reading makes him, considering he is so "fond" of it; bibs are pulled up about the gentleman's chin, and gowns admired by their fair wearers; and the patients lounge towards the window, to wonder whether it is fine, or is clearing up, or to look at the rain-drops, or see what Mrs Smith is doing over the way. The young gentlemen or ladies look at the Bible, or the calendar, or the army-list, or the last magazine, or their trinkets, and wonder whether Richard will come; and the little children are told not to sing.

But the lovers!

These, however, we shall keep till the last, agreeably to the demands of climax.

But, stay a moment.—

So tender, or rather, according to Mr Bentham's philosophy, so "extra-regarding prudent," and so "felicity-maximising," is our heart, that we fear we may have been thought a little hard, by those whom we have described as uniting a sleepiness over their books with a profession of astonishment at their tendency, considering they are "so fond of books." But mistake us not, dear non-readers who happen to be reading us, or who read a newspaper though you read little else. Nothing would we ever willingly say to the useless mortification of anybody, much less of those who love anything whatsoever, especially a newspaper; and all the fault we find with you is, for thinking it necessary to vindicate your reputation for sense and sympathy on one particular score, when you might do it to better advantage by regretting the want of the very fondness you lay claim to. For in claiming to be fond of books, when you are not, you show yourselves unaware of the self-knowledge which books help us to obtain; whereas, if you boldly and candidly expressed your regret at not being fond of them, you would show that you had an understanding so far superior to the very want of books, and far greater than that of the mechanical scholar, who knows the words in them, and nothing else. You would show that you knew what you wanted, and were aware of the pleasures that you missed: and perhaps it would turn out, on inquiry, that you had only been indifferent to books in the gross, because you had not met with the sort of reading suitable to your turn of mind. Now, we are not bound to like books unsuitable to us, any more than a poet is bound to like law-books, or a lawyer the study of Arabic, or a musician any books but his own feelings; nor is anyone, more than the musician, bound to like books at all, provided he loves the things which books teach us to love, and is for sowing harmony and advancement around him, in tones of good-humour and encouragement, to the kindly dance of our planet.

One of the pleasantest sights on a Sunday morning in the metropolis—to us, of course, particularly so—but justly also to all well-disposed and thinking Christians—is the numerous shops exhibiting weekly papers for sale—the placards of our hebdomadal brethren, blue, yellow, and white, vociferous with large types, and calling the passenger's attention to Parliamentary investigations, monstrous convictions, horrible murders, noble philanthropies, and the humanities of books, theatres, and the fine arts. Justly did the divine heart, who suffered his disciples to pluck the ears of corn, and would have the sheep extricated from the ditch on a Sabbath, refuse to

I suppose, upheld him. The cause was this, as I discovered, when he checked with a smile the gratulations I was offering him on his supposed gains:—He had been struggling, he said, for years to keep his footing in England, but the struggle went against him. It was not that it was toilsome— toil he did not fear; but the fight was not fair,—the labour was not clean. This concert he had given as a last trial—'And you succeeded?' I cried. 'The room was full—but it was with free admissions,' he quietly replied. You may believe, sir, I wished myself anywhere else than where I was, sitting opposite the man whom I felt that I had been a party in injuring; though no such thought, I do believe, entered his mind. He continued, 'I am now on the eve of departure for another country—where, an inward voice tells me, better fortune will be my mead.' And it was true: everything was preparing for removal. Those walls, witnesses of so much happiness—happiness which evidently had had its source alone in the riches of the heart and mind of their master—walls, which had resounded with so much that was kind, hospitable, brilliant, and harmonious,—were now being despoiled of their tasteful decorations; and everything threatened that the man whose kind heart and great genius had hallowed the spot, was now dreaming of other lands."

"By Jove! that was well danced!" cried George Eldridge, as, springing from his seat, he ran off to compliment the object of his admiration.

The old gentleman smiled to find he had been storying to unlistening ears. It was not the first time.

*. We doubt whether the complaint of our respected Correspondent is in this instance well founded. Music is a luxury, not a necessity: at least it is so thought; it goes, at all events, upon the principle of attraction, and if it cannot attract money out of pockets, as well as a cheaper attention, we know not that a moral ground of complaint lies against the non-payers. The desideratum is to refine their tastes; and this consummation, indeed, such remonstrances as the present may help to bring about, by showing how worthy of all acknowledgment the labours of the accomplished are held to be by liberal minds. We confess we have never thought the readiness to accept, or to beg, orders, a very handsome or considerate thing on the part of people who can afford to pay for them. We should be ashamed, for instance, to avail ourselves of orders furnished by a good actor or musician in no very flourishing circumstances, and then go and lay out the value of them in tarts, or a trinket, or any other superfluity.

AMBIGUOUS PROPHETS.

Thomas Learmouth, otherwise called the Rhymer, a native of Ercheldoune in the Merse, is reported to have lived during the reign of Alexander III. He was famous for his predictions of future events. On the day of Alexander's death, the Earl of March asked him, whether anything extraordinary would happen next day? "To-morrow," answered Thomas, "will be heard the most vehement wind that was ever known in Scotland." When the news of the King's death arrived, "that," said Thomas, "was the wind of which I spake." Fordun relates this story as a proof of his prophetic spirit. There is still a better story related of Apollonius Tyaneus by Philostratus, Lib. iv. c. 43. An eclipse happened at Rome in the days of the Emperor Nero, at the same time there was a violent thunder storm! Apollonius, lifting up his eyes to heaven, said, "ἔσται τι μέγα καὶ ἐκ ἔσται;" i. e. "something great or extraordinary will come to pass, and will not." No one could understand the sense of this enigma; however, it was soon explained; for a goblet in the hands of Nero was struck with lightning, and yet he himself escaped unhurt. This, according to the admirers of Apollonius, was the remarkable thing which was to happen and not to happen.—Dalrymple's Annals of Scotland

THE WEEK.

NINTH-DAYS AND OTHER ANNIVERSARIES.

MARCH 4. Ash-Wednesday, the first day of Lent,—a season so called from the Saxon Lenten or Lengthen-tide; that is the lengthening of day-light. The observance of abstinence at this season is a memorial of the fasting of Jesus. It is little retained except among Catholics, and it is very much qualified with them. Brand quotes an amusing clause concerning it from one of the Roman Casuists; namely, that "beggars which are ready to affamish for want, may eat what they can get."

Ash-Wednesday is so called from the custom formerly prevailing of blessing ashes on this day, and signing the people's foreheads with them at church, in token of the "dust and ashes" nature of man. The ashes were those of the palm-branches consecrated on Palm-Sunday.

Ash-Wednesday is no longer anything with us but a name; and Lent means little but a season in which people eat too much fish and egg-sauce, and go to the theatres in black to hear oratorios.

Same day, 1650 (according to Chalmers:—Gorton says, 1652). At Worcester, the son of an attorney, John Lord Somers, a celebrated lawyer and statesman, one of the leaders of the Revolution of 1688, and a man of great taste in literature,—the patron of Addison and Steele, and promoter of the fame of Milton. He appears to have been a genuine lover of freedom; but to have shown, in advancing its interests, something of the superfluous subtlety of a legal breeding, which subjected him, among other charges, to that of currying too much favour with the King (William III), for the sake of maintaining the Whigs in power. An unfavourable view of this conduct would trace it to an aristocratical leaven in his own nature; a favourable one, to his ulterior considerations of what was best for all. His taste in literature would argue for the latter conclusion. Of the former, an anecdote of him in his youth might be regarded by some as a prognostic. As it is an amusing one, and shows his father in a light of homely joviality, we here repeat it. The name of the landlord gives it an additional zest in these days, though the old gentleman would have hazarded no such brusquerie to its present bearer. It is curious, by the way, that the name of Cobbett is always found in connexion with Anti-Toryism. It was that of one of the Republican colonels in Cromwell's time.—Old Mr Somers (the biographers tell us) used to frequent the taverns in London, and in his way from Worcester was wont to leave his horse at the George at Acton, where he often made mention of the hopeful son he had at the Temple. Cobbett, who kept the inn, hearing him enlarge so much in praise of his son, to compliment the old gentleman, cried, "Why wont you let us see him, sir?" The father, to oblige his merry landlord, desired the young gentleman to accompany him so far on his way home; and being come to the George, took his landlord aside, and said "I have brought him, Cobbett, but you must not talk to him as you do to me; he will not suffer such fellows as you in his company."

—6, 1474. At Arezzo, in Tuscany, of a noble family, Michael Angelo Buonarroti, whom the lovers of energy in its visible aspect think the greatest artist that ever lived. Ariosto (in not one of his happiest compliments) punning upon his name, calls him

Michel, più che mortal, Angiol divino,—

Michael, the more than man, Angel divine;

and pursuing the allusion, it may be said that there is much of the same difference between him and Raphael, as there is between their namesakes, the warlike archangel Michael, in 'Paradise Lost,' and Raphael, "the affable archangel." But we must own it appears to us, that Raphael, by a little exaggeration, could have done all that Michael Angelo did; whereas Michael Angelo could not have composed himself into the tranquil perfection of Raphael. Raphael's Gods and Sybils are as truly grand as those of Buonarroti; while the latter, out of an instinct of inferiority in intellectual and moral grandeur, could not help eking out the power of his with something of a convulsive strength,—an ostentation of muscles and attitudes. His Jupiter was a Mars intellectualized. Raphael's was always Jupiter himself, needing nothing more, and including the strength of beauty with that of majesty; as true moral grandeur does in nature. Michael Angelo was great in sculpture as well as painting, and was the chief builder of the magnificent church of St Peter. He also wrote a number of sonnets, partaking of the austere character of his genius. He was short in stature, but of energetic and venerable aspect; though Torrigiano, the sculptor, in a fit of passion, when they were at school together, broke the bridge of his nose with a blow of his little violent fist, and left it flattened for life; as may be seen in the busts of him.

Same day, 1482. At Florence, of a noble family, Francesco Guicciardini, an excellent statesman and historian, diffuse in his narratives, but sagacious, and a lover of truth. We regret we can only speak of him from the judgments of others, never having read his history. Like most of the great men of Italy, he also wrote verses.

TO THE FALSE ONE.

"—— Their perfume gone,
Take these again; for to the noble mind
Rich gifts wax poor, when givers prove unkind."

Take backe thy gyfte—'tis deare no more
Sith false have prov'd the wordes I trusted,
Dimme are its gemmes, soe bryghte before,
Each lynke by Treach'rie's breathe is rusted.

Firme are those lynkes of purest golde
(Too firme to bee a trifer's tokenne)
Stille with unshakenne strengthe they holde—
They are not—like thy false vowe—brokenne!

Thou should'st have given a rosie chaine
Of budde that fade as ev'ning closes,
And even thenne too welles I weane,
Thy hearte had chang'd, before thy roses.

Thenne as each perfumed leafe and flowre
Of its fraile linkes had dropt awaye,
I might have counted houre by houre
The progrease of thy love's decaye.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

LX.—A HUMAN WILD BEAST APPARENTLY TAMED.

[From a curious piece of German autobiography just published, intitled 'Heinrich Stilling.' The author was a friend of Goethe's. We do not take for granted, as he does, the thorough conversion of the unhappy, and most probably wretchedly educated, subject of the present story; but the man, like other human beings, has a germ of goodness in him, and the contrast of his poor wife's patience and kindness is affecting.]

During supper, in the evening, Glöckner related a very remarkable tale regarding his brother-in-law, Freymuth, which was to the following effect:—Madame Freymuth was Glöckner's wife's sister, and of one mind with her concerning religion; the two sisters therefore came frequently together, with other friends, on the Sunday afternoon; they then recapitulated the morning's sermon, read in the bible, and sang hymns. Freymuth could not bear this at all; he was an arch enemy to such things, yet, notwithstanding, he went diligently to church and sacrament, but that was all; horrible oaths, drinking, gaming, licentious conversation, and fighting, were his most gratifying amusements, in which he passed his time, after his business was finished. When he came home in the evening, and found his wife reading the bible, or some other edifying book, he began to swear in a dreadful manner, and to say to her, "Thou canting pietistic D—, knowest thou not, that I will not have thee read?" He then seized her by the hair, dragged her about upon the ground, and beat her, till the blood gushed from her nose and mouth; however, she did not say a word, but when he left off, she embraced his knees, and besought him with many tears, to be converted and change his course of life; he then kicked her away from him with his feet, and said, "That I will not, thou wretch! I will be no hypocrite, like thee." He treated her in the same manner, when he knew that she had been in company with other pious people. In this way he had acted ever since his wife had been of different sentiments to himself. But now, only within the last few days, Freymuth had become intirely changed, and that in the following manner:—

Freymuth took his departure for the fair at Frankfort. During this time, his wife was intirely at liberty to live as she pleased; she not only went to visit other friends, but also occasionally invited a considerable number of them to her house; this she did, also, last Easter fair. Once, when many of them were assembled in Freymuth's house, on a Sunday evening, and were reading, praying, and singing together, it pleased the mob not to suffer this; they came, and, first of all, broke all the windows within their reach, and, as the house door was fastened, they burst it open with a strong pole. The company in the parlour were alarmed and terrified, and everyone sought to hide himself, as well as he could. Madame Freymuth alone remained, and, on hearing the house door broken open, she stepped out with a light in her hand. Several of the mob had already burst in, whom she met in the hall. She smiled at the people, and said, good humouredly, "Neighbours! what is it you want?" immediately they were as though they had received a beating; they looked at each other, were ashamed, and went quietly home again. The next morning Madame Freymuth sent for the glazier and carpenter, in order to restore everything to its proper state; this was done, and scarcely was all finished, when her husband returned from the fair.

He immediately observed the new windows, and therefore asked his wife how that had happened? She told him the pure truth circumstantially, and concealed nothing from him, but sighed, at the same time, in her mind, to God for assistance; for she believed nothing else but that she would be dreadfully beaten. Freymuth, however, did not think of that, but was mad at the outrage of the mob. His intention was to take cruel revenge upon the villains, as he called them; he, therefore, commanded his wife, with threats, to tell him who they were that had committed the outrage, for she had seen and recognized them.

"Yes, dear husband!" said she, "I will tell thee; but I know a still greater sinner than they all together; for there was one who, for the very same reason, beat me most dreadfully."

Freymuth did not understand this as it was meant; he flew into a passion, beat upon his breast, and roared out, "May the D— fetch him and thee too, if thou dost not this moment tell me who it was."—"Yes," answered Madame Freymuth, "I will tell thee; revenge thyself upon him as much as thou wilt; thou art the man that did it, and art, therefore, worse than the people who only broke the windows." Freymuth was mute, and as if struck by lightning; he was silent awhile; at length he began, "God in heaven, thou art in the right! I have certainly been a real villain! I am wishing to revenge myself on people who are better than I! Yes, wife! I am the most wicked wretch upon earth! He jumped up, ran up stairs to his bed-room, lay there three days and three nights, flat upon the ground, ate nothing, and only occasionally took something to drink. His wife kept him company as much as she could, and helped him in prayer, that he might obtain favour with God, through the Redeemer.

On the morning of the fourth day, he rose with his mind at ease, praised God, and said, "I am now assured that my grievous sins are forgiven me!" From that moment he has been quite another man, as humble as he was proud before, as meek as he had been previously wrathful and daring, and as heartily pious as he had before been impious.

This man would have been a subject for my friend, Lavater. The expression of his countenance was the maddest and wildest in the world; it needed only a single passion, for instance, anger, to be excited, and the animal spirits required only to extend every muscle of his face, and he would have appeared raging mad. But now he is like a lion turned into a lamb. Peace and serenity are impressed upon every muscle of his countenance, and this gives him an aspect as pious as it was previously brutal.

FOOD.

[The following article, translated from a local work on 'Boulogne sur Mer,' applies particularly to the edible productions of that place; but it bears a general interest; for who is not interested in eating and drinking? And the French are considered to have advanced a step before us in the chymical analysis of nutritive substances.]

The animal productions that serve the purpose of nutrition are the muscles, membranes, and all the tissues of the ox, the sheep, the pig, the hare, the rabbit, poultry, wild fowl, and a great variety of fish; both sea and fresh-water fish; together with shell-fish and crustacea. In each of these substances reside certain principles which concur with remarkable energy in the formation of chyle, and the quick reparation of all the powers:—these are gelatine, fibrine, albumine, and osmazome; but these nutritive principles do not always exist in the same proportions. They vary according to the age and species of the animal. Gelatine abounds in young animals; in adult animals, fibrine predominates. Albumine is found, more or less, in all. Osmazome is scarcely present at all, in the calf and pullet; but in the ox, and other full-grown animals, it is very abundant. It is to this substance that broth owes its colour, its aromatic odour, and agreeable flavour.

In examining their mode of action on the animal economy, it will not be difficult to distinguish the cases in which one or the other of these substances should be perferably employed.

Gelatine is obtained by a decoction in water of all the soft parts of animals; but particularly the skin, the tendons, membranes, and glands. The bones, also, being pulverised, furnish a great quantity. It does not digest as easily as is commonly believed. This mistaken notion causes it to be lavished on the convalescent, and generally on those whose failing strength is the result of a bad state of the organs of digestion. It is very nourishing, but too relaxing. When it does digest, it speedily produces an embonpoint, the character of which is, the paleness and softness of the flesh. Gelatine is never strictly proper, unless all the animal functions are in a healthy state, and in cases where a meagre state of body is not the result of any derangement of the stomach. For temperaments in which the white fluids predominate, its relaxing properties should be corrected by aromatics or some other stimulant, such as wine, spices, &c.—the mode of action is then totally different, and it becomes essentially tonic and strengthening.

Fibrine constitutes more particularly the flesh of animals; it is generally easy of digestion. It furnishes a large proportion of chyle, and leaves little or no residuum; it enriches the constitution by increasing the size and strength of all the tissues, quickens the sensibility, and gives energy and activity to all the functions. But to obtain these results, it is necessary that the fibrine should be united with osmazome; otherwise, its effects will be nearly the same as those of all the white parts of animals.

Albumine, of which the white of an egg is wholly formed, and the greater part of the yolk, is coagulated and hardened by heat to a degree that resists all efforts of digestion. Its nutritive properties, analogous to those of milk, are not to be relied on, unless when it is employed in a half-liquid state, whether alone, or combined with other animal substances,—then it is easily digested and assimilated.

Osmazome is obtained by the washing in cold water of any brown flesh: an extract is made of it, which is not nutritive, but which acts on the vital (propriétés) properties in a manner eminently stimulating, it penetrates the whole system of circulation excites the power of assimilation, and determines the chyloferous vessels to appropriate to themselves a greater proportion of the nutritious principles. Now, it will be readily conceived that the flesh of adult animals, containing at once fibrine and gelatine, the properties of which are advantageously modified by osmazome, would be the food best adapted for lymphatic constitutions, where there is a disposition to scrophula, and in all cases where the organs require stimulus; but, for the same reasons, it should be taken very moderately by those who are inclined to plethora, to active hæmorrhages, or other acute affections. It would be particularly injurious to nervous temperaments, and wherever there is any irritation of the organs of sensibility, unless tempered by a mixture of vegetable food.

What we have said of the flesh of animals applies equally well to poultry. Domestic fowl have white flesh, similar in its effects to that of young quadrupeds; whereas wild fowl and game in general have brown flesh, more resembling that of adult quadrupeds.

Fish do not, like birds and quadrupeds, contain the principle which stimulates the digestion; they contain, however, a large proportion of nutriment, the absorption of which is more or less easy in different individuals. There are, indeed, persons who can only eat particular kinds of fish; and others to whom it is altogether injurious, and in whom it excites an ardent thirst. The immediate action of fish on the animal economy, is not direct, like that manifestly produced by any aliment in which osmazome predominates; neither are the fluids and solids renewed, as by gelatine or fibrine; but in a manner much more calm. To this property, may, in a great measure, be referred the constitution of our seamen; it is also to the mild and tranquil digestion of this food that we may attribute the uniformity of their actions and habits.

Some authors have written that fish produce obstinate cutaneous affections, ulcers, adynamic fevers, and scurvy. We think that there has not been sufficient distinction made here between the salt and smoked fish, and the fresh. Sharp seasonings may affect the skin and the vital fluids; we have often observed these effects; but scorbutic diseases, and cutaneous affections, in general, are extremely rare among our seamen; whence we conclude that fish is a wholesome food, proper in all cases not requiring a stimulating diet.

The most common shell-fish in Boulogne, used as food, are oysters, les peignes, and muscles. Oysters are easy of digestion, and may agree with weak stomachs; but they are rather relaxing. Robust persons eat considerable quantities of them without inconvenience, their relaxing properties tending to correct the effects of too nourishing a diet. Les peignes, analogous to oysters in texture, are far from being as easy of digestion; and, though boiled with aromatics and other provocations, are proper only for persons of very strong digestion. In all other cases, they are not only improper (contraire) but positively injurious.

Muscles, from their abundance on the rocks bathed by the sea on the coast of Boulogne furnish a common article of food, and are a most important resource for the poor. Mucous as oysters, they act in the same manner on the animal economy; but they are justly mistrusted, because it sometimes happens that they produce serious indigestions, attended with violent pains in the head and stomach, difficulty of breathing, puffing of the face, and a red, sharp, and stinging eruption over the whole body; momentary coryza, and sometimes convulsions. It is remarkable that these effects do not depend upon the quantity eaten. For example: several persons will make a plentiful repast on muscles, and not be at all incommoded; one of the party will eat but two or three, and, a short time after, will experience the effects we have described; on another occasion, perhaps, all the party will be affected, more or less, in a similar manner. What can we conclude from this irregularity, but that muscles have sometimes poisonous properties, dependant upon the state of their fluids, the nature of the substances on which they feed, or the degree of purity of the waters in which they live? There may also be some predisposition of the stomach, favourable to the action of these properties. But the observation of a long course of years has demonstrated, that the muscles taken on the rocks of Equihen, which are uncovered only in very low tides, are rarely unwholesome; whereas those taken nearer to the coast are by no means so wholesome. This shows that their poisonous properties depend partly upon the causes we have assigned. It seems, however, that the brown tubercle in the centre, vulgarly called the tongue, is the most common cause of indigestion—for those persons who are careful to remove this are not incommoded. It is observed, also, that if the muscle be moistened in vinegar, before it is eaten, its ill qualities are neutralized. It is important, then, always to observe this rule, if one would avoid accidents, always accompanied with pain, anxiety, &c. &c.

The crustacea are not rare in the country; but they eat only the crab, the lobster, and the shrimp. They are difficult of digestion, especially the two first. Though they all form a solid and very nourishing food, they ought not to be used without aromatics and spices sufficiently stimulating to prevent indigestion; even then, they are only fit for strong and vigorous stomachs.

The lobster is liable to affections which sometimes render it unwholesome. Its ill properties reside especially in a red substance called the coral, which is neither more nor less than the eggs, still very small, and placed in the interior of the body. On the 1st of September 1824, five persons suffered from indigestion, followed by prostration of strength, hicough, violent colics, faintings, and other symptoms of the most alarming nature—in consequence of eating of a lobster, with the flesh of which was mixed the coral, cut in small pieces. An evident proof that it was the coral that caused the evil was, that a sixth person, who was of the party, having had the precaution to put aside the morsels of that part which had fallen to his share, suffered no inconvenience whatever. As it has not been ascertained at what precise period the lobster becomes unwholesome, and it is impossible exactly to describe any characters by which that state may be recognized, it is advisable habitually to reject the coral.

VEGETABLE FOOD.

The various vegetables used as food, differ as well in their action on the animal economy, as in the quantity of nutriment they contain. As our limits will not allow us to examine each severally, we shall separate them into sections, comprehending all the analogies.

The Farinaceous. Of these vegetables, wheat is undoubtedly the one most generally employed. The abundance of gluten and nutritious matter that enter into its composition, render it preferable for the making of bread; it digests with the greatest facility, and furnishes a large portion of chyle. The exclusive use of this kind of food, however, occasions a superabundance of blood. Great bread-eaters have the vascular system full; the pulse, though strong, remarkably slow; and in general, a tendency to plethora. Their muscles become more strong and robust, but they have not the quickness of movement, and the elasticity of persons who live upon more stimulating food. The functions of the mind also have less activity, and the sensibility seems blunted. This state of apparent calmness always conceals the elements of inflammatory maladies, intense in proportion to the more or less superabundance of the sanguine fluid. Such a diet is improper, therefore, for persons of a strong and stout constitution, or persons subject to hæmorrhage, to the impulsion of blood to the head, &c., but it would be useful in cases of great nervous irritability, when the hæmatose is viciated, as in scurvy; or where debility and poverty of blood announce a deficiency of the nourishing juices.

Farinaceous vegetables are valuable aliments, gentle in their action; and a mixture of them with animal productions, is, in some sort, the complement of the nourishment of man: but their quantity should be proportioned to the constitution, and to the predispositions which, according to sex or age, determine the liability to different affections.

Bread made of pure wheat is the best and the lightest; all its principles are almost intirely absorbed. That in which other flour is introduced—such as barley, rye, oats, or the fecula of potato, is not only more compact, but also slower of digestion. The former suits best for sedentary or inactive persons, because their digestive powers have less energy; but the second is best for the working classes. It makes them less sensible of the imperious calls of hunger, during the hours devoted to labour. Hot bread is always heavier than stale; and in all cases, crust digests more readily than crumb, because the latter, being much softer, requires little mastication; while the former, being more masticated, absorbs more saliva, and demands less effort on the part of the stomach. Long mastication is absolutely necessary to an easy digestion. Too little attention is paid to this fact, and to this omission many evils are attributable. It cannot be too earnestly recommended to weak and delicate persons to divide and temper their food in the mouth, as completely as possible, before it is entrusted to the stomach.

The Leguminous. In the number of aliments of this kind, it is necessary to comprehend the roots of certain vegetables, their leaves, their stalks, their seeds, and even their flowers. These parts contain different degrees of nutriment, and ought to be gathered at the most favourable period of vegetation. Thus, carrots, lettuces, asparagus, gourds, peas, cauliflowers, &c. are used only when the roots, leaves, stalks, seeds, &c. respectively, abound with sap; and each contains the nourishing and peculiar juices destined to the full growth of the vegetable. In fine, if the stalks were fully developed, the roots would become dry and woody, the leaves hard and cortaceous; they would no longer be susceptible of digestion, and would even cease to be nutritious.

Two parts necessarily exist in vegetables: the one contains all that is alimentary—it is the mucilaginous extract; the other is the vegetable fibre, which will not digest, and is constantly rejected. Now, it may be said, that the more mucilage any vegetable substance may contain, and the less of the fibrous part, the more it is susceptible of assimilation. The leguminous are by no means so nutritious as the farinaceous vegetables; and produce but a small proportion of chyle.

The effects of a constant diet of this kind are not difficult to distinguish: the stomach, wearied by the sweet moist mucilage of leguminous substances, furnishes to the assimilative agents but little nutrition, and peculiarly relaxing; thus, the contractibility of the heart is weakened, the skin loses its colour, and the vital properties of all the tissues become singularly relaxed; the blood itself becomes more liquid; and a full and swollen appearance often announces the want of energy of the acquired constitution. Such diet, then, is contra-indicated for persons of weak and feeble habit, and especially for those in whom the white fluids predominate. Neither are they proper for persons whose organs of locomotion have need of vigour and activity; nor those in whom an habitual state of indolence betrays the languor of the functions, and the inimence of a leuco-phlegmatic and weak habit of body; but, on the contrary, a vegetable diet may be employed to great advantage, where the thickening of the blood disposes to an inflammatory state. This regimen is no less proper when it is desirable to temper nervous susceptibility.

Unless in such cases as we have mentioned, leguminous vegetables, mingled with different kinds of meat, compose the best and most wholesome diet, because this mixture of the two is more strengthening than vegetables alone, and less stimulating than an intirely animal diet. According to these principles, the more or less proportion of either should be determined by the constitution of the individual.

Fruits are not generally considered as food, but rather as accessories en raison of the quantity of saccharine, acidulous, or oily matter they may contain; the mucilage with which these principles are united, however, gives them nutritive properties more or less decided.

The sweet fruits used in Boulogne are apricots, plums, and the dried fruits, as figs, raisins, &c. The sugar makes them particularly desirable—it is of easy digestion; its assimilation is almost complete. Persons who use a great quantity soon become em-bon-point, and even plethoric; but at the same time it seems that they are slower in their movements, and deficient in activity, which always depends on the elasticity of the muscles. The sensibility also is somewhat diminished, and the brain appears to act with more calmness and tranquillity. But when the sugar contained in the fruit presents itself in the form of a mass of sweet mucus, then its mode of action differs, and this new substance becomes relaxing, occasions flatulence, &c. and all the organs are weakened. These effects are especially remarkable in delicate persons, and persons of weak digestion.

Sweet fruits are a great resource for convalescents, and in all cases where it is desirable to increase nutrition; but then two conditions are necessary:—the first, that these fruits should contain as little mucus as possible; the other, that the stomach be strong enough to overcome their laxative influence. In such cases this nourishment, judiciously mingled with substances slightly stimulant, will give strength to the constitution; but it will be readily conceived that it must be injurious whenever there is the least predisposition to plethora or inflammation.

The most common of the acid fruits are gooseberries, currants, cherries, strawberries, apples, pears, peaches, raspberries, mulberries, oranges, and lemons. Though the acetic, citric, malic, and moric acids contained in these fruits is always mingled with a considerable quantity of sugary mucus, they are not nutritious, but rather exercise their influence in exciting the appetite, and favouring the digestion of other substances eaten at the same time. It is necessary, however, that they be eaten in moderation, otherwise they will occasion serious disorders. One of the most sensible effects of acid fruits is their action on the circulation. The pulse beats slower; the animal heat is modified in a remarkable manner. The cellular tissue is clogged, and this explains why the frequent use of acids often brings on a state of leanness; but a moderate use of them, especially when the weather is very warm, gives to the whole frame a sensation of refreshing coolness that is very useful.

The oily fruits gathered in this country are nuts and walnuts; but almonds and cocoa-nuts also are used. Alone, they are hard of digestion, and although the oil they contain, united with the vegetable pulp, affords a sufficiency of nutriment, it is necessary to their digestion that they should be masticated until every particle be completely crushed. If not thus carefully divided, the stomach is wearied with vain efforts to digest them. These fruits are never better assimilated than when fresh, and intirely triturated with the salivary juices, and never more unwholesome than when they are stale, and their oily particles have begun to lose their purity. Oily fruits are in general softening, and their action on the several systems of organs tend to moderate their functions. Thus, persons who make great use of them are stout without being strong; their sensibility is in some sort dulled, and the understanding dormant.

THEOPHILOSOPHY.

He that thinks best of man, thinks most worthily of God. Man, savage man,—and of civilised man the more ignorant and besotted classes, like the devils, believe and tremble; not so he who keeps ever in his view the high destinies of humanity; he, whatever be his creed, believes and loves.—Outline of a system of Education.

CHARACTERS OF SHAKESPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

NO. VIII.—THE MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM.

BOTTOM the Weaver is a character that has not had justice done him. He is the most romantic of mechanics. And what a list of companions he has!—Quince the Carpenter, Snug the Joiner, Flute the Bellows-mender, Snout the Tinker, Starveling the Tailor; and then, again, what a group of fairy attendants, Puck, Peaseblossom, Cobweb, Moth, and Mustard-seed! It has been observed that Shakespeare's characters are constructed upon deep physiological principles; and there is something in this play which looks very like it. Bottom the Weaver, who takes the lead of

"This crew of patches, rude mechanicals,
That work for bread upon Athenian stalls,"

follows a sedentary trade, and he is accordingly represented as conceited, serious, and fantastical. He is ready to undertake anything and everything, as if it was as much a matter of course as the motion of his loom and shuttle. He is for playing the tyrant, the lover, the lady, the lion. "He will roar that it shall do any man's heart good to hear him;" and this being objected to as improper, he still has a resource in his good opinion of himself, and "will roar you an 'twere any nightingale." Snug the Joiner is the moral man of the piece, who proceeds by measurement and discretion in all things. You see him with his rule and compasses in his hand. "Have you the lion's part written? Pray you, if it be, give it me, for I am slow of study."—"You may do it extempore," says Quince, "for it is nothing but roaring." Starveling the Tailor keeps the peace, and objects to the lion and the drawn sword. "I believe we must leave the killing out when all's done." Starveling, however, does not start the objections himself, but seconds them when made by others, as if he had not spirit to express his fears without encouragement. It is too much to suppose all this intentional: but it very luckily falls out so. Nature includes all that is implied in the most subtle analytical distinctions; and the same distinctions will be found in Shakespeare. Bottom, who is not only chief actor, but stage-manager for the occasion, has a device to obviate the danger of frightening the ladies: "Write me a prologue, and let the prologue seem to say, we will do no harm with our swords, and that Pyramus is not killed indeed; and for better assurance, tell them that I, Pyramus, am not Pyramus, but Bottom the Weaver: this will put them out of fear." Bottom seems to have understood the subject of dramatic illusion at least as well as any modern essayist. If our holiday mechanic rules the roast among his fellows, he is no less at home in his new character of an ass, "with amiable cheeks, and fair large ears." He instinctively acquires a most learned taste, and grows fastidious in the choice of dried peas and bottled hay. He is quite familiar with his new attendants, and assigns them their parts with all due gravity. "Monsieur Cobweb, good Monsieur, get your weapon in your hand, and kill me a red-hipt humble-bee on the top of a thistle, and, good Monsieur, bring me the honey-bag." What an exact knowledge is here shown of natural history!

Puck, or Robin Goodfellow, is the leader of the fairy band. He is the Ariel of the 'Midsummer Night's Dream'; and yet as unlike as can be to the Ariel in 'The Tempest.' No other poet could have made two such different characters out of the same fanciful materials and situations. Ariel is a minister of retribution, who is touched with a sense of pity at the woes he inflicts. Puck is a mad-cap sprite, full of wantonness and mischief, who laughs at those whom he misleads—"Lord, what fools these mortals be!" Ariel cleaves the air, and executes his mission with the zeal of a winged messenger; Puck is borne along on his fairy errand like the light and glittering gossamer before the breeze. He is, indeed, a most epicurean little gentleman, dealing in quaint devices, and faring in dainty delights. Prospero and his world of spirits are a set of moralists; but with Oberon and his fairies we are launched at once into the empire of the butterflies. How beautifully is this race of beings contrasted with the men and women actors in the scene, by a single epithet which Titania gives to the latter, "the human mortals!" It is astonishing that Shakespeare should be considered, not only by foreigners, but by many of our own critics, as a gloomy and heavy writer, who painted nothing but "gorgons and hydras, and chimeras dire." His subtlety exceeds that of all other dramatic writers, inasmuch that a celebrated person of the present day said that he regarded him rather as a metaphysician than a poet. His delicacy and sportive gaiety are infinite. In the 'Midsummer Night's Dream' alone, we should imagine, there is more sweetness and beauty of description than in the whole range of French poetry put together. What we mean is this, that we will produce out of that single play ten passages, to which we do not think any ten passages in the works of the French poets can be opposed, displaying equal fancy and imagery. Shall we mention the remonstrance of Helena to Hermia, or Titania's description of her fairy train, or her disputes with Oberon about the Indian boy, or Puck's account of himself and his employments, or the Fairy Queen's exhortation to the elves to pay due attendance upon her favourite, Bottom; or Hippolyta's description of a chase, or Theseus's answer? The two last are as heroic and spirited as the others are full of luscious tenderness. The reading of this play is like wandering in a grove by moonlight: the descriptions breathe a sweetness like odours thrown from beds of flowers.

Titania's exhortation to the fairies to wait upon Bottom, which is remarkable for a certain cloying sweetness in the repetition of the rhymes, is as follows:—

"Be kind and courteous to this gentleman;
Hop in his walks, and gambol in his eyes,
Feed him with apricocks and dewberries,
With purple grapes, green figs and mulberries;
The honey-bags steal from the humble-bees,
And for night tapers crop their waxen thighs,
And light them at the fiery glow-worm's eyes,
To have my love to bed, and to arise:
And pluck the wings from painted butterflies,
To fan the moon-beams from his sleeping eyes;
Nod to him, elves, and do him courtesies."

The sounds of the lute and the trumpet are not more distinct than the poetry of the foregoing passage, and of the conversation between Theseus and Hippolyta.

"THESEUS. Go, one of you, find out the forester,
For now our observation if perform'd;
And since we have the vaward of the day
My love shall hear the music of my hounds.
Uncouple in the western valley, go,
Despatch I say, and find the forester.
We will, fair Queen, up to the mountain's top,
And mark the musical confusion
Of hounds and echo in conjunction."

HIPPOLYTA. I was with Hercules and Cadmus once,

When in a wood of Crete they bay'd the bear
With hounds of Sparta; never did I hear
Such gallant chiding. For, besides the groves,
The skies, the fountains, every region near Seem'd all one mutual cry. I never heard
So musical a discord, such sweet thunder.

THESEUS. My hounds are bred out of the Spartan kind,

So flew'd, so sanded, and their heads are hung
With ears that sweep away the morning dew;
Crook-knee'd and dew-lap'd, like Thessalian bulls,
Slow in pursuit, but matched in mouth like bells,
Each under each. A cry more tuneable
Was never halloo'd to, nor cheer'd with horn,
In Crete, in Sparta, nor in Thessaly:
Judge when you hear."

Even Titian never made a hunting-piece of a gusto so fresh and lusty, and so near the first ages of the world as this.

It had been suggested to us, that the 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' would do admirably to get up as a Christmas after-piece; and our prompter proposed that Mr Kean should play the part of Bottom, as worthy of his great talents. He might, in the discharge of his duty, offer to play the lady like any of our actresses that he pleased, the lover or the tyrant like any of our actors that he pleased, and the lion like "the most fearful wild-fowl living." The carpenter, the tailor, and joiner, it was thought, would hit the galleries. The young ladies in love would interest the side-boxes; and Robin Goodfellow and his companions excite a lively fellow-feeling in the children from school. There would be two courts, an empire within an empire, the Athenian and the Fairy King and Queen, with their attendants, and with all their finery. What an opportunity for processions, for the sound of trumpets and glittering of spears! What a fluttering of urchins' painted wings; what a delightful profusion of gauze clouds and airy spirits floating on them!

Alas, the experiment has been tried, and has failed; not through the fault of Mr Kean, who did not play the part of Bottom, nor of Mr Liston, who did, and who played it well, but from the nature of things. The 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' when acted, is converted from a delightful fiction into a dull pantomime. All that is finest in the play is lost in the representation. The spectacle was grand; but the spirit was evaporated, the genius was fled.—Poetry and the stage do not agree well together. The attempt to reconcile them in this instance fails not only of effect, but of decorum. The ideal can have no place upon the stage, which is a picture without perspective: everything there is in the foreground. That which was merely an airy shape, a dream, a passing thought, immediately becomes an unmanageable reality. Where all is left to the imagination (as is the case in reading) every circumstance, near or remote, has an equal chance of being kept in mind, and tells according to the mixed impression of all that has been suggested. But the imagination cannot sufficiently qualify the actual impressions of the senses. Any offence given to the eye is not to be got rid of by explanation. Thus Bottom's head in the play is a fantastic illusion, produced by magic spells: on the stage, it is an ass's head, and nothing more; certainly a very strange costume for a gentleman to appear in. Fancy cannot be embodied any more than a simile can be painted; and it is as idle to attempt it as to personate wall or moonshine. Fairies are not incredible, but fairies six feet high are so. Monsters are not shocking, if they are seen at a proper distance. When ghosts appear at mid-day, when apparitions stalk along Cheapside, then may the 'Midsummer Night's Dream' be represented without injury at Covent-garden or at Drury-lane. The boards of a theatre and the regions of fancy are not the same thing.

A SAMPLE OF

THE SPELLING OF THE LADIES IN THE TIME OF CHARLES I.

[From the 'Memoirs of Dr Basire.' The letter was written to him during his exile in the royal cause, by his wife, a lady of a good family, and an excellent woman. Our extract is followed by a passage or two from her other letters.]

From Eglescliff, Feb. 10. 1661.

"MY DEAREST—I have received yowrs from Missina, dated the last of November, which is all I have received, sens S. Morkes day. I have and shall praise God for his gracious providens over you, in delivering you from the Pope and fryars envie. I pray God to prosper you stil in the good successe of your ministry, and to continue your prudence and care of yourself. I am sorry for your deare friend deth. Thoue you are not plesed to nam him, yet I thinke I know him—Ser John Gudrike brother. He told me his brother was dide of a pluresy as he was in his voyage for Englon. He axed me for you, and desired me to remember him to you. I saw him as I was retorning from bringing my Lady Blaxton in hear going to see Ser William her husband, which is a presoner at Moretake casel neare Coventry. My lady now is at London, waiting if she can get him relest, and for the present is pat of with good words. Our dotter Mary is at hom with me, she is (I praise God) a relegos child, and serveable to me. Mr Hums hath tout her to rit. My lady had a great love and care of her. I found her all her close and paid Mr Broune for teching her on the verginalls. I shall have a care of all the rest as much as in me lais. I ret to my frend Busby according to your desire about Isache, but never had ansar from him. I very much desire if it ples God to settel you at Rome, that he may com to you. I do think he will be a gret comfort to you, and loves rising earlly to go to coul. When I tel him I have had letter from you, he axes if you have send for him.

"I most kindly thanke you for your deare, loving, and most constand care of me, and I do earnestly desire to arove myself what you thinke me in your cherrittabl good thots of me. All your delit is wall heare, and I shall pray and long to heare of your prospering in your besnes and good settelment agine; my vnkle ret to me that the marchands had agroced to leon (lay on) every one so much for you to agment your stipend. I shall just now rit to my Lady Blaxton, and let her know you are wall. Mrs Man and Mrs Garnett, the Dauensons, and Dr Clarke are wall. My Lady Gercon, I think, is ded, for when I saw her, there was no hops of lif. My Lady Hutten was wall, and remembers her to you. Oure good frend, Mrs Hungton, and her husband, are both ded, and Mr John Killinggoul. All the res of our neighbours and our neighbours are as yet wall. My deare respetes and seruies to your good frend Mr Tindal.

"Yours as much as euer in the Lord,
"No more, thene euer,
"F. B. (Frances Basire.)

"I praise God for all your contentedness to bare your crosses, for that is the way to make them easie and lite to you, to consedeer from hom they com, and how gustly wee deserue them, and how nesserary they are for vs, and how they cannot be auoided in this lif.

"My dearest, I shall not faill to looke thos plases in the criptur, and pray for you as becometh your obedent wife and serunt in the Lord,

"F. B."

In another letter she says—"I prais God I am very wall, and I cro fat."

In another:—"I want whit wain (white wine) to make pouthers in; heare is non to be got that is god."

And again:—"Dr Clarke and Dr Nealer liue of some temberall mens thy hauc, (live on some temporal means) but do not prech."

Female education was strangely neglected in this humble particular, up to a late period. Nor, indeed, did gentlemen perhaps spell with uniform correctness till the middle of the last century. We think we recollect instances, even in the autographs of Pope. There is a letter to him from his venerable mother, preserved in some of his editions, almost as full of involuntary comedy as the above.

CARDINAL VIRTUES OF WIT.

Cardinal du Bellay was so extravagantly fond of the works of Rabelais, that being once desired to ask a person of learning to stay dinner, "Has he read the book?" quoth he. The answer was, "No; he is of a serious cast." "Then let him dine with the servants," replied the Cardinal. As if there could be no merit without reading that facetious performance.

A REMARK WHICH WE BELIEVE TO BE WELL-FOUNDED.

If a man keeps always perfectly sober, with an even temper, and no display of wealth, he may pass unscathed almost everywhere.—Alexander's Sketches in Portugal.

SNOW-DROPS.

A LOVELY sisterhood of nuns ye seem,
White-hooded, in your cloister of the snow;
A sweet society, charmed to forego
Delights, whose Eden is the summer beam,
Sports of the field, and hauntings of the stream.
The lark will sing in heaven—the violet blow—
The cuckoo shout—its star the primrose show,
When ye are fled, like music, or a dream.
Sad am I for you, sweet ones! you must never Wave your white beauty 'mid the summer bloom:
In life, death's sanctity must you endeavour—
A sad content—irrevocable doom!
Nature has fixed your fate—one cold for ever—
Winter your convent, and the snow your tomb.

R. H.

. This Correspondent (whose sonnet affords genuine proof that he has a right relish of the poetry he speaks of, and whose 'Gipsy King' we should be glad to see) has gratified us with a letter containing the following passage:—

Thousands of your Readers have had, if they are at all like us, a deep gratification—Keats's 'Eve of St Agnes' is beautiful—this we felt before, and now feel doubly, accompanied with your comment and interpretation. 'Isabella' is also a delightful poem—some of its lines are like solid bars of gold, once read they are read again, and never forgotten. But the same may be said of much of Keats's poetry. Of all our modern great poets he has been the least read and appreciated. As far as my experience in poetry goes, and the enjoyment of it, he takes his place with the highest—or why do passages from his poems come into the mind in the divine company of Shakspeare's and Milton's? I never read him without thinking of 'Comus' and 'The Midsummer Night's Dream.' What a chaste antique witchery there is in the 'Eve of St Agnes'!—what pathos in 'Isabella'!—and what a compass of mind and power in 'Hyperion'!—to use his own words,—"Might half-slumbering on his own right arm." You will, it is to be hoped, give and comment on 'Isabella,' and, surely, too, 'Comus.'

MUSIC.

Musical Library. No. XI. Charles Knight.

AN 'Andante and Variations' by Haydn, among the instrumental pieces, is one of the loveliest movements we ever heard; and very easy to play too; it is, therefore, to the taste, and within the power of everyone who can make the slightest use of his finger-tips. Clementi's pianoforte piece is a useful study for youthful practitioners, and very pleasing. Handel's overtures we cannot think suitable to one pair of hands, if to the pianoforte at all; much less to the very simple style of arrangement adopted in the 'Musical Library.' The vocal portion this time is not so good as it is wont to be. The madrigal is dull and tedious. The duet, from 'Lodoviska,' is pretty. The charming ballad of 'Sally in our Alley,' however, is worth a whole bookful of the rest; a most charming, simple, expressive composition it is. It is among the very best of inventions, original, true, and belongs, not to this or that style of music, so much as to our very nature. The composer learnt not the melody in the grammar, nor did he calculate it by any process of algebra or acoustic science; but he found it in his own heart, and gave it us as he found it. We could have wished that it had had a better accompaniment. It is true that the air being played in the accompaniment makes it all the easier to sing; but it very much deteriorates from the effect of which it is capable; and if a modern accompaniment be employed, it would have been as well to have made it as good as modern improvements in arrangement could have enabled it to be. It might, nay, it ought, to have been quite as simple; but the voice being unvaryingly in unison with the pianoforte, through the whole piece, has a very unpleasant sameness of effect.

ON THE DEATH OF HIS WIFE IN CHILD-BED OF TWINS.

BY LORD HAILES.

[Sir David Dalrymple, Scotch lord of session, the excellent writer of the 'Annals of Scotland.' His friend Lord Woodhouselee says truly of the following lines, that it would not be easy to produce from the works of any modern Latin poet (he might have added, or ancient,) a more delicate, tender effusion, or an idyllion of greater classical purity. It is a pity that the editor of 'Blackwood,' or of the 'Times,' or Mr Landor, or some other accomplished scholar, does not make a selection of these classical amenities, and give us them in a volume with notes and translations. Our friend Mr Webbe should do it. We are sure that men of genius, of all parties, would hail it with encouragement and delight.]

Vidi, gemellos, et superbiui parens,
Fausti decus puerperi;
At mox sub uno flebilis vidi parens
Condi gemellos oespice.

Tu, dulcis uxor! ut mihi sol occidit,
Radiante dejectus polo!
Obscura vitam nunc ego per avia
Heu, solus, ac dubius feror!

AN ATTEMPT TO TRANSLATE THE ABOVE.

I saw them, twins, a parent proud,
The blossoms of a happy bed:
A little while, a parent bow'd,
I saw them, through my tears, both dead.

But when thou left'st me too, sweet wife!
Oh! darkness smote me at noon-day.
Now through a lone and silent life
I stagger, nor can see my way.

DESTRUCTION OF A SHIP AND ITS CREW BY A WHALE.

Not boats only, but sometimes even ships are destroyed by these powerful creatures.

It is a well-authenticated fact, that an American whale ship, the Essex, was destroyed in the South Pacific Ocean by an enormous Sperm Whale. While the greater part of the crew were away in the boats killing whales, the few people remaining on board saw an enormous whale come up close to the ship, and, when very near, he appeared to sink down for the purpose of avoiding the vessel, and in doing so, he struck his body against some part of the keel, which was broken off by the force of the blow, and floated to the surface; the whale was then observed to rise a short distance from the ship, and to come with, apparently, great fury towards it, striking one of the bows with his head, with amazing force, and completely "staving it in." The ship, of course, immediately filled and fell over on her side, in which dreadful position the poor fellows in the boats saw their only home, and distant from the nearest land many hundred miles; on returning to the wreck, they found the few who had been left on board, hastily congregated in a remaining whale-boat, into which they had scarcely time to take refuge before the vessel capsized—they with difficulty obtained a scanty supply of provisions from the wreck, their only support on the long and dreary passage before them, to the coast of Peru, to which they endeavoured to make the best of their way.

One boat was fortunately picked up by a vessel not far from the coast; in it were the only survivors of the unfortunate crew, three in number—the remainder having miserably perished under unheard-of suffering and privations. These three men were in a state of stupefaction, allowing their boat to drift about where the winds and waves listed. One of these survivors was the master: by kind and careful attention on the part of their deliverers, they were eventually rescued from the jaws of death, to relate the melancholy tale.—[From a very interesting and comprehensive little account, just published, of the Sperm Whale, its Fishery, &c. Effingham Wilson, pp. 58.]

A GENTLEMAN WITH A WIFE IN EVERY TOWN.

[FROM the second volume of the 'Hindoos' (just published),—a volume still more amusing than the first, and giving the most extraordinary pictures of Hindostan, which (with admirable things in it) may be called, in many respects, the very hot-bed of absurdity.]

THERE exists in Bengal a particular tribe of Brahmins, who conduct their marriages in a manner different from that which prevails among other members of the same caste. The history of this tribe is as follows. Formerly, there existed in Bengal but one order of Brahmins, called Satsati, all of whom were equal in honour. There was, consequently, no powerful rivalry to stimulate to exertion, whether in virtue or learning, and the whole caste insensibly sank into sloth and ignorance. For some time this state of things continued undisturbed. But at length a prince arose, who, incensed at their indolence and incapacity, and wishing to offer up, by pious and skilful hands, a sacrifice, which he designed to solemnize for obtaining rain, invited from a neighbouring state five Brahmins of learning and virtue capable of conducting the ceremony in a becoming manner. Their performance satisfied the monarch, who, as a reward, gave them grants of land; and from these five men, nearly all the Brahmins, now in Bengal, are supposed to be descended. Nearly the same thing, however, happened to their posterity as had happened to the Satsatis: ignorance, the vice which most easily besets mankind, intent, for the most part, on vulgar acquisitions, again crept in, and a second reform became necessary. Ballalsena, therefore, King of Bengal, observing among the Brahmins a great lukewarmness in the performance of their religious duties, determined to divide them into three orders, distinguishing one as a peculiar order of merit, to intitle a man to enter which the following qualifications were required: to observe the duties of the caste, to be meek and learned, of good report, to possess a disposition to visit the holy places, to be devout, not to desire gifts from the impure, to delight in an ascetic life, and to be liberal and beneficent. Those in whom these nine qualities were found, he denominated Kulinas; those who possessed some, but were wanting in other qualities, were called Srotriyas; while those, in whom none of these signs of superiority could be discovered, were termed Vansajas.

The distinctions thus created, and which still continue to be observed with great tenacity, have given rise to the greatest enormities. A Kulina may lawfully give his son in marriage to the daughter of a Srotriya, or even to a Vansaja; but, in the second case, on condition that his family, if the practice be continued, shall sink to the level of a Vansaja. This danger, however, he generally confronts with great readiness for a certain consideration; and the Srotriyas and Vansajas, vehemently ambitious of forming connexions with the privileged class, consent to expend enormous sums of money to obtain Kulina husbands for their daughters. For this reason, the male youth of this class are generally engaged as soon as born to women of the inferior tribes. But the contriver of the rules, by which these people regulate their conduct, neglected to provide for the daughters of Kulinas, who are forbidden to marry out of their class, and, unless very wealthy, can find no husbands in it. They therefore remain unmarried. Polygamy, itself an evil, is frequently resorted to as a remedy to the inconvenience resulting from this arrangement. The Kulina Brahmin, solicited and courted on all sides, marries a number of wives, some from his own class, to gratify his friends, others from among the inferior classes, through considerations of interest, to enrich himself, or to provide for himself a home in various parts of the country, where he may be lodged and entertained without expense during his peregrinations from one place of pilgrimage to another. The women of his own class he commonly leaves at the houses of their friends; of the others he generally takes one to his own house, when he happens to possess one. But very frequently all his worldly possessions consist only of a shred of cloth and his Brahminical string, by the magic influence of which, however, he sometimes possesses a harem of a hundred and twenty ladies scattered over Bengal, each of whom is proud to call him husband, and looks forward to his distant and uncertain visit as to a season of rejoicing and jubilee. Numbers convert these kinds of marriages into a profitable speculation, and possess no other means of living. At each new marriage large presents are made them, which are renewed whenever they visit their wives. Thus a Kulina, having married into fifty or a hundred families, passes from house to house, where he is received with distinction, sumptuously entertained, and loaded at his departure with presents, in the hope of tempting him soon to return. In some cases the husband never sees the wife after the nuptials; in others he visits her once, perhaps, in three or four years. A Kulina of respectable circumstances never lives with the wife, who remains at the house of her parents; he sees her occasionally, as a friend rather than as a husband, and he dreads to have children by her, lest he should thereby sink in honour. In fact, to obviate this evil, they never acknowledge the children born in the houses of their fathers-in-law.

The prevalence of these preposterous customs is the cause of innumerable evils: the married women, neglected by their husbands, and still more their hosts of unmarried sisters, frequently indulge in every kind of debauchery and vice; while their husbands have lately been found, to a most extraordinary extent, among the most daring robbers and banditti.

FEUDAL AMUSEMENTS.

Henry de Lancaster, commander of the English forces, invited the Knight of Liddesdale to combat with him in the lists at Berwick. In the first course the Knight of Liddesdale was wounded by the breaking of his own spear. This accident having interrupted the sport, Henry Lancaster requested Alexander Ramsay to bring twenty gentlemen with him to encounter an equal number of English. The request was complied with; and the sports continued for three days. Two of the English combatants were killed on the field; nor was the loss of their antagonists less considerable. The point of a spear pierced the brain of William de Ramsay. After having been shrievd he expired in his armour. John Hay, an eminent person among the Scots, received a mortal wound. At this juncture, Patrick Graham happened to arrive from abroad. An English knight challenged him. "Brother," said Graham, pleasantly, "prepare for death, and confess yourself, and then you shall sup in Paradise." And so it fell out, says Fordun. He appears not to have felt any horror at a scene, where brave men, without either national animosity, or personal cause of offence, lavished their lives in savage amusement.—Dalrymple's Annals of Scotland.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

WE have to thank five of our Readers for supplying us with copies of the ballad of 'Cumnor Hall.' One of them expresses a wish to have some remarks upon it; but upon further acquaintance it turns out to be hardly worth the compliment. The story, too, is apocryphal. It is by no means certain that Leicester killed his wife; and Mr Sharon Turner, in his 'History of England,' has given reasons for supposing, that if the Countess did die of a fall down stairs, it was probably owing to accident,—a catastrophe of the sort being by no means uncommon. We have unfortunately mislaid the paragraph we had copied from Mr Turner; but, if we remember rightly, he says, that he himself had known three instances of such a death. It is well-known, that Bruce the traveller, after all his hair-breadth escapes in distant regions, died of a fall down stairs in his own house, while showing some visitors out of it. The closing stanzas of the ballad are not without merit, and the first is so beautiful, that it makes one impatient of the mediocrity of the rest. The picture it presents has the true ballad freshness and simplicity,—the truth told in simple words. "Regent," perhaps, is not so well; but the rest is as fresh as the "summer night:"

"The dews of summer night did fall;
The moon, sweet regent of the sky,
Silver'd the walls of Cumnor Hall,
And many an oak that grew thereby."

We recollected this stanza: we had been repeating it, like a tune, for a week past, till the communications of our friends came to hand; and then were obliged to comfort ourselves for the breaking of the spell, by thinking how kind and prompt they had been in sending us so many copies within three days after the appearance of our request.

We received the amazing anagram of our friend T. T., and have not yet recovered of the perplexity into which it has thrown us as to whether our Readers would derive as amusing an astonishment from it as ourselves.

The 'History of the Streets of London,' contained in the Supplements, will have a copious index to it when concluded.

We have no recollection of seeing the Latin version mentioned by GODFREY GRAFTON. His 'Prayer' does great credit to his nature, but wants a little more vigour in some of the lines. The following passage in his letter is of a kind which particularly gratifies us:—

"I do not believe there is a man on earth, even among the worst of those whom the every-day, and particularly 'decorous world shuns as 'blackguards,' who has not in his heart of hearts some redeeming quality; and I do firmly believe that of all the publications which issue from the press throughout Great Britain, none is more calculated to cherish and draw out that kind of latent goodness than yours; and this I consider one of its greatest claims to attention; yes, even a claim superior far to its literary merit, though I am sure I shall not be accused of underrating the latter."

G. W. cannot do better than cultivate his taste for poetry, provided it be only the ornament of his leisure, and interfere with no duty of certainty. Even the greatest poets, when they begin life, have no right to reckon upon their genius alone; especially as it sometimes happens, that the greater the genius, the less likely is it to be so generally understood by its contemporaries, as to be of worldly advantage to its possessor. The great poet, therefore, must often work like other men for a subsistence, and be content (as he well may) with his enjoyment of his beautiful fancies and his prospect of fame. And the lesser must be glad that he too has a perception of the beauties of nature, wherewith to solace himself after his necessary tasks.

The corrections kindly furnished us by F. will be made in the way he mentions. They have been accidentally delayed, too late even for their appearance in the next number of the Supplement; but will certainly be found in the one following.

The 'Triumph of Cholera' is by no means destitute of merit; but it is too long for the LONDON JOURNAL.

We thank G. for his letter: but he is mistaken in identifying the occasional weakness of temperament he alludes to in the excellent individual in question, with the habit of the other. And the exclusiveness he speaks of, was as inclusive a thing as possible; and repelled (as indeed he guesses) nobody who had a hearty regard for any thing. That was the only qualification.

We have not room for the approbation given of us at such kind length by PHILOLOGUS; but it is duly valued. So also the letter of E. L.—s.

PROCLAMATION EXTRAORDINARY!

THE QUEEN-BEE DEPOSED!

NATURE, Regina.

To Our Right Trusty and Well-Beloved Samuel Bagster, Junior, Dr Edward Bevan, Captain Thomas Brown, William and Samuel Curtis, Dr John Evans, Edward Jesse, William Kirby, John Claudius Loudon, James Rennie, William Spence, N. A. Vigors, and all and singular our bee-masters, entomologists, gardeners, naturalists, poets, and others whom it may concern, GREETING:

WHEREAS, by our singular good ordination, from time immemorial, our beloved and industrious little households, called Bees, purveyors to us of honey and wax, and singers of us to sleep by the side of our flowery brooks, have been, and are, and shall continue to be, till we think fit to ordain otherwise, the issue, male and female, lawfully begotten; of one sole Mother and Matriarch, falsely called QUEEN, who ruleth, like other mothers of households, intirely in right of her motherhood, and solely because she is the parent of all and singular the males, females, drones, workers, fighters, victuallers, sentinels, and all other denominations of bee whatsoever, separate or inclusive, and not because she resembleth in any respect the human Sovereign known by the name of Queen—

AND WHEREAS the said human Sovereign could by no parity of right or reason, except in the sense yeleft metaphorical, be styled Mother or Matriarch of the innumerable separate households, composing Kingdoms or Queendoms; but on the contrary would be justly and highly scandalised at the slightest intimation purporting that she was, in like and veritable manner, the actual mother and parent of all and singular her Majesty's foot-soldiers, horse-men, vestry-men, noblemen, bishops, members of parliament, corn-factors, hosiers, dyers, boot-makers, &c. &c. to the great confusion of terms and ideas, and detriment of her crown and dignity—

AND WHEREAS, furthermore, the state or condition of Motherhood, or Matriarchship, hath its own rights, dignities, and sovereign powers, as We who are both Queen and Mother well know, and standeth in no need of honours otherwise derived—

AND WHEREAS, most especially and lastly, it is of importance to all classes and denominations of creatures, to the furtherance of truth, and the operations of right reason, and beneficence, that the terms and ideas herein above-mentioned should be kept distinct and well apprehended, each in its proper confine and limitation, to the due glory of Me its originator (for in Me art originateth), and to the comfort and security of all things—

THIS IS TO GIVE NOTICE,

That from this present Wednesday the Eleventh of March, in the year One Thousand Eight Hundred and Thirty-five, and henceforward through all time to come, in all books, poems, treatises, references, discourses, casual mention, and all and every mention whatsoever, the said Mother or Matriarch of the Bee-household, yeleft the Hive, do cease and discontinue to be styled and intitled Queen, and be denominated, and revered solely under the denomination of Mother or Matriarch as aforesaid; upon pain of our singular displeasure as the Mother of Mothers, and Queen of all Things, of the contempt of the scientific, and the indignation of the lovers of common sense.

Given at our Court of the Winds, or Flower-Trumpeters, this eleventh day of the month of March, One Thousand Eight Hundred and Thirty-five, and in the Never-to-be-calculated Year of our Reign.

SUNDAY IN LONDON.

[Second Paper.]

HARD is it, thou coming kindness, and hard thou already-existing knowledge, and kindness too, of Christian philanthropists and philosophers, not to feel a wish to take the cane out of the hands of the beadle yonder, who is tyrannizing over barrow-women and little boys, and lay it about his own hat. In the name of God, what sort of Christianity would the law have, if it is not to be Christian?—if it is not to prefer "spirit" to "letter?" There are some men, according to whose notions it would appear as if heaven itself ought to shut up shop on Sundays, and afford us no light and sunshine. We verily believe, that they think the angels go to church on that day, and put on clean wings, and that St Paul preaches a sermon.

See now—here comes a little fellow whom they would suppress, clean as a pink, far happier than a prince, a sort of little angel himself, making allowance for the pug-nose; but innocence and happiness are in his face, and before him (not to speak it profanely) is the beatific vision of the piece of hot mutton, which he is carrying home from the baker's, and devouring with his eyes. He is an honest boy, for his mother has trusted him with carrying the meat and the baked potatoes; and it is the only bit of meat which he or she, or his father, can get to eat all the week round; and his little sisters are to have some of it, for they have all been good, and helped to earn it; and so here is a whole, good, hard-working, honest family, whom the religious eaters of hot meat every day would prevent from having their bit on Sundays, because why? Because it would do the poor souls any harm? No; but because it would do their rich dictators the harm of seeing their own pragmatical will and pleasure opposed, humours, the very result perhaps of their own stuffing and indigestion.

A Sunday evening in London, with its musical and other social meetings, such as cannot take place between men in business during the rest of the week, has parties enough to render it much livelier than it appears. But the lovers—the lovers are the thing. With them we begin, and with them we conclude; for what so good to begin or to end with as love? We loved as early as we can recollect; we love now; and our death will be a loving one, let it be coloured otherwise as it may.

When we speak of lovers on a Sunday evening, we mean, of course, lovers who cannot well visit on any other day in the week; and whose meetings, therefore, are rendered as intense as they can be by the infrequency. What signify the circumstances that may have hindered them? Let them be button-making, or bread-making, or a clerkship, or servitude, or any other chance or condition of life, what care we, provided the love be genuine, and the pleasure truly felt? Burns was a ploughman, Allan Ramsay a hair-dresser, Gay at one time a mercer, Richardson a printer, Dodsley a footman. Do we suppose that the authors of 'Sir Charles Grandison,' 'Black-Eyed Susan,' and the finest love-songs in the world, did not make as cordial and exquisite lovers as the best-bred gentlemen about town, and that their mistresses and they did not worship each other with a vivacity and a passion infinite?

Our Sunday lover, then, is an apprentice or a clerk, and his mistress is a tradesman's daughter, and they meet only on Sundays and Sunday evenings, counting every minute till the time arrives, listening to every knock, trying to look calm when the other joins the family party; for they seldom see one another alone even then. But now they are at least in the same room, and happiness is with them. They see and hear each other; they see the little manoeuvres to get a nearer seat; at length they sit close together. The parents are not displeased, and let things take their course. This is, perhaps, the happiest time of courtship—when lovers feel secure of one another's affections, and only have just sufficient doubt of other security to make everything seem dependent on themselves and the result of their own will and choice. By degrees, as the family divide in their talk, they are suffered to talk exclusively together. Every word is precious; every question the most indifferent has a meaning: it is sufficient for one to say, "I like this," or "I like that," and the other thinks it a charming observation—a proof of fine sense, or feeling, or taste, or, above all, of love; for the eyes, or the quivering lips, or the panting bosom, speak with it, and the whole intercourse, whether speaking or silent, is one of intense acquiescence and delight. A gentleman comes up and gallantly addresses some smiling remark to the lady; the lover, if he is not quite sure of her mind, begins to be jealous. The gentleman moves off, and a remark at his expense prostrates the lover's soul with gratitude. The lady leaves the room to put a child to bed, or speak to a sister, or look after the supper, and darkness falls upon the place. She returns, and her footsteps, her face, her frock, her sweet countenance, is thrice blessed, and brings happiness back again. She resumes her chair, with a soft "thank ye," as he elaborately, and for no need whatsoever, puts it in its best position for being resumed; and never, he thinks, did soul, breath, and bosom, go so sweetly together as in the utterance of that simple phrase. For her part, she has, secretly, hardly any bounds to her gratitude; and it is lucky that they are both excellent good people, otherwise the very virtues of one or other of them might be their destruction. (Ah! they will think of this in after-times, and not look with severe countenances on the victims of the less honourable.) At length they sit looking over some pictures together, or a book, which they are as far from reading as if they did not see. They turn over the leaves, however, with a charming hypocrisy, and even carry their eyes along the lines; their cheeks touch—his hand meets hers by favour of the table-cloth or the handkerchief! Its pressure is returned; you might hear their hearts beat, if you could listen.

Oh! welcome, war; welcome, sorrow; welcome, folly, mistake, perverseness, disease, death, disappointment, all the ills of life, and the astonishments of man's state! Those moments, nay, the recollections of them, are worth the whole payment. Our children will love, as we have loved, and so cannot be wholly miserable. To love, even if not beloved, is to have the sweetest of faiths, and riches finless, whilst nothing can take from us but our own unworthiness. And once to have loved truly, is to know how to love everything which unlovingness has not had a hand in altering—all beauties of nature and of mind, all truth of heart, all trees, flowers, smiles, hopes, and good beliefs; all dear decays of person, fading towards a two-fold grave, all trusts in heaven, all faiths in the capabilities of loving man. Love is a perpetual proof that something good and earnest and eternal is meant us; such a bribe and foretaste of bliss being given us to keep us in the lists of time and progression; and when the world has realised what love urges it to obtain, perhaps death will cease; and all the souls which love has created, crowd back at its summons to inhabit their perfected world.

Truly, we have finished our Sunday evening with a rapt and organ-like note. Let the reader fancy he has heard an organ indeed. Its voice is not unapt for the production of such thoughts, in those who can rightly listen to its consummate majesty and warbling modulations.

[Something yet remains to be said of 'Sunday in the Suburbs'.]

"PHILOSOPHY OF HEALTH."

One of our fair Readers, not aware that we had designated special attention to this new work by Dr. Southwood Smith, has kindly forwarded it to us, with the following letter and notice; the former of which we publish in accordance with the love we bear to all genuine questions, especially in a womanly shape, and to the readiness which they evince for waiving their self-love in behalf of more general considerations. We are also willing to let the world see what a compliment she pays us, in likening our public spirit to that of the author. The book (as might be supposed from a lady's true writing about it) is unexceptionable in every conventional respect, as well as admirable in the rest.

To the Editor of the London Journal.

SIR,—I have just enjoyed the exquisite pleasure of reading the book I send to you. I am a woman, and having long and deeply felt the want of such knowledge as it imparts, and knowing how general the want is, I long to make public the out-pouring of my own mind on having at last found the means of satisfying it. I think I perceive in you a kindred spirit to that which has animated the author, and I therefore send what I have written to you. I wish that you should make whatever use you please of it, and even if you can make none at all, I think you will, perhaps, thank me for calling your attention to the work, if it should have escaped your notice.

I am, Sir, with many thanks for the pleasure I so often receive in reading the LONDON JOURNAL,

Respectfully yours,
S. Y.

Philosophy is the science of principles, and principles are, or ought to be, the basis of institutions; and the guide of reform whenever institutions become inadequate or corrupt. A mind accustomed to the investigation of principles, and to the application of them to practical purposes, is sometimes painfully impressed by the narrowness and inadequacy of proposed measures of reform, in which their advocates seem disposed, finally and contentedly, to rest; and still more painfully affected by the opposite and jarring opinions, that prevail, for example, on education; on various political and social institutions; on the condition of woman; nay, even on the very object and end of the entire apparatus of society. These opposite and jarring opinions have their origin in the gross ignorance that prevails of that human nature, which all this apparatus is constructed for the purpose of influencing. The great majority of men know absolutely nothing, even of the frame-work of their bodies; could ignorance be more than ignorant, one might say they are in a state of still greater darkness relative to the operations of their minds; while, as to women, there is scarcely one who would not think there is a degree of impropriety in their so much as thinking of such subjects; and yet many of these persons are really anxious for their own improvement, and sincerely desirous to promote the welfare of their fellow-beings.

In this state of things, in this condition of darkness on the one hand, and of opposite and conflicting opinion on the other, the work before us seems to come like the "still small voice" that followed the whirlwind and the storm, when the prophet was seeking for God. It calls us back to Nature, and tells us about Humanity. It is truly an exposition. It presents no theories; it advances no doctrines; it opens to us facts; it details phenomena, and invites us to come and see, and seeing, to use our understandings and form our conclusions. It is true philosophy. If completed, as it is begun (for there is but one volume yet published), it must be an extensive work; but, when completed, the date of its publication will form an epoch in human existence. Sooner or later it must influence human minds, and its author must rank among the foremost of the benefactors of humanity.

The scope of the work is well expressed in the title—"The Philosophy of Health; or an Exposition of the Physical and Mental Constitution of Man, with a view to the promotion of Human Longevity and Happiness;" and the connexion and order of its subjects is thus stated in the introduction:—"The object of the present work is to give a brief and plain account of the structure and functions of the body chiefly with reference to health and disease. This is intended to be introductory to an account of the constitution of the mind, chiefly with reference to the development and direction of its powers. There is a natural connexion between these subjects, and an advantage in studying them in their natural order. Structure must be known before function can be understood; hence the science of physiology is based on that of anatomy. The mind is dependent on the body; hence an acquaintance with the physiology of the body should precede the study of the physiology of the mind. The constitution of the mind must be understood before its powers and affections can be properly developed and directed; hence a knowledge of the physiology of the mind is essential to a sound view of education and morals."

How much such a work is needed, they best know, whose knowledge of human nature is most profound; but to write it required a rare union of qualities—the anatomist, the physiologist, the physician, the intellectual and the moral philosopher combined. Of Dr Southwood Smith's qualification for the great task he has undertaken, a judgment may be formed from that part of it which he has accomplished. The volume before us is evidently the result of long and careful investigation. The arrangement of the matter is such, that subject after subject is introduced gradually and naturally, though extremely condensed; the descriptive part is full and complete; the style is remarkable for clearness and simplicity; it seems as if no useless word had been permitted to remain; yet the beauty and variety of the ideas conveyed by it give it the character of the highest kind of eloquence. Considered as a popular work, it will be found perfectly intelligible to all who study it; and from it the child might be instructed how it is made. "In the expository portion of the work," Dr Smith continues in the introduction, "I have not been anxious to obtain from the employment of technical terms, when a decidedly useful purpose was to be obtained by the introduction of them; but I have been very careful to use no such term without assigning the exact meaning of it. A technical term unexplained is a dark spot on the field of knowledge; explained, it is a clear and steady light." This is the true way to deal with technical terms.

It is extremely difficult to make extracts from a work like this. The volume contains a general view of life, as existing in the vegetable and in the animal; the distinctive characters of the vegetable or organic, and the animal or sentient life, and the combination of the two lives in the animal; the definition of structure and function; the progress of structure and its increasing complexity, as the scale ascends from the vegetable to the animal, and from the lowest animal up to man; with a beautifully philosophical view of the cause of this increasing complexity, which is given "not arbitrarily, but from absolute necessity," and because "the number, the superiority, the relation, the range, and the energy of the functions performed by the higher being, require it. An account of the progressive advancement of life and of death follows. These subjects occupy the two first chapters. The third is devoted to an exposition of the conclusions deducible from the facts which have been detailed; they are important, grand, and cheering. That the end of organisation and of life is the promotion of happiness; that pleasure is the direct, the ordinary, and the gratuitous result of the action of all the organs, and that the higher the organised structure the greater is the enjoyment to which it is subservient; that pleasure flows from the exercise of every faculty, and the higher the faculty the greater the pleasure. That pain, though occasionally the result, is always the accidental, never the ordinary result, and that it is self-destructive, while the tendency of pleasure is to its own increase and perpetuity. The fourth chapter illustrates the bearing of these facts on the duration of human life, and shows both from physiology and from statistics that its term is capable of being lengthened; that it has already been lengthened considerably; that longevity is a good, since it is only the best portion of human life which can be lengthened, namely, the period of maturity, all the others, infancy, childhood, adolescence, decay, being fixed within narrow limits, while that of maturity varies greatly at present, according to different circumstances, and there is no reason why, at any fixed period, it should end.

The remaining three chapters give a general view of the structure of the entire body, and a particular description of one of its functions—the circulation. This part of the work is written with great care and precision, and by the aid of a large number of diagrams the subjects are made so clear that no one who studies them with attention can fail to understand them, nor, understanding, to be deeply impressed by the detail of mechanism so exquisite, of contrivances so wonderful, of means adapted to ends in a mode far surpassing human skill, of a mysterious power at work which human skill cannot approach—the principle of life generating power instead of merely collecting it; and carrying on operations of which the results only can be appreciated, the mode in which they are accomplished being beyond the power of human intelligence to perceive. From this part of the work it is impossible to make extracts; it is a treatise complete in itself, which requires to be read in connexion and with care. It is from the third chapter, in which the conclusions to be deduced from the general view of human existence are laid down, that they can best be taken, and even from them, no adequate idea can be formed of the work. Portions read separately may seem like theory; read in connexion they come with the force of demonstration; but the attempt must be made.

We have been taught, step by step, that the vegetable or organic life builds up, and exists for the purpose of building up the animal life. "What then is the object of the animal life?" This object, whatever it be, must be the ultimate end of organisation, and of all the actions of which it is the seat and the instrument.

"Two functions, sensation and voluntary motion, are combined in the animal life. Of these two functions, the latter is subservient to the former: voluntary motion is the servant of sensation, and exists only to obey its commands.

"Is sensation, then, the ultimate object of organization? Simple sensation cannot be an ultimate object, because it is invariably attended with an ultimate result; for sensation is either pleasurable or painful. Every sensation terminates in a pleasure or a pain. Pleasure or pain, the last event in the series, must then be the final end.

"Is the production of pain the ultimate object of organization? That cannot be, for the production of pain is the indirect, not the direct,—the extraordinary, not the ordinary, result of the actions of life. It follows that pleasure must be the ultimate object, for there is no other of which it is possible to conceive. The end of organic existence is animal existence; the end of animal existence is sentient existence; the end of sentient existence is pleasurable existence; the end of life, therefore, is enjoyment. Life commences with the organic processes; to the organic are superadded the animal; the animal processes terminate in sensation; sensation ends in enjoyment: it follows that enjoyment is the final end. Now this every organ is constructed; to this every action of every organ is subservient; in this every action ultimately terminates."—P. 78.

The proof is made out from every one of the faculties, beginning with the lowest, the first springs of organisation and of life, and going on to the moral faculty, the crown and the glory of man. It is difficult to know where to choose; the exposition of each is so beautiful; but omitting the pleasures to be derived from the use of the senses, the pleasure of the eye in seeing, the ear in hearing, the pleasure arising from the use of the intellectual faculties, and the still higher pleasures arising from the use of the moral faculties, we shall extract, as being less obvious than likely to occur to minds in general, the passage illustrative of the mode in which pleasure is attached to the exercise of the organic organs; that which shows the heightening of the pleasures of sense by the addition of the intellectual faculties; and that which relates to the harmonious junction of the selfish and sympathetic parts of man's nature.

A little explanation is necessary before extracting the passages illustrative of the modes in which pleasure is attached to the action of the organic organs. The action of these organs is unattended with consciousness; we do not know, for example, when the blood is propelled onwards by the heart, or when it flows through the vessels to supply the body. A distinct set of nerves, called the sympathetic, which are destitute of sensation, preside over their action; but, by a special provision, each sentient nerve, before going to supply the animal organs to which it is destined, sends off two branches which mingle with the sympathetic nerves. "What is the result? That organic organs are rendered sentient; that organic processes, in their own nature insensible, become capable of affecting consciousness. What follows? What is the consciousness excited? Not a consciousness of the organic process. Of that we still remain wholly insensible. Not simple sensation. The result uniformly produced, as long as the state of the system is that of health, is pleasurable consciousness. The heart sends out to the organs its vital current. Each organ abstracting from the stream the particles it needs, converts them into the peculiar fluid or solid it is its office to form. The stomach, from the arterial streamlets circulating through it, secretes gastric juice; the liver, from the venous streamlets circulating through it, secretes bile. When these digestive organs have duly prepared their respective fluids, they employ them in the elaboration of the aliment. We are not conscious of this elaboration, though it goes on within us every moment; but is consciousness not affected by the process? Most materially. Why? Because sentient mingle with organic nerves; because the sentient nerves are impressed by the actions of the organic organs. And how impressed? As long as the actions of the organic organs are sound, that is, as long as their processes are duly performed, the impression communicated to the sentient nerves is in its nature agreeable; is, in fact, the pleasurable consciousness which constitutes the feeling of health. The state of health is nothing but the result of the due performance of the organic organs: it follows, that the feeling of health, the feeling which is ranked by everyone among the most pleasurable of existence, is the result of the action of organs of whose direct operations we are unconscious. But the pleasurable consciousness thus indirectly excited, is really the consequence of a special provision, established for the express purpose of producing pleasure. Processes, in their own nature insensible, are rendered sentient expressly for this purpose, that, over and above the special object they serve, they may afford enjoyment. In this case, the production of pleasure is not only altogether gratuitous, not only communicated for its own sake, not only rested in as an ultimate object, but it is made to commence at the very confines of life; it is interwoven with the thread of existence; it is secured in and by the actions that build up and that support the very framework, the material instrument of our being."

"But if the communication of sensibility to processes in their own nature incapable of exciting feeling, for the purpose of converting them into sources of pleasurable consciousness, indicate an express provision for the production of enjoyment, that provision is no less exemplified in the point at which this super-added sensibility is made to cease.

"Some of the consequences of a direct communication of consciousness to an organic process have been already adverted to. Had the eye, besides transmitting rays of light to the optic nerve, been rendered sensible of the insensate passage of each ray through its substance, the impressions excited by luminous bodies, which is indispensable to vision, the ultimate object of the instrument, if not wholly lost, must necessarily have become obscure, in direct proportion to the acuteness of this sensibility. The hand of the musician could scarcely have created its varied and rapid movements upon his instrument, had his mind been occupied at one and the same instant with the process of muscular contraction in the finger, and the idea of music in the brain. Had the communication of such a two-fold consciousness been possible, in no respect would it have been beneficial, in many it would have been highly pernicious; and the least of evils resulting from it would have been, that the inferior would have interrupted the superior faculty, and the means deteriorated the end. But in some cases the evil would have been of a much more serious nature. Had we been rendered sensible of the flow of the vital current through the engine that propels it; aware the distensions of the delicate valves that direct the current ever present to our view; by some inward feeling were we reminded, minute by minute, of the progress of the aliment through the digestive apparatus; and were the mysterious operations of the organic nerves palpable to sight, the terror of the maniac, who conceived that his body was composed of unannealed glass, would be the ordinary feeling of life. Every movement would be a matter of anxious deliberation; and the approach of every body to our own would fill us with dismay. But adjusted as our consciousness actually is, invariably the point at which the organic process begins, is that at which sensation ends. Had sensation been extended beyond this point it would have been productive of pain: at this point it uniformly stops. Nevertheless, by the indirect connexion of sensation with the organic processes, a vast amount of pleasure might be created: a special apparatus is constructed for the express purpose of establishing the communication. There is thus the two-fold proof, the positive and the negative, the evidence arising as well from what they do as from what they abstain from doing, that the organic processes are, and are intended to be, sources of enjoyment."—P. 88.

THE WEEK.

BIRTH-DAYS.

TASSO—BARKLEY.

March 11, 1544. At Sorrento, in the Bay of Naples, of a noble family, Torquato Tasso, author of Jerusalem Delivered. A grave, majestic, and true, but inferior however to Ariosto, and far inferior to Dante, because he too often wrote like a poet of books, instead of drawing upon his own primitive feelings; and indulged in pretty turns of words, even in his epic poem. He was a man of a noble but somewhat morbid nature, too sensitive to the dignity of his vocation; which ultimately embroiled him with the court he served, and, in conjunction with unworthy treatment, disturbed his wits. Tasso has been abundantly made use of by Spenser and Milton. The life of him by Dr Black of Edinburgh deserves a place in all poetical libraries. He was of a striking presence, tall and well made, with a large head, deep blue eyes, piercing in their regard, and had a clear, solemn voice, and a deliberate utterance.

— 12, 1684. In the neighbourhood of Kilkenny, in Ireland, son of an English gentleman, who was collector of Belfast, — George Berkeley, Bishop of Cloyne, an illustrious metaphysician and philanthropist, who put the world upon examining that extraordinary Platonic puzzle of the non-existence of matter; substance, he said, being nothing but an idea existing in the mind, and upheld thereby by the constant exercise of the will of God; — a very pious and sublime proposition, and susceptible of disproof by the human faculties; though, on the other hand, the amount of those faculties appears to render all final conclusions on such subjects impossible. One of his most ingenious and perplexing arguments, next to that of inducing every sensation to a perception of the infinite, without which certainly its existence would be the same as non-existence, was, that Nature never took two means of doing anything when she could do it by one; and that, therefore, it would therefore be superfluous in her to create both the perception and the thing perceived. The perception, he said, was the thing perceived. And, if you asked him how things always remained in the places in which you left them, or were raised and found elsewhere by others, &c. &c., the truest reply was really, that the Divine Being so willed it; an argument which has more in it than appears at first sight; because, reason about the question as we may, the first counter-mystery, remains a mystery as ever, and God might evidently will it to be what Berkeley says, as well as something more accordant with ordinary opinion. On the other hand, it would seem, that God might consent, with the ordinary opinion to bewitch it in and with the most unaffected reverence for Berkeley (who was one of his divines' earthly patrons, and had a right to "sweeten" in his notions), was one of the class of thinkers (if we may lay claim to the appellation at all) who take the common sense of these matters for proofs of them; and believe in the distinction between matter and spirit, as God has impressed it in the common mind. Berkeley was one of the most amiable and disinterested of men, giving up time, money, and favour for the good of his fellow-creatures, and taking an early part in that diffusion of knowledge, which the junction of Christianity with modern philosophy has at length made characteristic of civilisation. Those of his eminent friends, the wits and philosophers of the day (for he was beloved by all parties) who ventured to banter his metaphysics, reviled him all the while, and almost adored him. Pope said, he had "every virtue under heaven;" and Arbuthnot declared, that till he had seen Berkeley, "he did not think so much understanding, so much knowledge, so much endurance, and so much humility, had been the portion of any but angels." When he began life, he wrote in the Guardian, and is said to have had "a guinea and a dinner" from Steele for every paper he contributed; a vulgar mistake, surely, meaning that whenever his young friend thought his paper, he was asked to stay dinner as a matter of course, or of reciprocal pleasure; for Steele was not the man to mete out his payments in that fashion. "Besides giving up other emoluments, Berkeley had such a dislike of non-residence, that, when he wished to retire into a life of scholarship, he petitioned to be allowed to give up his bishoprick, valued at 1,400*l*. a-year; a request which so astonished and delighted George the Second, that he declared he should "die a bishop in spite of himself."—This great and good man was handsome, "with a countenance full of meaning and kindness," and of a temperament between sanguine and melancholy, strong in muscle, but what we should call delicate in the nerves. He had a happy death, expiring suddenly at the tea-table without a groan, while reclining on a sofa.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

LII.—THE MURDERER WHO WAS NO MURDERER.

[The closing paragraph of this story (which is quoted from the 'Theory of Presumptive Proof,' in 'Cecil's Sixty Curious Narratives'), winds it up with a singular increase of dramatic interest,—if we may use terms of the stage in speaking of such frightful realities. It reminds us, though dissimilar in other respects, of an account we have read somewhere of a lady who dreamt that her maid-servant was coming into her room to kill her, and who, rising in her bed in the agitation of waking, beheld the woman actually entering the door for that purpose. Imagine the appalled situation of both parties!]

JONATHAN BRADFORD kept an inn in Oxfordshire, on the London road to Oxford, in the year 1736. He bore an unexceptionable character. Mr Hayes, a gentleman of fortune, being on his way to Oxford, on a visit to a relation, put up at Bradford's; he there joined company with two gentlemen, with whom he supped, and, in conversation, unguardedly mentioned that he had then about him a large sum of money. In due time they retired to their respective chambers,—the gentlemen to a two-bedded room, leaving, as is customary with many, a candle burning in the chimney corner. Some hours after they were in bed, one of the gentlemen, being awake, thought he heard a deep groan in the adjoining chamber, and this being repeated, he softly awaked his friend. They listened together, and the groans increasing as of one dying, they both instantly arose, and proceeded silently to the door of the next chamber, from whence they heard the groans; and, the door being ajar, saw a light in the room; they entered, but it is impossible to paint their consternation, on perceiving a person weltering in his blood in the bed, and a man standing over him, with a dark lantern in one hand and a knife in the other. The man seemed as petrified as themselves, but his terror carried with it all the terror of guilt! The gentlemen soon discovered the person was a stranger with whom they had that night supped, and that the man who was standing over him was their host. They seized Bradford directly, disarmed him of his knife, and charged him with being the murderer: he assumed by this time the air of innocence, positively denied the crime, and asserted that he came there with the same humane intentions as themselves; for that, hearing a noise, which was succeeded by a groaning, he got out of bed, struck a light, armed himself with a knife for his defence, and was but that minute entered the room before them.

These assertions were of little avail; he was kept in close custody till the morning, and then taken before a neighbouring justice of the peace. Bradford still denied the murder, but, nevertheless, with such an apparent indication of guilt, that the justice hesitated not to make use of this extraordinary expression, on writing out his mittimus, "Mr Bradford, either you or myself committed this murder."

This extraordinary affair was the conversation of the whole county. Bradford was tried and condemned over and over again, in every company. In the midst of all this predetermination came on the assizes at Oxford; Bradford was brought to trial, he pleaded not guilty. Nothing could be more strong than the evidence of the two gentlemen; they testified to the finding Mr Hayes murdered in his bed; Bradford at the side of the body with a light and a knife; that knife, and the hand which held it, bloody; that, on their entering the room, he betrayed all the signs of a guilty man, and that, a few moments preceding, they had heard the groans of the deceased.

Bradford's defence on his trial was the same as before the gentlemen: he had heard a noise; he suspected some villany transacting; he struck a light; he snatched a knife (the only weapon near him) to defend himself; and the terrors he discovered were merely the terrors of humanity, the natural effects of innocence as well as guilt, on beholding such a horrible scene.

This defence, however, could be considered but as weak, contrasted with several powerful circumstances against him. Never was circumstantial evidence more strong. There was little need left of comment, from the judge in summing up the evidence. No room appeared for extenuation! And the jury brought in the prisoner guilty, even without going out of the box. Bradford was executed shortly after, still declaring he was not the murderer, nor privy to the murder of Mr Hayes; but he died disbelieved by all.

Yet were those assertions not untrue! The murder was actually committed by Mr Hayes's footman; who, immediately on stabbing his master, rifled his breeches of his money, gold watch, and snuff-box, and escaped to his own room; which could have been, from the very circumstances, scarcely two seconds before Bradford's entering the unfortunate gentleman's chamber. The world owes this knowledge to a remorse of conscience in the footman (eighteen months after the execution of Bradford) on a bed of sickness; it was a death-bed repentance, and by that death the law lost its victim.

It is much to be wished that this account could close here; but it cannot. Bradford, though innocent, and not privy to the murder, was, nevertheless, the murderer in design. He had heard, as well as the footman, what Mr Hayes had declared at supper, as to his having a large sum of money about him, and he went to the chamber with the same diabolical intentions as the servant. He was struck with amazement!—he could not believe his senses!—and in turning back the bed-clothes, to assure himself of the fact, he, in his agitation, dropped his knife on the bleeding body, by which both his hand and the knife became bloody. These circumstances Bradford acknowledged to the clergyman who attended him after his sentence.

A FEW THOUGHTS ON LANGUAGE.

BY ROBERTON WEBER.

"Nos probabilis multa habemus, quæ sequi facile, affirmare vix possumus."—Cic. (Acad. Lib. ii. Edit. prim.)

THE string that inclines the kite to the wind, limits its ascent; the water that floats the ship, surrounds it with a resisting power. Language is at once our liberator and our enslaver; our liberator from brute ignorance, our enslaver in the chains of conventionalism. It presents us with the only continuous medium of communication, yet invests it with such circumstances of form and manner as shackle the operations of the mind, and leave the subtleties of thought to be delivered in imperfect hints and half-disclosures. None of our faculties are illimitable, but many of our faculties have very different degrees of extension, and there can be no question that while the imagination ranges over a kingdom only bounded by the circle of experience, speech is confined to a much narrower province.

It is difficult to imagine a system of language of greater scope and capacity than that which prevails in the world at this day; it is also difficult to conceive that any possible innovations or refinements that might be engrafted on that system, such as it is, could materially extend its compass; in reasoning, therefore, on this subject, we may fairly take it for granted, that what with the living tongues, and the dead tongues, and "all the tongues that Babel cleft this world into," mankind has already witnessed the full development of the powers of language. But who will be so rash as to say that the mind of man has run its course? In a savage state, when the thoughts of men are limited to the mere objects of their appetite; or in a state of first society, where the mind, though of another growth, is still conversant with none but objects of familiar contemplation, the resources of language are abundantly sufficient for all the purposes of communication; but in a highly civilized age, when bodily labour has ceased to be the inheritance of all, and many are thrown on meditation as their portion—when men begin to examine themselves more curiously, and to regard with attention the wondrous operations of their minds,—then begins the perplexity of language: then involutions, perversions, forced applications, contradictions, anomalies, thicken fast, and confess the original weakness that engenders them. Language is a garment that the mind outgrows; in the infancy of the human intellect, it covers and nurtures it, and gives it warmth, but, in the end, becomes a close and binding shroud that puts a mortal weight on all our aspirations, and from which we endeavour in vain to deliver ourselves. Is this too much to say—shades of Aristotle, Plato, Hartley, Locke? In your state of heavenly knowledge, declare—what evil hand withheld you from the perfect sight of the truth for which you toiled? Why did you do so much, yet do no more? Is it not that phraseology enveloped you like a fog, confounded your operations, and obscured your view? Does not the road to truth lie straight before us; while the labyrinth of words winds round and round, for ever returning to the same point, so that we make much ado but no way, and either become blinded and overwhelmed amidst an "inevitable error," or, at the best, escape to no better credit than to have ended where we begun? I do not, however, forget that there are other imperfections in our condition, other and more formidable obstructions besetting the paths of philosophical inquiry; nor indeed can I think it doubtful, that there exists in morals, as in physics, a gravitating principle, which must continue to all eternity to bring down, on the head of the projector, the Sisyphus stone of metaphysical speculation. But how much of this discomfiture, we may ask, rests with language? "These words," says Horne Tooke of his particples and adjectives in disguise, "these words, not understood as such, have caused a metaphysical jargon, and a false morality;" and so far he was unquestionably in the right; but he adds—"which can only be dissipated by etymology;" and here I confess I think him wrong—if, at least, he means that etymology is in itself a sufficient antidote against false morals, and that truth and virtue need only to be sought in the roots of words. Etymology, indeed, might ferret Sophistry out of some of her old holes, but she would only take refuge in new quarters where he could not reach her: though Horne Tooke reduces her allowance to a noun and a verb, she can extract from these quite enough of the spirit of falsehood to maintain herself in a flourishing condition. I think with Horne Tooke that an abuse of language is an abuse of reason, but I also think (a position on which I propose to argue hereafter) that language is—even in its healthiest and soundest state, and under every conceivable advantage, whether of ability in the writer or capability in the reader—an instrument naturally defective and full of flaws. At present, I only propose to consider some of the most obvious of these, and to show that if our ideas are liable to error, the vehicle of those ideas is still more commonly at fault. A man more frequently outrages the truth in speech than in thought; he more frequently talks than thinks wrongly. To be convinced of this, we have only to fasten on any ordinary remark that may be elicited in conversation, and compare the thing expressed with the thing intended; in nine cases out of ten it will be found that the latter is just, while the former is absurd. I do not here allude to certain conventional hyperboles and familiar idioms well understood, respecting which it might very properly be answered that particular instances of perversion can afford no ground for a general argument. But I refer to the character of our ordinary expressions, even when we seek to convey some obvious meaning in the clearest manner;—habit blinds us to half the absurdities we utter. Were I to indulge myself in copious illustrations, I should exhaust the Reader's patience before I exhausted my list of examples; a few, however, will be sufficient, and will lead to the apprehension of others.

What shall we say to a "dry humour"—"a false verdict"—"a forgery of gold"—"an infamous notoriety"—"accustomed insolence"—"a sedentary course"—"a weekly journal"—"critical judgment"—"necessity of giving way,"—or to such expressions as "to lay down the law"—"an occasion arose" (and in the Latin, if I mistake not, "orta est occasio,")—"it rose up accidentally"—"he raised an impression"—"the subject was not submitted"—"his pains were the cause of his indolence,"—or such tautologies as "a substantial understanding"—"a falling ruin"—"a common vulgarity"—"a despotic master"—"a hospitable host"—"a habit that he had"—"vivere vitam"—"dare donum," &c.

Some of these, it is true, are such as a fastidious writer would not employ; but others are sanctioned by the example of all authors, and form part of the current coin of language. Here, then, is a choice dish of mixed metaphors, obscure figures, and palpable nonsense! And from this confusion—what page of what book is free? what five minutes of what conversation? If contradictions and anomalies of this kind were merely the result of a slovenly style of speech—an effect for which not language itself, but only the guardians of language had to answer, then the question might take another shape; but the truth seems to be, that the innumerable corruptions with which language is overlaid are no fortuitous blemishes induced by peculiar causes, but natural imposthumes on the surface of a body originally weak—a sort of cutaneous disorder—hereditary and incurable. So much so, that if we could conceive a people intirely composed of scholars and linguists going and settling themselves in some distant island, and carrying along with them a perfect pattern of a language which it was their sole care to preserve from contamination and decay, we might nevertheless safely predict that before many centuries had passed over the heads of this conservative colony, their treasure would no more resemble its original self, than the whiteness of the unsullied snow on the peak of Mont Blanc resembles the colour of a Cheapside thaw.—Nations may rise, and fall, and rise again; the character of a people may degenerate, and regenerate; we pass from liberty to licentiousness, from licentiousness to weakness, from weakness to slavery, from slavery to want, from want to rebellion, and so back again to liberty. But when language has once lost its primitive simplicity, which is pretty soon, it never recovers itself, it has no principle of resiliency in it as man has, and it continues to the end of the chapter to go along on a sort of hobby-horse of shifts and expedients.†

That a certain limited number of primitive words should beget the whole vocabulary, is all very well; no one will question their undoubted right to any extent of family they may choose to have. As all

* That is to say a dry moisture—a false truth—an iron-working of gold—an infamous famousness—accustomed unaccustomedness—a sitting run—a weekly daily—judging judgment—unyieldingness of yielding (if I am right in deriving necessitas from ne negative and cedo or cesso)—to lay down the laid-down—a falling arose—it rose up falling—ly—he raised a pressing-in (and a pressing in is a pressing down)—that which was thrown under was not sent under—his pains were the cause of his absence from pain—an understanding understanding—a falling falling—a common commonness, &c.

† What Horace says of words—that like the leaves of the trees they fall, but presently "flourish again with a new birth," is very true, but does not disprove what I have said; all he means by the simile is, that certain words go out of fashion, and by and by come in again; but this is no "new birth" for language—no return to first principles.

our ideas turn—with more or less consciousness on our part—on some few general sensations, so it is natural that words, the interpreters of those ideas, should in like manner spring from a few simple roots. But that these should gradually bid adieu to all the family ties—cut their relations—and enter into foreign service, running a race to the utter confusion of common sense, and the infinite botheration of their patient historians the philologists, does seem a little hard.

Let us consider for a moment that class of words which Horne Tooke says "compose the bulk of every language," and let us enjoy their perplexity a little. "Those," he says, "which are derived from the Latin, French, and Italian, are easily recognised;" but he does not say that they are as easily reconciled to propriety. His business lay with the Saxon part of English, and he did not concern himself with these anomalous features to which I am adverting. Had he done so, he would no doubt, in his usual perspicuous manner, have rendered an account of them as nearly approaching to satisfaction as it is possible; nevertheless he could not have proved that obscurity was not a grievous evil, merely because he was able to grope his way through it. But, first of all, here are a few of the patriarchs; prithee, Reader, treat them with respect, they are all venerable old gentlemen, and nowise responsible for the vagaries of their offspring.

Agro—capió—cado—cedo—duco—do—eo—γινωσκω—jacio—loquor—levo—λεγω—mitto—hendo—premo—sum—sequor—solvo—sentio—sto—tego—teneo—voco—video—φίρω.

Of the innumerable derivative words flowing from these sources, the greatest portion are compounds, formed by the addition of various prepositions, which generally do import, and always ought to import, some qualification of meaning. But these derivatives not only supply qualifications of the original meaning, but furnish a multitude of figurative expressions for the service of the imagination and the reason. Now these figurative expressions generally do consort, and always ought to consort, with the association of ideas;—wherin lies the metaphysical part of language. If these two points of conformity had always been duly adhered to, so as to preserve unity and consistency throughout, which is impossible, language at this day would have been a comparatively simple machine, and have ailed nowhere, save only in those fundamental respects—which I propose to notice hereafter. But will anyone affirm that such is the case? Is the composition of words, whether in the languages of modern times, or in those from which they proceed, always such as the understanding most readily embraces? Assuredly not. Take the word mitto to send (though I think it more frequently should be rendered to put especially in composition—a sense which the French seem to have preserved in their verb mettre). Because mitto has this signification, it is easy to recognise the propriety of such a word as e-mit, to send out (e from or out) applied to a matter of fact, or the word dis-miss, as figuratively used when we say "he dismissed the subject from his mind," i. e. he sent the subject away from his mind. But what are we to make of ad-mit? which, if we translate it literally, to send to, does not seem very well to justify our present employment of it. If you and your family have been standing for an hour at the door of the pit in Drury lane till you are half crushed, I fancy when it is at length opened you are not at that moment intent upon being sent to any place, but simply desire to be let in. To admit, therefore, instead of being used in the sense of "to suffer to enter," Johnson's definition, would be a much better word to mean "to send a man about his business"—in short "not to suffer to enter." Yet the Latin admitto hardly exhibits more traces of its radical meaning than does its English relative. It is possible, I know, to give some account of this, but no apology can reconcile us to such prevaricating words—such conundrums. In the same way it may no doubt be explained by what process of torture πισχυομαι comes to mean I promise, or how promitto arrives at the same destination, or πιττεινω I permit, or how some words (and these not a few) should mean in one language precisely the reverse of what they mean in another; why for example, elevated with us should mean raised up, while elevatus in the Latin means debased, why resolute should mean firm or determined while resolutus means relaxed—and by consequence feeble and undetermined.* All this may be explained—but so may the Chinese puzzles or the Egyptian hieroglyphics. We don't want language for a plaything to provoke our ingenuity, but for a steady and faithful friend to assist us in many a grave inquiry after truth. It is no satisfaction to know how words have been misappropriated, if misappropriated they are. If a man loses his hat and wig in a crowd, it is no consolation to him to be told that a thief picked them up and ran away with them. Nor does the original propriety of a word afford any redress for the absurdity of a subsequent application. John Long, in all probability, is a very short man; what does it make in favour of John Long, that some remote progenitor had inches to justify his cognomen? Again, if the connection of certain verbs with certain prepositions to imply a certain sense, were a matter of unquestionable fitness in one language, we should suppose that the analogy would hold good as regards any other; it would be equally true of all, if true of one. But if this were the case we should find all parallel words in corresponding situations. Προσισημι and προστο, προσισημι and προσuum, consto and withstand, supervenio and overcome, ὑποστρεφω and subverto, ἐπικαθήμεαι and supersede, ὑποστασις substantia and understanding—would only be various in sound, but would agree in expressing the same thing; whereas these words, we know, take all manner of different forms. We should not find suspicio, as well as its counterpart ὑφοραω, signifying indifferently to mistrust, or to honour; we should not be able, with impunity, to exchange withdraw for retract—overturn for subvert (under-turn)—overthrow for subject (under-throw)—supposition and hypothesis (a putting under) for surmise (a putting over), &c. &c.

What does all this prove?—original error—subsequent perversion? Neither. But it proves this; that the image or figure that has reconciled such words to the understanding in any case, is so slight, so flimsy, so precarious, so easily exchangeable for any other image or figure, that no method or analogy can be maintained. It proves that the association of our ideas is of a nature for ever to forbid uniformity or universality in any system of language; that it is as impossible for there to be one diction in the world, as for there to be one mind, that each individual language is, and must remain, full of inconsistencies and incoherencies, whilst between one language and another there can be no more assimilation than between the manners, dispositions, and opinions of the people who use them.†

* The in intensive, and the in privative, and the in redundant, of the Latin, are productive of many inconveniences in that language, which we have partly copied. Thus infractus either means very much broken, or not at all broken. Habitable and inhabitable with us mean the same thing; but the Latin habitabilis answers to our inhabitable, while in-habitabilis answers to our un-inhabitable. Inquisitus means either investigated, or not investigated; infractus either bridled, or unbridled. The same ambiguity belongs to the Greek ἔπι; λυπη means grief, ἐπιλυπη with great grief; μειδω means to laugh, but ἐπιμειδω means to laugh slightly;—but this diminutive sense seems to be very rare. To improve is now used to mean—more than to prove—to make better, but in old English we find it used negatively—not to prove or approve—to disapprove. Valuable and invaluable, estimable and inestimable, appreciable and inappreciable, one and the other are used to affirm value, but though in the latter words the in has the effect of an intensive, it is not here through affirmation, but through negation; we mean by valuable that which can be valued, because it has value; by invaluable we mean that which can not be valued, because its value is beyond calculation.

† Peculiarities, by the way, on which the phraseology of every country greatly depends. Gibbon, in a note on the 'Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire,' suggests the idea of a work which would indeed be a valuable acquisition to our national literature; the object of which should be, to trace the character of different nations from their language—a scientific process. Horne Tooke was philologist enough but not philosopher enough for the task. Locke was philosopher, but not philologist enough. Yet Locke would

CHARACTERS OF SHAKESPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

NO. IX.—OTHELLO.

It has been said that tragedy purifies the affections by terror and pity. That is, it substitutes imaginary sympathy for mere selfishness. It gives us a high and permanent interest, beyond ourselves, in humanity as such. It raises the great, the remote, and the possible to an equality with the real, the little and the near. It makes man a partaker with his kind. It subdues and softens the stubbornness of his will. It teaches him that there are and have been others like himself, by showing him, as in a glass what they have felt, thought, and done. It opens the chambers of the human heart. It leaves nothing indifferent to us that can affect our common nature. It excites our sensibility by exhibiting the passions wound up to the utmost pitch by the power of imagination or the temptation of circumstances; and corrects their fatal excesses in ourselves by pointing to the greater extent of sufferings and of crimes to which they have led others. Tragedy creates a balance of the affections. It makes us thoughtful spectators in the lists of life. It is the refiner of the species; a discipline of humanity. The habitual study of poetry and works of imagination is one chief part of a well-grounded education. A taste for liberal art is necessary to complete the character of a gentleman. Science alone is hard and mechanical. It exercises the understanding upon things out of themselves, while it leaves the affections unemployed, or engrossed with our own immediate narrow interests.—'Othello' furnishes an illustration of these remarks. It excites our sympathy in an extraordinary degree. The moral it conveys has a closer application to the concerns of human life than that of any other of Shakspeare's plays. "It comes directly home to the bosoms and business of men." The pathos in 'Lear' is indeed more dreadful and overpowering; but it is less natural, and less of every day's occurrence. We have not the same degree of sympathy with the passions described in 'Macbeth.' The interest in 'Hamlet' is more remote and reflex. That of 'Othello' is at once equally profound and affecting.

The picturesque contrasts of character in this play are almost as remarkable as the depth of the passion. The Moor Othello, the gentle Desdemona, the villain Iago, the good-natured Cassio, the fool Roderigo, present a range and variety of character as striking and palpable as that produced by the opposition of costume in a picture. Their distinguishing qualities stand out to the mind's eye, so that even when we are not thinking of their actions or sentiments, the idea of their persons is still as present to us as ever. These characters and the images they stamp upon the mind are the farthest asunder possible; the distance between them is immense: yet the compass of knowledge and invention which the poet has shown in embodying these extreme creations of his genius is only greater than the truth and felicity with which he has identified each character with itself, or blended their different qualities together in the same story. What a contrast the character of Othello forms to that of Iago: at the same time, the force of conception with which these two figures are opposed to each other is rendered still more intense by the complete consistency with which the traits of each character are brought out in a state of the highest finishing. The making one black and the other white, the one unprincipled, the other unfortunate in the extreme, would have answered the common purposes of effect, and satisfied the ambition of an ordinary painter of character. Shakspeare has laboured the finer shades of difference in both with as much care have been the man—or Locke-cum-Tooke—or Tooke-cum-Locke. Why do our dictionaries refer Via (force) to the Greek βία, and not its evident fellow, Via? Would it not be a good commentary on Roman violence, showing that they ever made their way by force, that via and vis were, with them, one and the same thing (βία)—nay that their whole life vita (βίωσις) was but one season of barbarity and brute coarseness?

and skill as if he had had to depend on the execution alone for the success of his design. On the other hand, Desdemona and Emilia are not meant to be opposed with anything like strong contrast to each other. Both are, to outward appearance, characters of common life, not more distinguished than women usually are, by difference of rank and situation. The difference of their thoughts and sentiments is however laid as open, their minds are separated from each other by signs as plain and as little to be mistaken as the complexions of their husbands.

The movement of the passion in Othello is exceedingly different from that of Macbeth. In Macbeth there is a violent struggle between opposite feelings, between ambition and the stings of conscience, almost from first to last: in Othello, the doubtful conflict between contrary passions, though dreadful, continues only for a short time, and the chief interest is excited by the alternate ascendancy of different passions, the intire and unforseen change from the fondest love and most unbounded confidence to the tortures of jealousy and the madness of hatred. The revenge of Othello, after it has once taken thorough possession of his mind, never quits it, but grows stronger and stronger at every moment of its delay. The nature of the Moor is noble, confiding, tender, and generous; but his blood is of the most inflammable kind; and being once roused by a sense of his wrongs, he is stopped by no considerations of remorse or pity till he has given a loose to all the dictates of his rage and his despair. It is in working his noble nature up to this extremity through rapid but gradual transitions, in raising passion to its height from the smallest beginnings and in spite of all obstacles, in painting the existing conflict between love and hatred, tenderness and resentment, jealousy and remorse, in unfolding the strength and the weaknesses of our nature, in uniting sublimity of thought with the anguish of the keenest woe, in putting in motion the various impulses that agitate this mortal being, and at last blending them in that noble tide of deep and sustained passion, impetuous but majestic, that "flows on to the Propontic, and knows no ebb," that Shakspeare has shown the mastery of his genius and of his power over the human heart. The third act of 'Othello' is his masterpiece, not of knowledge or passion separately, but of the two combined, of the knowledge of character with the expression of passion, of consummate art in the keeping up of appearances with the profound workings of nature, and the convulsive movements of uncontrollable agony, of the power of inflicting torture and of suffering it. Not only is the tumult of passion heaved up from the very bottom of the soul, but every the slightest undulation of feeling is seen on the surface, as it arises from the impulses of imagination or the different probabilities maliciously suggested by Iago. The progressive preparation for the catastrophe is wonderfully managed, from the Moor's first gallant recital of the story of his love, of "the spells and witchcraft he had used," from his unlooked-for and romantic success, the fond satisfaction with which he dotes on his own happiness, the unreserved tenderness of Desdemona and her innocent importunities in favour of Cassio, irritating the suspicions instilled into her husband's mind by the perfidy of Iago, and rankling there to poison, till he loses all command of himself, and his rage can only be appeased by blood. She is introduced, just before Iago begins to put his scheme in practice, pleading for Cassio with all the thoughtless gaiety of friendship and winning confidence in the love of Othello,—

"What! Michael Cassio?

That came a wooing with you, and so many a time,
When I have spoke of you dispassioningly,
Hath taken your part, to have so much to do
To bring him in?—Why this is not a boon:
'Tis as I should intreat you wear your gloves,
Or feed on nourishing meats, or keep you warm;
Or sue to you to do a peculiar profit
To your person. Nay, when I have a suit,
Wherein I mean to touch your love indeed,
It shall be full of poise, and fearful to be granted."

Othello's confidence, at first only staggered by broken hints and insinuations, renounces itself at sight of Desdemona; and he exclaims,—

"If she be false, O then Heav'n mocks itself:
I'll not believe it."

But presently after, on brooding over his suspicions by himself, and yielding to his apprehensions of the worst, his smothered jealousy breaks out into open fury, and he returns to demand satisfaction of Iago like a wild beast stung with the envenomed shaft of the hunters. "Look where he comes," &c. In this state of exasperation and violence, after the "first paroxysms of his grief and tenderness have had their vent in that passionate apostrophe, "I felt not Cassio's kisses on her lips," Iago by false aspersions, and by presenting the most revolting images to his mind, easily turns the storm of passion from himself against Desdemona, and works him up into a trembling agony of doubt and fear, in which he abandons all his love and hopes in a breath,—

"Now do I see 'tis true. Look here, Iago,
All my fond love thus do I blow to Heav'n. 'Tis gone.

Arise blank vengeance from the hollow hell;
Yield up, O love, thy crown and hearted throne
To tyrannous hate! Swell bosom with thy fraught;
For 'tis of aspics' tongues."

From this time, his raging thoughts "never look back, ne'er ebb to humble love," till his revenge is sure of its object, the painful regrets and involuntary recollections of past circumstances which cross his mind amidst the dim trances of passion, aggravating the sense of his wrongs, but not shaking his purpose. Once indeed, where Iago shows him Cassio with the handkerchief in his hand, and making sport (as he thinks) of his misfortunes, the intolerable bitterness of his feelings, the extreme sense of shame, makes him fall to praising her accomplishments and relapse into a momentary fit of weakness, "Yet, oh, the pity of it; Iago, the pity of it!" This returning fondness however only serves, as it is managed by Iago, to whet his revenge, and set his heart more against her. In his conversations with Desdemona, the persuasion of her guilt and the immediate proofs of her duplicity seem to irritate his resentment and aversion to her; but in the scene immediately preceding her death, the recollection of his love returns upon him in all its tenderness and force; and after her death, he all at once forgets his wrongs in the sudden and irreparable sense of his loss,—

"My wife! My wife! What wife? I have no wife.
Oh, insupportable! Oh, heavy hour!"

"This happens before he is assured of her innocence; but afterwards his remorse is as dreadful as his revenge has been, and yields only to fixed and death-like despair. His farewell speech, before he kills himself, in which he conveys his reasons to the senate for the murder of his wife, is equal to the first speech in which he gave them an account of his courtship of her, and "his whole course of love." Such an ending was alone worthy of such a commencement. If anything could add to the force of our sympathy with Othello, or compassion for his fate, it would be the frankness and generosity of his nature, which so little deserve it. When Iago first begins to practise upon his unsuspecting friendship, he answers—

"'Tis not to make me jealous,
To say my wife is fair, feeds well, loves company,
Is free of speech, sings, plays, and dances well;
Where virtue is, there are most virtuous.
'Nor from my own weak merits will I draw
The smallest fear or doubt of her revolt,
For she had eyes and chose me."

This character is beautifully (and with affecting simplicity) confirmed by what Desdemona herself says

* See the passage beginning, "It is impossible you should see this, were they as prime as goats," &c.

of him to Æmelia after she has lost the handkerchief, the first pledge of his love to her,—

"Believe me, I had rather have lost my purse
Full of cruzadoes. And but my noble Moor
Is true of mind, and made of no such baseness,
As jealous creatures are, it were enough
To put him to ill thinking.

ÆMILIA. Is he not jealous?

DESDEMONA. Who, he? I think the sun where he was born

Drew all such humours from him."

In a short speech of Æmelia's, there occurs one of those side-intimations of the fluctuations of passion which we seldom meet with but in Shakspeare. After Othello has resolved upon the death of his wife, and bids her dismiss her attendant for the night, she answers—

"I will, my Lord.

ÆMILIA. How goes it now? He looks gentler than he did."

Shakspeare has here put into half a line what some authors would have spun out into ten set speeches.

The character of Desdemona herself is inimitable both in itself, and as it contrasts with Othello's groundless jealousy, and with the foul conspiracy of which she is the innocent victim. Her beauty and external graces are only indirectly glanced at; we see "her visage in her mind;" her character everywhere predominates over her person.

"A maiden never bold:
Of spirit so still and quiet, that her motion
Blushed at itself."

There is one fine compliment paid to her by Cassio, who exclaims triumphantly when she comes ashore as Cyprus after the storm—

"Tempests themselves, high seas, and howling winds,
As having sense of beauty, do omit
Their mortal natures, letting safe go by
The divine Desdemona."

In general, as is the case with most of Shakspeare's females, we lose sight of her personal charms in her attachment and devotedness to her husband. "She is subdued even to the very quality of her lord;" and to Othello's "honours and his valiant parts her soul and fortunes consecrates." The lady protests so much herself, and she is as good as her word. The truth of conception, with which timidity and boldness are united in the same character, is marvellous. The extravagance of her resolutions, the pertinacity of her affections, may be said to arise out of the gentleness of her nature. They imply an unreserved reliance on the purity of her own intentions, an intire surrender of her fears to her love, a knitting of herself (heart and soul) to the fate of another. Bating the commencement of her passion, which is a little fantastical and headstrong (though even that may perhaps be consistently accounted for from her inability to resist a rising inclination*) her whole character consists in having no will of her own, no prompter but her obedience. Her romantic turn is only a consequence of the domestic and practical part of her disposition; and instead of following Othello to the wars, she would gladly have "remained at home a moth of peace," if her husband could have staid with her. Her resignation and angelic sweetness of temper do not desert her at the last. The scenes in which she laments and tries to account for Othello's estrangement from her are exquisitely beautiful. After he has struck her, and called her names, she says,—

"Alas, Iago,

What shall I do to win my lord again?
Good friend, go to him; for by this light of heaven,
I know not how I lost him. Here I kneel;
If e'er my will did trespass 'gainst his love,
Either in discourse, or thought, or actual deed,
Or that mine eyes, mine ears, or any sense
Delighted them on any other form;

* "Iago. Ay, too gentle.

OTHELLO. Nay, that's certain."

Or that I do not, and ever did,
And ever will, though he do shake me off
To beggarly devorcement, love him dearly,
Comfort forewear me. Unkindness may do much,
And his unkindness may defeat my life,
But never taint my love."

IAGO. I pray you be content: 'tis but his humour;

The business of the state does him offence.

DESDEMONA. If 'twere no other!"—

The scene which follows with Æmelia and the song of the 'Willow,' are equally beautiful, and show the author's extreme power of varying the expression of passion, in all its moods and in all circumstances.

"ÆMILIA. Would you had never seen him.

DESDEMONA. So would not I: my love doth not approve him,

That even his stubbornness, his checks, his frowns,
Have grace and favour in them," &c.

Not the unjust suspicions of Othello, not Iago's treachery, place Desdemona in a more amiable or interesting light than the casual conversation (half earnest, half jest) between her and Æmelia, on the common behaviour of women to their husbands. This dialogue takes place just before the last fatal scene. If Othello had overheard it, it would have prevented the whole catastrophe; but then it would have spoiled the play.

The character of Iago is one of the supererogations of Shakspeare's genius. Some persons, more nice than wise, have thought this whole character unnatural, because his villany it without a sufficient motive. Shakspeare, who was as good a philosopher as he was a poet, thought otherwise. He knew that the love of power, which is another name for the love of mischief, is natural to man. He would know this as well or better than if it had been demonstrated to him by a logical diagram, merely from seeing children paddle in the dirt or kill flies for sport. Iago in fact belongs to a class of characters, common to Shakspeare, and at the same time peculiar to him; whose heads are as acute and active as their hearts are hard and callous. Iago is to be sure an extreme instance of the kind; that is to say, of diseased intellectual activity, with an almost perfect indifference to moral good or evil, or rather with a decided preference of the latter, because it falls more readily in with his favourite propensity, gives greater zest to his thoughts and scope to his actions. He is quite or nearly as indifferent to his own fate as to that of others; he runs all risks for a trifling and doubtful advantage; and is himself the dupe and victim of his ruling passion—an insatiable craving after action of the most difficult and dangerous kind. "Our ancient" is a philosopher, who fancies that a lie that kills has more point in it than an alliteration or an antithesis; who thinks a fatal experiment on the peace of a family a better thing than watching the palpitations in the heart of a flea in a microscope; who plots the ruin of his friends as an exercise for his ingenuity, and stabs men in the dark to prevent canst. His gaiety, such as it is, arises from the success of his treachery; his ease from the torture he has inflicted on others. He is an amateur of tragedy in real life; and instead of employing his invention on imaginary characters, or long-forgotten incidents, he takes the bolder and more desperate course of getting up his plot at home, casts the principal parts among his nearest friends and connections, and rehearses it in downright earnest, with steady nerves and unabated resolution. We will just give an illustration or two.

One of his most characteristic speeches is that immediately after the marriage of Othello,— "RODERIGO. What a full fortune does the thick lips owe;

If he can carry her thus!"

IAGO. Call up her father:

Hence him (Othello), make after him, poison his delight,

Proclaim him in the streets, incense her kinmen;
And tho' he in a fertile climate dwell,

Plague him with flies: Tho' that his joy be joy,
Yet throw such changes of vexation on it,
As it may lose some colour."

In the next passage, his imagination runs riot in the mischief he is plotting, and breaks out into the wildness and impetuosity of real enthusiasm:—

"RODERIGO. Here is her father's house: I'll call aloud.

IAGO. Do, with like timorous accent and dire yell,

As when, by night and negligence, the fire
Is spied in populous cities."

One of his most favourite topics, on which he is rich indeed, and in descending on which his spleen serves him for a Muse, is the disproportionate match between Desdemona and the Moor. This is a clue to the character of the lady which he is by no means ready to part with. It is brought forward in the first scene, and he returns to it, when, in answer to his insinuations against Desdemona, Roderigo says,—

"I cannot believe that in her—she's full of most blest conditions.

IAGO. Bless'd fig's end! The wine she drinks is made of grapes. If she had been blest, she would never have married the Moor."

And again with still more spirit and fatal effect afterwards, when he turns this very suggestion arising in Othello's own breast to her prejudice:—

"OTHELLO. And yet how nature erring from itself—

IAGO. Ay, there's the point;—as, to be bold with you,

Not to affect many proposed matches
Of her own clime, complexion, and degree, &c."

* This is probing to the quick. Iago here turns the character of poor Desdemona, as it were, inside out. It is certain that nothing but the genius of Shakspeare could have preserved the intire interest and delicacy of the part, and have even drawn an additional elegance and dignity from the peculiar circumstances in which she is placed.—The habitual licentiousness of Iago's conversation is not to be traced to the pleasure he takes in gross and lascivious images, but to his desire of finding out the worst side of everything, and proving himself an over-match for appearances. He has none of "the milk of human kindness" in his composition. His imagination rejects everything that has not a strong infusion of the most unpalatable ingredients; his mind digests only poisons. Virtue or goodness or whatever has the least "relish of salvation in it," is to his depraved appetite, sickly and insipid: and he even resents the good opinion entertained of his own integrity, as if it were an affront east on the masculine sense and spirit of his character. Thus, at the meeting between Othello and Desdemona, he exclaims—"Oh, you are well tuned now: but I'll set down the pegs that make this music, as honest as I am"—his character of bon-homme not sitting at all easily upon him. In the scenes where he tries to work Othello to his purpose, he is proportionably guarded, insidious, dark, and deliberate. We believe nothing ever came up to the profound dissimulation and dexterous artifice of the well-known dialogue in the third act, where he first enters upon the execution of his design:—

"IAGO. My noble lord.

OTHELLO. What dost thou say, Iago?

IAGO. Did Michael Cassio,

When you woo'd my lady, know of your love?

OTHELLO. He did from first to last.

Why dost thou ask?

IAGO. But for a satisfaction of my thought,
No further harm.

OTHELLO. Why of thy thought, Iago?

IAGO. I did not think he had been acquainted with it.

OTHELLO. O yes, and went between us, very oft—

IAGO. Indeed?

OTHELLO. Indeed? Ay, indeed. Discern'st thou ought of that?

Is he not honest?

IAGO. Honest, my lord?

OTHELLO. Honest? Ay, honest.

IAGO. My lord, for aught I know.

OTHELLO. What do'st thou think?

IAGO. Think, my lord!

OTHELLO. Think, my lord! Alas, thou echo'st me, As if there was some monster in thy thought, Too hideous to be shown."

The stops and breaks, the deep workings of treachery under the mask of love and honesty, the anxious watchfulness, the cool earnestness, and if we may so say, the passion of hypocrisy marked in every line, receive their last finishing in that inconceivable burst of pretended indignation at Othello's doubts of his sincerity.

"O grace! O Heaven forgive me!

Are you a man? Have you a soul or sense?

God be wi' you; take mine office. O wretched fool,"

That lov'st to make thine honesty a vice!

O monstrous world! take note, take note, O world!

To be direct and honest is not safe.

I thank you for this profit, and from hence!

I'll love no friend, since love breeds such offence."

If Iago is detestable enough when he has business on his hands and all his engines at work, he is still worse when he has nothing to do, and we only see into the hollowness of his heart. His indifference when Othello falls into a swoon is perfectly diabolical.

"IAGO. How is it, General? Have you not hurt your head?

OTHELLO. Do'st thou mock me?

IAGO. I mock you not, by Heaven," &c.

The part indeed would hardly be tolerated, even as a foil to the virtue and generosity of the other characters in the play, but for its indefatigable industry and inexhaustible resources, which divert the attention of the spectator (as well as his own) from the end he has in view to the means by which it must be accomplished. — Edmund the Bastard in 'Lear' is something of the same character, placed in less prominent circumstances. Zanga is a vulgar caricature of it.

TABLE TALK.

TRUE REMARK ON "CONCEITS" IN POETRY AND ON THE IMAGINATIVENESS OF PASSION.

Petrarch's Italian poetry, written either to please his lady or to relieve the overflowing of his heart, bears in every line the stamp of warm and genuine, though of refined and chivalric passion. It has been criticised as too imaginative, and defaced by conceits: of the latter there are few, confined to a small portion of the sonnets. They will not be admired now, yet, perhaps, they are not those of the poems which came least spontaneously from the heart. Those have experienced little of the effects of passion, of love, grief, or terror, who do not know that conceits often spring naturally from such. Shakspeare knew this, and he seldom describes the outbursts of passion unaccompanied by fanciful imagery, which borders on conceit. Still more false is the notion that passion is not, in its essence, highly imaginative. Hard and dry critics, who neither feel themselves nor sympathise in the feeling of others, alone can have made this accusation; these people, whose inactive and colourless fancy naturally suggests no new combination nor fresh tint of beauty, suppose that it is a cold exercise of the mind when—

"The poet's eye in a fine frenzy rolling,

Doth glance from heaven to earth, from earth to heaven."

As they with difficulty arrive at comprehending poetic creations, they believe that they were produced by dint of hard labour and deep study. The truth is the opposite of this. To the imaginative, fanciful imagery and thoughts, whose expression seems steeped in the hue of dawn, are natural and unforced; when the mind of such is calm, their conceptions resemble those of other men; but when excited by passion, when love, or patriotism, or the influence of nature kindles the soul, it becomes natural, nay, imperative to them to embody their thoughts, and to give "a local habitation and a name" to the emotions that possess them. The remarks of critics on the overflowings of poetic minds remind one of the traveller who expressed such wonder when on landing at Calais he heard little children talk French.—Lives of Eminent Italians. (Vol. lxiii of 'Dr Lardner's Cyclopædia'.)

WRITINGS OF CHARLES LAMB.

We have been highly gratified in seeing the following announcement in the current number of the 'New Monthly,' by the writer of the 'Confessions of Shakspeare':—"I may, perhaps, be allowed this opportunity of stating, that an edition of such of the late Mr Charles Lamb's writings as can be recovered by his executors, with a large selection from his correspondence, is now preparing under the superintendence of Mr Serjeant Talfourd, and will be accompanied by a notice from that learned and accomplished gentleman, of the life and genius of his deceased friend."—We are not aware of any man living, who, from the united circumstance of long acquaintance with Mr Lamb, and thorough subtlety of criticism, is so well qualified to do justice to him as Mr Talfourd.

SOLDIERS AND DRINKING.

It is the mode at present in use, of serving out the rations for the day all at one time; the allowance of meat and vegetables, being cooked in the course of the forenoon, is, at twelve o'clock, together with the bread, served out to each room or mess. The men being hearty and possessed of good appetites, perhaps just relieved off guard, or returned from drill or fatigue duty of some kind, frequently demolish the day's allowance, with the exception of the bread, at one meal. It might be inferred from this that they had not a sufficiency of food, but it is not so; as far as quantity is concerned the allowance is amply sufficient. But the rough and unpolished soldier should not be expected to possess more influence over his appetite than the wealthy glutton, who, devouring twice the quantity necessary for the nourishment of the body, is continually a prey to indigestion and disease. In four or five hours after this meal the man's appetite returns; nothing being left but the plain bread, the public-house is resorted to, (in some measure as a matter of necessity,) for something to relish it. Once there, the probability is, that the inducements he there finds to prolong his stay are found to be irresistible, and the natural consequences, drunkenness and disgrace, too often follow. This evil might be in a great measure removed by making some alteration in the nature of the rations, which at present are intirely of a solid nature, nothing liquid being served out. If the officers were to encourage the formation of messes for making coffee or cocoa in the barrack-rooms on a certain hour, say five o'clock in the evening, by way of supper, the necessity of resorting to the canteen for "something to drink" would be removed, and the habits of good-fellowship among the men increased. Proposals for the introduction of "tea-slops" may excite expressions of ridicule from some persons, but let it be recollected that cocoa and tea have, for the last ten years, formed part of the provisions issued in the naval service; where their usefulness, in preference to the extra pint of grog formerly issued, is fully proved by the concurring testimony of many eminent naval officers. Besides, there can be no doubt but that these liquors equally answer the purposes of drink, are exhilarating, and far less injurious than either spirits or malt liquor.—[From a 'sensible and humane pamphlet just published, intitled 'Remarks on Military Flogging, its Causes and Effects,' &c.—Steill. Pp. 23.]

LUDICROUS SPECULATION.

A looking-glass is a matter of great wonder to magpies. We once saw one placed on the ground, where two were hopping about. One of them came up to it, stared at it in apparent wonder, hopped off to the other, and then both returned and spent at least ten minutes in nodding, chattering, and hopping about the glass.—Faculties of Birds.

MUSIC.

[Musical Library. No. XII. Charles Knight.

'Aia, with Variations.' Mozart. A very beautiful instrumental piece; but has not a slow movement been omitted at the end? Surely Mozart's music requires no curtailment. There are some fine passages in the fragment in Martini's trio; but they are disjointed, and few in proportion to the number of staves they are distributed over. In the adagio from Woelfl's sonata, we can discern neither subject, object, nor connexion of any kind. It appears to us, under correction, a bit of solemn nonsense. Haydn's canzonet, 'Piercing Eyes!' is very graceful and sweet. 'La Marmotte,' by Beethoven, is very pretty; so is Rossini's canzonet. Lord Mornington's madrigal is not very striking, but the effects are very pleasing. The song, 'Where'er you walk,' from Handel's 'Semele,' is a most majestic strain of enamoured compliment, more majestic than enamoured. Horsley's MS. glee is by no means calculated to increase his high repute as a composer.

FINE ARTS.

Gallery of Portraits. No. XXXIV. Charles Knight.

THE inauspicious countenance of Clarendon heads the triumvirate this month. It is a most unpleasant face, sceptical and cross-looking, with an air of ill-tempered surprise and petty-haughtiness; he looks as though he were resenting some impertinent and unexpected interruption on the part of an inferior. Reynolds has a more contented and humane cast of countenance. It is pleasant to have a portrait of a man like Reynolds, by himself, necessarily, too, in the very act of painting. There may be seen the peculiar expression, which is the habitual one of a painter at work, a look of pleased and fixed scrutiny; for painters are by profession an observant race, they seek their mind's food on all sides, and never find a scarcity of it; therefore they are also a contented race. The exceptions to this rule are in cases of disappointed ambition,—a feeling Reynolds does not appear to have suffered much. It may be remarked that the present portrait of Reynolds is a reverse, painted with a single looking-glass, as may be seen by his front being turned to the sinister side of the picture; if he had turned over his right shoulder, the body would front the other way, as any may see, who makes the experiment.—The right hand too holds the mahl-stick, the left is employed in painting. By employing a second glass, and reversing the reflection in the first, the error may be corrected. Swift's face is more in character with some good-natured anecdotes that are told of him, than with his cutting satire or his suffering life. The engravings are well executed; but the first and last are rather tame in the effect. The portrait of Reynolds is a very fair representation of his style of painting, with the exception of his peculiar style of handling.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE Editor must beg the indulgence of his Correspondents till next week. While now writing, his attention is demanded by the publication of the Poem alluded to last Wednesday, intitled 'Captain Sword and Captain Pen,' which will most probably be out by the time this notice appears. The poem is partly political; and so far nothing further will be said of it in the LONDON JOURNAL; which the Editor is determined to keep sequestered and serene from all sound of trouble and controversy, however conscientiously excited. Of other points in it, however, something will be said in a future number; and meantime he avails himself of this opportunity of letting the public know that such a Poem is to be had.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A FEW MINUTES' EDITORIAL TALK WITH THE READER—
ELISIONS IN VERSE—FLOWERS IN A LETTER—QUEST-ION RESPECTING THE AMERICAN LOCUST ANSWERED
—RECONCILEMENT TO TOWN—LETTER FROM MR
HERAUD, ETC.

Our pile of correspondence has so increased upon us by the omission of a week's answers, that we must notice it this time at the head of the paper, and turn the notice into an "Article." The letters, as they lie heaped before us, remind us of the "conspiracy of the papers" written in the days of the Regent, by the author of the 'Two-penny Post Bag,' who records the horror of that illustrious personage at the sight, and his dread lest they were "growing upon him" at a rate too formidable to overcome—

"As if they said, 'our grand design is To suffocate his Royal Highness.'"

The suffocation, however, in the present instance (were we important enough to have the honour of a death so royal), would be of a far pleasanter sort, resembling rather the death of a former illustrious personage, the prince who was drowned in a butt of Malmsey,—intoxicating with sweets, leaving us "dead drunk" with honey like a bee, giving us a death of our own choice (if we could choose to die at all when so pleased): for never have we received a more encouraging or flattering stock of letters than at this moment; and the one which we shall notice first, has actually brought flowers in it,—a lump of blossoms from a garden in Wales—scenting the air here in London, and almost making us fancy that the words of the fair writer would become audible, bringing us a voice to match the fragrance—

"— Ambrosial odours, o'er the cheek Celestial warmth suffusing."—GENIE.

They now lie before us, fragrant still, though they have been plucked for weeks. We wish we could put the odour into the LONDON JOURNAL. Their colours combine yellow and brown, like the bee's; and, assuredly, if a bee were to come into our room, he would find them out, and plunge into them, and look of a piece with their beauty.

But before we proceed, we must say something of our JOURNAL and its new-year commencements. We promised at the beginning of the year to have some Lives and Travels in it, and have been fearing that the Readers would resent the non-performance of the promise; but they have been true LONDON JOURNAL Readers, good-natured; and, instead of doing so, have said nothing but kind things, and expressed satisfaction with what is laid before them. And we must say for ourselves that, although we have not kept our word in those particulars, we have more than kept it in the general conduct of our undertaking, having written a great deal more than we proposed on our setting out, and feeling certain that we shall continue to do so, though we have learnt, once for all, the imprudence of making specific promises—of which we here accordingly take our leave with a delighted penitence, now and for ever, feeling ourselves able to do our best when least restricted, and happy to discover that our Readers do not care what subjects the paper treats of, provided there is sincerity in the treatment, and good humour. So, off, Restriction! and welcome! the universe, and the coming summer, and all pleasant subjects at will, and loads of good-humoured letters, the writers of which bind us to them for ever by letting us do what we like.

But we must explain a little farther, for we have neither been idle nor acting out of caprice. Our 'Romances of Real Life' do not fail us, and we verily believe never will, as long as the Reader chooses to have them—and they are popular. The 'Week' also, from its nature, is sure of its supply, and will be continued throughout its twelve-month; and for a 'First Article' subjects being ad libitum, are of course never wanting. But when we came to look about us for 'Lives,' we found we could not reckon upon a supply always good enough, and though good extracts from 'Travels' are more to be depended on, and we hope to have them still, though not systematically, we discovered that Readers in general like a greater variety, an admixture of shorter pieces than the new arrangements of the JOURNAL would have permitted, especially comprising as they do, the valuable Shakspeare criticisms of Mr Hazlitt: and our Correspondents also perplexed us with the length as well as goodness of many of their communications, and new books came in, and miscellaneousness of all sorts abounded; so that we fairly did not know what to do with our proposed plan. Instead of the 'Lives,' therefore, we have enlarged the very brief summaries of character which we intended to give in our 'Week,' and keeping up what was already approved of, we have let the rest of the JOURNAL take its course, like our old friend the Butterfly in the poet, promising nothing except that we will taste every sweet that we can come nigh, and bring a bit of colour and joy into every homestead that chooses to welcome us.

And so once more to set out again, with gladsome wings, the happier from just having been doing our duty in a graver shape,—a soldier in the ranks of 'Captain Pen.' Blessed be thy transforming power, O imagination! that thus beatest Ovid all to pieces, and canst metamorphose ourselves, and to whatsoever shape we please,—provided only we have faith, and a hearty wish for it. By thee this instant, our rainy windows are changed into open ones, the clouds into sunshine, March into May, and nothing remains of ourselves, but the soul of us, in its Greek shape,—the Psyche, or Butterfly aforesaid,—who quivering his wings like the finger-tips of some happy musician, when he is touching two notes at once, in the shake of a joyous symphony (like that of Gia san ritorno, for instance) rises in the rapture of his anticipations, and issues forth to the blue air, drunk with the scent of gardens.

Thus the fresh Clarion, being readie dight,
Unto his journey did himselfe addresse,
And with good speed began to take his flight,
Over the fields in his franke lustinesse:
And all the champaine o'er he soared light,
And all the country wide he did possesse,
Feeding upon their pleasures bounteouslie,
That none gainsaid, nor none did him envie.

The woods, the rivers, and the meadows greene,
With his aire-cutting wings he measured wide,
Ne did he leave the mountaines bare unsene,
Ne the ranke grassie fennes delights untride.

But none of these however sweet they beene,
Mote please his fancie, nor him cause to abide;
His choicfull sense with every change doth flit.
No common things may please a wavering wit.

We beg leave, however, to disclaim the application of these last four lines; for though we like to "flit," we like also to "abide;" being of a right greedy disposition in matters of luxury, and loving to retain all the goods we have, whatsoever addition we make to the stock. Neither do we like to have any luxury cut short, not even the syllable O; for which reason we have here restored it from the hasty and incapable profanations of the commentators, who took it away from before the word abide—

"Mote please his fancy, or him cause l'abide"— a vile elision—endangering the right reading of the verse, even if intended only as a hint to read rapidly, and not to change the two words into one. Ever while you live, dear Reader, eschew all such perils, and let your ears be aware of the full measures of sweet poetry:—

"Mote please his fancy, and him cause to abide."
to abide, with swift distinctness if you will, and bide with the greater force in consequence; but never allow a commentator or school-boy critic, proud of his knowing that there are ten syllables in a heroic line, to pretend that two short syllables are not the same as one, and to be written at their full length accordingly. Hear the Italians sing their beautiful words, and mark the melodious relish with which they distinguish every syllable they utter, even while fusing their sweetness together. The Italian heroic measure is the same as ours, only with double instead of single rhyme; yet they have far more vowels than we, not one of which (except in certain conventional and colloquial instances, or when the poet himself chooses) they cut off, sliding them beautifully into one another with articulate smoothness. We have occasionally an instance in our own language, as in that line of Milton's allegro:—

"To many a youth and many a maid Dancing in the chequered shade."

Now, upon the principle of writing l'abide, for to abide, the y might be cut off here at the word many; or the and should be written 'ad in that divine verse in 'Paradise Lost'—speaking of the powers of music to—

"chase
Anguish, and doubt, and fear and sorrow, and pain."

But who would endure this? We may take, if we please, no more time in uttering sorrow and, than if it were written sorrow'ad; but who would lose the two beautiful sounds of the o and a? According to these cutters and maimers (violators of the Ellenborough Act) piano in a verse should be written pao, and fori, fori. Here is a lovely line of Ariosto, in which Alcina, the magician, is described attracting the fishes to her out of the water:—

"Con semplici parole e puri incanti."
(With simple sayings and enchantments pure.)

The Italians pronounce both the ee's in this line, and both the ii's, and make the verse the sweeter and richer. The two ee's may not be thought the happiest instance of this custom, but they go very sweetly nevertheless; and the sound of the two is's may be represented, in English by writing them poor's in, instead of poor's as a commentator would cut it; or it may be shown in another version of the line:—

"With simple words and easy enchantments pure."

Who would like to read cas' for easy in this line, or think the melody improved by it?

We have taken up too much space, we fear, in explaining this matter; but the subject beguiled us, and we have assumed, with an insolence common to periodical editorship, that the Reader is to let us do as we please.

Now then to do very much as we please, and lay before him the letter of our fair Correspondent from Wales, who gives a variety of pleasant information.

"No one reads with greater delight the LONDON JOURNAL, or is more grateful for the instruction she receives from it, than she of the verdant valley in 'Fultima Cambria.' When one 'Monthly part' is duly conned, she counts the days till the next arrives. The first vol. is complete, and in nothing wanting save—may she with great humility suggest to the Editor, that an Index would tend much to economize the time and patience of its admirers? The Editor's poetical wand has conjured up a January's garden worthy of Boccaccio's magician; but the mildness of our northern winters has not only tempted several of our usually migratory birds to remain in their summer quarters, but also has blessed us with a greater variety of flowers than is to be found in the 'Household Almanac,' which probably took its list from the recorded produce of some 'olden days' January flowers; for now 'the pale primrose' and ranunculus unfold most sweetly their petals to our slanting sun, though with less luxuriance of bloom than to its stronger rays. The aconite, or wolf's-bane, opened rejectingly its yellow buds, as soon as 'the sweet south' breathed on 'the frost-bound soil;' all these, of course, will flourish in the February's garden; but there is one of the botanist's monsters that blossoms when snow is on the ground, all unmindful of it, to the end of February, or later still—it is the winter double violet: its colour is a very pale lilac.

"But a still more precious plant, that blossoms in the open air, without requiring attention, is the Calycanthus Precox: some of its flowers shall be herewith enclosed, though in their withered state they can give but a faint notion of the humbly coloured blossom's singularly fragrant scent when freshly plucked. Its first buds opened at the close of November, when the leaves were still clustering thick upon the shrub; since that time, every tiny twig, every branch, has been 'clothed with flowers that none the wood mote see;' and in this beautiful (or rather, more odorous than beautiful) state it will remain till March wanes, or April dawns.

"The writer takes this opportunity of answering the question that heads the article in No. 41.—The American Locust—which interesting insect is not the same as the noisy, chirping, nay, often stunning, Cigala of the south, which she has many a time chased in Italy: it differs little from our northern grasshopper in size and appearance, but she cannot believe that the noise it makes is produced by the friction of the wings together, as is the case with the more musical sounding tones of ours.

"The real Egyptian locust of the Scriptures is still to be found in Malta; and the writer understands that in Arabia it abounds. In Malta she kept one for some time: it measured above two inches long, was in form a common grasshopper, but of a brilliant green, with wings long enough to be able to take a flight of from one to two hundred yards, and thickly covered with black cabalistical characters. It would devour the leafy parts of a lettuce leaf in about ten minutes, or less time."

The next letter is from another fair Correspondent, and is one of those which stand in our first class of welcome communications, because they tell us of good positively effected, and objections reconciled. We take this opportunity of observing, that when we preach the doctrine of making the best of things, and fetching out all which they can yield, far is it from our intention to oppose any great public good, or any advancement of individual right. Singular indeed would be such a contradiction of half the spirit of our life. What we recommend is, not the desertion of any just claim, public or private, but that we should take along with us every possible cheerfulness and goodwill, both as a means of prosecuting our claim the better, and as a noble resource always, including a heart-home to retreat upon in case of the worst. There are helpers in a spirit of cheerful sanguineness as well as of spleen; and though we would not undervalue the latter in case of necessity, far less be ungrateful to what its worthies have done for us, we think the former stand the better chance of being more just and persuasive, and of putting an end to the constant re-actions of anger and violence. But to the letter of our fair friend.

January 29.

"As I know, dear sir, you are pleased to hear of any good arising through your instrumentality, I must tell you your papers have been the means of reconciling both me and my sister to town. We are lovers of the country: it was there we first drew our breath, were nurtured, and have spent the greater part of the years we have numbered: and although it is a sweet constraint which binds us to this city, it being the present abode of those we most fondly love, yet our hearts yearned for their native haunts, with their silence and solitude. Nay more, we determined to find no beauty in anything external which London could yield. We despised a small garden, because it was not a large one; thought a flower in a window a mockery of the love of rural life; and would scarcely take a walk in the suburbs, because the fields boasted not the picturesque beauty of those we had left, where 'Nature seemed to sit alone.' But your papers, dear sir, have taught us otherwise, and made us resolve to content ourselves with the sources of gratification we possess, without sighing for those beyond our reach."

Socius is informed, that we had not forgotten Aunt Sazar; though one part of her letter conspired with circumstances to delay it; for the good lady, in her dislike of the squirrel's teeth, forgot that the poor free-born prisoner had a right to object to his cage; and we, on the other hand, do not like to object to a lady, and bandy arguments with her. The story of the key (not "lost," but carried away in another's pocket) was as true, as that Socius is hereby told so. The Editor does not deal in figments of that sort.

"How are we to get happily married?" shall appear the first opportunity.

We are sorry that F.'s correction of the erratum did not reach us till our last number had gone to press. For the word "tomb" in his letter respecting 'Edwin and Emma,' the reader will be good enough to take his pen, and substitute "turf."

The following letter which we have had the honour of receiving from the author of the 'Judgment of the Flood,' shows him in a light so considerate towards the "poor devils" of the press, and also furnishes so useful an example of the attention which is paid to the construction and harmony of their verses, by poets who have a right respect for the art, that we cannot help availing ourselves of the permission given us at the close of it. It will help to excuse our long critical dissertation on to and abide:—

1st of March 1835.

28 Burton street, Burton Crescent.

MY DEAR SIR,

As by an engagement with my Newsman it is not until Sunday Morning that I receive your JOURNALS, which I peruse with pleasure, and preserve with anxiety, I was not aware until the present moment of the station which you had given me, both as translator and author, among your 'Poets on Ice.' I have now to thank you much and sincerely for the honour, and your motive in according it.

Will you permit me to mention, that either your fair Correspondent has mis-copied the extracts given from my two poems, or your printer has mistaken her manuscript? As here and there these errata make nonsense of the passage, you will probably permit me to furnish you with the means of correcting them.

The 3rd line of the 8th stanza of 'The Ice Course' should run—"Far thy Cothurnus' sound." This is but a trifle.

F. In the description of "Dudael," 12th line should begin—"Bare and of life devoid,"—not "Base," &c.; 19th line should have been printed, "Went as a sealed fountain,"—not "seal'd fountain." The ed should be sounded, else the rhythm were imperfect. In the 20th line you have "broke," instead of "brake." You who know how much euphony depends on the skilful alliteration of the vowel sounds, will forgive me mentioning an apparent trifle like this. Its importance may be felt, however, by examining the structure of two or three consecutive lines—e. g.—

the vigorous blood,

Was shackled, and the rivers of the heart

Were on a sealed fountain, and the veins
Perch'd became brittle like to glass, and brake,
Or hardened into marble."

Most of these corrections respect sound—those in the next quotation, extracted from the 'Descent into Hell,' regard sense. In the 9th line for "compact," read "compact." In the 14th line for "barren stamp" read "barren stamp." In the 28th line a semicolon destroys the grammar of the verse; the passage should run—

"and, all dusk as the sad night,

The regal pall hangs the broad shoulder o'er,

Frozen in gorgeous folds, and moveless quite."

In a preceding line the printer's devil has spelt "glazing" glazing—Poor devil! he has to bear much blame—this, however, will not break his back. "Aught" also he has changed to "ought." As to this, he may plead difference of opinion.

You are at perfect liberty to do what you like with this letter. And believe me, my dear Sir,

Yours very sincerely,

JOHN A. HERAUD.

The communications with which we have been favoured by W. D. C. shall appear in the SUPPLEMENT.

Our friend ALFRED is too long this time, and hardly so good as before.

We have to thank several more Correspondents for 'Cumnor Hall.' It is pleasant to see a ballad making so melodious a stir, and giving occasion to so many people to show their good nature. The name of Mr W. of Doncaster, particularly pleased us,—an old acquaintance, if we mistake not.

We must positively be immodest, and print the following passage from the letter of our friend J. W. D. "The JOURNAL," quoth the cordial pen of this gentleman, "seems to many friends and myself to increase in interest and beauty: I earnestly hope that its success bears some proportion to its merits. We intend to celebrate its approaching anniversary, in, I trust, its own spirit, and wish it a long life and a merry. Pray read some more poems with us, after the fashion of that delightful reading of 'the Eve of St Agnes,' many of the beauties of which were then, to me at least, disclosed for the first time." We do not wonder that our Correspondent thinks the JOURNAL increased in interest and beauty, seeing that it has become more miscellaneous, and has to boast of such articles as those of Mr Hazlitt, Mr Webbe, &c. By the way, also, talking of 'Lives,' we give this week an excellent 'Life of Pythagoras,' by Mr Godwin, from his book on the 'Necromancers.' But pieces of biography by men of genius are rare things to get at.

The 'Snow-drop' next week. By the way, will the proprietor of the 'Englishman' allow us to ask why it is not sent to our office regularly? The price, to be sure, is nothing; but we do not find it so easy to secure a regular service of it, where we live, as he may imagine. The same question to our old and respected friend 'Tait.' It is hard that he should not be one to join the unpolitical meeting of good wills in this JOURNAL, when influential editors, of other parties, are not averse from acknowledging the claims of our neutral ground. The great Tory

'Blackwood,' the jovial Tory 'Fraser,' the conservative 'New Monthly,' and the radio-philosophical 'Repository,' all come to us; why should we miss the great Scottish radical?

This question reminds us that we have not received the 'Dublin University' this time. Also, that we have received a new monthly periodical, 'The Agricultural and Industrial Magazine' (of which more by and by); another called the 'Literary Union' (ditto); and the first two monthly parts of a new weekly provincial (Lancaster), intitled 'The Companion,' which is a very clever and promising publication, of the LONDON JOURNAL order, though in an octavo shape, and might as well have done us the honour of asking us to stand godfather to it; for the 'Companion,' be it known to 'time-honoured Lancaster,' is a name of our own. There is some good criticism in these opening numbers, upon Charles Lamb.

We should be glad to hear from P. F. on any other subject; the one he has chosen not being admissible into these our most ultra-considerate columns.

'Luna by Day,' from the German of Richter would be gladly inserted; but we fear the uninitiated would misconstrue its spirit.

S. W. H. complains truly that one of the greatest obstacles to the advancement of the doctrines advocated by our Correspondent T. R., in his question to "Men of Business," is the fancy which too many of them entertain, that trade, and a love of literature, are incompatible. This fancy helps to produce the very error they deprecate, by leading young lovers of books to take them at their word; and so the dispute is exasperated on both sides. They should recollect, that many a thriving tradesman and merchant has been a lover of books and an author. Doddsley, the bookseller, was one; Richardson, the printer, another; Glover, the banker, a third; Voltaire, for all his wit and vivacity, knew how to put his money out to account as well as the shrewdest of city speculators; and the author of 'Robinson Crusoe' was author also of the 'Complete English Tradesman.'

J. B. extremely gratified us, not only by the copy of the publication which accompanied his letter, but by showing us how much intelligence and public feeling are to be looked for in the quarter whose character he helps to elevate.

We doubt whether our Readers in general are yet quite bookish enough to relish the communication with which OLD CRONY has favoured us, intitled a 'A New Old Book.'

We take in good part (as well we may) the brusque but flattering advice of our anonymous friend, who will not stop to get ink to write to us, but venteth himself in pencil. But he will have discovered in the meanwhile that we have not been idle; and we are to discover, we suppose, for our part, that the quotation at the top of his letter was meant to apply to us. If so, it is the first time we were aware of it, nor will matter of fact allow us to acknowledge the likeness.

A. B. protests, on account of his eye-sight, against the alteration in our type proposed by R. H. R. As to the change which he is good enough to propose himself, it stirreth much pleasing vision in our mind's eye, but also much formidable necessity for reflection.

W. H. gratifies us by finding that "repulse" was too strong a word. Not only, he may be certain, was no such thing intended by either party, but if either had had the least suspicion that any manifestation of another sort was desirable, nothing would have been pleasanter than to act accordingly. As to the taunts of those days against "money-dealers," they were idle and unreflecting, and originated solely with the writer; who, though teaching others, required, in that respect, and perhaps a great many more, to be taught himself. W. H. highly pleases us by what he tells us of the good the LONDON JOURNAL does him.

M. N. is informed that the Sensationalists are bound up at present with the volumes, but as there will be a separate index to them by-and-by, they can well be kept distinct, and ultimately bound up by themselves. Thomson was not omitted among the "ice-poets" for want of love; as M. N. may see by turning to a review of his 'Castle of Indolence,' in No. 9. But we thought his 'Seasons' too well known to render a quotation necessary. The passage respecting Booth, and Cato's wig, is in 'Pope's Imitations of Horace,'—the one addressed to Augustus.

The first part of the above answer to J. W. who is thanked for his good opinion of the articles he alludes to; but it is doubtful whether they could be divested of the spirit at least of all political allusion, as to appear with propriety in the JOURNAL.

The article of our friend G. H. L. (from whom we are always happy to hear) is too long, and not quite of a nature for our JOURNAL. We must give the same answer to the Gentleman who writes on 'Monitorial Teaching,' and to the author of 'Prospects of a Law Student,' who has a spirit; however, of which we should be glad to see more.

Will J. H. inform us of the particular nature of what he wishes?

T. R. was not alluded to by the Correspondent in question. His communication shall be read forthwith. We had unfortunately mislaid it.

The 'Calathumpian' is told in proper gossiping style; but those practical jokes are hardly good for example, however they may be occasionally deserved.

We must make use of the welcome criticism in the 'Bristol Mercury' for the exordium of a similar conscience-smitten review of our own!

Whatever communications addressed to us, now remain unnoticed at the end of the present inordinate article, have either not come to hand, or consist of that sort of conventional merit which baffles selection.

SUNDAY IN THE SUBURBS;

BEING MORE LAST WORDS ON 'SUNDAY IN LONDON,' WITH A DIGRESSION ON THE NAME OF SMITH.

IN writing our articles on this subject, we have been so taken up, first with the dull look of the Sunday streets, and afterwards with the lovers who make their walls lively on the hidden side, that we fairly overlooked a feature in our Metropolitan Sabbath, eminently sabbatical; to wit, the suburbs and their holiday-makers. What a thing to forget! What a thing to forget, even if it concerned only Smith in his new hat and boots. Why, he has been thinking of them all the week; and how could we, who sympathise with all the Smith-ism and boots in existence, forget them? The latter did not bring home his hat till last night, the boot-maker his boots till this morning. How did not Smith (and he is a shrewd fellow too, and reads us,) pounce upon the hat-box, undo its clinging pasteboard lid, whisk off the silver paper, delicately develop the dear beaver, and put it on before the glass! The truth must be owned;—he ate in it half supper-time. Never was such a neat fit. All Aldersgate, and the City-road, and the New-road, and Camden and Kentish-towns, glided already before him, as he went along in it,—hatted in thought. He could have gone to sleep in it,—if it would not have spoiled his nap, and its own.

Then his boots!—Look at him.—There he goes—up Somers-town. Who would suspect, from the ease and superiority of his countenance, that he had not had his boots above two hours,—that he had been a good fourth part of the time labouring and fetching the blood up in his face with pulling them on with his boot-hooks,—and that at this moment they horribly pinch him! But he has a small foot—has Jack Smith; and he would squeeze, jam, and damn it into a thimble, rather than acknowledge it to be a bit larger than it seems.

Do not think very ill of him, especially you that pinch a little less. Jack has sympathies; and as long as the admiration of the community runs towards little feet and well-polished boots, he cannot dispense, in those quarters, with the esteem of his fellow-men. As the sympathies enlarge, Jack's boots will grow wider; and we venture to prophesy that at forty he will care little for little feet, and much for his corns and the public good. We are the more bold in this anticipation, from certain reminiscences we have of boots of our own. We shall not enter into details, for fear of compromising the dignity of literature; but the good-natured may think of them what they please. Nam ignoro mali (said Dido), misericordia succurrere disco: that is, having known what it was to wear shoes too small herself, she should never measure, for her part, the capabilities of a woman's head, by the prettiness of her slippers.

Napoleon was proud of a little foot; and Caesar, in his youth, was a dandy. So go on, Smith, and bear your tortures like a man; especially towards one o'clock, when it will be hot and dusty.

Smith does not carry a cane with a twist at the top of it for a handle. That is for an inferior grade of holiday-maker, who pokes about the suburbs, gaping at the new buildings, or treats his fellow-servant to a trip to White Conduit-house, and an orange by the way—always too sour. Smith has a stick or a whangsee; or, if he rides, a switch. He is not a good rider; and we must say it is his own fault, for he rides only on Sundays, and will not scrape acquaintance with the ostler on other days of the week. You may know him on horseback by the brisk forlornness of his steed, the inclined plane of his body, the extreme outwardness or inwardness of his toes, and an expression of face betwixt ardour, fear, and indifference. He is the most without a footman of any man in the world; that is to say, he has the most excessive desire to be taken for a man who ought to have one; and, therefore, the space of road behind him pursues him, as it were, with the reproach of its emptiness.

A word, by the way, as to our use of the generic name 'Smith.' A Correspondent wrote to us the other day, intimating that it would be a good-natured thing if we refrained in future from designating classes of men by the name of 'Tomkins.' We knew not whether he was a Tomkins himself, or whether he only felt for some friend of that name, or for the whole body of the Tomkinases; all we know is, that he has taken the word out of our mouth for ever. How many paragraphs he may have ruined by it, we cannot say; but the truth is, he has us on our weak side. We can resist no appeal to our good-nature made by a good-natured man. Besides, we like him for the seriousness and good faith with which he took the matter to heart, and for the niceness of his sympathy. Adieu, then, name of Tomkins! Even Jenkins we shall hardly venture upon in future. But let nobody interfere in behalf of Smith; for Smith does not want it. Smith is too universal, even a John Smith could not regard the use of his name as personal; for John Smith, as far as his name is concerned, has no personality. He is a class, a huge body; he has a good bit of the Directory to himself. You may see for pages together (if our memory does not deceive us), John Smith, John Smith, John Smith, or rather,

Smith, John,
Smith, John,
Smith, John,
Smith, John,
Smith, John,
Smith, John,
Smith, John,

and so on, with everlasting Smith-Johnism, like a set of palisades or iron rails; almost as if you could make them clink as you go, with drawing something along them. The repetition is dazzling. The monotony bristles with sameness. It is a chocrou-de-Smith. John Smith, in short, is so public and multitudinous a personage, that we do not hesitate to say we know an excellent individual of that name, whose regard we venture thus openly to boast of, without earing to run any danger of offending his modesty; for nobody will know whom we mean. An Italian poet says he hates his name of John, because if anybody calls him by it in the street, twenty people look out of window. Now let anybody call "John Smith!" and half Holborn will cry out "Well!"

As to other and famous Smiths, they are too strongly marked out by their fame; sometimes by their Christian names; and partly, indeed, by the uncommon lustre they attain by their very commonness, to make us at all squeamish in helping ourselves to their generic appellation at ordinary times. Who will ever think of confounding Smith, in the abstract, with Adam Smith, or Sir Sidney Smith, or the Reverend Sydney Smith, or James and Horace Smith, or Dr Southwood Smith, or any other concretion of wit, bravery, or philosophy?

By this time, following, as we talk, our friend Jack up the road, we arrived at the first suburb tea-gardens, which he, for his part, passes with disdain; not our friend, John Smith, be it observed, for his philosophy is as universal as his name; but Jack Smith, our friend of the new hat and boots. And yet he will be a philosopher, too, by-and-by; and his boots shall help him to philosophise; but all in good time. Meanwhile, we who are old enough to consult our inclination in preference to our grandeur, turn into the tea-gardens, where there is no tea going forward, and not much garden; but worlds of beer, and tobacco-pipes, and alcoves; and in a corner behind some palings there is (we fear) a sound of skittles. May no clergyman hear it, who is twisting his thumbs, or listening to the ring of his wine-glasses. How hot the people look! how unpinned the goodly old dames! how tired, yet untired, the children! and how each alcove opens upon you as you pass, with its talk, smoke, beer and bad paint! Then what a feast to their eyes is the grass-plot! Truly, without well knowing it, do they sit down almost as much to the enjoyment of that green table of Nature's in the midst of them, as to their tobacco and "half-and-half." It is something which they do not see all the rest of the week; the first bit of grass, of any size, which they come to from home; and here they stop and are content. For our parts, we wish they would go further, as Smith does, and get fairly out in the fields; but they will do that, as they get freer, and wiser, and more comfortable, and learn to know and love what the wild-flowers have to say—to them. At present how should they be able to hear those small angelical voices, when their ears are ringing with stocking-frames and crying children, and they are but too happy in their tired-heartedness to get to the first bit of holiday ground they can reach?

"We come away, and mingle with the crowds returning home, among whom we recognise our friend of the twisted cane, and his lass; who looks the reddest, proudest, and most assured of maid-servants, and sometimes "snubs" him a little, out loud, to show her power; though she loves every blink of his eye. Yonder is a multitude collected round a Methodist preacher, whom they think far "behind his age," extremely ignorant of yesterday's unstamped, but "well-meaning," a "poor mistaken fellow, sir;" and they will not have him hustled by the police. Lord X should hear what they say. It might put an idea in his head.

The gas-lights begin to shine; the tide of the crowd grows thinner; chapel-windows are lit up; maid-servants stand in door-ways; married couples carry their children, or dispute about them; and children, not carried, cry for spite, and jumble their souls out.

As for Smith, he is in some friend's room, very comfortable, with his brandy and water beside him, his coloured handkerchief on his knee, and his boots intermittent.*

LOVE AND EGOTISM.

Egotism works on others for its own—love, for those other's sake. Egotism demands, love in its very deeds finds, its reward. Love embraces all things, and finds them in the one—God. Egotism sees all things for, and in all creation sees but, one thing—self. Love, in short, is power; and egotism, fear, weakness.—Outline of a National System of Education (a book worthy the attention of the reflecting).

HINTS FOR TABLE TALK.

No. VII.

ASSOCIATION OF IDEAS—MERCANTILE REMINISCENCES—CITY GATHERING—THE EVERY-DAY WALK—THE REGULAR OLD GENTLEMAN—THE REGULAR STAGE—OMNIBUS—HORSEMAN—CAB—CARRIAGE—FAMILIAR FACES—SHOPS—HOUSE TO LET—DOOR WASHING—CROSSING SWEEPERS—STY-SORES—THE HOUSE IN CHANCERY.

It is truly said that the most barren and monotonous object may be clothed with associations which will make it a source of pleasure. The city clerk in his counting-house glances over the row of account-books big with the transactions of the firm for perhaps the last half century, adorned and dated with every "Anno Domini" since 17—, and their regularity fatigues his eye, and he would fain find relief in a strange face, or at the window, but it is dimmed, or grained, and impenetrable to the visual organs. But the merchant himself looks with far different feelings upon these folios. As he reads the thousand, the hundreds, the tens, and the units of each year, he is reminded of some profitable speculation, or unfortunate loss; some great bankruptcy, or time of panic; some season when the stocks were very high, or another in which they were equally low; from transactions he is led to the persons connected with them, and so on through an interminable maze of life and circumstance. He feels anew the joy upon his first lucrative speculation, and the grief upon the first serious loss experienced by his firm; and bounding from hill to hill in his land of memory, scans the rise and progress of his "house" to its present standing in the city. All these thoughts may pass in a mind of very mediocre capacity; it is but an exercise of the faculty of memory, of which all are possessed in a greater or less degree.

From the time when the rising sun throws its rays upon the cross and dome of the majestic cathedral of St Paul, to the bustling hour of mid-day, there is a constant influx of human life from the suburbs to the centre of the city; the population of the district there gathers to a focus. As the sun again is on the wane, the rays of human life diverge to all the country adjacent, within the compass, perhaps, of the "Map of ten miles round London." The greater part of these persons are pedestrians—some take an omnibus, some the regular stage, some are in gigs, some on horseback, and a few in their own carriages; hackney cabs are never used, unless an individual has conversed himself in consequence of a previous night's carousal, and then endeavours to redeem the time by the help of four extra feet.

I have now in my eye those persons who tread and re-tread the same path, day after day, month after month and year after year—and to whom everything on the way is as familiar as the alphabet. I will suppose myself to be one of the pedestrians; that my residence is between two and three miles of the Exchange, near which is my office of business; that my way is a well-frequented road; that I am punctual to my time in setting out; and that I have gone in the morning to the city, and returned from thence in the evening every day, Sundays excepted, for a dozen years or so; and, moreover, that having found the nearest way between the two points, by sundry experimental journeys at first, I have always kept to that one road. One would be apt to say, that the monotony of such a course was fatiguing, and its familiarity wearisome.

Beloved Lector, it is not so. The same road, trodden every day at the same hour a thousand times, will, on the thousand and first time, be found interesting and entertaining.

In the first place, rising from the table after breakfast, you walk to the window to see what tone of countenance the weather bears. At that moment you see a precise old gentleman, rather stout, walking with a regular pace, which neither betokens hurry nor loitering; if there is the least chance of rain, he carries an umbrella under his arm—if fine weather, a stick of rather knotty wood, with a head like a vulture's beak, worn white and smooth by constant use. You have become so accustomed to his figure passing the window, that his appearance excites as little emotion as the opposite houses. Yet, if it be your desire, you may make him a "peg whereon to hang a tail" of observations and reflections. Remark the day he wears some new garment; if it be a dirty morning, does he not pick his steps with greater nicety? Does he wear a more thoughtful or a more gay countenance than usual? Speculate in your mind as to what may have been its cause.

When you get into the road, the accustomed omnibus passes with the same, or nearly the same, passengers; but this vehicle is not so favourable for observation as the regular stage—the driver of which you may almost claim acquaintance with. A constant passenger occupies the half of the coach-box, who considers he has an acknowledged right to the seat, and would be as greatly surprised at anyone taking possession of it, as at a stranger entering his house unbidden. Should you be caught by a sudden shower, you perhaps take the stage or omnibus. Upon entering it, you are almost looked upon as an intruder, not being a regular passenger.

Every regular equestrian you recognise as he passes you on the road. There is one or two worth remarking. The old gentleman on a short thick-set bay cob, with a footman at a respectful distance—generally at a walking pace, but occasionally it quickens into a gentle amble. Should you, by any chance, be five minutes or so later than usual, you will meet the servant returning, leading his master's steed by the bridle, and he no doubt traverses the same road again in the evening to bring the old gentleman back. The rich merchant in his carriage, the stock-broker in his cabriolet, with a dapper foot-boy standing on a board six inches square, behind. You meet the same faces, morning after morning; and anything remarkable about any of these stranger acquaintances your eye catches at once. The impression which these faces leave upon your mind is very indecisive, altogether local, and you know them only at the usual place of passing on the road; should you meet one of them in company, or in an out-of-the-way quarter, you are quite puzzled to think where you have seen the face before. You feel confident that you have seen it; but whether as an old acquaintance, a stage-coach companion, or how else, you cannot determine. You are annoyed, too, lest you should, unintentionally, have cut an old irony, or been guilty of a breach of good manners, or good feeling. Oftimes you cannot unravel the mystery till you again meet him at the accustomed spot on the daily peregrination. May not the same perplexity have occupied his mind with regard to yourself, which is likewise at the same moment explained?

You may further take notice of the different shops which are open, or opening, as you pass, how the display of goods in the windows varies with the season, taste, or fashion; or as some particular holiday or festival comes round that affects the trade, how every appropriate article is blanded forth to tempt a purchaser. A newly opened shop is a red-letter observation—you watch the rise and progress, or decline and fall of the successful or unsuccessful tradesman on your route, as if you had an interest in the concern. On the first appearance of a bill in a window—"This house to let," you naturally give it a more particularly inquiring look, to ascertain the motive for removal, or to see the commencement of the packing-up operations. As quarter-day approaches you are sure to observe some indications of a bustle—like the hum of the bees in the hive before they swarm—and on the day itself, at a good distance, you catch sight of the half-loaded waggon,—chairs, tables, stools, and other articles of furniture lying about the pavement before the door, interspersed with straw, ropes, and rush matting. Having seen the departure of a tenant, you cast your eye on the house every morning to see if it be let, of which you have token by the removal of the bill. The new tenant also undergoes your scrutiny, and for a few mornings you give them a passing glance, to see if they appear comfortable in their new abode, and what kind of people they are.

There are also certain regular servant-maids, which you take note of, on their knees (not at their devotions, but) "washing the door," as they say, but properly, the pavement before the door. By the by, I may mention that an Esculapian friend of mine informed me, that a large portion of the inmates of the Metropolitan hospitals were servants with ulcerated knees, which had been caused by continually kneeling on stones and boards, to wash and scrub them. Is there no remedy, or rather preventive, for this?

At the dirtiest crossing on your road, you usually give the sweeper a few halfpence on dirty days, and he or she is most likely a character. These mendicants, with "characters," always come best off. A common-place beggar, I should think, seldom gets much, at least in comparison with one who has a "character." Crossing-sweepers perplex one's eleemosynary faculties: one cannot bestow largess upon them all, and it is difficult to say who is the most deserving. I moreover feel as if I had no right to walk upon the swept part, unless I give something, and am sometimes inclined rather to walk in the mud. Although the sweeper depends on the casual bounty of passers by, and has no legal right to a toll—the trouble he bestows in keeping a passage clean appears to give him a shadow of a moral right, and I have an idea of trespass when I avail myself of the convenience without paying the price.

In the course of your daily route, there is sure to be some pimple on the fair face of nature, some blotch on the countenance of art, which acts as a continual eye-sore to you. Some wrong spelt name in a sign board—something out of the perpendicular—some two lines not parallel, which ought to be so—some building with wings, which are not equal—or else some awkwardly divided name and trade over a double shop front (such as "Cheese—Fish—Monger"—"Green—White—Grocer"—"Carpenter and Merry—Undertaker.") But the greatest of all eye-sores is a "house in chancery"—There it stands, dull, dirty, and dilapidated; the windows broken and the stones which have been thrown at them resting on the sills—the foundation rotten, and the roof broken in—it stands like a corpse among the living.

I have but touched upon what has occurred to me as most likely to be observable in every walk, as there are, of course, particular things peculiar to every locality, and remarkable to each individual.

BOOKWORK.

Our correspondent has written to us to correct two errors of the press in his last communication. Parriti should be Parritch; and Cælestes ambo, Cælebes ambo (Bachelors both, not Cælestials). The latter mistake was the Editor's, who could not see through a certain blot which happened to be upon the word, and thought that the designation might possibly refer to some jovial membership of a club, or some such thing, in which people take high-flying appellations from the exaltation of their animal spirits.

CHARACTERS OF SHAKSPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

NO. X.—TIMON OF ATHENS.

'TIMON OF ATHENS' always appeared to us to be written with as intense a feeling of his subject as any one play of Shakspeare. It is one of the few in which he seems to be in earnest throughout, never to trifle nor go out of his way. He does not relax in his efforts, nor lose sight of the unity of his design. It is the only play of our author in which spleen is the predominant feeling of the mind. It is as much a satire as a play: and contains some of the finest pieces of invective possible to be conceived, both in the snarling, captious answers of the cynic Apemantus, and in the impassioned and more terrible imprecations of Timon. The latter remind the classical reader of the force and swelling impetuosity of the moral declamations in 'Juvenal,' while the former have all the keenness and caustic severity of the old stoic philosophers. The soul of Diogenes appears to have been seated on the lips of Apemantus. The churlish profession of misanthropy in the cynic is contrasted with the profound feeling of it in Timon, and also with the soldier-like and determined resentment of Alcibiades against his countrymen, who have banished him, though this forms only an incidental episode in the tragedy.

The fable consists of a single event;—of the transition from the highest pomp and profusion of artificial refinement to the most abject state of savage life, and privation of all social intercourse. The change is as rapid as it is complete; nor is the description of the rich and generous Timon, banqueting in gilded palaces, pampered by every luxury, prodigal of his hospitality, courted by crowds of flatterers, poets, painters, lords, ladies, who—

"Follow his strides, his lobbies fill with tendance,
Rain sacrificial whisperings in his ear;
And through him drink the free air"— more striking than that of the sudden falling off of his friends and fortune, and his naked exposure in a wild forest digging roots from the earth for his sustenance, with a lofty spirit of self-denial, and bitter scorn of the world, which raise him higher in our esteem than the dazzling gloss of prosperity could do. He grudges himself the means of life, and is only busy in preparing his grave. How forcibly is the difference between what he was, and what he is described in Apemantus's taunting questions, when he comes to reproach him with the change in his way of life!—

"What, think'st thou,
That the bleak air, thy boisterous chamberlain,
Will put thy shirt on warm? will these moist trees
That have out-liv'd the eagle, page thy heels,
And skip when thou point'st out? will the cold brook,
Candied with ice, caudle thy morning taste
To cure thy o'er-night's surfeit? Call the creatures,
Whose naked natures live in all the spight
Of wreakful heav'n, whose bare unhoussed trunks,
To the conflicting elements expos'd,
Answer mere nature, bid them flatter thee."

The manners are everywhere preserved with distinct truth. The poet and painter are very skilfully played off against one another, both affecting great attention to the other, and each taken up with his own vanity, and the superiority of his own art. Shakspeare has put into the mouth of the former a very lively description of the genius of poetry and of his own in particular:—

"A thing slipt idly from me.
Our poesy is as a gum, which issues
From whence 'tis nourish'd. The fire i' th' flint Shows not till it be struck: our gentle flame
Provokes itself—and like the current flies
Each bound it chafes."

The hollow friendship and shuffling evasions of the Athenian lords, their smooth professions and pitiful ingratitude, are very satisfactorily exposed, as well as the different disguises to which the meanness of self-love resorts in such cases to hide a want of generosity and good faith. The lurking selfishness of Apemantus does not pass undetected amidst the grossness of his sarcasms and his contempt for the pretensions of others. Even the two courtezans who accompany Alcibiades to the cave of Timon are very characteristically sketched; and the thieves who come to visit him are also "true men" in their way.—An exception to this general picture of selfish depravity is found in the old and honest steward, Flavius, to whom Timon pays a full tribute of tenderness. Shakspeare was unwilling to draw a picture "all over ugly with hypocrisy." He owed this character to the good-natured solicitations of his Muse. His mind was well said by Ben Jonson to be the "sphere of humanity."

The moral sententiousness of this play equals that of Lord Bacon's 'Treatise on the Wisdom of the Ancients,' and is indeed seasoned with greater variety. Every topic of contempt or indignation is here exhausted; but while the sordid licentiousness of Apemantus, which turns everything to gall and bitterness, shows only the natural virulence of his temper and antipathy to good or evil alike, Timon does not utter an imprecation without betraying the extravagant workings of disappointed passion, of love altered to hate. Apemantus sees nothing good in any object, and exaggerates whatever is disgusting: Timon is tormented with the perpetual contrast between things and appearances, between the fresh, tempting outside and the rottenness within, and invokes mischiefs on the heads of mankind proportioned to the sense of his wrongs and of their treacheries. He impatiently cries out, when he finds the gold,—

"This yellow slave

Will knit and break religions; bless the accurs'd;
Make the hoar leprosy ador'd; place thieves,
And give them title, knee, and approbation,
With senators on the bench; this is it,
That makes the wappen'd widow wed again;
She, whom the spital-house
Would cast the gorge at, this embalms and spices
To th' April day again."

One of his most dreadful imprecations is that which occurs immediately on his leaving Athens:—

"Let me look back upon thee, O thou wall,
That girdlest in those wolves! Dive in the earth,
And fence not Athens! Matrons, turn incontinent;
Obedience, fail in children; slaves and fools,
Pluck the grave wrinkled senate from the bench,
And minister in their steads. To general filth
Convert o' th' instant green virginity!
Do't in your parents' eyes. Bankrupts, hold fast;
Rather than render back, out with your knives,
And cut your trusters' throats! Bound servants, steal:
Large-handed robbers your grave masters are,
And pill by law. Maid, to thy master's bed:
Thy mistress is i' th' brothel. Son of sixteen,
Pluck the lin'd crutch from thy old limping sire,
And with it beat his brains out! Fear and piety,
Religion to the Gods, peace, justice, truth,
Domestic awe, night-rest, and neighbourhood,
Instructions, manners, mysteries and trades,
Degrees, bse vances, customs and laws,
Decline to your confounding contraries;
And let confusion live!—Plagues, incident to men,
Your potent and infectious fevers heap
On Athens, ripe for stroke! Thou cold sciatica,
Cripple our senators, that their limbs may halt
As lamely as their manners! Lust and liberty,
Creep in the minds and manners of our youth,
That 'gainst the stream of virtue they may strive,
And drown themselves in riot! Itches, blains,
Sow all th' Athenian bosoms; and their crop
Be general leprosy: breath, infect breath,
That their society (as their friendship) may Be merely poison!"

Timon is here just as ideal in his passion for ill as he had before been in his belief of good. Apemantus was satisfied with the mischief existing in the world, and with his own ill-nature. One of the most decisive intimations of Timon's morbid jealousy of appearances is in his answer to Apemantus, who asks him,—

"What things in the world can'st thou nearest compare with thy flatterers?
TIMON. Women nearest: but men, men are the things themselves."

Apemantus, it is said, "loved few things better than to abhor himself." This is not the case with Timon, who neither loves to abhor himself nor others. All his vehement misanthropy is forced, uphill work. From the slippery turns of fortune, from the turmoils of passion and adversity, he wishes to sink into the quiet of the grave. On that subject his thoughts are intent, on that he finds time and place to grow romantic. He digs his own grave by the sea-shore, contrives his funeral ceremonies amidst the pomp and desolation, and builds his mausoleum of the elements:—

"Come not to me again; but say to Athens,

Timon hath made his everlasting mansion
Upon the beached verge of the salt flood;
Which once a-day with his embossed froth
The turbulent surge shall cover.—Thither come,
And let my grave-stone be your oracle."

And again, Alcibiades, after reading his epitaph, says of him—

"These well express in thee thy latter spirits:
Though thou abhorrest in us our human griefs,
Scorn'dst our brain's flow, and those our droplets, which
From niggard nature fall; yet rich conceit
Taught thee to make vast Neptune weep for aye
On thy low grave"—

thus making the winds his funeral dirge, his mourner the murmuring ocean; and seeking in the everlasting solemnities of nature oblivion of the transitory splendour of his life-time.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

[Our present story from the 'Lounger' (a very striking one) is preceded by some remarks of his, singularly characteristic of the man, who, with a great deal of hearty good in him; had much that was vehement and suspicious; of a piece with the anxious stubbornness with which he kept himself concealed from the public. Perhaps, he feared some such fate as, he here intimates, is sometimes caused by a favourite "housekeeper."]

LEIL—A REMARKABLE INSTANCE OF RECOVERY FROM THE GRAVE, RECORDED AND AUTHENTICATED BY SEVERAL HISTORIANS.

It is mentioned here in order to stimulate the friends of persons whose animation has been suspended by drowning, suffocation, and other accidents; and to encourage them not to relax in their efforts of recovery, however hopeless appearances may be. I also mean this article as a salutary check on persons of another description: the residuary legatees, second cousins, favourite house-keepers, and religious intimates of wealthy bachelors, rich widows, and childless, or childish, old men. I would wish them not to be too hasty in laying them out, and to pay some little regard to decency and decorum before they send for the undertaker, screw up the coffin, and rummage for the will.

A spark of life, not yet wholly extinguished, may be roused into a flame, by their abominable hypocrisy, and their avaricious hopes be ultimately defeated by a new devisee.

But, waiving further preliminary comment, and to come at once to the fact, the circumstance in question took place in the sixteenth century, during the reign of Elizabeth of England, and Charles the IXth of France, at the period when the intrepid female who filled the English throne felt it her duty, or her interest, to interfere in the wars of the league, and actually sent an army of 6,000 men, under the command of the Earl of Warwick, who took possession of Dieppe and Havre-de-Grace, but was too late to prevent the city of Rouen being taken by assault by the Duke of Guise and his party.

It was at this siege, and in defending Fort St Catherine, that Francis de St Civile, a young man of good family in Normandy, but somewhat tainted with the new opinions, leading on the company he commanded, received a musket shot, which, entering his right cheek, and passing obliquely downwards, was buried in his neck.

A considerable effusion of blood took place, he fell motionless on the ground, and soon after, being considered as dead, was stripped, and with another corpse committed to the earth.

A faithful old servant of his family's impatiently waited his return, and, on being told what had happened, was anxious to see the body of his beloved master; and, with a superstition, in this instance amiable, to give it Christian burial.

In the eagerness of zeal and love, he procured several soldiers of M. de St Civile's company to attend him with torches to the spot where the captain was buried. The day was already closed when he received the melancholy intelligence, and a solemn stillness reigned over a spot so lately the scene of carnage and confusion.

They opened many graves in vain, and as they were fearful of exciting the attention and drawing upon themselves the fire of the besiegers, were preparing to return, without having accomplished their purpose, when the domestic's attention was attracted by some bright body on the ground, which, reflecting the blaze of the torch, sparkled in his eye.

Turning back to examine the cause, he saw, uncovered, a hand and arm of some corpse already buried; on closer inspection, and gazing with eager looks, he found that the glittering object was a diamond ring on one of the fingers; this he instantly recognized, having formerly brought it to his master, as a token of love from the mistress of the young soldier's heart.

The body was disinterred without delay, and the valet, bearing it in his arms, returned to his quarters. He could not help remarking, as he carried this honourable burthen, that it was still warm; stopping a moment to look at that face which had smiled on him a thousand times; he perceived something like a faint breath issuing from the mouth. This circumstance created new hopes; and the instant he reached home, placing the body in a warm bed, and calling in medical aid, the wounded man gradually recovered.

The first object De St Civile opened his eyes on, was the fond, the faithful servant, who had attended him from his entrance into life and had now snatched him from an untimely grave.

He remained for several weeks in a languid state; and the city was in the meantime taken by storm. The besiegers being exasperated against the family of the wounded captain, for the active part they had taken, with that more than savage animosity with which civil wars are carried on; threw the sick man from the window.

Fortunately for M. de St Civile there was a large dung-hill underneath, on which he fell without injury; here, in the noise and confusion of a military assault, he lay for several days unnoticed by the enemy, was occasionally supplied with a little nourishment, and at last conveyed by night, through the kind care of his original deliverer, to a farmhouse, a few miles from the city; at this place, with good nursing, he at length recovered; and was personally known to Monsieur de Thou, to whom I am obliged for a good part of this short, but interesting, narrative.

THE LIFE OF PYTHAGORAS.

BY WILLIAM GODWIN.

[THE name of Pythagoras, partly owing to its antiquity, and partly to the mysticism attached to it, sounds at this time of day almost like a thing of fable, and of no importance to "men's business and bosoms." But a little reflection, and the treatment of it, as here given, by a man of genius, soon show us otherwise. The founder of the Platonic philosophy, who was also a mathematical discoverer, and influences the commonest movements of science as well as imagination to this day, here stands before us, as real a man as ever existed, and, like so many others, at once a great and a weak man, a teacher of truth and a user of falsehood, and thereby an injurer of his truth and of his fame. The moral is obvious and affecting.—The Life is taken from Mr Godwin's lately published work upon Necromancers.]

THE name of Pythagoras is one of the most remarkable in the records of the human species; and his character is well worthy of the minutest investigation. By this name we are brought at once within the limits of history properly so called. He lived in the time of Darius and Cyrus Hystaspes, of Croesus, of Pisistratus, of Polycrates, tyrant of Samos, and Amasis, King of Egypt. Many hypotheses have been laid down respecting the precise period of his birth and death; but as it is not to our purpose to enter into any lengthened discussions of that sort, we will adopt at once the statement that appears to be the most probable, which is that of Lloyd, who fixes his birth about the year before Christ 566, and his death about the year 506.

Pythagoras was a man of the most various accomplishments, and appears to have penetrated, in different directions, into the depths of human knowledge. He sought wisdom in its retreats of faintest promise, in Egypt and other distant countries. In this investigation he employed the earlier period of his life, probably till he was about forty, and devoted the remainder to such modes of proceeding, as appeared to him the most likely to secure the advantage of what he had acquired to a late posterity.

He founded a school, and delivered his acquisitions by oral communication to a numerous body of followers. He divided his pupils into two classes, the one neophytes, to whom were explained only the most obvious and general truths; the others, who were admitted into the intire confidence of the master. These last he caused to throw their property into a common stock, and to live together in the same place of resort. He appears to have spent the latter part of his life in that part of Italy called Magna Græcia, so denominated, in some degree, from the numerous colonies of Græcians by whom it was planted, and partly, perhaps, from the memory of the illustrious things which Pythagoras achieved there. He is said to have spread the seeds of political liberty in Crotona, Sybaris, Metapontum, and Rhegium, and from thence in Sicily to Tauromenium, Catania, Agrigento, and Himera. Charondas and Zaleucus, themselves famous legislators, derived the rudiments of their political wisdom from the instructions of Pythagoras.

But this marvellous man, in some way, whether from the knowledge he received, or from his own proper instructions, has secured to his species benefits of a more permanent nature, and which shall outlive the revolutions of ages, and the instability of political institutions. He was a profound geometrician. The two theorems, that the internal angles of every right-angle triangle are equal to two right-angles, and that the square of the hypotenuse of every right-angled triangle is equal to the sum of the squares of the other two sides, are ascribed to him. In memory of the latter of these discoveries, he is said to have offered a public sacrifice to the Gods; and the theorem is still known by the name of the Pythagorean theorem. He ascertained, from the length of the Olympic course, which was understood to have measured six hundred of Hercules's feet, the precise stature of that hero. Lastly, Pythagoras is the first person who is known to have taught the spherical figure of the earth, and that we have antipodes; and he propagated the doctrine that the earth is a planet, and that the sun is the centre round which the earth and the other planets move, now known by the name of the Copernican system.

To inculcate a pure and simple mode of subsistence was also an object of pursuit of Pythagoras. He taught a total abstinence from everything having had the property of animal life. It has been affirmed, as we have seen, that Orpheus, before him, taught the same thing. But the claim of Orpheus to this distinction is ambiguous, while the theories and dogmas of the Samian sage, as he has frequently been styled, were more methodically digested, and produced more lasting and unequivocal effects. He taught temperance in all its branches; and a resolute subjection of the appetites of the body to contemplation and the exercises of the mind; and, by the unremitted discipline and authority he exerted over his followers, he caused his lessons to be constantly observed. There was, therefore, an edifying and an exemplary simplicity that prevailed, as far as the influence of Pythagoras extended, that won golden opinions to his adherents at all times that they appeared, and in all places.

One revolution that Pythagoras worked, was that; whereas, immediately before, those who are most conspicuous among the Greeks, as instructors of mankind in understanding and virtue, styled themselves sophists, professors of wisdom, this illustrious man desired to be known only by the appellation of a philosopher, a lover of wisdom. The sophists had previously brought their denomination into discredit and reproach by the arrogance of their pretensions, and the impudic way in which they attempted to lay down the law to the world.

The modesty of this appellation, however, did not altogether suit with the deep designs of Pythagoras, the ascendancy he resolved to acquire, and the secular subjection in which he deemed it necessary to hold those who placed themselves under his instruction. This wonderful man set out with making himself a model of the passive and unscrupulous docility, which he afterwards required from others. He did not begin to teach till he was forty-eight years of age, and from eighteen to that period he studied in foreign countries, with the resolution to submit to all his teachers enjoined, and to make himself master of their least communicated and most secret wisdom. In Egypt, in particular, we are told that, although he brought a letter of recommendation from Polykrates, his native sovereign, to Amasis, king of that country, who fully concurred with the views of the writer, the priests, jealous of admitting a foreigner into their secrets, baffled him as long as they could, referring him from one college to another, and prescribing to him the most rigorous preparatives, not excluding the rite of circumcision. But Pythagoras endured and underwent everything, till at length their unwillingness was conquered, and his perseverance received its suitable reward.

When in the end Pythagoras thought himself fully qualified for the task he had all along had in view, he was no less strict in prescribing ample preliminaries to his own scholars. At the time that a pupil was proposed to him, the master, we are told, examined him with multiplied questions; as to his principles, his habits, and intentions, observed minutely his voice and manner of speaking, his walk and his gestures, the lines of his countenance, and the expression and management of his eye, and when he was satisfied with these, then, and not till then, admitted him as a probationer. It is to be supposed that all this must have been personal. As soon, however, as this was over, the master was withdrawn from the sight of the pupil; and a novitiate of three and five, in all eight years, was prescribed to the scholar, during which time he was only to hear his instructor from behind a curtain, and the strictest silence was enjoined him through the whole period. As the instructions Pythagoras received in Egypt and the East admitted of no dispute, so in his turn, he required an unreserved submission from those who heard him: αυτος εφη, "the master has said it," was deemed a sufficient solution to all doubt and uncertainty.

To give the greater authority and effect to his communications, Pythagoras hid himself, during the day at least, from the great body of his pupils, and was only seen by them at night. Indeed there is no reason to suppose that anyone was admitted into his intire familiarity. When he came forth, he appeared in a long garment of the purest white, with a flowing beard, and a garland upon his head. He is said to have been of the finest symmetrical form, with a majestic carriage, and a grave and awful countenance. He suffered his followers to believe that he was one of the gods, the Hyperborean Apollo; and is said to have told Abaris, that he assumed the human form that he might the better invite men to an easiness of approach, and a confidence in him. What, however, seems to have been agreed in by all his biographers is, that he professed to have already in different ages appeared in the likeness of a man; first, as Æthalides, the son of Mercury; and when his father expressed himself as ready to invest him with any gift short of immortality, he prayed that, as the human soul is destined successively to dwell in various forms, he might have the privilege in each to remember his former state of being, which was granted him. From Æthalides he became Euphorbus, who slew Patroclus at the siege of Troy. He then appeared as Hermodimus, then Pyrrhus, a fisherman of Delos, and, finally, Pythagoras. He said that a period of time was interposed between each transmigration, during which he visited the seat of departed souls; and he professed to relate a part of the wonders he had seen. He is said to have eaten sparingly and in secret, and in all respects to have given himself out for being not subject to the ordinary laws of nature.

Pythagoras, therefore, pretended to miraculous endowments. Happening to be on the sea shore when certain fishermen drew to the land an enormous number of fishes, he desired them to allow him to dispose of the capture, which they consented to do, provided he would name the precise number they had caught. He did so, and required that they should throw their prize into the sea again, at the same time paying them the value of the fish. He tamed a Daunian bear by whispering in his ear, and prevailed on him henceforth to refrain from the flesh of animals, and to feed on vegetables. By the same means he induced an ox not to eat beans, which was a diet especially prohibited by Pythagoras; and he called down an eagle from his flight, causing him to sit on his hand, and submit to be stroked down by the philosopher. In Greece, when he passed the river Nessus, in Macedon, the stream was heard to salute with the words, "Hail, Pythagoras!" When Abaris addressed him as one of the heavenly host, he took the stranger aside, and convinced him that he was under no mistake, by exhibiting to him his thigh of gold; or, according to another account, he used the same sort of evidence at a certain time, to convince his pupils of his celestial descent. He is said to have been seen on the same day at Metapontum in Italy, and at Tauromium in Sicily, though these places are divided by the sea, so that it was conceived that it would cost several days to pass from one to the other. In one instance, he absented himself from his associates in Italy for a whole year; and when he appeared again, related that he had passed that time in the infernal regions, describing likewise the marvellous things he had seen. Diogenes Laertius, speaking of this circumstance, affirms however, that he remained during this period in a cave, where his mother conveyed to him intelligence and necessities, and that, when he came once more into light and air, he appeared so emaciated and colourless, that he might well be believed to have come out of Hades.

The close of the life of Pythagoras was, according to every statement, in the midst of misfortune and violence. Some particulars are related by Iamblichus, which, though he is not an authority beyond all exception, are so characteristic as seems to insinuate them to the being transcribed. This author is more circumstantial than any other in stating the elaborate steps by which the pupils of Pythagoras came to be finally admitted into the full confidence of the master. He says that they passed three years, in the first place, in a state of probation, carefully watched by their seniors, and exposed to their occasional taunts and ironies, by way of experiment to ascertain whether they were of a temper sufficiently philosophical and firm. At the expiration of that period, they were admitted to a novitiate in which they were bound to uninterrupted silence, and heard the lectures of the master, while he was himself concealed from their view by a curtain. They were then received to initiation, and required to deliver over their property to the common stock. They were admitted to intercourse with the master. They were invited to a participation of the most obscure theories and the abstrusest problems. If, however, in this stage of their progress, they were discovered to be too weak of intellectual penetration, or any other fundamental objections were established against them, they were expelled the community; the double of the property they had contributed to the common stock was paid down to them; a headstone and a monument inscribed with their names were set up in the place of meeting of the community; they were considered as dead; and if afterwards they met by chance any of those who were of the privileged few, they were treated by them as intirely strangers.

Cylon, the richest man, or, as he is in one place styled, the prince of Crotona, had manifested the greatest partiality to Pythagoras. He was, at the same time, a man of rude, impatient, and boisterous character. He, together with Pericles of Thurium, submitted to all the severities of the Pythagorean school. They passed the three years of probation, and the five years of silence. They were received into the familiarity of the master. They were then initiated, and delivered all their wealth into the common stock. They were, however, ultimately pronounced deficient in intellectual power, or for some other reason were not judged worthy to continue among the confidential pupils of Pythagoras. They were expelled. The double of the property they had contributed was paid back to them. A monument was set up in memory of what they had been, and they were pronounced dead to the school.

It will easily be conceived in what temper Cylon sustained this degradation. Of Pericles we hear nothing further. But Cylon, from feelings of the deepest reverence and awe for Pythagoras, which he cherished for years, was filled, even to bursting, with inextinguishable hatred and revenge. The unparalleled merits, the venerable age of the master whom he had so long followed, had no power to controul his violence. His paramount influence in the city insured him the command of a great body of followers. [He excited them to a frame of turbulence and riot. He represented to them how intolerable was the despotism of this pretended philosopher. They surrounded the school in which the pupils were accustomed to assemble, and set it on fire. Forty persons perished in the flames. According to some accounts, Pythagoras was absent at the time: according to others, he and two of his pupils escaped. He retired from Crotona to Metapontum. But the hostility which had broken out in the former city followed him there. He took refuge in the Temple of the Muses. But he was held so closely besieged that no provisions could be conveyed to him; and he finally perished with hunger, after, according to Laertius, forty days abstinence.]

It is difficult to imagine anything more instructive, and more pregnant with matter for salutary reflection, than the contrast presented to us by the character and system of action of Pythagoras on the one hand, and those of the great inquirers of the two last centuries, Bacon, Newton, and Locke, on the other. Pythagoras probably does not yield to any one of these in the evidences of truly intellectual greatness. In his school, in the followers he trained resembling himself, and in the salutary effects he produced on the institutions of the various republics of Magna Græcia and Sicily, he must be allowed greatly to have excelled them. His discoveries of various propositions in geometry, of the earth as a planet, and of the solar system as now universally recognised, clearly stamp him a genius of the highest order.

Yet this man, thus enlightened and philosophical, established his system of proceeding upon narrow and exclusive principles, and conducted it by methods of artifice, quackery, and delusion. One of his leading maxims was, that the great and fundamental truth, to the establishment of which he devoted himself, were studiously to be concealed from the vulgar, and only to be imparted to a select few, and after years of the severest novitiate and trial. He learned his earliest lessons of wisdom in Egypt, after this method, and he conformed through life to the example which had thus been delivered to him. The severe examination that he made of the candidates previously to their being admitted into his school, and the years of silence that were then prescribed to them, testify this. He instructed them by symbols, obscure and enigmatical propositions, which they were first to exercise their ingenuity to expound. The authority and dogmatical assertions of the master were to remain unquestioned; and the pupils were to fashion themselves to obsequious and implicit submission, and were the furthest in the world from being encouraged to the independent exercise of their own understandings. There was nothing that Pythagoras was more fixed to discountenance, than the communication of the truths upon which he placed the highest value to the uninitiated. It is not probable, therefore, that he wrote anything: all was communicated orally, by such gradations, and with such discretion, as he might think fit to adopt and exercise.

Delusion and falsehood were main features of his instruction. With what respect, therefore, can we consider, and to what manliness worthy of his high character and endowments can we impute, his discourses delivered from behind a curtain, his hiding himself during the day, and only appearing by night in a garb assumed for the purpose of exciting awe and veneration? What shall we say to the story of his various transmigrations? At first sight it appears in the light of the most audacious and unblushing imposition. And, if we are to yield so far as to admit that by a high-wrought enthusiasm, by a long train of maceration and visionary reveries, he succeeded in imposing on himself, this, though in a different way, would scarcely less detract from the high stage of eminence upon which the nobler parts of his character would induce us to place him.

Such were some of the main causes that have made his efforts perishable, and the lustre which should have attended his genius in a great degree transitory and fugitive. He was probably much under the influence of a contemptible jealousy, and must be considered as desirous that none of his contemporaries or followers should eclipse their master. All was eracular and dogmatic in the school of Pythagoras. He prized, and justly prized, the greatness of his attainments and discoveries, and had no conception that anything could go beyond them. He did not encourage, nay, he resolutely opposed, all true independence of mind, and that undaunted spirit of enterprise, which is the atmosphere in which the sublimest thoughts are most naturally generated. He therefore did not throw open the gates of science and wisdom, and invite every comer; but, on the contrary, narrowed the entrance, and carefully reduced the number of aspirants. He thought not of the most likely methods to give strength, and permanence, and an extensive sphere to the progress of the human mind. For these reasons he wrote nothing; but consigned all to the frail and uncertain custody of tradition. And distant posterity has amply revenged itself upon the narrowness of his policy; and the name of Pythagoras, which would otherwise have been ranked with the first luminaries of mankind, and consigned to everlasting gratitude, has, in consequence of a few radical and fatal mistakes, been often loaded with obloquy, and the hero who bore it been indiscriminately classed among the votaries of imposture and artifice.

FINE ARTS.

Exhibition of the British Institution.

THE show of pictures at Pall Mall is not remarkable this season for the number of its good or its bad ones; there is a shoal of pictures of most respectable mediocrity. Among the figure-pieces [we want some word not so magniloquent as "historical," to express the telling a story by means of figures]—there are some of the most execrable disfigurements that can be placed upon a gallery-wall. Of them, enough said. Among the landscapes there are very many that are pleasing transcripts of nature's beauties, and as such are pleasant to look upon, and worth a rich man's money, to adorn her rooms withal; but those that exhibit any peculiarity of skill or taste on the part of the painter were few. To note each of the five hundred pictures that cover the walls of the British Institution were impossible, nor can we, in fairness, comment on any few out of the legion of talented propriety we have mentioned; we must therefore confine our observations to the most remarkable. First, in genius and power, then, let us render homage due to Edwin Landseer. There is the active vigour in every part—there the weight of strength—there the solemn majesty of the noble beast—all now resigned to the deepest slumber. The study was made from a dead animal, and whether it be fancy or not we cannot say, but we think we can recognize the look of death. The noble brute was killed by an accident, and its owner took him immediately to Edwin Landseer, who, like an old heathen god, though life is fled for ever, has given the dog an immortal existence by turning him into a picture. The activity, the strength, the grandeur of that form will not pass away and be forgotten, but there for ages will they stay, and many will be the eyes that will wonder at the creature, and at the painter who has immortalized him. The colour of the picture is solemn and subdued, in keeping with the deep repose of the subject. The handling is bold and masterly. It is less elaborately finished than most of Landseer's pictures. It is the size of life; half its grandeur would otherwise have been lost. The 'Retriever' is one of his astonishing fac-similes. It is a dog of the spaniel breed, bringing a wounded duck from among some rushes. How true the mild, pleased, tail-wagging expression of the dog's face; how helpless the duck, and how true to the motion of being carried is the action of the neck and legs. Did you ever, Reader, carry a duck, for if you have you will immediately recognise that peculiar bend of the neck. The bird is most beautifully coloured.

To be continued next week.

Houses of Parliament and Palatial Edifices of Westminster. By John Britton and Edward W. Brayley. No. III.

We objected to the engravings in No. I, that they wanted, to complete them, a certain degree of pictorial effect; such is the case with some in the part before us: No. II. we have not seen. The staircase in the Painted Chamber, however, proves that Mr Billings is not incapable of a better style; the light-and-shade is broader and the parts are in better keeping; and so the grandeur of the building is done more justice to.

A History of British Fishes. By Wm. Yarrell, F.L.S. Illustrated by Wood-cuts of all the Species, and numerous Vignettes. John Van Voarst. Part I.

THESE cuts are of the very best order of execution, delicate and soft, highly finished, yet broad. As instances of delicacy and tender touch, we will point out the Perch,—and the Smooth Serranus, each part is well defined, and yet the tints blend most naturally and gently into one another. The action and expression, withal, are excellent, witness the Sapphirine Garnard, curving gently on one side, with all the fluent ease of the lively fish in its native element. Or all the students this island has fostered, none has made such use of his apprenticeship, none has so completely learned his craft, none is so worthy of the title a "Master," as Edwin Landseer. Everything worked by his hand is not an attempt successful, it is an intention fulfilled. His brushes own despotic sway,—and are the slaves of his merest wish; difficulty is to him a forgotten evil. The 'Sleeping Blood Hound is magnificent;—broad, solid, real, in effect;—grand in strength, and the expression of power in repose.

TABLE TALK.

PRECIOUS ABUSE.

In 1656 the French and the English encountered in the vineyards of Maupertuis, not far from Poitiers (19th September). The event of that day is well known. Great carnage was made of the Scots. Lord Douglas, after having been wounded, was forced off the field by his surviving companions. Archibald Douglas, a warrior eminent in our history, fell into the power of the enemy; but, by the extraordinary presence of mind of Sir William Ramsay of Colluthy, he was concealed, and escaped unknown. The story, as related by Fordun, is curious. It shall be translated, as nearly as possible, in his own manner: Archibald Douglas having been made prisoner along with the rest, appeared in more sumptuous armour than the other Scottish prisoners, and therefore he was supposed by the English to be some great lord. Late in the evening after the battle, when the English were about to strip off their armour, Sir William Ramsay of Colluthy happening to be present, fixed his eyes on Archibald Douglas, and, affecting to be in a violent passion, cried out, "You cursed, damnable murderer, how comes it in the name of mischief (ex-parte diaboli), that you are thus proudly decked out in your master's armour? Come hither and pull off my boots. Douglas approached tremblingly, kneeled down, and pulled off one of the boots: Ramsay taking up the boot, beat Douglas with it. The English bystanders, imagining him out of his senses, interposed, and rescued Douglas. They said that the person whom he had beaten was certainly of great rank, and a lord. "What! he a lord," cried Ramsay, "He is a scullion, and a base knave, and, as I suppose, has killed his master. Go, you villain to the field, search for the body of my cousin, your master, and when you have found it, come back, that, at least, I may give him a decent burial." Then he ransomed the feigned serving man for forty shillings, and, having buffeted him smartly, he cried, "Get you gone; fly." Douglas bore all this patiently, carried on the deceit, and was soon beyond the reach of his enemies. This story, as to some of its circumstances, may not seem altogether probable; yet, in the main, it has the appearance of truth. Had I been at liberty to vary the narrative, I would have made Ramsay suspect, that the feigned serving man had stript his master after he had been slain, or mortally wounded. This Archibald was the natural son of the renowned Sir James Douglas, slain by the Saracens in Granada. —Annals of Scotland.

IMPRESSION OF MUSIC ON ANIMALS.

M. Marville has given the following curious details on this subject. Doubting, he tells us, the truth of those who say it is natural for us to love music, especially the sound of instruments, and that beasts themselves are touched with it, being one day in the country he made his observations, while a man was playing on a conch shell (trompe marine), upon a cat, a dog, a horse, an ass, a hind, cows, small birds, and some barn-door fowls in a yard under the window on which he was leaning. He did not perceive that the cat was in the least affected, and he even judged by her air that she would have given all the musical instruments in the world for a mouse, for she slept all the while unmoved in the sun; the horse stopped short from time to time at the window, raising his head up now and then as he was feeding on the grass; the dog continued for above an hour seated on his hind legs, looking steadfastly at the players; and the ass did not discover the least indication of his being touched, eating his thistles very peaceably; the hind lifted up her large wide ears, and seemed very attentive; the cows slept a little, and after gazing awhile went forward; some little birds which were in an aviary, and others on trees and bushes, almost tore their little throats with singing; but the cock, minding his hens, and the hens solely employed in scrapping in a neighbouring dunghill, did not show in any manner that they took the least pleasure in hearing the music. —Faculties of Birds.

THE WEEK.

SINCE writing our first article we find that we have come sooner than we looked for to a point in the almanac, which throws us into a dilemma; for we noticed last year (up to a certain number of weeks) the birth-days of eminent men now commencing, and as a repetition of them is out of the question, so we are loth to vary our remarks for the mere sake of doing so, and thus losing the freshness of a first impression. We shall see by next week what is to be done.

FRANCESCA CARRARA.—'CHANCES AND CHANGES,' AND 'THE RICHES OF CHAUCER.'

SWIFT advises a servant, when his master is going to find fault with him, to anticipate him by some ground of complaint, real or imaginary, of his own. This resource will not do for us gentry of the LONDON JOURNAL, who are all of us, whether masters or servants, inheritors of higher notions from books, and do not condescend to the excuses of those days. But it is a fine thing, when a man is obliged to make an excuse, and is at a loss for one equally consistent with the delicacies of all parties, to find a gentleman coming up, and making an excuse to him! Golden is the opportunity for showing oneself grateful and generous, and thereby hinting to the remaining party how proper it will be to accept the excuse we are about to make, and what honour they will do themselves by it.

Now thus writeth of us the most cordial and knowing 'Bristol Mercury,' on the appearance of our first volume,—and thus, with that admission of our merits to becoming in a modern editor, do we repeat what he writeth:—

"Among the greatest miseries of an editor may be reckoned the wish to accomplish some particular object which he is continually obliged to postpone, and then, by and by, like the thoughtless debtor who suffers a trifling amount to remain unpaid, he is astounded at the magnitude of the debt which has accumulated. In some such a position do we feel ourselves with our Readers. Week after week, since the publication of the LONDON JOURNAL, has it beguiled for us many a weary hour, and often, by its happy philosophy, have the harassing cares, which have dogged our steps all day, been fairly driven from the field, when we have been able at last to take up a good position for doing battle, snugly entrenched in our easy chair and slippers, our coffee and toast before us, and armed with an unread number of this JOURNAL. And week after week have we intended to direct our Readers to the source of so much pleasure; and lo! a goodly-sized volume has made its appearance, with its many pleasant reminiscences, to reproach us with our selfishness and neglect."

Now "week after week, since the publication" of 'Francesca Carrara'—

—"week after week, since the publication" of 'Chances and Changes'—]

—"week after week, since the publication" of 'The Riches of Chaucer'— have they interfused their respective relishes amidst the amenities of our tea-table and the large luxury of our easy chair and slippers; and week after week have we intended to direct our Readers to the sources of so much pleasure, when lo! three volumes together here make their appearance to reproach us with scarcely yet having noticed one. Here are 'The Riches of Chaucer,' a very treasure and casket of all precious things to make our tea-table rich,—'Chances and Changes' as sweet and domestic, as a lady to make tea for us,—and 'Francesca Carrara' (how shall we say it?) as thorough a peppered devil of wilfulness and calamity as ever fair hand served up to vary our dulcitudes withal,—and to none of them have we yet returned thanks for their sweetness or pungency.

The truth is, we cannot get rid of a vile propensity we have for putting off notices of the things we wish to notice most, for the purpose (as we think) of doing them the better justice; whereas the best justice is to notice them at once, briefly as we may be able, and not to stand committing their chances of sale (helped by the mere fact of notice) with the imaginary importance of our "long say." And the worst of it is, that we do this to the authors whose books have given us the greatest personal regard for them,—another vile trick of the egotism of 'approbation; as if the prodigious honour we do' to people in liking them, gave us a right to ill-use them, and to take liberties more trying than pleasant.

However, Miss Landon's book, with her fame and popularity, will have disposed of itself, long before anything is said by us on the subject. Our superfluous self-references, we fear (if she sees them), will only dispose her to add another chapter to the "vanities of all things." The 'Six Weeks on the Loire,' also, will have procured, we trust, a full though quieter passage along the public stream, for the fair authoress of 'Chances and Changes.' Mr Clarke has the greatest right to complain of us, because poetry, especially old poetry, does not make its way to public perusal, like novels. But to say the truth, we have yet another reason for the delay; and this is, that we have a quarrel to pick with all these three authors; and in one instance, it involves a renunciation of an error on our own part, which completes the hardship of this accumulated perplexity.

Mr Clarke, who has a genuine love for his author, struck with disgust at the gross notion which has prevailed in this country almost ever since Chaucer wrote, that he is little else but a writer of humorous and licentious tales, has gone to the extreme of giving us as much as possible of his gravity, and as little as possible of his levity; whereas, though it is out of the question to think of publishing much of what is rejected, he might have retained exquisite passages of drollery perfectly unexceptionable, and sunk a good deal of what is merely prosing and superfluous. We have also to express a doubt, whether Chaucer's versification is so invariably regular in its construction as Mr Clarke supposes; a doubt which [we] express with the less willingness, because we have done something in our day towards spreading the contrary notion. But we must own, it now appears to us, that although the divine old bard, generally speaking, is as correct in his prosody as he is instinctively melodious, his lines are now and then short, or superfluous, of a syllable or so, and his time marked only by quantity. We are the more inclined to this opinion, from some remarkable instances that have come before us of a like tendency in other good ears, even now living, when the demands of prosody are so much better understood. Here is a sample in Chaucer, from the very first page that we have opened at random,—

"The hand was known that the letter wrote,
And all the venom of this cursed deed,
But in what wise certainly I not:—"

that is, "know not." Now on these two syllables, "what wise," the voice lingers by reason of their natural emphasis, and thus makes the two serve the purpose of three; for in this verse there is a syllable wanting. Mr Clarke, however, has made a present to the reading world, which they ought to seize with joy. He has put an end to the old bugbear of "difficulty," by modernizing the spelling of Chaucer, without hurting the spirit of his poetry; and if it is to be regretted that he has put too gratuitous a faith in the far too gratuitous conclusions of Mr Godwin's otherwise valuable life of the poet, his fault in that respect, as in others, is still a fault of faith, and leaves him a character for bonhomie, not unbecoming a recommender of childlike and loving genius. The world is now twice indebted to Mr Clarke on the side of poetry: for he was one of the first teachers, and main encouragers, of the young genius of Mr Keats, of whom he has here recorded an interesting anecdote, accompanied by a sonnet which will be highly welcome to our poetical readers:—

"The poem of 'The Flower and the Leaf' was especially favoured by the young poet, John Keats. The author may perhaps be pardoned for making a short digression upon the present occasion, to record an anecdote in corroboration of the pleasure testified by that vivid intellect upon his first perusal of the composition. It happened at the period when Keats was about publishing his first little volume of poems (in the year 1817). He was then living in the second floor of a house in the Poultry, at the corner of the court leading to the Queen's Arms Tavern—that corner nearest to Bow Church. The author had called upon him here, and finding his young friend engaged, took possession of a sofa, and commenced reading from his then pocket-companion, Chaucer's 'Flower and the Leaf.' The fatigue of a long walk, however, prevailed over the fascination of the verses, and he fell asleep. Upon awaking, the book was still at his side; but the Reader may conceive the author's delight, upon finding the following elegant sonnet written in his book, at the close of the poem. During my sleep, Keats had read it for the first time; and, knowing that it would gratify me, had subjoined a testimony to its merit, that might have delighted Chaucer himself."

"SONNET UPON READING THE 'FLOWER AND THE LEAF.'"

This pleasant tale is like a little copse
The honied lines so freshly interlace
To keep the reader in so sweet a place;
So that he here, and there full-hearted stops;
And oftentimes he feels the dewy drops
Come cool and suddenly against his face:
And by the wand'ring melody may trace
Which way the tender-legged linnet hops.
Oh, what a charm hath white simplicity!
What mighty power hath this gentle story!—
I, that for ever feel athirst for glory,
Could at this moment be content to lie
Meekly upon the grass, as those whose sobbings
Were heard of none beside the mournful robin's."
February, 1817."

With Miss Landon our quarrel is far worse, and quite horrible, seeing it is with a lady; but why does she, whose poetry can live at will in such charming places of fancy, and floweriness, and lovingness, write a novel which is one continued, wilful wail over the "miseries of human life," making the very worst of what is bad, and refusing to make as much as she could, and even as the circumstances demand, of what is consolatory and prosperous? She has positively, after making all her loving people as anxious and unhappy as possible throughout the book, taken her hero and heroine the instant they are married, and when they might have sat comfortably down by their fireside, and sent them to sea in a storm, for no reason whatsoever but to drown them, and say "You shan't be happy, though you might." Now there really are happy brides in the world; all the people, who are married at St George's or St Mildred's, do not look about them for a ship in a storm to die in; and why should Miss Landon, therefore, have deprived us of this bit of sugar after our physic, and lumped such a very particular misery among her general calamities? Cui bono? The "Miseries of Human Life" are an old story, and are so apt to be overdone, that a modern wit has made a farce of them instead of a tragedy. We are not for denying their existence, but for doing our best to diminish them, and see fair play to those innumerable sources of pleasure which, in the riches of our spleen, and in our power to dispense with all pleasures, provided we do not see things go just as we like, we are so apt to look upon as nothing. The world is surely quite enough alive to what is unhappy in it, as far as regards the old grounds of unhappiness; at least no preaching up of despair will render them so to better purpose; and we do not see how the only comfort left them in such sermons, to wit, the superiority of the world to come, is much recommended by a system of lamentation and rebuke, so little complimentary to the creator of both. Might we suggest, then, to Miss Landon, that she is going farther than she intends, and perhaps adding to the discomfort she deplures, by encouraging a saturnine turn of mind in her readers? We have always heard, and we believe, that her heart is equal to her staid, and that in private she is one of the most generous and disinterested of women; and why should she not be as generous in her books, and endeavour to increase that sense of pleasure which she admits to be small, rather than diminish it? Let her think of this, and do justice to the gifts heaven has bestowed on her, and not pretend there are no roses because there are thorns. Let her make us all love her so much, that our very gratitude shall force her to be cheerful whether she will or no.

As to the fair authoress of 'Chances and Changes,' who is one of the most acquiescent of human beings, and delights in drawing comfort out of the severest trials, we have less scruple in quarrelling with her, seeing she can turn everything to such good account; but why, in thinking us worthy of a quotation, must she needs select a passage which we regret to have written, and which originated in young and petulant want of proper reverence for a poet (Mr Wordsworth) to whom we afterwards made the amende honorable? And she reprobates it, too, as if we had not done so ourselves!—nay, as if we had not been one of the greatest trumpeters of his muse (then needing such servant-harbingers); so much so, that a late noble rival of his used to rank it among our offences, and merrily charge us with having given the town the wrong poetical faith. This is hard, though she does not mean it, and though she says everything in such a soft, good-natured voice, as in truth aggravates the hardship, and makes us sorrier that she has mistaken us. However, we have here supplied her with golden reason for doing us justice at some future opportunity, and mending her quotation, which she will do in the most acceptable manner by giving one on the same poet, to be found in another edition of the same verses, or even in the same edition; for we hailed him as the Prince of living Poets even then.

We beg pardon of the Reader for this personal digression; but there are sore points on which authors find it difficult not to speak when they can; and editorship furnisheth alarming facilities that way.

This novel, 'Chances and Changes,' is remarkable for its relish of domestic happiness, for a cheerful piety, and for an admirably drawn character of a man of the world, who tires out the affections of the heroine. The authoress, with true sense and right feeling, makes her marry another man, and become happy with him; for real love is real love, whether "first," or "second;" and though first love be accompanied with a novelty which seldom loses its after-effect in the imagination, and is often mistaken for something deeper, second love not seldom finds out that it ought to have been first, and that the first was no love at all.

'PHILOSOPHY OF HEALTH.'

[Concluded.]

"There is one effect resulting from the operation of the intellectual faculties on the senses that deserves particular attention. The higher faculties elevate the subordinate in such a manner as to make them altogether new endowments. In illustration of this, it will suffice to notice the change wrought as if in the very nature of sensation, the moment it becomes combined with an intellectual operation, as exemplified in the difference between the intellectual conception of beauty, and the mere perception of sense. The grouping of the hills that bound that magnificent valley, which I behold at this moment spread out before my view; the shadow of the trees at the base of some of them, stretching its deep and varied outline up the sides of others; the glancing light now brightening a hundred different hues of green on the broad meadows, and now dancing on the upland fallows; the ever-moving, ever-changing clouds; the sweet air; the song of birds; the still more touching music which the breeze awakens in the scarcely trembling branches of those pine trees,—the elements of which this scene is composed, the mere objects of sense, the sun, the sky, the air, the hills, the woods, and the sounds poured out from them, impress the senses of the animals that graze in the midst of them; but on their senses they fall dull and without effect, exciting no perception of their loveliness, and giving no taste of the pleasures they are capable of affording. Nor even in the human being, whose intellectual faculties have been uncultivated, do they awaken either emotions or ideas. The clown sees them, hears them, feels them, no more than the herds he tends: yet in him whose mind has been cultivated and unfolded, how numerous and varied the impressions, how manifold the combinations, how exquisite the pleasure produced by objects such as these!"—Ch. iii, p. 87.

"But there are pleasures of another class, pleasures having no relation whatever to a person's own sensation or happiness, pleasures springing from the perception of the enjoyment of others. The sight of pleasure not its own affects the human heart, provided its state of feeling be natural and sound, just as it would be affected were it its own. Not more real is the pleasure arising from the gratification of appetite, the exercise of sense, and the operation of intellect, than that arising from the consciousness that another sentient being is happy. Pleasures of this class are called sympathetic, in contradistinction to those of the former class, which are termed selfish.

There are then two principles in continual operation in the human being, the selfish and the sympathetic. The selfish is productive of pleasure of a certain kind; the sympathetic is productive of another kind. The selfish is primary and essential; the sympathetic, arising out of the selfish, is superadded to it. And so, precisely, what the animal life is to the organic, the sympathetic principle is to the selfish; and just what the organic life gains by its union with the animal, the mental constitution gains by the addition of the sympathetic to the selfish affection. The analogy between the combination in both cases is in every respect complete. As the organic life produces and sustains the animal, so the sympathetic principle is produced and sustained by the selfish. As the organic life is conservative of the entire organization of the body, so the selfish principle is conservative of the entire being. As the animal life is superadded to the organic, extending, exalting, and perfecting it, so the sympathetic principle is superadded to the selfish, equally extending, exalting, and perfecting it. The animal life is nobler than the organic, whence the organic is subservient to the animal; but there is not only no opposition, hostility, or antagonism between them, but the strictest possible connexion, dependence, and subservience.

The sympathetic principle is nobler than the selfish, whence the selfish is subservient to the sympathetic; but there is not only no opposition, hostility, or antagonism between them, but the strictest possible connexion, dependence, and subservience. Whatever is conducive to the perfection of the organic, is equally conducive to the perfection of the animal life; and whatever is conducive to the attainment of the true end of the selfish, is equally conducive to the attainment of the true end of the sympathetic principle. The perfection of the animal life cannot be promoted at the expense of the organic, nor that of the organic at the expense of the animal; neither can the ultimate end of the selfish principle be secured by the sacrifice of the sympathetic, nor that of the sympathetic by the sacrifice of the selfish. Any attempt to exalt the animal life beyond what is compatible with the healthy state of the organic, instead of accomplishing that end, only produces bodily disease. Any attempt to extend the selfish principle beyond what is compatible with the perfection of the sympathetic, or the sympathetic beyond what is compatible with the perfection of the selfish, instead of accomplishing the end in view, only produces mental disease. Opposing and jarring actions, antagonizing and mutually destructive powers, are combined in no other work of nature; and it would be wonderful indeed, were the only instance of it found in man, the noblest of her works, and in the mind of man, the noblest part of her noblest work."—Ch. iii, p. 90.

"Deeply then," Dr Smith goes on, "are laid the fountains of happiness in the constitution of human nature. They spring from the depths of man's physical organization; and from the wider range of his mental constitution they flow in streams magnificent and glorious. It is conceivable that, from the first to the last moment of his existence, every human being might drink of them to the full extent of his capacity. Why does he not? The answer will be found in that to the following question. What must happen, before this be possible? The attainment of clear and just conceptions, on subjects in relation to which the knowledge hitherto acquired by the most enlightened man is imperfect. Physical nature, every department of it, at least, which is capable of influencing human existence, and human sensation; human nature, both the physical and the mental part of it; institutions so adapted to that nature as to be capable of securing to every individual, and to the whole community, the maximum of happiness with the minimum of suffering—this must be known."—Lib. iii, p. 102.

"When will this be known? How long is man to wander in the dark, and having eyes, to see not? Our extracts shall be concluded with the exhortation that Dr Smith gives to one portion of the human race; that portion which is most in need of it, and which, could it be roused to a sense of what is wanting, would soon alter the condition of humanity.

"The bodily organization, and the mental powers of the child, depend mainly on the management of the infant; and the intellectual and moral aptitudes and qualities of the man have their origin in the predominant states of sensation, at a period far earlier in the history of the human race than is commonly imagined. The period of infancy is divided by physiologists into two epochs; the first, commencing from birth, extends to the seventh month; the second, commencing from the seventh month, extends to the end of the second year, at which time the period of infancy ceases, and that of childhood begins. The first epoch of infancy is remarkable for the rapidity of the development of the organs of the body: the processes of growth are in extreme activity; the formative predominates over the sentient life, the chief object of the action of the former being to prepare the apparatus of the latter. The second epoch of infancy is remarkable for the development of the perceptive powers. The physical organization of the brain, which still advances with rapidity, is now capable of a greater energy, and a wider range of function. Sensation becomes more exact and varied; the intellectual faculties are in almost constant operation; speech commences, the sign, and to a certain extent, the cause of the growing strength of the mental powers; the capacity of voluntary locomotion is acquired, while passion, emotion, and affection come into play with such constancy and energy, as to exert over the whole economy of the new veritable and plastic creature a prodigious influence for good or evil. If it be, indeed, possible to make correct moral perception, feeling, and conduct, a part of human nature—as much a part of it as any sensation or propensity—if this be possible for every individual of the human race, without exception, to an extent which would render all more eminently and consistently virtuous than any are at present (and of the possibility of this, the conviction is the strongest in the acutest minds which have studied this subject the most profoundly), preparation for the accomplishment of this object must be commenced at this epoch. But if preparation for this object be really commenced, it implies on the part of those who engage in the undertaking, some degree of knowledge—knowledge of the physical and mental constitution of the individual to be influenced—knowledge of the mode in which circumstances must be so modified in adaptation to the nature of the individual being, as to produce upon it, with uniformity and certainty, a given result. The theory of human society, according to its present institutions, supposes that this knowledge is possessed by the mother; and it supposes, further, that this adaptation will actually take place in the domestic circle through her agency. Hence the presumed advantage of having the eye of the mother always upon the child; hence the apprehension of evil so general, I had almost said instinctive, whenever it is proposed to take the infant, for the purpose of systematic physical and mental discipline, from beyond the sphere of maternal influence. But society, which thus presumes that the mother will possess the power and the disposition to do this, what expedients has it devised to endow her with the former, and to secure the formation of the latter? I appeal to every woman whose eye may rest on these pages—I ask of you, what has ever been done for you to enable you to understand the physical and mental constitution of that human nature, the care of which is imposed upon you? In what part of the course of your education was instruction of this kind introduced? Over how large a portion of your education did it extend? Who were your teachers? What have you profited by their lessons? What progress have you made in the acquisition of the requisite information? Were you at this moment to undertake the guidance of a new-born infant to health, knowledge, goodness, and happiness, how would you set about the task? How would you regulate the influence of external agents upon its delicate, tender, and highly irritable organs, in such a manner as to obtain from them healthful stimulation, and avoid destructive excitement? What natural and moral objects would you select as the best adapted to exercise and develop its opening faculties? What feelings would you check, and what cherish? How would you excite aims? How would you supply motives? How would you avail yourself of pleasure as a final end, or as a means to some further end? And how would you deal with the no less formidable instrument of pain? What is the measure of your own physical, intellectual, and moral state, as specially fitting you for this office? What is the measure of your own self-control, without a large portion of which no human being ever yet exerted over the infant mind any considerable influence for good? There is no philosopher, however profound his knowledge—no instructor, however varied and extended his experience, who would not enter upon this task with an apprehension proportioned to his knowledge and experience; but knowledge, which men acquire only after years of study—habits, which are generated in men only, as the result of long-continued discipline, are expected to come to you spontaneously, to be born with you, to require on your part no culture, and to need no sustaining influence.”—Introduction, p. 5.

And now we have but one request to make of the author. Beautiful and instructive as this volume is, it is introductory to matter which must be still more interesting. We have learned enough from it to know how much we want to learn, and we trust he will soon publish another. The power of communicating knowledge such as this, is a talent that must not “lodge with him useless,” a talent that should make him count every day for lost, in which he has not done something towards the completion of his work.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

LXIII.—THE FAMOUS STORY OF THE FAMILIES OF CALAS AND SIEVEN.

[In repeating a story of Catholic bigotry and cruelty, it is hardly necessary, in these times, to deprecate its application to the existing members of the Catholic faith. They partake of the general Christian amelioration of the age, and would be ashamed to do as their predecessors did. Bigotry, it is true, will still break out into overt acts of absurdity here and there, Protestant as well as Catholic; but, generally speaking, at least among all decently educated people (and it is not the fault of the uneducated that they remain so), it has outgrown its mistakes, and no longer confounds the exasperations of self-will with the ordinance of God. The following narrative is the ‘Lounger’s,’ and is coloured with the peculiarities of a by-gone generation and of his own character.]

JOHN CALAS was a reputable tradesman, or, as he was called in France, a merchant of the city of Thoulouse, in the eighteenth century. Himself, his wife, and five sons, had been born and educated in the Protestant religion, but Lewis, the second of his children, only a few months before the present narrative commences, renouncing the tenets he had professed, embraced the Catholic faith. It was supposed that the young man had been persuaded to this change by an old female servant, who had lived many years in the family, and by whom he had been originally nursed. His parents lamented this apostasy, but being remarkable for affection towards their offspring, it was not observed to diminish the kindness of their behaviour either to Lewis or the old domestic, as they were convinced, however erroneous the proceeding, that it originated from amiable motives and a benevolent mind. Their eldest son, Anthony, had been bred to the law, but found that his dissenting from the established religion of his country was an insuperable bar to his being admitted to practice. The disappointment was observed to have a strong effect on his mind and health; he became melancholy, peevish, and solitary, procured and perused many reprehensible books, and often repeated passages from them in defence of suicide.

In this state of things, Anthony received an accidental visit from an old schoolfellow, the son of Mr Lavoisse, an avocat, or, as we should term it, an attorney, of Thoulouse. Young Lavoisse having been absent for several weeks at Bourdeaux, on his return found that his father had been for several days at a little villa to which he occasionally retired, eight miles from the city. Having endeavoured to procure a horse at several places, without effect, as he was coming out of the stable-yard of one of the persons to whom he had applied, he met Anthony and his father, who congratulated him on his arrival, and hearing that none of his family were at home, invited him to pass his evening at their house, to which he agreed. Mrs Calas received Lavoisse, as the friend of her son, with great cordiality, and after sitting in conversation about half an hour, Anthony, being the general market-man of the family, was sent to purchase some cheese; soon after, Lavoisse went again to the keeper of a lively stable to see if any of his horses were returned, and to bespeak one for his use in the morning.

They both came back in a short time, and at seven o'clock sat down to supper in a room up one pair of stairs; the company consisting of Calas, his wife, Anthony, Peter, one of his brothers, and Mr Lavoisse. Before the meal was concluded, Anthony, without any apparent reason, rose from table in an evident state of mental perturbation: this, as it was a circumstance that had often occurred since his indisposition, was not noticed; he passed into the kitchen, which was on the same floor, and being asked by the servant if he was cold, said to her, “Quite the contrary, I am in a burning heat;” he soon after went down stairs.

It ought to have been observed that the whole of the ground floor was occupied by the shop and a warehouse behind it, which were separated by folding doors. The party whom Anthony had quitted continued conversing till half-past nine, when Lavoisse took his leave, and Peter, who, fatigued by his attendance in the shop, had fallen asleep, was roused to attend him with a lantern. It is easier to conceive than describe their horror and astonishment on reaching the foot of the stairs; the first object that presented itself was the unhappy Anthony, stripped to his shirt, and hanging from a bar which he had laid across the top of the folding-doors, having half-opened them for that purpose. Their exclamation brought Mr Calas down stairs, who, the moment he saw what had taken place, rushed forward and raised the body in his arms, moved the rope by which it was suspended, and the bar fell down; for the two young men were so affected that they stood immovable as statues, and lost all presence of mind. The unhappy father, in an agony of grief, laid his son on the ground, and immediately sent Peter for Mr Lamoire, a surgeon in the neighbourhood, observing to him, “Let us, if we can, prevent this dishonourable accident being known; you need not say how your brother’s death took place.”

Lavoisse in the meantime ran up stairs, to prevent, if possible, Mrs Calas from knowing what had happened, but hearing the groans and outcries of her husband, and the old servant, it could not be prevented, and the presence of this unhappy mother added to the afflicting scene. The surgeon was not at home, but his pupil, Mr Grosse, immediately came; on examination he found that Anthony was quite dead, and when he removed his neckcloth, observing a dark mark made by the cord, immediately said he had been strangled. A crowd of people, attracted by curiosity and the cries of the family, had collected round the door, and hearing the surgeon’s words, immediately formed an opinion that the deceased was on the point of becoming a Catholic, and that his family, as Protestants, had strangled Anthony, to prevent his abjuring their communion.

The majority of the inhabitants of France being at that time violently prejudiced against the Calvinists, and more particularly the inhabitants of Thoulouse, who, for several years celebrated the massacre of St Bartholomew by anniversary processions, this vague suspicion was eagerly circulated, and with many absurd aggravations, pronounced an undeniable fact; a furious mob assembled, and to prevent Calas and his family from being torn to pieces, it was thought necessary to send for the intendant of the police and his assistants.

These peace-officers, instead of quieting the people, and entering into cool examination of facts, precipitately sided in opinion with the multitude, and the whole family, together with Lavoisse, was committed to prison, under circumstances of universal hatred and indignation.

The Franciscans and White Penitents, two religious societies, at that time, in Thoulouse, maliciously inflamed the public irritation, and promulgated the report that Anthony, who had never given the least indication of a change in his opinions, was the next day to have become one of their fraternity; that he was strangled in order to prevent it, and that Lavoisse, on this and the other similar occasions, was generally executioner among the Calvinists. The corpse was publicly interred in St Stephen, accompanied by a long and pompous procession, a solemn service and funeral dirge; a tomb was raised to his memory in a conspicuous part of that church, and a real human skeleton was exhibited on the monument, holding in one hand a paper on which was written ANJURATION OF HERESY, and in the other a branch of the palm-tree as an emblem of martyrdom. In such a state of the public mind it was not probable that the affair would experience an impartial examination. The Capitou, one David, an ignorant but fierce bigot, insisted on the impossibility of a person's suspending himself across the folding-doors, and said that it was a common practice with Protestant "parents" to hang such of their children as wished to change their religion; the worthy magistrate, forgetting at the moment, or resolving not to remember, that Lewis Calas, another of the unfortunate prisoner's children, had actually become a Catholic, and so far from incurring the resentment of his father, had been lately settled by him in an advantageous business, and that the person who had been the chief instrument of his conversion was at that moment an inmate in the family, and treated with the most unremitting kindness. Le Borda, the presiding Judge, who knew and ought to have acted better, warmly espoused the popular opinion; he repeatedly inquired "if Anthony Calas had been seen to kneel at his father's feet before he strangled him?" but receiving no satisfactory answer, observed that the cries of the murdered martyr were heard at distant parts of the city; he added that "it was necessary to make an example of John Calas, for the edification of true believers, and the propagation of sound faith, as heretics had been of late more than usually bold and incorrigible."

I relate with concern, that in the eighteenth century, in a Christian country, and during the reign of a most Christian King, this unfortunate man, seventy years of age, and irreproachable in life, who was remarkable for parental affection, and had brought up a numerous family in credit and repute, was declared guilty of murdering his own child, a crime which collateral and other circumstances proved he had never committed, and sentenced to be broken on the wheel. This innocent prisoner in a few days was led forth to punishment, in a state of mind which excited general admiration.

Two honest Dominicans, Bourges and Caldegnes, who attended him, declared, that they not only thought him innocent of the crime, but an uncommon example of Christian patience, fortitude, charity, and forbearance; they could not help remarking, that in his prayers he intreated the Almighty to pardon the errors of his enemies. These worthy fathers united in wishing that their last hours might be like his.

Calas endured the torture with unabated firmness, declaring the innocence of himself and family to the last; his son Peter was banished for life; the other persons, with a glaring inconsistency—for if one was guilty, all must have been so—were set at liberty.

This melancholy and disgraceful transaction, which took place in the year 1761, naturally attracted the notice and consideration of all well-disposed, humane, and liberal persons, particularly of Mr Voltaire, the advocate of toleration; who, like other advocates, was ultimately carried further in his reforming career than he originally expected or designed. But in rescuing the family of Calas from obloquy and disgrace, he was commended by all parties. His applications to men in power were so effectual, that the judicial proceedings were sent to Paris, and revised; Calas, and the whole of the family were declared innocent; the sentence was annulled, the Attorney-General of the province was directed to prosecute the infamous Capitou, David, and every possible satisfaction was made to the widow, Mr Lavoisier, and the survivors. But although everything that could be done was done, all could not call up from the grave the mangled corpse of the unhappy father, who, at the moment he was suffering unutterable distress of mind for a suicide child, was loaded with disgrace and chains, and committed to a loathsome dungeon, accused, tried, and condemned, as the executioner of his own offspring, suffered a cruel death, and finally was insulted on the scaffold in his last agonies by the cruel David. "Wretch!" said this infernal monster, to the poor old man, while in a state of torture, "wretch! confess your crime. Behold the faggots which are to consume your body to ashes!"

The melancholy impressions made by this article would have been somewhat alleviated, had it been in the Editor's power to relate with truth, that the vile Capitou, a Franciscan, and two or three of the White Penitents had been hanged.

Where and when have I seen, and by what artist, a painting in which a group of persons are exhibited as contemplating a picture of the tragedy which forms the subject of my present article, and exemplifying its effect on different tempers and dispositions?

The man of violent passions, with fury in his countenance, and an extended arm, is pouring forth execrations against the remorseless bigots; another gentleman of exquisite sensibility is silently wiping the tear from his cheek; a connoisseur seems to be admiring the painter's performance, without being apparently affected by the subject of it; and a jolly fellow, who appears to have understood and practised the pleasures of the table, sits unbusied before the picture, buried in fat, indolence, and stupidity.

Various have been the efforts of human wisdom to correct the excesses of intolerant superstition; in many instances, these efforts have been successful, but like a race-horse pushing for the goal, they have often been carried further than was intended.

The zealous, and perhaps at first, and before his passions are inflamed, the well-meaning Catholic, who would punish a man's body for the salvation of his soul, ultimately degenerates into the most cruel and bloody of all tyrannies—a tyranny over the mind. On the contrary, the liberal-minded man of feeling and philanthropy, unless guided by prudence and expediency, becomes a latitudinarian, and a sceptic, and would ultimately introduce the most irrational and unfeeling of all despotisms.

The following letter addressed to Mr Voltaire from the late Empress of Russia, during his spirited conduct in favour of the family of Calas, must have highly gratified that ingenious Frenchman:—

"SIR,—The brightness of the Northern star is a mere Aurora Borealis; but the private man, who is an advocate for the rights of nature, and a defender of oppressed innocence, will immortalize his name. You have attacked the great enemies of true religion and science; fanaticism, ignorance, and chicane: may your victory be complete.

"You desire some small relief for the family: I should be better pleased if my inclosed bill of exchange could pass unknown; nay, if you think my name, unharmonious as it is, may be of use to the cause, I leave it to your discretion.

"CATHERINE."

It is a melancholy truth, that while this disgraceful tragedy was performing, another instance of superstitious intolerance, and like this, ending in the death of two innocent persons, was exhibited in the same province, at Castres, little more than forty miles from Thoulouse.

Adjoining to that city, on a little farm which they owned and occupied themselves, lived the family of Sirven, consisting of the farmer, his wife, and three daughters, one of whom was married and pregnant; her husband by his employment being called to a distant province. Although of the Protestant religion, the youngest of his single daughters had been taken by force from her father's home, put into a convent, and told that she must conform to the Catholic faith, which was the only true religion. Finding the poor girl naturally attached to the tenets in which she had been educated, her instructors told her that it was the high road to hell, and insisting that it was necessary to punish the body to save the soul, they taught her their better catechism, whipt her severely, and shut her up in a solitary cell. In a few weeks, in consequence of their persevering in what they called wholesome discipline, the poor creature lost her senses, and, escaping from her keepers, threw herself headlong into a well. It was immediately insisted on by the Catholics, and passed current, that her own family had destroyed her, it being an established rule with Protestants to murder everyone who is suspected of any inclination to the Catholic faith. The populace was inflamed, Sirven did not dare to make his appearance, and having heard of the transaction at Thoulouse, was anxious to avoid similar treatment, as his house had been twice attacked. Expecting to be torn to pieces, he took an opportunity when his infuriated enemies were retired to rest from their persecutions, to leave his house with his family. At the dead of night, on foot, in the severity of winter, and with a deep snow on the ground, they fled from their savage neighbours, and took the road to Switzerland, though scarcely knowing whither to go. To add to Sirven's afflictions, his daughter was delivered of a dead child during the journey, evidently killed by the over fatigue and horrors of its parent; urged forward by their remorseless hunters, the frantic mother could not be persuaded that her child was dead, and travelled on, closely embracing the clay-cold infant in her arms.

• We think there is an engraving of it in Lavater, and that the original is by a French artist.—ED.

It is not easy to describe the exasperated fury of the zealots at Castres, when they found their intended victims had escaped; they reproached each other with not having kept a guard during the night; to prove what they wished to do, the whole family were burnt in effigy; a process was issued against Sirven, his goods seized, his property confiscated, and the memory of an industrious, harmless, and much injured family, loaded with infamy and reproach.

The fugitives, travelling by night, and concealing themselves in the day time, fortunately escaped the tigers, but did not consider themselves as safe till they reached Switzerland. In another respect they were not less fortunate; the benevolent friend and advocate of the family of Calas heard of Sirven's misfortunes, and powerfully interfered in their favour, but was shocked on being told that their cause should be reheard, and that possibly they might be pardoned; a virtuous, decent, innocent family reduced to beggary and ruin, with two individuals of it murdered, for so in fact it was, is told it may be pardoned. But the active benevolence of Voltaire did not rest satisfied with this answer, which seemed to be adding injury to insult. Mr De Beaumont, who nobly and successfully defended the Calas family, also strongly interested himself, and tardy justice ultimately took place.

CHARACTERS OF SHAKESPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

NO. XI.—CORIOLANUS.

SHAKESPEARE has in this play shown himself well versed in history and state-affairs. 'Coriolanus' is a store-house of political common-places. Any one who studies it may save himself the trouble of reading 'Burke's Reflections,' or 'Paine's Rights of Man,' or the Debates in both Houses of Parliament since the French Revolution or our own. The arguments for and against aristocracy or democracy, on the privileges of the few and the claims of the many, on liberty and slavery, power and the abuse of it, peace and war, are here very ably handled, with the spirit of a poet and the acuteness of a philosopher. Shakespeare himself seems to have had a leaning to the arbitrary side of the question, perhaps from some feeling of contempt for his own origin; and to have spared no occasion of baiting the rabble. What he says of them is very true: what he says of their betters is also very true, though he dwells less upon it. The cause of the people is indeed but little calculated as a subject for poetry: it admits of rhetoric, which goes into argument and explanation, but it presents no immediate or distinct images to the mind, "no jutting frieze, buttress, or coigne of vantage."

or poetry "to make its pendent bed and procreate cradle in." The language of poetry naturally falls in with the language of power. The imagination is an exaggerating and exclusive faculty: it takes from one thing to add to another: it accumulates circumstances together to give the greatest possible effect to a favourite object. The understanding is a dividing and measuring faculty: it judges of things, not according to their immediate impression on the mind, but according to their relations to one another. The one is a monopolizing faculty, which seeks the greatest quantity of present excitement by inequality and disproportion; the other is a distributive faculty, which seeks the greatest quantity of ultimate good, by justice and proportion. The one is an aristocratical, the other a republican faculty. The principle of poetry is a very anti-levelling principle. It aims at effect, it exists by contrast. It admits of no medium. It is everything by excess. It rises above the ordinary standard of sufferings and crimes. It presents a dazzling appearance. It shows its head turretted, crowned and crested. Its front is gilt and blood-stained. Before it "it carries noise, and behind it tears." It has its altars and its victims, sacrifices, human sacrifices. Kings, priests, nobles, are its train-bearers, tyrants and slaves its executioners.—"Carnage is its daughter."—Poetry is right-royal.* It puts the individual for the species, the one above the infinite many, might before right. A lion hunting a flock of sheep or a herd of wild asses is a more poetical object than they; and we even take part with the lordly beast, because our vanity or some other feeling makes us disposed to place ourselves in the situation of the strongest party. So we feel some concern for the poor citizens of Rome when they meet together to compare their wants and grievances, till Coriolanus comes in and with blows and big words drives this set of "poor rats," this rascal scum, to their homes and beggary before him. There is nothing heroic in a multitude of miserable rogues not wishing to be starved, or complaining that they are like to be so: but when a single man comes forward to brave their cries and to make them submit to the last indignities, from mere pride and self-will, our admiration of his prowess is immediately converted into contempt for their pusillanimity. The insolence of power is stronger than the plea of necessity. The tame submission to usurped authority or even the natural resistance to it has nothing to excite or flatter the imagination: it is the assumption of a right to insult or oppress others that carries an imposing air of superiority with it. We had rather be the oppressor than the oppressed. The love of power in ourselves and the admiration of it in others are both natural to man: the one makes him a tyrant, the other a slave. Wrong dressed out in pride, pomp, and circumstance has more attraction than abstract right.—Coriolanus complains of the fickleness of the people: yet the instant he cannot gratify his pride and obstinacy at their expense, he turns his arms against his country. If his country was not worth defending, why did he build his pride on its defence? He is a conqueror and a hero; he conquers other countries, and makes this a plea for enslaving his own; and when he is prevented from doing so, he leagues with its enemies to destroy his country. He rates the people "as if he were a God to punish, and not a man of their infirmity." He scoffs at one of their tribunes for maintaining their rights and franchises: "Mark you his absolute shall?" not marking his own absolute will to take everything from them, his impatience of the slightest opposition to his own pretensions being in proportion to their arrogance and absurdity. If the great and powerful had the beneficence and wisdom of Gods, then all this would have been well: if with a greater knowledge of what is good for the people they had as great a care for their interest as they have themselves, if they were seated above the world, sympathising with the welfare, but not feeling the passions of men, receiving neither good nor hurt from them, but bestowing their benefits as free gifts on them, they might then rule over them like another Providence. But this is not the case. Coriolanus is unwilling that the senate should show their "cares" for the people, lest their "cares" should be construed into "fears," to the subversion of all due authority; and he is no sooner disappointed in his schemes to deprive the people not only of the cares of the state, but of all power to redress themselves, than Volumnia is made madly to exclaim,—

"Now the red pestilence strikes all trades in Rome,
And occupations perish."

This is but natural: it is but natural for a mother to have more regard for her son than for a whole city; but then the city should be left to take some care of itself. The care of the state cannot, we here see, be safely entrusted to maternal affection, or to the domestic charities of high life. The great have private feelings of their own, to which the interests of humanity and justice must courtesy. Their interests are so far from being the same as those of the community, that they are in direct and necessary opposition to them; their power is at the expense of our weakness; their riches of our poverty; their pride of our degradation; their splendour of our wretchedness; their tyranny of our servitude. If they had the superior knowledge ascribed to them (which they have not) it would only render them so much more formidable; and from Gods would convert them into Devils. The whole dramatic moral of 'Coriolanus' is that those who have little shall have less, and that those who have much shall take all that others have left. The people are poor; therefore they ought to be starved. They are slaves; therefore they ought to be beaten. They work hard; therefore they ought to be treated like beasts of burden. They are ignorant; therefore they ought not to be allowed to feel that they want food, or clothing, or rest, that they are enslaved, oppressed, and miserable. This is the logic of the imagination and the passions, which seeks to aggrandise what excites admiration and to heap contempt on misery, to raise power into tyranny, and to make tyranny absolute; to thrust down that which is low still lower, and to make wretches desperate; to exalt magistrates into kings, kings into gods; to degrade subjects to the rank of slaves, and slaves to the condition of brutes. The history of mankind is a romance, a mask, a tragedy, constructed upon the principles of poetical justice; it is a noble or royal hunt, in which what is sport to the few is death to the many, and in which the spectators halloo and encourage the strong to set upon the weak, and cry havoc in the chase, though they do not share in the spoil. We may depend upon it that what men delight to read in books, they will put in practice in reality.

One of the most natural traits in this play is the difference of the interest taken in the success of Coriolanus by his wife and mother. The one is only anxious for his honour; the other is fearful for his life:—

"VOLUMNIA. Methinks I hither hear your husband's drum:

I see him pluck Aufidius down by th' hair:
Methinks I see him stamp thus—and call thus—
Come on, ye cowards; ye were got in fear
Though you were born in Rome; his bloody brow
With his mail'd hand then wiping, forth he goes
Like to a harvest man, that's task'd to mow
Or all or lose his hire.

VIRGILIA. His bloody brow! Oh Jupiter, no blood!

VOLUMNIA. Away, you fool; it more becomes a man

Than gilt his trophy. The breast of Hecuba,
When she did suckle Hector, look'd not lovelier
Than Hector's forehead, when it spit forth blood
At Grecian swords contending."

When she hears the trumpets that proclaim her son's return, she says in the true spirit of a Roman matron,—

"These are the ushers of Marcius: before him
He carries noise, and behind him he leaves tears.
Death, that dark spirit, in's nervy arm doth lie,
Which being advanc'd, declines, and then men die."

Coriolanus himself is a complete character: his love of reputation, his contempt of popular opinion, his pride and modesty are consequences of each other. His pride consists in the inflexible sternness of his will: his love of glory is a determined desire to bear down all opposition, and to extort the admiration both of friends and foes. His contempt for popular favour, his unwillingness to hear his own praises, spring from the same source. He cannot contradict the praises that are bestowed upon him; therefore he is impatient at hearing them. He would enforce the good opinion of others by his actions, but does not want their acknowledgments in words.

"Pray now, no more: my mother,
Who has a charter to extol her blood,
When she does praise me, grieves me."

His magnanimity is of the same kind. He admires in an enemy that courage which he honours in himself: he places himself on the hearth of Aufidius with the same confidence that he would have met him in the field, and feels that by putting himself in his power, he takes from him all temptation for using it against him.

In the title-page of 'Coriolanus,' it is said at the bottom of the Dramatis Personæ, "The whole history exactly followed, and many of the principal speeches copied from the life of Coriolanus in Plutarch." It will be interesting to our readers to see how far this is the case. Two of the principal scenes, those between Coriolanus and Aufidius and between Coriolanus and his mother, are thus given in Sir Thomas North's translation of Plutarch, dedicated to Queen Elizabeth, 1579. The first is as follows:—

"It was even twilight when he entered the city of Antium, and many people met him in the streets, but no man knew him. So he went directly to Tullus Aufidius' house, and when he came thither, he got him up straight to the chimney-hearth, and sat him down, and spake not a word to any man, his face all muffled over. They of the house spying him, wondered what he should be, and yet they durst not bid him rise. For ill-favouredly muffled and disguised as he was, yet there appeared a certain majesty in his countenance and in his silence: whereupon they went to Tullus, who was at supper, to tell him of the strange disguising of this man. Tullus rose presently from the board, and coming towards him, asked him what he was, and wherefore he came. Then Marcius unmuffled himself, and after he had paused awhile, making no answer, he said unto himself, If thou knowest me not yet, Tullus, and seeing me, dost not perhaps believe me to be the man I am indeed, I must of necessity discover myself to be that I am. 'I am Caius Marcius, who hath done to thyself particularly, and to all the Volscs generally, great hurt and mischief, which I cannot deny for my surname of Coriolanus that I bear. For I never had other benefit nor recompence of the true and painful service I have done, and the extreme dangers I have been in, but this only surname: a good memory and witness of the malice and displeasure thou shouldst bear me. Indeed the name only remaineth with me; for the rest, the envy and cruelty of the people of Rome have taken from me, by the sufferance of the dastardly nobility and magistrates, who have forsaken me, and let me be banished by the people. This extremity hath now driven me to come as a poor suitor, to take thy chimney-hearth, not of any hope I have to save my life thereby. For if I had feared death, I would not have come hither to put myself in hazard: but pricked forward with desire to be revenged of them that thus have banished me, which now I do begin, in putting my person into the hands of their enemies. Wherefore if thou hast any heart to be wrecked of the injuries thy enemies have done thee, speed thee now, and let my misery serve thy turn, and so use it as my service may be a benefit to the Volsces: promising thee, that I will fight with better good will for all you, than I did when I was against you, knowing that they fight more valiantly who know the force of the enemy, than such as have never proved it. And if it be so that thou dare not, and that thou art weary to prove fortune any more, then am I also weary to live any longer. And it were no wisdom in thee to save the life of him who hath been heretofore thy mortal enemy, and whose service now can nothing help, nor pleasure thee.' Tullus hearing what he said, was a marvellous glad man, and taking him by the hand, he said unto him: 'Stand up, O Marcius, and be of good cheer, for in proffering thyself unto us, thou doest us great honour: and by this means thou mayest hope also of greater things at all the Volscs' hands.' So he feasted him for that time, and entertained him in the honourablest manner he could, talking with him of no other matter at that present: but within few days after, they fell to consultation together in what sort they should begin their wars."

* In the name of the many free spirits among the Greek poets,—in the name of the independent men and great poets, Dante, Petrarch, Ariosto, Chaucer, Milton, and many of a later day, whose memories we will not make blush by prematurely naming them with the others, we protest against this doctrine. It is an effusion of eloquent spleen; and that is all.—Ed.

The meeting between Coriolanus and his mother is also nearly the same as in the play.

"Now was Marcius set then in the chair of state, with all the honours of a general, and when he had spied the women coming afar off, he marvelled what the matter meant: but afterwards knowing his wife which came foremost, he determined at the first to persist in his obstinate and inflexible rancour. But overcome in the end with natural affection, and being altogether altered to see them, his heart would not serve him to tarry their coming to his chair, but coming down in haste he went to meet them, and first kissed his mother, and embraced her a pretty while, then his wife and little children. And nature so wrought with him, that the tears fell from his eyes, and he could not keep himself from making much of them, but yielded to the affection of his blood, as if he had been violently carried with the fury of a most swift-running stream. After he had thus lovingly received them, and perceiving that his mother Volumnia would begin to speak to him, he called the chiefest of the council of the Volscs to hear what she would say. Then she spake in this sort: 'If we held our peace, my son, and determined not to speak, the state of our poor bodies, and present sight of our raiment, would easily betray to thee what life we have led at home, since thy exile and abode abroad; but think now with thyself, how much more unfortunate than all the women living, we are come hither, considering that the sight which should be most pleasant to all others to behold, spiteful fortune had made most fearful to us: making myself to see my son, and my daughter here her husband, besieging the walls of his native country: so as that which is only comfort to all others in their adversity and misery, to pay unto the Gods, and to call to them for aid, is the only thing which plungeth us into most deep perplexity. For we cannot, alas, together pray, both for victory to our country, and for safety of thy life also: but a world of grievous curses, yea more than any mortal enemy can heap upon us, are forcibly wrapped up in our prayers. For the bitter sop of most hard choice is offered thy wife and children, to forego one of the two: either to lose the person of thyself, or the nurse of their native country. For myself, my son, I am determined not to tarry till fortune in my lifetime do make an end of this war. For if I cannot persuade thee rather to do good unto both parties, than to overthrow and destroy the one, preferring love and nature before the malice and calamity of wars, thou shalt see, my son, and trust unto it, thou shalt no sooner march forward to assault thy country, but thy foot shall tread upon thy mother's womb, that brought thee first into this world. And I may not defer to see the day, either that my son be led prisoner in triumph by his natural countrymen, or that he himself do triumph of them, and of his natural country. For if it were so, that my request tended to save thy country in destroying the Volscs, I must confess, thou wouldst hardly and doubtfully resolve on that. For as to destroy thy natural country, it is altogether unmeet and unlawful, so were it not just and less honourable to betray those that put their trust in thee. But my only demand consisteth, to make a good delivery of all evils, which delivereth equal benefit and safety, both to the one and the other, but most honourable for the Volscs. For it shall appear, that having victory in their hands, they have of special favour granted us singular graces, peace and safety, albeit themselves have no less part of both than we. Of which good, if so it came to pass, thyself is the only author, and so hast thou the only honour. But if it fail, and fall out contrary, thyself alone deservedly shalt carry the shameful reproach and burthen of either party. So, though the end of war be uncertain, yet this notwithstanding is most certain, that if it be thy chance to conquer, this benefit shalt thou reap of thy goodly conquest, to be chronicled the plague and destroyer of thy country. And if fortune overthrow thee, then the world will say, that through desire to revenge thy private injuries, thou hast for ever undone thy good friends, who did most lovingly and courteously receive thee.' Marcius gave good ear unto his mother's words, without interrupting her speech at all, and after she had said what she would, he held his peace a pretty while, and answered not a word. Hereupon she began again to speak unto him, and said: 'My son, why dost thou not answer me? Dost thou think it good altogether to give place unto thy choler and desire of revenge, and thinkest thou it not honesty for thee to grant thy mother's request in so weighty a cause? Dost thou take it honourable for a nobleman, to remember the wrongs and injuries done him, and dost not in like case think it an honest nobleman's part to be thankful for the goodness that parents do show to their children, acknowledging the duty and reverence they ought to bear unto them? No man living is more bound to show himself thankful in all parts and respects than thyself; who so universally, showest all ingratitude. Moreover, my son, thou hast sorely taken of thy country, exacting grievous payments upon them, in revenge of the injuries offered thee; besides thou hast not hitherto showed thy poor mother any courtesy. And therefore it is not only honest, but due unto me, that without compulsion I should obtain my so just and reasonable request of thee. But since by reason I cannot persuade thee to it, to what purpose do I defer my last hope?' And with these words herself, his wife and children fell down upon their knees before him: Marcius seeing that, could refrain no longer, but went straight and lifted her up, crying out, 'Oh mother, what have you done to me?' And holding her hard by the right hand, 'Oh mother,' said he, 'you have won a happy victory for your country, but mortal and unhappy for your son: for I see myself vanquished by you alone.' These words being spoken openly, he spake a little apart with his mother and wife, and then let them return again to Rome, for so they did request him; and so remaining in the camp that night, the next morning he dislodged, and marched homeward unto the Volscs' country again."

Shakspeare has, in giving a dramatic form to this passage, adhered very closely and properly to the text. He did not think it necessary to improve upon the truth of nature. Several of the scenes in 'Julius Cæsar,' particularly Portia's appeal to the confidence of her husband by showing him the wound she had given herself, and the appearance of the ghost of Cæsar to Brutus, are, in like manner, taken from the history.

SECRETS OF COMFORT.

Though sometimes small evils, like invisible insects, inflict pain, and a single hair may stop a vast machine, yet, the chief secret of comfort lies in not suffering trifles to vex one, and in prudently cultivating an under-growth of small pleasures, since very few great ones, alas! are let on long leases.—Sharp's Essays.

SPECIMENS OF WIT, HUMOUR, AND CRITICISM OF CHARLES LAMB.

No. III.

BLAKESMOOR IN H—SHIRE.

I do not know a pleasure more affecting than to range at will over the deserted apartments of some fine old family mansion. The traces of extinct grandeur admit of a better passion than envy: and contemplations on the great and good, whom we fancy in succession to have been its inhabitants, weave for us illusions, incompatible with the bustle of modern occupance, and vanities of foolish present aristocracy. The same difference of feeling, I think, attends us between entering an empty and a crowded church. In the latter it is chance but some present human frailty—an act of inattention on the part of some of the auditory—or a trait of affectation, or worse, vain glory, on that of the preacher—puts us by our best thoughts, disharmonising the place and the occasion. But would'st thou know the beauty of holiness?—go alone on some week-day, borrowing the keys of good Master Sexton, traverse the cool aisles of some country church: think of the piety that has kneeled there—the congregations, old and young, that have found consolation there—the meek pastor—the docile parishioner. With no disturbing emotions, no cross conflicting comparisons, drink in the tranquillity of the place, till thou thyself become as fixed and motionless as the marble effigies that kneel and weep around thee.

Journeying northward lately, I could not resist going some few miles out of my road to look upon the remains of an old great house with which I had been impressed in this way in infancy. I was apprised that the owner of it had lately pulled it down; still I had a vague notion that it could not all have perished, that so much solidity with magnificence could not have been crushed all at once into the mere dust and rubbish which I found it.

The work of ruin had proceeded with a swift hand indeed, and the demolition of a few weeks had reduced it to—an antiquity.

I was astonished at the indistinction of everything. Where had stood the great gates? What bounded the court-yard? Whereabout did the out-houses commence? a few bricks only lay as representatives of that which was so stately and so spacious.

Death does not shrink up his human victim at this rate. The burnt ashes of a man weigh more in their proportion.

Had I seen these brick-and-mortar knaves at their process of destruction, at the plucking of every pannel I should have felt the varlets at my heart. I should have cried out to them to spare a plank at least out of the cheerful store-room, in whose hot window-seat I used to sit and read Cowley, with the grass-plat before, and the hum and flappings of that one solitary wasp, that ever haunted it about me—it is in mine ears now, as oft as summer returns; or a pannel of the yellow room.

Why, every plank and pannel of that house for me had magic in it. The tapestried bed-rooms—tapestry so much better than painting—not adorning merely, but peopling the wainscots—at which childhood ever and anon would steal a look, shifting its coverlid (replaced as quickly) to exercise its tender courage in a momentary eye-encounter with those stern bright visages, staring reciprocally—all Ovid on the walls, in colours vividder than his descriptions. Acteon in mid sprout, with the unappeasable prudery of Diana; and the still more provoking, and almost culinary coolness of Dan Phœbus, eel-fashion, deliberately divesting of Marsyas.

Then, that haunted room—in which old Mrs Battle died—whereinto I have crept, but always in the day-time, with a passion of fear; and a sneaking curiosity, terror-tainted, to hold communion with the past.—How shall they build it up again?

It was an old deserted place, yet not so long deserted but that traces of the splendour of past inmates were everywhere apparent. Its furniture was still standing—even to the tarnished gilt leather battle-axes and crumbling feathers of shuttlecocks in the nursery, which told that children had once played there—but I was a lonely child, and had the range at will of every apartment, knew every nook and corner, wondered and worshipped everywhere.

"The solitude of childhood is not so much the mother of thought, as it is the feeder of love, and silence, and admiration. So strange a passion for the place possessed me in those years, that, though there lay—I shamed to say how few rods distant from the mansion—half hid by trees, what I judged some romantic lake, such was the spell which bound me to the house, and such my carelessness not to pass its strict and proper precincts, that the idle waters lay unexplored for me; and not till late in life, curiosity prevailing over elder devotion, I found, to my astonishment, a pretty brawling brook had been the Lacus Incognitus of my infancy. Variegated views, extensive prospects—and those at no great distance from the house—I was told of such—what were they to me, being out of the boundaries of my Eden?—So far from a wish to roam, I would have drawn, methought, still closer the fences of my chosen prison; and have been hemmed in by a yet securer cincture of those excluding garden walls. I could have exclaimed with that garden-loving poet—

"Bind me, ye woodbines, in your twines;
Curl me about, ye gadding vines;
And oh so close your circles lace,
That I may never leave this place;
But, lest your fetters prove too weak,
Ere I your sliken bondage break,
Do you, O brambles, chain me too,
And, courteous briars, nail me through."

I was here as in a lonely temple. Snug firesides—the low-built roof—parlours ten feet by ten—frugal boards, and all the homeliness of home—these were the condition of my birth—the wholesome soil which I was planted in. Yet, without impeachment to their tenderest lessons, I am not sorry to have had glances of something beyond; and to have taken, if but a peep, in childhood, at the contrasting accidents of a great fortune.

To have the feeling of gentility, it is not necessary to have been born gentle. The pride of ancestry may be had on cheaper terms than to be obliged to an importunate race of ancestors; and the coatless antiquary in his unemblazoned cell, revolving the long line of a Mowbray's or De Clifford's pedigree, at those sounding names may warm himself into as gay a vanity as those who do inherit them. The claims of birth are ideal merely, and what herald shall go about to strip me of an idea? Is it trenchant to their swords? can it be hacked off as a spur can? or torn away like a tarnished garter?

What, else, were the families of the great to us? what pleasure should we take in their tedious genealogies, or their capitulatory brass monuments? What to us the uninterrupted current of their bloods, if our own did not answer within us to a cognate and correspondent elevation?

Or wherefore, else, O tattered and diminished 'Scutecheon that hung upon the time-worn walls of thy princely stairs, BLAKESMOOR! have I in childhood so oft stood poring upon thy mystic characters—thy emblematic supporters, with their prophetic 'Resurgam'—till, every dreg of peasantry purging off, I received into myself Very Gentility? Thou wert first in my morning eyes; and of nights hast detained my steps from bedward, till it was but a step from gazing at thee to dreaming on thee.

This is the only true gentry by adoption; the veritable change of blood, and not, as empirics have fabled, by transfusion.

"Who it was by dying that had earned the splendid trophy, I know not, I inquired not; but its fading rage, and colours cobweb-stained, told that its subject was of two centuries back.

And what if my ancestor at that date was some Dametas—feeding flocks, not his own, upon the hills of Lincoln—did I in less earnest vindicate to myself the family trappings of this once proud Egon?—repaying by a backward triumph the insults he might possibly have heaped in his life-time upon my poor pastoral progenitor.

If it were presumption so to speculate, the present owners of the mansion had least reason to complain. They had long forsaken the old house of their fathers for a newer tribe; and I was left to appropriate to myself what images I could pick up to raise my fancy, or to soothe my vanity.

I was the true descendant of those old W—s; and not the present family of that name, who had fled the old waste places.

Mine was that gallery of good old family portraits, which, as I have gone over, giving them in fancy my own family name, one—and then another—would seem to smile, reaching forward from the canvass, to recognise the new relationship; while the rest looked grave, as it seemed, at the vacancy in their dwelling, and thoughts of fled posterity.

That Beauty with the cool blue pastoral drapery, and a lamb—that hung next the great bay window—with the bright yellow H—shire hair and eye of watchet hue—so like my Alice!—I am persuaded she was a true Elia—Mildred Elia, I take it.

Mine too, BLAKESMOOR, was thy noble Marble Hall, with its mosaic pavements, and its Twelve Cæsars—stately busts in marble—ranged round of whose countenances, young reader of faces as I was, the frowning beauty of Nero, I remember, had most of my wonder; but the mild Galba had my love. There they stood in the coldness of death, yet freshness of immortality.

Mine, too, thy lofty Justice Hall, with its one chair of authority, high-backed and wickered, once the terror of luckless poacher, or self-forgetful maiden—so common since, that bats have roosted in it.

Mine too,—whose else—thy costly fruit-garden, with its sun-baked southern wall; the ampler pleasure-garden, rising backwards from the house in triple terraces, with flower-pots now of palest lead, save that a speck here and there, saved from the elements, bespake their pristine state to have been gilt and glittering; the verdant quarters backward still; and stretching still beyond, in old formality, the fiery wilderness, the haunt of the squirrel, and the day-long murmuring woodpigeon, with that antique image in the centre, God or Goddess I wist not; but child of Atheas or old Rome paid never a sincerer worship to Pan or to Sylvanus in their native groves, than I to that fragmental mystery.

Was it for this, that I kissed my childish hands too fervently in your idol worship, walks and windings of BLAKESMOOR! for this, or what sin of mine, has the plough passed over your pleasant places? I sometimes think that as men, when they die, do not die all, so of their extinguished habitations there may be a hope—a germ to be revived.

FINE ARTS.

British Institution.

'The Lute Player' (52), by Etty, is in that artist's most peculiar style; there is a certain vigour of colour, and a solidness about it; but it is strange and unnatural in the tint, and the physical predominates over the intellectual in all parts. Plenty is there of flesh, a look of life is in the limbs, an expression in the faces; but the flesh is coarse, the limbs are burly, even in the young girls, and the expression is sensual. Etty has a gusto in the physical part of his art, genuine, such as it is; but his relish for the corporeal, is not leavened by sentiment; not even the sentiment belonging to a refined perception of the physical. The 'Nymph and Young Fawn dancing' (200), is a better specimen of what he can do; the action of the Nymph might have been better; it is rather sprawling and ungainly; the colouring is very rich and powerful. The boy fawn is admirable, burly and glowing, with a sort of grave and ferocious jollity in his eye. We cannot admire Mr. Briggs's 'Romeo and Juliet' (65); the Romeo is attitudinizing to display the sculpture-like classicality of his legs, which look like stone, white, hard, and lifeless, while he coyly holds Juliet's hand between his finger and thumb, like an opera dancer. Juliet is better; but she is an English, and not an Italian girl, in Mr. Briggs's picture; and there is a want of southern colour and passion in her bridal face. On the other hand, the friar has all the energy of a captain leading his men to the charge. Leaving these points of expression out of the question, the picture is a good one; for the drawing is unexceptional, and the colouring in a very fair proportion. 'Una entering the cottage of Corceca' (80), by Hilton, we like much. The fair Una is most beautiful, and the purity and feminine dignity of the poet's creation most happily made apparent in the visible likeness wrought by the painter. There is, however, we think, scarcely enough evidence of weariness. The ghastly terror in the old mother, and the lubberly dread of the clownish girl, are excellent. The colour is effective and harmonious; Una still makes a sunshine in that shady place. 'Old Buildings on the Darn' (96) D. Roberts, is a fine piece of reality; the light and colour are bright and happy. Hancock is not very fortunate in his large picture 'Warriors of former days' (504); but a little picture of his 'The Grave' (264), with a female and a faithful dog mourning over it, is very touchingly designed; the moon rising behind the tomb-stone, the quiet attitude of the dog, the mysterious shade that envelopes the female, and seems to make itself a part of her mourning weeds, are all in the truest feeling of harmony of expression. Mr. Howard's 'Hesperides' is a poor affair; it is a bevy of pretty girls, standing or sitting about trees with golden apples. This said, we have told the best of the picture. It is too common a mistake to confound the merits of a picture with the merits belonging to its subject; and Mr. Howard falls into this mistake. He chooses a poetical subject, and thinks he produces a poetical picture; that he is poetical ex officio, as it were. The pictures are prettily coloured, and his subjects are chosen for their beauty; but he seldom manages to put much meaning into his designs.

THE WEEK.

For the Birth-days of Eminent men, as long as they do not appear in our present numbers, we must refer the Reader to last year's volume. As soon as the list there is terminated, we shall resume it. In the meantime we present our Readers with a Series of Personal Portraits of such men; the first of which we take from Mr. Clarke's Memoir of the Father of English Poetry.

PERSONAL PORTRAITS OF EMINENT MEN.

CHAUCEER.

The person of Chaucer was of middle stature, in advanced years inclining to corpulency. In his journey with the Pilgrims to Canterbury, mine host of the Tabard takes occasion to jest with him upon this point;—comparing both their persons, he says—

"Now, ware you, sir, and let this man have place;
He in the waist is shaped as well as I,
This were a poppet in armes to embrace," &c.

His face was full and smooth, betokening regular good health, and a serene and cheerful frame of mind. His complexion was fair, verging towards paleness; his hair was of a dusky yellow, short and thin; that of his beard grew, or rather perhaps it was fashioned into a forked shape, and its colour was wheaten. He had an expansive and marble-like forehead, fair and unwrinkled; his eyes constantly tended towards the ground,—a habit he has likewise given occasion in the host to notice :—

"What man art thou (quoth he),
That lookest as thou wouldst find a hare;
For ever on the ground I see thee stare?"

The general expression of his countenance combined a mixture of animation, of lurking, good-natured satire, of unruffled serenity, sweetness, and close thought. As in the above passages from his great poem we are let into a lively portrait of some of his personal peculiarities, so in the 'Testament of Love' as perfect an idea of his actions and manner in conversation are further displayed; so that one may almost fancy oneself in the prison with him, listening to his discourses on philosophy. "The downcast look (says Urry), the strict attention, the labouring thought, the hand waving for silence, the manner of address in speaking, the smooth familiar way of arguing, the respectful way of starting his objections, and, in short, every expression in that dispute, figures a lively image of him in the mind of the reader."

His features, as in most instances of sincere and transparent natures, were an index of his temper, and this comprised a mixture of the lively, grave, and modest. Yet was the gaiety of his disposition more prominent in his writings than in his general demeanour, which, it may be said, was repressed by his modesty. This bashfulness it was which gave occasion to the Countess of Pembroke often to banter him; declaring, that this absence was preferable to his conversation, since the latter was nought, on account of his reserve and distant respect; whereas, when he was away from her, the chance was, he might be preparing some composition to afford her delight. His behaviour with the pilgrims is uniformly in keeping with this habit of silence and seclusion. He scarcely appears in person, and when called upon for his tale, endeavours to avoid the task by singing a ballad; the host, however, protesting against this departure from the general compact, his own story (or rather discourse) is one of the least interesting in the whole series.

During his relaxations from the duties of public business, he continually retired to his study. Reading, indeed, was his chief delight, as appears, by his own confession, in the introduction to his 'Dream,' and to the 'Legend of Good Women.' He preferred it to every amusement, with the exception of a morning walk in May-tide. He lived almost exclusively in his own world of meditation, never interfering, as he says of himself, in the concerns of others. He was temperate and regular in his diet; he "arose with the lark, and lay down with the lamb;" hence the marvellous truth and freshness of his early morning pictures.

PETRARCH AND BOCCACCIO.

[THE following interesting passages, relative to these illustrious friends, are taken from the book mentioned in our last,—the 'Lives of Eminent Italians,'—the new volume of Dr Lardner's series. In characterizing the prominent geniuses of literature, Petrarch, for his long and passionate devotion to one object, may be styled the Lover; as Boccaccio, for his book of stories, and his earnest, hearty way of telling them, may be called the Story-Teller. There are few things more delightful to contemplate than the friendships of such extraordinary men; and the present writer of their lives has judiciously shown them in that connexion as much as possible.]

PETRARCH AND YOUNG BOCCACCIO.

THE future author of the 'Decameron,' was present when Petrarch was examined by Robert King of Naples, previous to his coronation (as a poet) in the capitol. King Robert was a philosopher, a physician, and an astrologer, but hitherto he had despised poetry being only acquainted with some Sicilian rhymes, and a few of the compositions of the Troubadours. Petrarch, discovering the ignorance of his royal patron, took an opportunity, at the conclusion of his examination (for the Laureatehip) to deliver an oration in praise of poetry, setting forth its magical beauty and its beneficent influence over the minds and manners of men; and so exalted his art, that the King said, in Boccaccio's hearing, that he had never before suspected that the foolish rind of verse inclosed matter so lofty and sublime; and declared that now, in his old age, he would learn to appreciate and understand it, asking Petrarch, as an honour which he coveted, to dedicate his poem of 'Africa' to him. From this time the lover of Laura became the magnus Apollo of the more youthful Boccaccio; he named him his guide and preceptor, and became, in process of time, his most intimate friend.

BOCCACCIO'S COPY OF 'DANTE,' WRITTEN OUT BY HIMSELF FOR A GIFT TO PETRARCH.

This celebrated manuscript belongs to the Vatican Library. The epistle (written by the donor) is addressed to "Francis Petrarch, illustrious and only poet;" and is subscribed "The Giovanni da Certaldo." The manuscript is illuminated, and the arms of Petrarch, consisting of a gold bar in an azure field, with a star, adorn the head of each canto. There are a few notes of emendation, and the whole is written in a clear and beautiful hand. [Lovers of books will delight in reading of this gorgeous and fond "getting up", of a manuscript, for the purpose of making a present of it; and what sort of present! a Dante written out by a Boccaccio, to give to a Petrarch! The arms and the illuminations too, turn the book into a painting.]

BOCCACCIO, PETRARCH, AND CHAUCER.

It is a singular circumstance that one of the last acts of Petrarch was, to read the 'Decameron.' Notwithstanding his intimate friendship with the author during twenty years, Boccaccio's modesty prevented his speaking of the work, and it fell into Petrarch's hands by chance. "I have not had time," he writes to his friend, "to read the whole, so that I am not a fair judge; but it has pleased me exceedingly. Its great freedom is sufficiently excused by the age at which you wrote it, the lightness of the subject, and of the readers for whom it was destined. With many gay and laughable things are mingled many that are serious and pious. I have read principally at the beginning and end. Your description of the state of your country during the plague, appears to me very true and very pathetic. The tale at the conclusion made so lively an impression on me, that I committed it to memory, that I might sometimes relate it to my friends."

This is the story of Griselda. Petrarch translated it into Latin for the sake of those who did not understand Italian, and often read it and had it read to him. He relates, that frequently the friends who read it, broke off, interrupted by tears. Among others to whom he communicated his favourite tales, was our English poet, Chaucer, who, in his prologue to the story of Griselda, says that he "Learned it at Padowe of a worthy clerke, Francis Petrarch."

Chaucer had been sent ambassador to Genoa, just at this time.

PETRARCH'S INVITATION TO BOCCACCIO TO COME AND LIVE WITH HIM.

Reflect whether you cannot, as I have long wished pass the remainder of your days with me. As to your debt to me, I do not know of it, nor understand this foolish scruple of conscience. You owe me nothing except love; nor that, since each day you pay me; except, indeed, that receiving continually from me, you still continue to owe. You complain of poverty, I will not bring forward the usual consolation, nor allege the examples of illustrious men, for you know them already. I applaud you for having preferred poverty combined with independence to the riches and slavery that were offered you; but I do not praise you for refusing the solicitations of a friend. I am not able to enrich you; if I were, I should use neither words nor pen, but speak to you in deeds. But what is sufficient for one is enough for two; one house may surely suffice for those who have but one heart. Your disinclination to come injures me, and it is more injurious if you doubt my sincerity." [In the same beautiful and sincere spirit Shelley wrote to Keats, to come and live with him in Italy; and the latter, himself a most generous man, would have ultimately joined him, had he lived. If it is wondered how such men write so finely, behold the secret! Their feelings are as real as they are rare.]

TO MY SOLITARY SNOW-DROP.

PALE maiden-flower, my rugged garden's gem!
Emblem of patient hope—safe innocence,
Drooping thy fair head o'er the fragile stem!
In yielding weakness—thy most sure defence;
Amidst mild airs—beneath illusive skies,
Promise of the young year! thou hadst thy birth
And thy first days were gentle. But there rise Fierce winds, and kingly storms sweep o'er the earth:
They shake thee, but cannot subdue; thy port!
Is brave as meek: and still thy snowy crest
(Whence gains its thin green stem such fixed support?)
Sheds soft light o'er thy mother's gladdened breast.
Oh, let me win whilst thus I gaze on thee,
Some glimpse of peace, truth and simplicity.

DIET AND MEDICINE.]

Variety of medicines is the daughter of ignorance; and it is not more true, that many dishes have caused many diseases, than this is true, that many medicines have caused few cures.—Bacon.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE signature to the note sent with the remarks on Dr Smith's 'Philosophy of Health' should have been P. Y. not S. Y. The fair writer will accept our thanks for the kind expressions in her last communication.

We have faith in F. O. W. and he must have faith in us, and think the best of it, when we say that we cannot have the pleasure (at present) of availing ourselves of his kind offer. With regard to the question he asks us respecting poetry or not poetry, it is one of a sort to which we do not like to give abrupt answers. The samples might or might not be the best; and the answers might repress proper confidence or excite expectations too great in degree. There is a look of something not common in the lines sent us. The problem alluded to was proposed, we conceive, in jest.

The 'Lines for an Album' have merit; but the theology on which they turn might appear uncharitable to an age which proposes to teach rather than to condemn.

Will H. C. (Deptford) favour us with the grounds of his dissent?

The approbation of IGNOTUS is very gratifying to us.

We made no objection, as our Correspondent J. G. supposes, in remarking that his Joshua's portrait by himself is a reverse, as seen in a mirror. We merely drew attention to the fact, that the painter's appearance, in propria persona, is a reverse of the portrait; and thus far, that the positive amount of resemblance is lessened. J. G. thinks the reversal a beauty. He observes, that it says as plainly as if the words were labelled on the picture, "This is the portrait of a painter, painted by himself." It does so; but would not the handling and style have been sufficient testimonies of his Joshua's autograph? When the ancient artist, calling at a friend's house, "wrote his name at Co," it consisted of a line drawn by a sweep of his brush. Nobody would have mistaken the hand of Sir Joshua, whether left or right.

SPRING,

THIS morning as we sat at breakfast, thinking of our present article, with our eyes fixed on a set of the British Poets, which stand us in stead of a prospect, there came by the window, from a child's voice, a cry of "Wall-flowers." There had just been a shower; sunshine had followed it; and the rain, the sun, the boy's voice, and the flowers, came all so prettily together upon the subject we were thinking of, that in taking one of his roots, we could not help fancying we had received a present from Nature herself,—with a penny for the bearer. There were thirty lumps of buds on this penny root; their beauty was yet to come; but the promise was there,—the new life,—the Spring,—and the rain-drops were on them, as if the sweet goddess had dipped her hand in some fountain, and sprinkled them for us by way of message; as who should say, "April and I are coming."

What a beautiful word is Spring! At least one fancies so, knowing the meaning of it, and being used to identify it with so many pleasant things. An Italian might find it harsh; and object to the Sp and the terminating consonant; but if he were a proper Italian, a man of fancy, the worthy countryman of Petrarch and Ariosto, we would convince him that the word was an excellent good word, crammed as full of beauty as a bud,—and that S had the whistling of the brooks in it, p and r the force and roughness of whatsoever is animated and picturesque, ing the singing of the birds, and the whole word the suddenness and salience of all that is lively, sprouting, and new—Spring, Spring-time, a Spring-green, a Spring of water—to Spring—Springal, a word for a young man, in old (that is, ever new) English poetry, which with many other words has gone out, because the youthfulness of our hearts has gone out,—to come back with better times, and the nine-hundredth number of the LONDON JOURNAL.

If our Italian, being very unlike an Italian, ill-natured and not open to pleasant conviction, should still object to our word, we would grow uncourteous in turn, and swear it was a better word than his Prima-vera,—which is what he calls Spring—Prima-vera, that is to say, the first Vera, or Ver of the Latins, the Veer (Bog Ionice) or Ear of the Greeks; and what that means, nobody very well knows. But why Prima-Vera? and what is Seconda, or second Vera? The word is too long and lazy, as well as obscure, compared with our brisk little, potent, obvious, and leaping Spring,—full of all fountains, buds, birds, sweet-briars, and sunbeams.

"Leaping, like wanton kids in pleasant spring."

says the poet, speaking of the "wood-born people" that flocked about fair Serena. How much better the word spring suits here with the word leaping, than if it had been prima-vera! How much more sudden and starting, like the boundings of the kids! Prima-vera is a beautiful word; let us not gainsay it; but it is more suitable to the maturity, than to the very springing of spring, as its first syllable would pretend. So long and comparatively languid a word ought to belong to that side of the season which is next to summer. Ver, the Latin word, is better,—or rather Greek word; for as we have shown before, it comes from the Greek,—like almost every good thing in Latin. It is a pity one does not know what it means; for the Greeks had "good meanings" (as Sir Hugh Evans would say); and their Ver, Veer, or Ear, we may be sure, meant something pleasant,—possibly the rising of the sap; or something connected with the new air; or with love; for etymologists, with their happy facilities, might bring it from the roots of such words. Ben Jonson has made a beautiful name of its adjective (Earinos, vernal) for the heroine of his 'Sad Shepherd,'—

"Earine,"

Who had her very being, and her name,
With the first knots, or buddings of the Spring;
Born with the primrose and the violet,
Or earliest roses blown; when Cupid smiled,
And Venus led the Graces out to dance;
And all the flowers and sweets in Nature's lap
Leap'd out."

The lightest thoughts have their roots in gravity, and the most fugitive colours of the world are set off by the mighty back-ground of eternity. One of the greatest pleasures of so light and airy a thing as the vernal season arises from the consciousness that the world is young again; that the spring has come round, that we shall not all cease, and be no world. Nature has begun again, and not begun for nothing. One fancies somehow that she could not have the heart to put a stop to us in April or May. She may pluck away a poor little life here and there; nay, many blossoms of youth,—but not all,—not the whole garden of life. She prunes, but does not destroy. If she did,—if she were in the mind to have done with us,—to look upon us as an experiment not worth going on with, as a set of ungenial and obstinate compounds which refused to co-operate in her sweet designs, and could not be made to answer in the working,—depend upon it she would take pity on our incapability and bad humours, and conveniently quash us in some dismal, sullen winter's day, just at the natural dying of the year, most likely in November; for Christmas is a sort of Spring itself, a winter-flowering. We care nothing for arguments about storms, earthquakes, or other apparently unseasonable interruptions of our pleasures:—we imitate, in that respect, the magnanimous indifference, or what appears such, of the Great Mother herself, knowing that she means us the best in the gross;—and also that we may all get our remedies for these evils in time, if we co-operate as before said. People in South America for instance, may learn from experience, and build so as to make a comparative nothing of those rockings of the ground. It is of the gross itself that we speak; and sure we are, that with an eye to that, Nature does not feel as Pope ventures to say she does, or sees "with equal eye"—

"Atoms or systems into ruin hurl'd,
And now a bubble burst, and now a world."

He may have flattered himself that he should think it a fine thing for his little poetship to sit upon a star, and look grand in his own eyes, from an eye so very dispassionate; but Nature, who is the author of passion, and joy, and sorrow, does not look upon animate and inanimate, depend upon it, with the same want of sympathy. "A world" full of loves, and hopes, and endeavours, and of her own life and loveliness, is a far greater thing in her eyes, rest assured, than a "bubble;" and, a fortiori, many worlds, or a "system," far greater than the "atom" talked of with so much complacency by this divine little whipper-snapper. Ergo, the moment the kind mother gives promise of a renewed year with these her green and budding signals, be certain she is not going to falsify them; and that being sure of April, we are sure as far as November. As to our existence any further, that, we conceive, depends somewhat upon how we behave ourselves; and therefore we would exhort everybody to do their best for the earth, and all that is upon it, in order that it and they may be thought worth continuance.

What! shall we be put into a beautiful garden, and turn up our noses at it, and call it a "vale of tears," and all sorts of bad names (helping thereby to make it so), and yet confidently reckon that Nature will never shut it up, and have done with it, or set about forming a better stock of inhabitants? Recollect, we beseech you, dear "Lord Worldly Wiseman," and you, "Sir Having," and my lady "Greedy," that there is reason for supposing that man was not always an inhabitant of this very fashionable world, and somewhat larger globe; and that perhaps the resident before him was only of an inferior species to ourselves (odd as you may think it), who could not be brought to know what a beautiful place he lived in, and so had another chance given him in a different shape. Good heavens! If there were none but mere ladies and gentlemen, and city-men, and soldiers, upon earth, and no poets, readers, and milk-maids to remind us that there was such a thing as Nature, we really should begin to tremble for Almack's and Change Alley about the 20th of next October!

HOW ARE WE TO GET HAPPILY MARRIED?

THIS is really a very interesting question. A truce then for the next five minutes to politics; let the Whigs and the Tories worry each other as much as they please, but let us, taking no heed to the state of Parliament, think a little about our domestic affairs.

Since everybody marries—or may marry—I had almost said, ought to marry, it is surely worth considering what the necessary conditions may be for obtaining that which, I take it for granted, everyone promises himself in marrying, namely, an increased degree of comfort and happiness. I may be told that it is not only quite idle, but that it smacks a little of presumption, to pretend to instruct people in the road to felicity; that everyone judges pretty correctly in what relates to himself, and therefore may be safely left to work out his own happiness, after his own manner. I have only to say, that I disclaim all ideas of teaching; I only wish to rouse attention to the importance of a subject that nearly concerns the well-being of every member of the great human family.

However knowing people may be in every-day and worldly matters, I am not disposed to admit that they are so clever in the management of this affair of matrimony, as is commonly imagined. Every person, male or female, has the power of determining for himself the two material and preliminary questions:—firstly, whether he will be married or not? secondly (if the first be answered affirmatively), to whom will he be married?

Having this power, then, if people knew what was good for them, there would be no unhappy marriages; but there are unhappy marriages: therefore they do not know what is good for them. Not only are there some unhappy marriages, but there are unfortunately a great many—in short, it is no use blinking the question, there is scarcely one in a hundred that is otherwise. Matrons, with a large family of daughters to establish, may bristle up, and look feline at such an insinuation, and their husbands loudly and fiercely deny it. This is but natural; they have got into a scrape, and would fain have companions in misfortune.

I hope no one suspects me of a design to treat this subject with levity. If anything I may have dropt has given rise to this impression, I am sorry for it—the intention is farthest from my thoughts. It is too sad a subject to be discussed for the sake of amusement; if one jests upon it, he but acts like the child who grins to conceal the fact that he is weeping.

But to resume. This cat-and-dog like state of things,—this universal misery, is owing, in many cases, not to the error of judgment, which we shall presently have to consider, but to not judging at all. I heard, the other day, of a man, in a humble walk of life, who married a woman for no other earthly reason (according to his own admission) than because she had a pretty foot and ankle!—she was, otherwise, both physically and morally deformed.

I knew a young lady, who was led to the altar from a boarding-school, and who confessed, that she became a wife in order that she might be at liberty to lie in bed as long as she pleased in the morning, and have buttered toast for breakfast! People of the world would laugh no doubt at the idea of being actuated by motives so whimsically absurd. But let us see if they act a whit more wisely themselves. It cannot be denied that some of them marry exclusively for wealth. This is to fall into the mistake of the man who, finding that an apple-pie was improved by the addition of a quince, caused a pie to be made intirely of quinces. Others are attracted by personal beauty. This is no better. Voyagers tell us that, though, when first they near the shores of India, their senses are intoxicated by the delicious odours of the flowers with which the land is covered; yet, in a short time, they not only regard this fragrance with indifference, but cease altogether to perceive it.

It may be said, that all this is nothing to the purpose; that these are people who do not exercise their reasoning faculties, and have no business to expect to be happy.

It may be so. There are others, certainly, who, despising alike beauty, and silver, and gold, know that there is something else more necessary to happiness in the married state, and take great pains to obtain it; but, as these pains are so often taken in vain, we must suppose that the efforts are applied in a wrong direction.

The fact is one of every day observation, that there are many very amiable people, endowed apparently with every requisite for making themselves and others happy, but who, nevertheless, being inconsiderately joined together, are not so. They are assigned, but not happy. They do not make a display of their wretchedness, like the beggar who exposes his ulcer to excite the pity of the crowd; on the contrary, they keep a strict watch over themselves, lest the fatal secret should escape—but it is not—it cannot be hidden. Of course they never quarrel—they have too much good sense—too much proper pride; besides, it would not be worth while! In spite of all their evenness of temper and mental discipline, there is still some unaccountable jar, and dissonance in their social being—like certain musical instruments, which most betray the imperfection of their construction, when the chords are perfectly in tune. Reflecting upon this, is it not fair to conclude that some fundamental error has crept into all the calculations of reason upon this subject, and vitiated the whole process? It is; and this error lies, I firmly believe, in the prevailing notion that, in a partner for life, we should require, before all things, a similarity of tastes, habits, and disposition. This I take to be the fatal mistake, and so long as it is persisted in, I see no end to the evil. My belief is, that the continuation of a perfectly good understanding between husband and wife—an understanding that will bear the wear and tear of the world—depends upon their being distinguished from each other by the possession of opposite qualities—upon their being as unlike each other as possible.

The common opinion referred to may have arisen from observing that a similarity of tastes, habits, and dispositions (whether good or bad) is apt to draw young people of different sexes together, and give birth to love, or something resembling it; and there is said to be sympathy between them. But this love has no stamina, no quality of endurance; and as to the sympathy, the less we have to do with it, perhaps, the better.

I do not attach much value to proverbial sayings and saws, otherwise it would not be difficult to adduce a good many that appear to bear me out; such, for example, as, "Love matches are seldom happy ones;" and "In marrying, it is best to begin with a little aversion," &c. I only mention these here to show that I am urging no new-fangled theory—the principle is known, but disregarded.

To make myself better understood, I will relate an old nursery tale:—

It chanced, that once upon a time, a small stream that crossed a public road, became so swollen by continued rains as to assume almost the appearance of a river; and so, as it was no longer possible to step across it as heretofore, loose stones were placed so as to form a sort of cause-way from side to side. The first travellers who approached after these things had happened, were two who were both lame alike, and who had joined company somewhere on the road, and agreed to travel together. Well, when they got to the edge of the water-course, they endeavoured to cross by the stepping stones, but this they found to be no easy matter; being both lame, each had enough to do to take care of himself, and could lend no help to the other. The result was that they both fell into the water, and were obliged to wade to the opposite side, where they continued their journey, grumbling at the stream and at each other. The next who attempted the passage, were two travellers who were both blind, and who met with a similar mishap. Just as these last were scrambling out of the water, there came up two others of a more promising appearance: they were both young, strong, and full of spirits, and you would have supposed that so trifling an impediment in their way, as the brook, would have been easily surmounted; but they shared no better fate than their predecessors. Too self-subsistent—too independent of each other—each confided in his own strength and dexterity, and scorned to receive while he thought it unnecessary to offer assistance. Thus, rushing together upon the narrow and uneven path, they jostled violently on the way, and were, like the others, precipitated into the stream. The story goes on to say, that the next who came up, and who were the first who succeeded in reaching the opposite side without accident, were two way-farers who had travelled a long way very cheerfully together. One was tall, strong, and active, but quite blind; the other was, on the contrary, of a diminutive and feeble frame, but his eyes were piercing as the falcon's.

They advanced without hesitation to pass the stream; for they knew that, though neither singly could accomplish the task, yet, together, and confiding in each other, no harm could come to them; the blind one relying upon his bright-eyed companion to point out the best places, whereupon he might set his feet, and the weak-one feeling quite sure that his strong friend would never, for his own sake, release the firm grasp with which he hugged him to his side.

The drift and moral of this story will, from what has been already said, be sufficiently obvious. We are most of us, indeed, feeble or dim-sighted creatures, not formed to stand alone, or buffet along the rugged path of life without some friendly shoulder to lean on—some arm to cling to. We must select, then, a companion by whose side to toil—always bearing in mind, at the same time, that as it is impossible, so is it quite unnecessary, that our fellow pilgrim should be altogether free from infirmity and error. All that is necessary is, that he should not be obnoxious to the same infirmities, errors, and prejudices as ourselves—that he should so far form a contrast to ourselves, as to be strong, precisely in those points where we are weak, and weak where we are strong; in order that a want and a consciousness of mutual support and assistance, be constantly present to both.

F. C. M.

* * * Our correspondent has started an interesting but perplexing subject for reflection; and will not wonder if we think he has failed, like others, in cutting the Gordian knot. The fable he has told, alas! will hardly enable the morally and intellectually infirm to discover, much less to acknowledge their respective deficiencies. The question between the conflicting parties will still be, which is the lame or the blind, and which has the greater need of the other's assistance.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

LXIV.—WILLIAM AND CATHERINE SHAW.

[We take this edifying sample of Circumstantial Evidence from the 'Sixty Curious Narratives' (before-mentioned), the compiler of which quotes it from the 'Theory of Presumptive Proof.' Presumptive proof is really a very presumptuous personage, and his circumstantial evidence frequently deserves to have a halter brought round its own neck. People circumstantially found guilty ought, we think, at the very worst, to undergo only a circumstantial hanging. A gallows should be peraded round them; the executioner should make a circuitous pretence of turning them off; and the bystanders should exclaim, "There you are, not positively hung—but you are circumstantially;—you may presume that you are dead;—the proof of your being so is not direct; but strong symptoms of an execution are round about you;—you may say that you have been in very hanging circumstances."

We take poor William Shaw to have been no very pleasant father; and his unfortunate daughter (perhaps in consequence of a violent bringing-up) was furious and vindictive. But their characters must have been known;—a surgeon should have been able to distinguish between a throat cut by the deceased's own hand, and by that of another person; and the groans and exclamations of a highly probable suicide ought not to have been construed into evidence of murder, not even with a shirt spotted with blood, especially as the spots turn out to have been owing to what the man said. But the simpletons kill him, and then wave a flag over his grave, by way of canceling his innocence! There is something in this action ludicrously of a piece with the rest of the folly; though the instinct was a good one, and the poor people must have been very sorry. We believe there will be no great haste to hang any more criminals upon circumstantial evidence, after the publication of works of this kind, and the fate of the unfortunate Eliza Fenning.]

WILLIAM SHAW (says our authority) was an upholsterer at Edinburgh, in the year 1721. He had a daughter, Catherine Shaw, who lived with him. She encouraged the addresses of John Lawson, a jeweller, to whom William Shaw declared the most susceptible objections, alleging him to be a profligate young man, addicted to every kind of dissipation. He was forbidden the house; but the daughter continuing to see him clandestinely, the father, on the discovery, kept her strictly confined.

William Shaw had, for some time, pressed his daughter to receive the addresses of a son of Alexander Robertson, a friend and neighbour; and one evening, being very urgent with her thereon, she presumptuously refused, declaring she preferred death to being young Robertson's wife. The father grew enraged, and the daughter more positive; so that the most passionate expressions arose on both sides, and the words, barbarity, cruelty, and death, were frequently pronounced by the daughter! At length he left her, locking the door after him.

The greatest part of the buildings at Edinburgh are formed on the plan of the chambers in our firms of court; so that many families inhabit rooms on the same floor, having all one common staircase. William Shaw dwelt in one of these, and a single partition only divided his apartment from that of James Morrison, a watch-case maker. This man had distinctly overheard the conversation and quarrel between Catherine Shaw and her father, but was particularly struck with the repetition of the above words, the having pronounced them loudly and emphatically! For some little time after the father was gone out, all was silent, but presently Morrison heard several groans from the daughter. Alarmed, he ran to some of his neighbours under the same roof. These, entering Morrison's room, and listening attentively, not only heard the groans, but distinctly heard Catherine Shaw, two or three times, faintly exclaim—"Cruel father, thou art the cause of my death!" Struck with this, they flew to the door of Shaw's apartment; they knocked—no answer was given. The knocking was still repeated—still no answer. Suspicions had before arisen against the father; they were now confirmed: a constable was procured, an entrance forced; Catherine was found weltering in her blood, and the fatal knife by her side! She was alive, but speechless; but, on questioning her as to owing her death to her father, was just able to make a motion with her head, apparently in the affirmative, and expired.

Just at the critical moment, William Shaw returns and enters the room. All eyes are on him! He sees his neighbours and a constable in his apartment, and seems much disordered thereat; but, at the sight of his daughter he turns pale, trembles, and is ready to sink. The first surprise, and the succeeding horror, leave little doubt of his guilt in the breasts of the beholders; and even that little is done away on the constable discovering that the shirt of William Shaw is bloody.

He was instantly hurried before a magistrate, and, upon the depositions of all the parties, committed to prison on suspicion. He was shortly after brought to trial, when, in his defence, he acknowledged the having confined his daughter to prevent her intercourse with Lawson; that he had frequently insisted on her marrying Robertson; and that he had quarrelled with her on the subject the evening she was found murdered, as the witness Morrison had deposed: but he averred, that he left his daughter unharmed and untouched; and that the blood found upon his shirt was there in consequence of his having bled himself some days before, and the bandage becoming untied. These assertions did not weigh a feather with the jury, when opposed to the strong circumstantial evidence of the daughter's expressions, of "barbarity, cruelty, death," and of "cruel father, thou art the cause of my death,"—together with that apparently affirmative motion with her head, and of the blood so seemingly providentially discovered on the father's shirt. On these several concurring circumstances, was William Shaw found guilty, was executed, and was hanged in chains, at Leith Walk, in November 1721.

Was there a person in Edinburgh who believed the father guiltless? No, not one! notwithstanding his latest words at the gallows were, "I am innocent of my daughter's murder." But in August 1722, as a man, who had become the possessor of the late William Shaw's apartments, was rummaging by chance in the chamber where Catherine Shaw died, he accidentally perceived a paper fallen into a cavity on one side of the chimney. It was folded as a letter, which, on opening, contained the following:—"Barbarous Father, your cruelty in having put it out of my power ever to join my fate to that of the only man I could love, and tyrannically insisting upon my marrying one whom I always hated, has made me form a resolution to put an end to an existence which is become a burthen to me. I doubt not I shall find mercy in another world; for sure no benevolent Being can require that I should any longer live in torment to myself in this! My death I lay to your charge: when you read this, consider yourself as the inhuman wretch that plunged the murderous knife into the bosom of the unhappy—CATHERINE SHAW."

This letter being shown, the hand-writing was recognized and avowed to be Catherine Shaw's by many of her relations and friends. It became the public talk; and the magistracy of Edinburgh, on a scrutiny, being convinced of its authenticity, they ordered the body of William Shaw to be taken from the gibbet, and given to his family for interment; and, as the only reparation to his memory and the honour of his surviving relations, they caused a pair of colours to be waved over his grave, in token of his innocence.

THOUGHTS ON LANGUAGE.

BY ROBERTON WHESE.

NO II.

I do not think that anything I have advanced, or mean to advance, on the subject of language, will give umbrage either to the philologist or to the poet. With the former I agree in loving his study, though little qualified to estimate its beauties, or do justice to its importance. With the latter, I share his gratitude towards the eloquent "interpreter," the great organ of the reason and the imagination, without which we were little distinguishable from the beasts of the field; with which we are what we are, and may be what we would. But I think we are too apt to transfer to the account of language praises that belong of right to the understanding only, and to conceive, when some remote and exquisite object is brought suddenly, and as if by miracle, into the focus of our perception by nothing more than a single stroke of the poetic wand, that the magic is in the language, and not in ourselves; and then, on the other hand, we deal with it too much as with a favorite; and because it is our perpetual companion and helpmate, and flatters us with its ready services, we are blind to, or reluctantly admit, its manifold offences and inextinguishable defects.

In my last chapter I considered a few of these of the more obvious kind, and I propose to push those considerations somewhat further hereafter. But, in the meantime, perhaps a few observations on the origin of language will not be unacceptable to the Reader. I will therefore beg him to consider me here (to compare great things with small) as working after the manner of the epic poets, who, at first setting out, rush into the middle of things, but presently take occasion to relate some circumstances of a previous date, proper for the Reader to know, though not equally suitable for an exordium.

Little can be gathered concerning the origin of language; and, fortunately, the question is not one of much practical importance, though a curious subject for conjecture. The favorite theory, that words at first were imitative sounds, suggested by the nature and properties of their objects, is plausible; but, except in a very limited sense, I venture to think not well founded. That a rushing stream should receive a name significant of the quality of its sound, or that the voices of birds and other animals, as well as the noise of winds, of the sea, of thunder, &c., should give rise to words imitative of their different tones and modulations, it is not difficult to suppose. But your naked savage has something else to do than to invoke nightingales and soliloquise on waterfalls; he has to cut his daily faggot from a tree that says nothing—to prepare his meal on some "silent stone." Let us, indeed, make every reasonable allowance for analogy and the association of ideas; let us grant it possible that some of the nice metaphysical relations existing between sound and sight—sound and touch, &c., may have been seized upon by the mind, and turned to account in language, even in the earliest stage (though Professor Porson tells us that our first fathers were plain men who "called a spade a spade"); still, allowing all this, can we suppose that the whole of inanimate nature was christened after this manner?—that the most hidden and subtle properties of things, in this way, became their title to a name, among savages? But, it may be said, there are few substantive things which do not produce some kind of sounds when put into motion. This is true, but to proceed on this ground, we must needs assume that such evidences in every case preceded the nomenclature. But would the tree be sure to receive its appellation in a high wind? would there be no allusion to the stone before it was heard whizzing through the air? would the faggots remain anonymous till they crackled in the fire?

If I cannot agree with the assertors of an imitative origin, neither can I assent to the opinion of those who save themselves a world of difficulty, while, at the same time, they throw an air of sanctity over their cause, by making language a matter of divine revelation. And I dissent, not merely because there is no authority for such an opinion, that I am aware of, in the Mosaic history, nor because the following verse in Genesis (chap. ii. v. 19) would seem pretty plainly to announce the contrary—

"And out of the ground the Lord God formed every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air; and brought them unto Adam to see what he would call them; and whatsoever Adam called every living creature, that was the name thereof"—

but I dissent, partly for the reason already urged by those who have combated on the same side, viz. that if language had been a direct gift from God, it would have been a perfect instrument, or one at least of much greater perfection than it is or ever has been (to which may be added, that it would have been most perfect in its beginning, and would rather have lost than gained power as it descended from its first possessors, whereas the reverse is the fact), and partly, because I do not see the dignus viadis modus. For is there not a much simpler account of the origin of language, nearer home? Observe a little baby at the age when it first begins to be sensible that it has a tongue. How it delights to rattle out a succession of easy syllables, without any other object or meaning than its own amusement. It talks to its coral, it talks to its cradle, every new object excites it to talk. Do we not see in this an evidence of a strong natural instinct? If this were merely an act of imitation consequent upon hearing the voices of grown people, it would be accompanied with other acts of imitation provoked in a similar manner. But this chattering, and this articulation of syllables, takes place long before the development of any regular power of observation. Now the instinct of the child is so soon adulterated, so soon lost and huddled up with the movements of experience and the effects of example, that we can, as it were, only snatch a transient and imperfect glimpse of Nature as she here momentarily appears to us. And yet this glimpse, I think, is sufficient to set our doubts at rest on one or two points. It may satisfy us, perhaps,—

1st. That we are sent into the world with the seeds of this faculty within us, and that it is as much a part of our instinct to use the tongue and the voice in those articulations and inflexions that have their accomplishment in speech, as it is to apply the hands, the arms, the legs, &c. to the several uses for which they are designed by Providence.

2d. That there is a propensity to accompany every new discovery, by which I mean the first sight of every new object, with some exclamation.

3rd. That this exclamation is not imitative, except in a rare and very limited sense.

4th. That it is for the most part purely capricious and accidental, admitting of no critical inquiry, except as concerns the superior facility of utterance of certain syllables or sounds.

5th. That the syllable or sound thus uttered becomes a name for the object which called it forth.

As regards the first of these propositions (to which this chapter will be confined), it may be objected by the upholders of the divine origin, that if the use of the tongue in speech were as much a matter of instinct as the application of the other members to their respective purposes, the same degree of efficiency would be exhibited in the result; but that whereas man in a savage state attains in a single life-time to the perfect command of his limbs, his efforts at language are forlorn and hopeless to the last degree, and never advance beyond that condition (say they) until a new direction is given to them by intercourse with civilized nations. This objection, I conceive, can give us no embarrassment. If the fact of speech having no development among savage tribes corresponding to that of their other faculties, be a proof in favour of the theory of divine interposition, the same might be urged with respect to the understanding itself—which I think was never done. But if it is not disputed that Time is the sufficient ripener of the human mind, why should there be a question as to its power to bring the faculty of speech to the same maturity through the same degrees? As to the perfection of the physical powers amongst barbarians—while still no more than "mutum et turpe pecus"—it argues nothing but this, that Nature in giving to man his full quota of bodily strength in that condition of his being, has provided him, as her custom is, with the thing most necessary to him;—the luxury of language she reserves for a fitter season. There is no evidence to prove—and vastly improbable it is—that a savage experiences any trouble or perplexity through poverty of speech, or, as we say, is ever "at a loss for a word." We may rest assured that that little which he desires to communicate, between cries and gestures, he communicates readily enough. But the extension of language is coequal with the extension of the understanding, and as soon as the mind begins to quicken with perception and to seek more earnestly the pleasures of sympathy, it is not long in improving its old resources or devising new expedients. Necessity is not the only mother of invention—Desire operates hardly less powerfully in creating the means of its own gratification; and when our necessities are provided for, our desires usurp their place.

With respect to the assertion, that language makes no progress amongst a people until intercourse with civilized communities gives it the necessary impulse, it seems to be a pure assumption, and to an assumption one can only oppose a doubt. Strongly do I doubt the correctness of the assumption. Yet is this point not hastily to be dismissed, as well because it has been a good deal insisted upon, as because, if it could be substantiated, I confess I think it would needs overturn the theory here contended for. The doctrine then, as far as I understand, is, that language, and the arts, and whatever makes up the sum of human knowledge, has been derived to us from the East, whence issuing it has gradually spread itself over the world. Accordingly, endeavours have been made to trace all languages to one common source; the connection between the Hebrew, the Phœnician, the Pelasgian, and the Greek, has been studiously laboured; it has been asserted that the Latin was in its origin no more than Æolic Greek, while the modern European languages are only branches from the Latin. If all these relations were clearly made out, instead of being in a great measure open to dispute, the fact would not prove that, in evidence of which it is adduced. For with respect to any one of these derived languages, it is not surely denied that there must have pre-existed some species of oral communication, however imperfect that may have been; the acquired language, then, in any case, must have been a graft—not a plant—and must have superseded its rude predecessor by virtue only of its superior capacity, and by its being ready-made to hand, and not because the latter had no power of cultivation or improvement in se. The only kind of evidence, as it seems to me, on which it would be possible to ground a substantial argument against the human origin of language, would be to show that all barbarians when first discovered were literally "mutum et turpe pecus;" but if their possession of any aboriginal form of speech whatsoever, any indigenous words, however few be admitted, I cannot but think it a virtual admission of the whole argument—

"Cadat elusus ratione ruentis acervi."

For if mankind have wit enough without direction to possess themselves of the first elements of language, what, in the name of reason, is to prevent them from acquiring the remainder in the same manner? We who say we are civilized, and who count the arts of navigation and of war amongst our accomplishments, transport ourselves to some newly discovered region, where, having reduced the natives to subjection, we give them arts and letters in exchange for liberty, and then say—and they are taught to believe us—that they ought to be vastly obliged to us, for, that if it had not been for the lucky accident of our finding them out and murdering the greater part of their naked fathers, they could never have tasted the blessings of knowledge; and their language, as well as their manners, must inevitably have remained in statu quo to doomsday. What a superfluous piece of insolence is this! And this has been the trick played on the conquered by the conquerors ever since the flood! If savage tribes exhibit—and they do exhibit—degrees of difference in their condition, if they are found—not equally—but more or less removed from the point of civilization, it must be accepted as proof sufficient of an indefinite power of advancement; and the same of language. To admit the existence of the primum mobile, and question the power of progression, is to deny that the greater includes the less, and to overturn the first principles of ratiocination. That any country in a state of high civilization would be discovered by the explorers of new worlds, was not to be expected. One of the first results of that condition of a country is emigration; as ripe fruits shed their seeds, so a ripe country, by a natural effort, shoots off its superabundant population, whence infant states—as from the seed new fruit. If a distant nation had been rising and progressing pari passu with ourselves, not only would their motives to colonization have become the same, but curiosity and the spirit of enterprise would, as with us, long since have spread them over the globe, and they would have found us, if we did not find them. The gradual procession of knowledge and humanity out of Holy Land, which history teaches us,—this "march of mind" from East to West,—may very well consist with these opinions. Because it may have pleased God to provide a certain course, if I may say so, for the education of the world, and to ordain that one community shall instruct another till all be perfected in knowledge, we are not therefore warranted in saying—as it has been so confidently said—that no society of men have the power of attaining to that perfection of themselves. The facts are against those who say it: they cannot persuade history to support so absurd a position. Not that history records such a phenomenon as that above imagined

(for many reasons besides those alleged,) but that she presents us with examples innumerable of a natural state of society so far possessed of our own materials of civilization, that it would be the ne plus ultra of drivelling vanity to suppose that we were any otherwise important to them, than as useful forcing instruments to hasten and facilitate the intellectual season.

I defer to the next chapter some concluding observations on this first head.

SPECIMENS OF WIT, HUMOUR, AND CRITICISM OF CHARLES LAMB.

No. IV.

MRS BATTLE'S OPINIONS ON WHIST.

[HERE followeth, gentle Reader, the immortal record of Mrs Battle and her whist; a game which the author (as thou wilt see) wished that he could play for ever; and accordingly in the deathless pages of his wit, for ever will be play it.—Ed.]

"A CLEAR fire, a clean hearth, and the rigour of the game." This was the celebrated wish of old Sarah Battle (now with God) who, next to her devotions, loved a good game at whist. She was none of your lukewarm gamblers, your half-and-half players, who have no objection to take a hand, if you want one to make up a rubber; who affirm that they have no pleasure in winning; that they like to win one game and lose another; that they can while away an hour very agreeably at a card table, but are indifferent whether they play or no; and will desire an adversary who has slipt a wrong card to take it up and play another. These insufferable triflers are the curse of a table. One of these flies will spoil a whole pot. Of such it may be said, that they do not play at cards, but only play at playing at them.

Sarah Battle was none of that breed. She detested them as I do from her heart and soul, and would not, save upon a striking emergency, willingly seat herself at the same table with them. She loved a thorough-paced partner, a determined enemy. She took, and gave, no concessions. She hated favours. She never made a revoke, nor ever passed it over in her adversary without exacting the utmost forfeiture. She fought a good fight: cut and thrust. She held not her good sword (her cards) "like a dancer." She sate bolt upright; and neither showed you her cards, nor desired to see yours. All people have their blind side—their superstitions; and I have heard her declare, under the rose, that Hearts was her favourite suit.

I never in my life—and I knew Sarah Battle many of the best years of it—saw her take out her snuff-box when it was her turn to play; or snuff a candle in the middle of the game; or ring for a servant till it was fairly over. She never introduced, or connived at miscellaneous conversation during its process. As she emphatically observed, "Cards were cards;" and if I ever saw unmingled distaste in her fine last-century countenance, it was at the airs of a young gentleman of a literary turn, who had been with difficulty persuaded to take a hand; and who in his excess of candour declared, that he thought there was no harm in unbending the mind now and then, after serious studies, in recreations of that kind! She could not bear to have her noble occupation, to which she wound up her faculties, considered in that light. It was her business, her duty, the thing she came into the world to do,—and she did it. She unbent her mind afterwards—over a book.

Pope was her favourite author: his 'Rape of the Lock' her favourite work. She once did me the favour to play over with me (with the cards) his celebrated game of ombre in that poem; and to explain to me how far it agreed with, and in what points it would be found to differ from, tradrille. Her illustrations were apposite and poignant; and I had the pleasure of sending the substance of them to Mr Bowles: but I suppose they came too late to be inserted among his ingenious notes upon that author.

Quadrille, she has often told me was her first love; but whist had engaged her maturer esteem.

The former, she said, was showy and spacious, and likely to allure young persons. The uncertainty and quick shifting of partners—a thing which the constancy of whist abhors;—the dazzling supremacy and regal investiture of Spadille—absurd, as she justly observed, in the pure aristocracy of whist, where his crown and garter gave him no proper power above his brother-nobility of the Aces;—the giddy vanity, so taking to the inexperienced, of playing alone;—above all the overpowering attractions of a Sans Prendre Vole,—to the triumph of which there is certainly nothing parallel or approaching, in the contingencies of whist;—all these, she would say, make quadrille a game of captivation to the young and enthusiastic. But whist was the solid game: that was her word. It was a long meal, not, like quadrille, a feast of snatches. One or two rubbers might co-extend in duration with an evening. They gave time to form rooted friendships, to cultivate steady enmities. She despised the chance-started, capricious and ever-fluctuating alliances of the other. The skirmishes of quadrille, she would say, reminded her of the petty ephemeral embroilments of the little Indian states, depicted by Machiavel; perpetually changing postures and connexions; bitter foes to-day, sugared darlings to-morrow; kissing and scratching in a breath; but the wars of whist were comparable to the long, steady, deep-rooted, rational antipathies of the great French and English nations.

A grave simplicity was what she chiefly admired in her favourite game. There was nothing silly in it, like the mob in cribbage—nothing superfluous. No flashes—that most irrational of all pleas that a reasonable being can set up:—that anyone should claim four by virtue of holding cards of the same mark and colour, without reference to the playing of the game, or the individual worth or pretensions of the cards themselves! She held this to be a solecism; as pitiful an ambition at cards as alliteration is in authorship. She despised superficiality, and looked deeper than the colours of things.—Suits were soldiers, she would say, and must have a uniformity of array to distinguish them: but what should we say of a foolish squire, who should claim a merit from dressing up his tenantry in red jackets, that never were to be marshalled—never to take the field?—She even wished that whist were more simple than it is; and, in my mind, would have stripped it of some appendages, which, in the state of human frailty, may be venially, and even commendably allowed of. She saw no reason for the deciding of the trump by the turn of the card. Why not one suit always trumps?—Why two colours, when the marks of the suits would have sufficiently distinguished them without it?—

“But the eye, my dear madam, is agreeably refreshed with the variety. Man is not a creature of pure reason—he must have his senses delightfully appealed to. We see it in Roman Catholic countries, where the music and the paintings draw in many to worship, whom your quaker spirit of unsensualizing would have kept out. You yourself have a pretty collection of paintings—but confess to me whether, walking in your gallery at Sandham, among those clear Vandykes, or among the Paul Potters in the ante-room, you ever felt your bosom glow with an elegant delight, at all comparable to that you have it in your power to experience most evenings over a well-arranged assortment of the court cards?—the pretty antic habits, like heralds in a procession—the gay triumph-assuring scarlets—the contrasting deadly-killing sables—the ‘hoary majesty of spades’—Pam in all his glory!—

“All these might be dispensed with; and, with their naked names upon the drab paste-board, the game might go on very well pictureless. But the beauty of cards would be extinguished for ever. Stripped of all that is imaginative in them, they must degenerate into mere gambling. Imagine a dull deal board, a drum head, to spread them on, instead of that nice verdant carpet (next to Nature’s), fittest arena for those courtly combatants to play their gallant jousts and tourneys in! Exchange those delicately-turned ivory markers (work of Chinese artist unconscious of their symbol, or as profanely slighting their true application as the arrantest Ephesian journeyman that turned out those little shrines for the goddess)—exchange them for little bits of leather (our ancestors’ money) or chalk and a slate!”

The old lady, with a smile confessed the soundness of my logic; and to her approbation of my arguments on her favourite topic that evening, I have always fancied myself indebted for the legacy of a curious cribbage-board, made of the finest Sienna marble, which her maternal uncle (old Walter Plumer, whom I have elsewhere celebrated) brought with him from Florence—this, and a trifle of five hundred pounds came to me at her death.

The former bequest (which I do not least value) I have kept with religious care; though she herself, to confess a truth, was never greatly taken with cribbage. It was an essentially vulgar game, I have heard her say,—disputing with her uncle, who was very partial to it. She could never bring her mouth heartily to pronounce, “go”—or “that’s a go.” She called it an ungrammatical game. The pegging teased her. I once knew her to forfeit a rubber (a five dollar stake) because she would not take advantage of the turn-up knave, which would have given it her, but which she must have claimed by the disgraceful tenure of declaring “two for his heels.” There is something extremely genteel in this sort of self-denial. Sarah Battle was a gentlewoman born.

Piquet she held the best game at the cards for two persons, though she would ridicule the pedantry of the terms—such as pique—repique—the capot—they savoured (she thought) of affectation. But games for two, or even three, she never greatly cared for. She loved the quadrate, or square. She would argue thus:—Cards are warfare: the ends are gain, with glory. But cards are war, in disguise of a sport; when single adversaries encounter, the ends proposed are too palpable. By themselves, it is too close a fight; with spectators it is not much bettered. No looker on can be interested, except for a bet, and then it is a mere affair of money; he cares not for your luck sympathetically, or for your play. Three are still worse; a mere naked war of every man against every man, as in cribbage, without league or alliance; or a rotation of petty and contradictory interests, a succession of heartless leagues, and not much more hearty infractions of them, as in tradrille.—But in square games (she meant whist) all that is possible to be attained in card-playing is accomplished. There are the incentives of profit with honour, common to to every species—though the latter can be but very imperfectly enjoyed in those other games, where the spectator is only feebly a participator. But the parties in whist are spectators and principals too. They are a theatre to themselves, and a looker-on is not wanted. He is rather worse than nothing, and an impertinence. Whist abhors neutrality or interests beyond its sphere. You glory in some surprising stroke of skill or fortune, not because a cold—or even an interested—by-stander witnesses it, but because your partner sympathises in the contingency. You win for two. You triumph for two. Two are exalted. Two again are mortified; which divides their disgrace, as the conjunction doubles (by taking off the invidiousness) your glories. Two losing to two are better reconciled, than one to one in that close butchery. The hostile feeling is weakened by multiplying the channels. War becomes a civil game.—By such reasonings as these the old lady was accustomed to defend her favourite pastime.

No inducement could ever prevail upon her to play at any game where chance entered into the composition, for nothing. Chance, she would argue—and here again admire the subtlety of her conclusion!—chance is nothing but where something else depends upon it. It is obvious that cannot be glory. What rational cause of exultation could it give to a man to turn up size ace a hundred times together by himself? or before spectators, where no stake was depending? Make a lottery of a hundred thousand tickets with but one fortunate number—and what possible principle of our nature, except stupid wonderment, could it gratify to gain that number as many times successively, without a prize?—Therefore she disliked the mixture of chance in backgammon, where it was not played for money. She called it foolish, and those people idiots who were taken with a lucky hit, under such circumstances. Games of pure skill were as little to her fancy. Played for a stake, they were a mere system of over-reaching. Played for glory, they were a mere setting of one man’s wit,—his memory, or combination-faculty rather—against another’s; like a mock engagement at a review, bloodless and profitless.—She could not conceive a game wanting the sprightly infusion of chance,—the handsome excuses of good fortune. Two people playing at chess in a corner of a room, whilst whist was stirring in the centre, would inspire her with insufferable horror and ennui. Those well-cut similitudes of castles and knights, the imagery of the board, she would argue (and I think in this case justly), were intirely misplaced and senseless. Their hard head-contests can in no instance ally with the fancy. They reject form and colour. A pencil and dry slate, she used to say, were the proper arena for such combatants.

To those puny objectors against cards, as nurturing the bad passions, she would retort, that man is a gaming animal. He must be always trying to get the better in something or other:—that this passion can scarcely be more safely expended than upon a game at cards: that cards are a temporary illusion; in truth, a mere drama; for we do but play at being mightily concerned, where a few idle shillings are at stake, yet, during the illusion, we are as mightily concerned as those whose stake is crowns and kingdoms. They are a sort of dream-fighting; much ado; great battling, and little bloodshed; mighty means for disproportioned ends; quite as diverting, and a great deal more innoxious, than many of those more serious games of life, which men play, without esteeming them to be such.—

With great deference to the old lady’s judgment on these matters, I think I have experienced some moments in my life, when playing at cards for nothing has even been agreeable. When I am in sickness, or not in the best spirits, I sometimes call for the cards, and play a game at piquet for love with my cousin Bridget—Bridget Elia.

I grant there is something sneaking in it; but with a tooth-ache, or a sprained ancle,—when you are subdued and humble,—you are glad to put up with an inferior spring of action.

There is such a thing in nature, I am convinced, as sick whist.—

I grant it is not the highest style of man—I deprecate the manes of Sarah Battle—she lives not, alas! to whom I should apologise.—

At such times, those terms which my old friend objected to, come in as something admissible.—I love to get a tierce or a quatorze, though they mean nothing. I am subdued to an inferior interest. Those shadows of winning amuse me.

That last game I had with my sweet cousin (I capotted her)—(dare I tell thee, how foolish I am?)—I wished it might have lasted for ever, though we gained nothing, and lost nothing, though it was a mere shade of play: I would be content to go on in that idle folly for ever. The pipkin should be ever boiling, that was to prepare the gentle lenitive to my foot, which Bridget was doomed to apply after the game was over: and, as I do not much relish appliances, there it should ever bubble. Bridget and I should be ever playing.

IMPORTANCE OF INDIVIDUALS TO ONE ANOTHER.

Widely separated as they may be, there is no case where the influence possessed by any individual, however mean, over any other individual, however mighty, is really null, and unworthy of all regard. The mouse in the fable, releasing the lion from bondage, is an exemplification of the possible dependence of the strong upon the weak.—Bentham’s Deontology.

THE WEEK.

PERSONAL PORTRAITS OF EMINENT MEN.

DANTE.

[From 'Lives of Eminent Italians.'—This summary account of the great Italian is one of the best fitted to give a popular and true idea of him, that we have seen.]

DANTE'S poem is certainly neither the greatest nor the best in the world; but it is, perhaps, the most extraordinary one which resolute intellect ever planned, or persevering talents successfully executed. It stands alone; and must be read and judged according to rules and immunities adapted to its peculiar structure, plot, and purpose, formed upon principles affording scope to the exercise of the highest powers, with little regard to precedent. If these principles, then, have intrinsic excellence, and the work be found uniformly consistent with them, fulfilling to the utmost the aims of the author, the 'Divina Commedia' must be allowed to stand among the proudest trophies of original genius, challenging, encountering, and overcoming unparalleled difficulties. Though the fields of action, or rather of vision, are nominally Hell, Purgatory, and Paradise,—the Paradise, Purgatory, and Hell of Dante, with all their terrors, and splendours, and preternatural fictions, are but representations of scenes transacted on earth, and characters that lived antecedently or contemporaneously with himself. Though altogether out of the world, the whole is of the world. Men and women seem fixed in eternal torments, passing through purifying flames, or exalted to celestial beatitude; yet in all these situations they are what they were; and it is their former history, more than their present happiness, hope, or despair, which constitutes, through a hundred cantos, the interest awakened and kept up by the successive exhibition of more than a thousand individuals, actors and sufferers. Of every one of these something terrible or touching is intimated or told briefly at the utmost, but frequently by mere hints of narrative, or gleams of allusion, which excite curiosity in the breast of the reader, who is surprised at the poet's forbearance, when, in the notes of commentators, he finds complex, strange and fearful circumstances, on which a modern versifier or novelist would extend pages, treated here as ordinary events on which it would be impertinent to dwell. These, in the author's own age, were generally understood; the bulk of the materials being gathered up during a period of restlessness and confusion among the republican states of Italy.

Hence, though the first appearance of the 'Divina Commedia,' in any intelligible edition, is repulsive from the multitude of notes, and the text is not seldom difficult and dark with the oracular words, yet will the toil and patience of any reader be well repaid, who perseveringly proceeds but a little way, quietly referring, as occasion may require, from the obscurity of the original to the illustrations below; for when he returns from the latter to the former (as though his own eye had been refreshed with new light, the darkness having been in it, and not in the verse), what was colourless as a cloud is radiant with beauty, and what before was undefined in form, becomes exquisitely precise and symmetrical from comprehending in so small a compass so vast a variety of thought, feeling, or fact. Dante, in this respect, must be studied as an author in a dead language by a learner, or rather as one who employs a living language on forgotten themes; then will his style grow easier and clearer as the reader grows more and more acquainted with his subject, his manner, and his materials. For whatever be the corruption of the text (which, perhaps, has never been sufficiently collated) the remoteness of the allusions, of our countrymen's want of that previous knowledge of almost everything treated upon which best prepares the mind for the perception and highest enjoyment of poetical beauty and poetical pleasure, Dante will be found, in reality, one of the most clear, minute, and accurate writers in sentiment, as he is one of the most perfectly natural and graphic painters to the life of persons, characters, and actions. His draughts have the freedom of etchings, and the sharpness of proof impressions. His poem is well worth all the pains which the most indolent reader may take to master it.

Boccaccio, the earliest of his biographers, though not the most authentic, says, that in person Dante was of middle stature; that he stooped a little from the shoulders, and was remarkable for his firm and graceful gait. He always dressed in a manner peculiarly becoming his rank and years. His visage was long, with an aquiline nose, and eyes rather full than small, his cheek-bones large, and his upper-lip projecting beyond the under; his complexion was dark; his beard and hair black, thick and curled; and his countenance exhibited a confirmed expression of melancholy and thoughtfulness. Hence, one day, at Verona, as he passed a gateway, where several ladies were seated, one of them exclaimed, "There goes the man who can take a walk to hell, and back again, whenever he pleases, and bring us news of everything that is doing there." On which another, with equal sagacity, added, "That must be true; for don't you see how his beard is frizzled, and his face browned, with the heat and the smoke below." The words, whether spoken in sport or silliness, were overheard by the poet, who, as the fair slanderers meant no malice, was quite willing that they should please themselves with their own fancies. Towards the opening of the 'Purgatorio' there is an allusion to the soil which his face had contracted on his journey with Virgil through the nether world:—

"High Morn had triumph'd o'er the glimmering dawn

Which fled before her, so that I discern'd
The tremble of the ocean from afar:
We walk'd along the solitary plain,
Like men retracing their erratic steps,
Who think all lost till they regain the path.
Arriving where the dew-drops with the sun
Contented, and lay thick beneath the shade,
Both hands my master delicately spread
Upon the grass: aware of his intent,
I turn'd to him my tearful countenance,
And thence he wiped away the dusky hue
With which the infernal air had sullied it."

In his studies, Dante was so eager, earnest, and indefatigable, that his wife and family often complained of his unsocial habits. Boccaccio mentions, that once when he was at Sienna, having unexpectedly found at a shop-window a book which he had not seen, but had long coveted, he placed himself on a bench before the door, at nine o'clock in the morning, and never lifted up his eyes till vespers, when he had run through the whole contents with such intense application, as to have totally disregarded the festivities of processions and music which had been passing through the streets the greater part of the day; and when questioned about what had happened in his presence, he denied having had any knowledge of anything but what he was reading. As might be expected from his other habits, he rarely spoke, except when personally addressed, or strongly moved, and then his words were few, well chosen, weighty, and expressed in tones of voice accommodated to the subject. Yet, when it was required, his eloquence broke forth with spontaneous felicity, splendour, and exuberance of diction, imagery, and thought.

Dante delighted in music. The most natural and touching incident in his 'Purgatorio' is the interview between himself and his friend Casella, an eminent singer in his day, who must, notwithstanding, have been forgotten within his century, but for the extraordinary good fortune which had befallen him, to be celebrated by two of the greatest poets of their respective countries (Dante and Milton), from whose pages his name cannot soon perish.

Choosing to excel in all the elegancies of life, as well as in gentlemanly exercises and intellectual

* L' alba vinceva l' ora mattutina
Che fuggia 'nnanzi, sì che di lontano
Conobbi il tremolar della marina.
Noi andavam per lo sfolgo piano
Cem' uom, che torna alla smarrita strada
Che 'ndina ad essa li pare ire in vano.

powers, Dante attached himself to painting not less than to music, and practised it with the pencil (not indeed so triumphantly as with the pen, his picture poetry being unrivalled), with sufficient facility and grace to make it a favourite amusement in private; and none can believe that he could amuse himself with what was worthless. His four celebrated contemporaries, Cimabue, Giotto, and Giotto, are all honourably mentioned by him in the eleventh Canto of the 'Purgatorio.'

There is an interesting allusion to the employment which he loved in the 'Vita Nuova':—"On the day that completed the year after this lady (Beatrice) had been received among the denizens of eternal life, while I was sitting alone, and recalling her form to my remembrance, I drew an angel on a certain tablet," &c. It may be incidentally observed, that Dante's angels are often painted with unsurpassable beauty, as well as inexhaustible variety of delineation throughout his poems, especially in Canto ix of the 'Inferno,' and Cantos ii, viii, xii, xv, xviii, xxiv of the 'Purgatorio.' Take six lines of one of these portraits; though the inimitable original must consume the unequal version:—

"A noi venia la creatura bella,
Bianco vestita, e ne la faccia quale
Par, tremolando, mattutina stella:
Le braccia aperte, e indi aprese l' ale;
Disse; Venite; qui son presso i gradi,
E agevolmente omai si sale."

DELL' PURGATORIO, Canto XII.

"That being came, all beautiful, to meet us,
Clad in white raiment, and the morning star
Appear'd to tremble in his countenance;
His arms he spread, and then he spread his wings
And cried, 'Come on, the steps are near at hand,
And here the ascent is easy.'"

Leonardo Aretino, who had seen Dante's handwriting, mentions, with no small commendation, that the letters were long, slender, and exceedingly distinct,—the characteristics of what is called in ornamental writing a fine Italian hand. The circumstance may seem small, but it is not insignificant as a finishing stroke in the portraiture of one who, though he was the first poet unquestionably, and not the least philosopher, was also one of the most accomplished gentlemen of his age.

CHARACTERS OF SHAKSPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

NO. XII.—TROILUS AND CRESSIDA.

THIS is one of the most loose and desultory of our author's plays: it rambles on just as it happens, but it overtakes, together with some indifferent matter, a prodigious number of fine things in its way. Troilus himself is no character: he is merely a common lover: but Cressida and her uncle Pandarus are hit off with proverbial truth. By the speeches given to the leaders of the Grecian host, Nestor, Ulysses, Agamemnon, Achilles, Shakspeare seems to have known them as well as if he had been a spy sent by the Trojans into the enemy's camp—to say nothing of their being very lofty examples of didactic eloquence. The following is a very stately and spirited declamation:—

"ULYSSES. Troy, yet upon her basis, had been down,
And the great Hector's sword had lack'd a master,
But for these instances.
The specialty of rule hath been neglected.

The heavens themselves, the planets, and this centre,
Observe degree, priority, and place,
Insisture, course, proportion, season, form,
Office, and custom, in all line of order:
And therefore is the glorious planet, Sol,
In noble eminence, enthron'd and spher'd
Amidst the other, whose med'cinable eye

Corrects the ill aspects of planets evil,
And posts, like the commandment of a king, Sans check, to good and bad. But, when the planets,
In evil mixture to disorder wander,
What plagues and what portents! what mutinies!
What raging of the sea! shaking of earth!
Commotion in the winds! frights, changes, horrors,
Divert and crack, rend and deracinate
The unity and married calm of states
Quite from their fixture! O, when degree is shaken, (Which is the ladder to all high designs)
The enterprize is sick! How could communities,
Degrees in schools, and brotherhoods in cities,
Peaceful commerce from dividable shores,
The primogenitive and due of birth
Prerogative of age, crowns, sceptres, laurels, (But by degree) stand in authentic place?
Take but degree away, untune that string,
And hark what discord follows! each thing meets
In mere oppugnancy. The bounded waters
Would lift their bosoms higher than the shores,
And make a sop of all this solid globe:
Strength would be lord of imbecility,
And the rude son would strike his father dead:
Force would be right; or, rather, right and wrong
(Between whose endless jar Justice resides)
Would lose their names, and so would Justice too,
Then everything includes itself in power,
Power into will, will into appetite;
And appetite (an universal wolf,
So doubly seconded with will and power)
Must make perforce an universal prey,
And last, eat up himself. Great Agamemnon,
This chaos, when degree is suffocate,
Follows the choking:
And this neglect of degree it is,
That by a pace goes backward, in a purpose
It hath to climb. The general's disdained
By him one step below; he, by the next;
That next, by him beneath: so every step,
Exemplified by the first pace that is sick
Of his superior, grows to an envious fever
Of pale and bloodless emulation;
And 'tis this fever that keeps Troy on foot,
Not her own sinews. To end a tale of length,
Troy in our weakness lives, not in her strength."

It cannot be said of Shakspeare, as was said of some one, that he was "without o'erflowing full." He was full even to o'erflowing. He gave heaped measure, running over. This was his greatest fault.
He was only in danger "of losing distinction in his thoughts" (to borrow his own expression)

"As doth a battle when they charge on heaps
The enemy flying."

There is another passage, the speech of Ulysses to Achilles, showing him the thankless nature of popularity, which has a still greater depth of moral observation and richness of illustration than the former.
It is long, but worth the quoting. The sometimes giving an intire extract from the unacted plays of our author may with one class of readers have almost the use of restoring a lost passage; and may serve to convince another class of critics, that the poet's genius was not confined to the production of stage effect by preternatural means:—

"ULYSSES. Time hath, my lord, a wallet at his back,
Wherein he puts alms for Oblivion;
A great-sid'd monster of ingratitude:
Those scraps are good deeds past,
Which are devour'd as fast as they are made,
Forgot as soon as done: Perseverance, dear mylord,
Keeps Honour bright: to have done, is to hang Quite out of fashion, like a rusty mail
In monumental mockery. Take the instant way;
For Honour travels in a strait so narrow,
Where one but goes abreast; keep then the path,
For Emulation hath a thousand sons,
That one by one pursue; if you give way,
Or hedge aside from the direct forth-right,
Like to an entered tide, they all rush by,

And leave you blindness;—
Or, like a gullant horse fall'n in first rank, O'er-run and trampled on: then what they do in present,
Tho' less than yours in past, must o'ertop yours:
For Time is like a fashionable host,
That slightly shakes his parting guest by th' hand,
And with his arms out-stretch'd, as he would fly,
Grasps in the corner: the Welcome ever smiles,
And Farewell goes out sighing. O, let not virtue seek Remuneration for the thing it was; for beauty, wit,
High birth, vigour of bone, desert in service,
Love, friendship, charity, are subjects all
To envious and calumniating time:
One touch of nature makes the whole world kin.
That all, with one consent, praise new-born gauds,
Tho' they are made and moulded of things past,
The present eye praises the present object.
Then marvel not, thou great and complete man,
That all the Greeks begin to worship Ajax;
Since things in motion sooner catch the eye,
Than what not stirs. The cry went out on thee,
And still it might, and yet it may again,
If thou wouldst not entomb thyself alive,
And ease thy reputation in thy tent."

The throng of images in the above lines is prodigious; and though they sometimes jostle against one another, they everywhere raise and carry on the feeling, which is metaphysically true and profound.
The debates between the Trojan chiefs on the restoring of Helen are full of knowledge of human motives and character. Troilus enters well into the philosophy of war when he says in answer to something that falls from Hector,—

"Why there you touch'd the life of our design:
Were it not glory that we were affected,
Than the performance of our heaving spleens,
I would not wish a drop of Trojan blood
Spent more in her defence. But, worthy Hector,
She is a theme of honour and renown,
A spur to valiant and magnanimous deeds."

The character of Hector, in the few slight indications which appear of it, is made very amiable. His death is sublime, and shows in a striking light the mixture of barbarity and heroism of the age. The threats of Achilles are fatal; they carry their own means of execution with them:—

"Come here about me, you my Myrmidons,
Mark what I say.—Attend me where I wheel:
Strike not a stroke, but keep yourselves in breath;
And when I have the bloody Hector found,
Empale him with your weapons round about:
In fellest manner execute your arms.
Follow me, sirs, and my proceeding eye."

He then finds Hector and slays him, as if he had been hunting down a wild beast. There is something revolting as well as terrific in the ferocious coolness with which he singles out his prey: nor does the splendour of the achievement reconcile us to the cruelty of the means.

The characters of Cressida and Pandarus are very amusing and instructive. The disinterested willingness of Pandarus to serve his friend in an affair which lies next his heart is immediately brought forward. "Go thy way, Troilus, go thy way; had
I a sister were a grace, or a daughter were a goddess, he should take his choice. O admirable man! Paris!
Paris is dirt to him, and I warrant Helen, to change, would give money to boot." This is the language he addresses to his niece: nor is she much behindhand in coming into the plot. Her head is as light and fluttering as her heart. "It is the prettiest villain; she fetches her breath so short as a new-ta'en sparrow." Both characters are originals, and quite different from what they are in Chaucer. In Chaucer, Cressida is represented as a grave, sober, considerate personage (a widow—he cannot tell her age, nor whether she has children or no) who has an alternate eye to her character, her interest, and her pleasure: Shakspeare's Cressida is a giddy girl, an unpractised jilt, who falls in love with Troilus, as she afterwards deserts him, from mere levity and thoughtlessness of temper. She may be wooed and won to anything, and from anything, at a moment's warning: the other knows very well what she would be at, and sticks to it, and is more governed by substantial reasons than by caprice or vanity. Pandarus again, in Chaucer's story, is a friendly sort of go-between, tolerably busy, officious, and forward in bringing matters to bear:

but in Shakspeare he has "a stamp exclusive and professional:" he wears the badge of his trade; he is a regular knight of the game. The difference of the manner in which the subject is treated arises perhaps less from intention, than from the different genius of the two poets. There is no double entendre in the characters of Chaucer: they are either quite serious or quite comic. In Shakspeare the ludicrous and ironical are constantly blended with the stately and the impassioned. We see Chaucer's characters as they saw themselves, not as they appeared to others or might have appeared to the poet. He is as deeply implicated in the affairs of his personages as they could be themselves. He had to go a long journey with each of them, and became a kind of necessary confidant. There is little relief, or light and shade in his pictures. The conscious smile is not seen lurking under the brow of grief or impatience. Everything with him is intense and impatience—a working out of what went before.— Shakspeare never committed himself to his characters. He trifled, laughed, or wept with them as he chose. He has no prejudices for or against them; and it seems a matter of perfect indifference whether he shall be in jest or earnest. According to him
"the web of our lives is of a mingled yarn, good and ill together." His genius was dramatic, as Chaucer's was historical. He saw both sides of a question, the different views taken of it according to the different interests of the parties concerned, and he was at once an actor and spectator in the scene. If anything, he is too various and flexible; too full of transitions, of glancing lights, of salient points. If Chaucer followed up his subject too doggedly, perhaps Shakspeare was too volatile and heedless. The Muse's wing too often lifted him off his feet. He made infinite excursions to the right and left.

"He hath done
Mad and fantastic execution,
Engaging and redeeming of himself
With such a careless force and forceless care,
As if that luck in every spite of cunning Bad him win all."

Chaucer attended chiefly to the real and natural, that is, to the involuntary and inevitable impressions on the mind in given circumstances: Shakspeare exhibited also the possible and the fantastical,—not only what things are in themselves, but whatever they might seem to be, their different reflections, their endless combinations. He lent his fancy, wit, invention, to others, and borrowed their feelings in return. Chaucer excelled in the force of habitual sentiment; Shakspeare added to it every variety of passion, every suggestion of thought or accident.
Chaucer described external objects with the eye of a painter, or he might be said to have embodied them with the hand of a sculptor, every part is so thoroughly made out, and tangible:—Shakspeare's imagination threw over them a lustre

"Prouder than when blue Iris bends."

Everything in Chaucer has a downright reality.
A simile or a sentiment is as if it were given in upon evidence. In Shakspeare the commonest matter-of-fact has a romantic grace about it; or seems to float with the breath of imagination in a freer element.
No one could have more depth of feeling or observation than Chaucer, but he wanted resources of invention to lay open the stores of nature or the human heart with the same radiant light, that Shakspeare has done. However fine or profound the thought, we know what was coming, whereas the effect of reading Shakspeare is "like the eye of vassalage encountering majesty." Chaucer's mind was consecutive, rather than discursive. He arrived at truth through a certain process; Shakespeare saw everything by intuition. Chaucer had great variety of power, but he could do only one thing at once. He set himself to work on a particular subject. His ideas were kept separate, labelled, ticketed and parcelled out in a set form, in pews and compartments by themselves. They did not play into one another's hands. They did not re-act upon one another, as the blower's breath moulds the yielding glass. There is something hard and dry in them. What is the most wonderful thing in Shakespeare's faculties is their excessive sociability, and how they gossiped and compared notes together.

We must conclude this criticism; and we will do it with a quotation or two. One of the most beautiful passages in Chaucer's tale is the description of Cresseide's first avowal of her love:—

"And as the new abashed nightingale,
That stineth first when she beginneth sing,
When that she heareth any herde's tale,
Or in the hedges any wight stirring,
And, after, sicker doth her voice outting;
Right so Cresseide, when that her dread stent,
Opened her heart, and told him her intent."

See also the two next stanzas, and particularly that divine one beginning

"Her armes small, her back both straight and soft," &c.

Compare this with the following speech of Troilus to Cressida in the play.

"O, that I thought it could be in a woman;
And if it can, I will presume in you,
To feed for aye her lamp and flame of love,
To keep her constancy in plight and youth,
Out-living beauties out-ward, with a mind
That doth renew swifter than blood decays.
Or, that persuasion could but thus convince me,
That my integrity and truth to you
Might be affronted with the match and weight
Of such a winnow'd purity in love;
How were I then uplifted! But alas,
I am as true as Truth's simplicity,
And simpler than the infancy of Truth."

These passages may not seem very characteristic at first sight, though we think they are so. We will give two, that cannot be mistaken. Patroclus says to Achilles,—

"Rouse yourself; and the weak wanton Cupid
Shall from your neck unloose his amorous fold,
And like a dew-drop from the lion's mane,
Be shook to air."

Troilus, addressing the God of Day on the approach of the morning that parts him from Cressida, says with much scorn,—

"What! proffer'st thou thy light here for to sell?
Go, sell it them that smallé selés grave."

If nobody but Shakespeare could have written the former, nobody but Chaucer would have thought of the latter.—Chaucer was the most literal of poets, as Richardson was of prose-writers.

We have much pleasure in inserting the following literary notice which has been sent us. In the press, 'Corn Law Rhymes.' The third volume of the works of Ebenezer Elliott will appear in the ensuing month. Amongst its contents will be found some of the earliest productions of this talented writer, without any political allusions,—productions which were almost unheeded at the time of their publication.—Southey alone addressing him to this effect: "There is power in the least serious of these tales, but the higher you pitch your tone the better you succeed. Thirty years ago they would have made your reputation; thirty years hence the world will wonder that they did not do so."

FINE ARTS.

Wanderings through North Wales, by Thomas Roscoe, embellished with highly finished Engravings, by Wm. Radcliffe, from Drawings made expressly for this work, by Cattermole, Cox, and Creswick. Part I. London. Tilt; Simpkin and Marshall.

MR RADCLIFFE'S engravings in the Part before us are a little hard, with a degree of coarseness and flatness in the fore-ground; but they are distinct, and not unpleasant in the effect. 'Caunant Mawr,' after Creswick, is a striking scene. 'Langollen Valley' is a lovely scene, and makes one think directly of its 'Maid' and her 'contented' Shepherd. Cattermole's 'Death of Llewellyn' is spirited; but not very carefully drawn.

Poems, with Illustrations, by Louisa Anne Twamley. London. Tilt.

MISS TWAMLEY urges that the illustrations to her poems are her first attempt at etching on copper; she need scarcely have done so, for they are executed with much feeling and talent, and bear no signs of incapacity or immaturity. They consist of landscapes and flower-pieces. Of the landscapes, we prefer Tintern Abbey, which we never saw look better on paper; more venerable or picturesque; and a friend, who has visited the veritable edifice, praises it for its fidelity. The flower-piece immediately following it is still better in point of execution; it is drawn with great freedom and feeling, and the blending and variety of the tints is very happily caught. Something will be said of the poetry in another number.

TO F. M. W.

WITH A QUARTO EDITION OF LADY RACHEL RUSSELL'S LETTERS.

ON more than Russell in thy fortitude,
And in thy love too, capable of more,
— Say, either may we bless or must deplore
The lot which makes thy evil and our good.
For, Lady, had the silken lap of ease
Nursed the charms thy friends so doat upon,
Then hadst thou not from adverse fortune won
The triumph which a chastened heart decrees,
For hadst thou known the subtle bands that knit
Into one web meek feeling and high thought,
Making the soul a holy garment, wrought
With nicest art, magnificently fit—
Then unto us thy love had only brought
The grace of manners and the charm of wit.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE enlarged copy of Mr Landor's ode will appear in our next. Its insertion has been delayed by a provoking accident, which has conspired, we fear, with another hindrance, to make us seem very unaccountable and thankless in the eyes of the fair Correspondent by whom it was forwarded. But we have been hoping, day by day, to be able to beg her acceptance of a little volume, which would have accompanied our letter of explanation; and in case this volume does not appear before the present Number of our JOURNAL, we hereby mention the circumstance that she may see we are not quite so absurd as she might otherwise reasonably imagine.

We shall be glad to hear again from H. F.

We cordially thank the gentleman who has written to us so kindly about the LONDON JOURNAL, and whose letter inclosed some of the poems of Sir Richard Fanshawe, &c. He will see that we are not forgetful.

The MS. sent us by Mr J. will be attended to at our very first leisure.

We are much mistaken if we have not inserted some article written by J. M. C. Will he favour us with copy or copies of some later communications, in case they have been mislaid?

Our friend G. H. L. seems to be full of good feeling, and fancy too; but he is in too great a hurry both with his verse and prose, and therefore writes at too great length. He reminds us of the letter-writer, who said, "Excuse my being so long, but I have not time to be shorter." Is this our friend's case? At present he wants concentration; and must also study his versification a little more. He is in such haste to live in his pleasant bowers, that he must needs inhabit them, before they are built!

The writer of a letter in pencil, who notices the doctrine of Berkeley, is, we take it, not the same Correspondent who made the quotation alluded to. We have two Readers who seem to have objections to pen and ink. With regard to Berkeley's arguments we would recommend him to read them for himself in the philosopher's works. He would find them very amusing at least, and, we suspect, very startling. And we should be glad to hear from him afterwards on the subject, for our own acquaintance with them was both partial and hasty.

AN OLD ENGLISH GENTLEMAN will probably have seen the announcement of 'Captain Sword and Captain Pen' before this answer appears. At all events, it will be speedily published by Mr Knight. His other query we cannot notice, because it would trench upon the forbidden ground of advertisement. We are much flattered by his idea of the "Series" he speaks of.

Agreeably to our wish to avoid all possible themes of controversy, we are sorry that the mention of the "Clergyman" in 'Sunday in the Suburbs' was not omitted. F., who takes such a kindly interest in our pages, is informed that the article was written some time back, and the passage, on a hasty review of it, overlooked.

What S. J. says upon 'Love and Matrimony' is very true, and does him honour; but we fear to open our columns to all that may be said on this subject.

We agree with all the opinions expressed in the letter of X; but has he not made his 'Gipsy's Song' somewhat too intimate with the language and luxuries of high living?

Thanks to GODFREY GRAFTON; who will hear further from us.

The printed articles on Mr Lamb reached us unfortunately too late to be made use of in our present number. Due attention shall be paid to them in our next. Meantime we must observe that the writer is under a great mistake respecting the absence of some of Mr Hazlitt's friends, when his funeral took place.

We will not do venerable JOHN PACEY the injustice of publishing the lines sent us by the gentleman who gives us the following account of him, because the homeliness of their attire may not allow everybody to pay honour enough to their spirit; but no one will misunderstand the reverend and living piece of poetry here presented us in the person of a cheerful old man of eighty, rendered superior to his adversity by a good conscience and a mind willing to look around it for sources of comfort:—

"The author of the accompanying trifles, John Pacey, now eighty years of age, was born in the village of Charlton-Kings, Gloucestershire, of honest and industrious parents. He was apprenticed at an early age to a laborious trade, which he has, however, with commendable industry, pursued until within these last few years, when age and infirmities prevented his further exertions, and drove him to seek refuge from penury and distress in the cultivation of a little vegetable-garden. His wants are few and easily supplied; a life of industry has rendered him frugal and abstinent, while honesty and good-feeling have preserved him in the paths of sobriety and rectitude. He married at the early age of twenty-one, and has decently brought up seven children. His eldest son is an object of great compassion, being alike infirm in body and imbecile in mind; he is dependant upon the kindness of his parents, not only for the necessities of life, but also for his actual support,—he is helpless. Notwithstanding this unusual clog, poor old Pacey bears up under the burdens of existence, is cheerful and contented, and even bestows his leisure hours to the cultivation of an humble and amusing taste for poetry."

THE SATYR OF MYTHOLOGY AND THE POETS.

WE intended this week to present our poetry-loving Readers with a new and greatly improved edition of Mr Landor's 'Ode to a Friend,' published in one of our December Numbers last year; but as we have just received some contributions from other friends, which will harmonize with it, and expect one or two more, we delay introducing it till our next. Meanwhile, we lay before them the portrait, if not of an eminent man, of a very eminent half or four-fifths man, an old friend of the poets, particularly of the sequestered and descriptive order, and constantly alluded to in all modern as well as ancient quarters poetical. He is alive, not only in Virgil, and Theocritus, and Spenser, but in Wordsworth, in Keats, and Shelley, and in the 'pages of 'Blackwood' and the LONDON JOURNAL.

We keep the public in mind, from time to time, that one of the objects of the LONDON JOURNAL is to bring uneducated readers of taste and capacity acquainted with the pleasures of those who are educated; and we write articles of this description accordingly, in a spirit intended to be not unacceptable to either. Enter, therefore, the Satyr,—as in one of the Prologues to an old play. By-and-by, we shall give a Triton, a Nymph, &c. &c. and so on through all the gentle populace of fiction,—the plebe degli dei, as Tasso calls them,—the "common people of the gods." Such, we hope, in future times,—or worthy rather of such appellation,—will be all the people of the earth,—their poetry in common, their education in common, knowledge and its divine pleasures being as cheap as daisies in the mead.

The Satyr (not always, but generally) is a goat below the waist, and a man above, with a head in which the two beings are united. He has horns, pointed ears, and a beard; and there is just enough humanity in his face to make the look of the inferior being more observable. The expression is drawn up to the height of the salient and wilful. He is a merry brute of a demigod; and when not sleeping in the grass, is for ever in motion, dancing after his quaint fashion, and butting when he fights. He goes in herds, though he is often found straying. His haunt is in the woods, where he makes love to the Dryads and other nymphs, not always with their good will.

When he gets old, he takes to drinking, grows fat, and is called a Silenus, after the most eminent gorbelly of his race: and then he becomes oracular in his drink, and disbursts the material philosophy which his way of life has taught him. He is not immortal, but has a long life as well as a merry; some say a thousand years; others, many thousand. A thousand years, according to Aristotle, is the duration both of the Satyr and the Nymph.

The Faun, though often confounded with the Satyr, and supposed by some to be nothing but a Latin version of him, is generally taken by the moderns for a Satyr mitigated and more human. Goat's feet are not necessary to him. He can be content with a tail, and two little budding horns, like a kid.

"How the Satyrs originated," quoth the "serious" but not very "sage" Natalis Comes, "or of what parents they were begotten, or where, or when they began to exist, or for what reason they were held to be gods by antiquity, neither have I happened upon any creditable ancient who can inform me, nor can I make it out myself." He says he takes no heed of the opinion of those who suppose them to have been the children of Saturn or Faunus. Pliny, he tells us, speaks of Satyrs, as certain animals in the Indian mountains, of great swiftness, going on all fours, but with a human aspect, and running upright. Furthermore, Pausanias mentions one Euphemus of Caria, who coming upon a cluster of "desert" islands, in the extreme parts of the sea, and being forced by a tempest to alight on one of them called Satyras, found it inhabited by people of a red colour, with tails not much inferior to those of horses. These gentlemen invaded the ships of their new acquaintance, and without saying a word, began helping themselves to what they liked. Finally, Pomponius Mela speaks of certain islands beyond Mount Atlas, in which lights were seen at night, and a great sound was heard of drums, and cymbals, and pipes, though nobody was to be seen by day; and these islands were said to be inhabited by Satyra. To which beareth testimony the famous Hanno the Carthaginian.*

Boccaccio, in his treatise 'De Montibus,' appears to have transferred these islands to Mount Atlas itself; of which he says (dwelling upon the subject with his usual romantic fondness) that, "such a depth of silence is reported to prevail there by day, that none approach it without a certain horror, and a feeling of some divine presence; but at night-time, like heaven, it is lit up with many lights, and resounds with the songs and cymbals, the pipes and whistling reeds, of Ægipans and Satyra."†

The same writer, speaking of the opinion that Satyrs were goat-footed homunciones, or little men, tells the story of St Anthony: "who, searching through the deserts of the Thebais for the most holy eremite Paul, did behold one of them, and question him: the which made answer, that he was mortal; and that he was one of the people, bordering thereabouts, whom the Gentiles, led away by a vain error, did worship as Fauns and Satyra." Other authors, he says, "esteemed them to be men of the woods, and called them Incubi, or Ficarii (Fig-eaters)." We here see who had the merit of it when figs were stolen.

Chaucer takes the Satyr for an Incubus, probably from this passage of his favourite author. Speaking of the friar, whose office it was to go about blessing people's grounds and houses (which was the reason, he says, why there were no longer any fairies) he adds, in his pleasant manner,

"Women may now go safely up and down:—
In every bush, and under every tree,
There is none other Incubus but he."

Wife of Bath's Tale.

But the most "particular fellow" on this subject is Philostratus; who, among the wild stories which he relates with such gravity of Apollonius the Tyanæan, has this, the wildest of them all, and, in his opinion, the most weighty. As the account is amusing, we will extract nearly the whole of it:—

"After visiting," says he, "the cataracts (of the Nile), Apollonius and his companions stopped in a small village in Ethiopia, where, whilst they were at supper, they amused themselves with a variety of conversation, both grave and gay. On a sudden was heard a confused uproar, as if from the women of the village exhorting one another to seize and pursue. They called to the men for assistance, who immediately sallied forth, snatching up sticks and stones, with whatever other weapons they chanced to find. * * * All this hubbub arose from a Satyr having made his appearance, who for ten months past had infested the village. * * * The moment Apollonius perceived his friends were alarmed at this, he said, 'Don't be terrified. * * * There is but one remedy to be used in cases of such kind of insolence, and is what Midas had recourse to. He was himself of the race of the Satyrs, as appeared plainly by his ears. A Satyr once invited himself to his house, on the ground of consanguinity, and whilst he was his guest, libelled his ears in a copy of verses, which he set to music, and played on his harp. Midas, who was instructed, I think, by his mother, learnt from her, that if a Satyr was made drunk with wine, and fell asleep, he recovered his senses, and became quite a new creature. A fountain happening to be near his palace, he mixed it with wine, to which he sent the Satyr, who drank it till he was quite overcome with it. Now to show you that this is not all mere fable, let us go to the governor of the village, and if the inhabitants have any wine, let us make the Satyr drink, and I will be answerable for what happened in the case of the Satyr of Midas.' All were willing to try the experiment; and immediately four Egyptian amphoras of wine were poured into the pond, in which the cattle of the village were accustomed to drink. Apollonius invited the Satyr to drink, and added, along with the invitation, some private menaces, in case of refusal. The Satyr did not appear; nevertheless the wine sank as if it was drunk. When the pond was emptied, Apollonius said, 'Let us offer libations to the Satyr, who is now fast asleep.' After saying this, he carried the men of the village to the cave of the Nymphs, which was not more than the distance of a plethron from the hamlet, where, after showing them the Satyr asleep, he ordered them to give him no ill-usage, either by beating or abusing him: 'For,' said he, 'I will answer for his good behaviour for the time to come.'—This is the action of Apollonius, which, by Jupiter, I consider as what gave greatest lustre to his travels, and which was, in truth, their greatest feat. Anyone who has perused the letter which he wrote to a dissipated young man, wherein he tells him he had tamed a Satyr in Ethiopia, must call to mind this story. Consequently, no doubt can now remain of the existence of Satyra. * * * When I was myself in Lemnos, I remember one of my contemporaries, whose mother, they said, was visited by a Satyr, formed according to the traditional accounts we have of that race of beings. He wore a deer-skin on his shoulders, which exactly fitted him, the fore-feet of which, encircling his neck, were fastened to his breast. But of this I shall say no more, as I am sensible credit is due to experience, as well as to me."

† At the end of his 'Genealogia Deorum.'

It is clear, from all these authorities, that various circumstances might have given rise to the idea of Satyra.—The Great Ape species alone, which like the monkeys in Africa, might easily be supposed to be a race of men too idle to work, and holding their tongues to avoid it, would be sufficient to suggest the fancy to an imaginative people. The Satyr Islands of Pausanias are evidently islands frequented by apes, or rather baboons; unless indeed we are to believe with Monbodo, that men once had tails; which is hardly a greater distinction from some men without them, than a philosopher is from a savage. Oran Otan signifies a wild man; and Linnæus has called the Great Ape the Ape Satyr (Simia Satyrus.) Again, there have been real wild men; and a single one of these, such as Peter the Wild Boy, would people a country like Greece with Satyrs.

* 'Life of Apollonius of Tiana,' translated from the Greek of Philostratus, by the Rev. Edward Berwick, p. 348.

But it is not necessary to recur to palpable images for a poetical stock. A sound, a shadow, a look of something in the dark, was enough to make them; and if this had not been found, they would still have been fancied. Satyrs, in an allegorical sense, are the animal spirits of the creation, its exuberance, its natural health and vigour, its headlong tendency to reproduction. In a superstitious and popular point of view, they were the spirits of the woods, a branch of the universal family of genii and fairies. Finally, in the great world of poetry, they partake, on both these accounts, of whatever has been said or done for them, that remains interesting to the imagination; and are still to be found there, immortal as their poets. As long as there is a mystery in the world, and men are unable to affirm what beings may not exist, so long poetry will have what existences it pleases, and the mind will have a corner in which to entertain them. Therefore, "the sage and serious Spenser" tells us wisely of

"The wood-god's breed which must for ever last."

In no part of the world of poetry were they ever more alive or lasting, than in the woods of his 'Faerie Queene.' You have, indeed, a stronger sense of them in his pages, than in the works of antiquity. The ancient poets appear to have been too close at hand with them. The familiarity, though of a religious sort, had in it something of contempt. Spenser is in always remote; in the uttermost parts of poetry; and thither shall he take us to meet them. Here they are, on a bright morning, in the thick of their glades. Una is in distress, and has cried out, so that her voice is heard throughout the woods.

"A troope of Faunes and Satyres, far away
Within the wood, were dancing in a rownd,
Whiles old Sylvanus slept in shady arber sownd."

"Who when they heard that piteous, strained voice,
In haste forsooke their rural merriment,
And ran towards the far rebownded noyse,
To meet what wight so loudly did lament.
Unto the place they come incontinent:
Whom when the raging Sarazin espide,
A rude, mishapen, monstrous rabblement,
Whose like he never saw, he durst not byde;
But got his ready steed, and fast away gan ryde."

"Such fearefull fitt assaid her trembling hart,
Ne word to speake, ne joynt to move, she had:
The salvage nation feeles her secret smart,
And read her sorrow in her count'nanee sad;
Their frowning foreheads, with rough hornes yclad
And rustick horror, all asyde doe lay;
And, gently grenning, shew a semblance glad
To comfort her; and (feare to put away)
Their backward-bent knees teach, her humbly to obey."

The doubtfull damzell dare not yet committ
Her single person to their barbarous truth;
But still twixt feare and hope amazed does sitt,
Late leard what harme to hasty truth ensu'th:
They in compassion of her tender youth
And wonder of her beantie soveraigne,
Are wonne with pity and unwonted ruth:
And, all prostraite upon the lowly playne,
Doe kisse her feete, and fawne on her with count'nanee fayne."

"Their harts she guesseth by their humble guise,
And yields her to extremitie of time:

So from the ground she feareless doth arise,
And walketh forth without suspect of crime:
They, all as glad as birdes of joyous pryme,
Thence lead her forth, about her dauncing round,
Shouting, and singing all a shepherd's ryme:
And, with greene branches strowing all the ground,
Do worship her as queene, with olive girland croud."

And all the way their merry pipes they sound,
That all the woods with doubled echo ring;
And with their horned feet doe weare the ground,
Leaping like wanton kids in pleasant spring.
So towards old Sylvanus her they bring;
Who, with the noyse awaked, commeth out
To meet the queene, his weak steps governing
And aged limbs on cypresse staddle stout;
And with an yvie twyne his waste is girt about."

The wood-born people fall before her flat,
And worship her as goddess of the wood;
And old Sylvanus self bethinkes not, what
To think of wight so fayre: but gazing stood
In doubt to deeme her born of earthly brood."

The wooddy nymphes, faire Hamadryades,
Her to behold doe thether runne apace;
And all the troupe of light-foot Naiades
Flocke all about to see her lovely face."

Book 1, canto 6.

Spenser has a knight among his chivalry, who was the son of a Satyr by the wife of a country-gentleman, one Thetion (or Brute) by name,—a severe insinuation on the part of the gentle poet;—

"A loose unruly swayne,
Who had more joy to raunge the forest wide
And chase the salvage beast with busie payne,
Than serve his ladie's love."

Perhaps the poet intended a hint to the squires of his time. He tells us of another wife, who had a considerable acquaintance among the wood-gods. It is not so easy to relate her story; but she would be a charming person by the time she was thirty, and make a delicate heart content! His account of her is certainly intended as a lesson to old gentlemen.

"The gentle lady, loose at random left,
The greenwood long did walke, and wander wide
At wilde adventure, like a forlorne waffe;
Till on a daye the Satyres her espide
Straying alone withouten groome or guide:
Her up they took, and with them home her ledd,
With them as housewife ever to abide,
To milke their goats, and make them cheese and bredd."

She forgets her old husband Malbecco, who has just arrived at the spot where she lives,—

"And eke Sir Paridell, all were he deere,
Who from her went to seek another lott;
And now by fortune was arrived here."

Soon as the old man saw Sir Paridell,
(who was the person that had taken his wife from him),

He fainted, and was almost dead with feare;
Ne word he had to speake, his grieffe to tell,
But to him louted low, and greeted goodly well:

And, after, asked him for Hellenore:
'I take no keepe of her,' sayd Paridell;
'She wonneth in the forest, there before.'
So forth he rode as his adventure fell."

A great noise is afterwards heard in the woods, of bagpipes and "shrieking hubbubs;" the old man hides in a bush; and after a while

"The jolly Satyres full of fresh delight
Came dancing forth, and with them nimble ladd
Faire Hellenore, with gyalonds all bespredd,
Whom their May-lady they had newly made:

She, proud of that new honour which they radd,
And of their lovely fellowship full glade,
Daunst lively, and her face did with a beverell shade."

What a sunny picture is in this line!

"The silly man, that in the thickett lay
Saw all this goodly sport; and grieved sore;
Yet durst he not against it do or say,
But did his hart with bitter thoughts engore,
To see th' unkindness of his Hellenore.
All day they daunced with great lustyhedd,
And with their horned feet the greene grass wore;
The wiles their gotes upon the brouzes fedd,
Till drouping Phoebus gan to hyde his golden hedd."

"Tho up they gan their merry pypes to trusse,
And all their goodly heardees did gather rownde."

The old gentleman creeps to his wife's bed-head at night, and endeavours to persuade her to go away with him; but she is deaf to all he can say; so in the passion of his misery, and supernatural strength of his very weakness, he runs away, "runs with himself away,"—till, under the most appalling circumstances, he undergoes a transformation into Jealousy itself! a poetical fight, the daringness of which can only be equalled (and vindicated, as it is) by the mastery of its execution. See the passage; which, through a half-allegory, is calculated to affect the feelings of the poetical reader, almost as much as Burley and his cavern in 'Old Mortality' do readers in general. It is at the end of Canto xi, Book 3.

Spenser has a story of 'Foolish god Faunus,' who comes on Diana when she is bathing; for which he is put into a deer-skin, and she and her nymphs hunt him through wood and dale. Fauns and Satyrs, it is to be observed, are represented as wise or foolish, according as the poet allegorizes the elements of a country life, and the reflections, or clownish impulses, of sequestered people. The Faun, in particular, who was the more oracular of the two, might be supposed either to speak from his own knowledge, or to be merely the channel of a higher one, and so to partake of that reverend character of fatuity, which is ascribed in some countries to idiots. The Satyr was more conscious and petulant: he waited more especially upon Bacchus; was loud and saucy; may easily be supposed to have been noisiest and most abusive at the time of grapes; and it is to him, we think, and him alone (whatever learned distinctions have been made between satyri and satyres, or the fruit which he got together, and him who got them), that the origin of the word Satire is to be traced; that is to say, Satire was such free and abusive speech, as the vintagers pelted people with, just as they might with the contents of their baskets.

To make Satyr, therefore, clever or clownish, or both, just as it suits the writer's purpose, is in good keeping. To make him revengeful for not having his will, is equally good, as Tasso has done in the 'Aminta.' To make him old, and scorned by a young mistress, is warrantable, as Guarini has done in the 'Pastor Fido'; and even a touch of sentiment may not be refused him, if visited by a painful sense of the difference of his shape; which is an imitation of the beautiful Polyphemus invention of Theocritus, and was introduced into modern poetry by the precursor of those poets, the inventor of the Sylvan Drama, Beccari. But we cannot say so much for another great poet of ours, Fletcher, who, spoilt by his town breeding, and thinking he could not make out a case for chastity, and the admiration of it, but by carrying it to a pitch of the improbable, introduces into his 'Faithful Shepherdess,' a Satyr thoroughly divested of his nature, the most sentimental and Platonical of lovers, and absolute guardian of what he exists only to oppose. The clipping of hedges into peacocks was nothing to this. It was like changing warmth into cold, and taking the fertility out of the earth. Elegance was another affair. The rudest things natural contain a principle of that. You may show even a Satyr in his graces, as you may a goat in a graceful attitude, or the turns and blossoms of a thorn. But to make the shaggy and impetuous wood-god, with his veins full of the sap of the vine, a polished and retiring lover, all for the metaphysics of the passion, and bowing and backing himself out of doors like a "sweet Signior," was to strike barrenness into the spring, and make the "swift and fiery sun," which the poet so finely speaks of, halt, and become a thing deliberate: Pan, at the sight, should have cut off his universal beard. Certainly, the Satyr ought to have clipped his coat, and withdrawn into the urbanities of a suit of clothes. He should have "walked gowned."

However, there is a ruddy and rough side of the apple still left; and with this we proceed to indulge ourselves, cutting away the rest. Fletcher is a true poet; and could not speak of woods and wood-gods, without finding means to give us a proper taste of them. His Satyr comes in well.

"ENTER A SATYR WITH A BASKET OF FRUIT."

SAT. Thorough yon same bending plain,
That flings his arms down to the main,
And through these thick woods have I run,
Whose bottom never kiss'd the sun;
Since the lusty spring began:
All to please my master Pan
Have I trotted without rest
To get him fruit: for at a feast
He entertains, this coming night,
His paramour, the Syrinx bright.

Here be grapes, whose lusty blood
Is the learned poet's good;
Sweeter yet did never crown
The head of Bacchus: rats more brown
Than the squirrel's teeth, that crack them:
Deign, oh fairest fair, to take them.
For these, black-eyed Dryope
Hath oftentimes commanded me
With my clasped knee to climb:
See how well the lusty time
Hath deck'd their rising cheeks in red;
Such as on your lips is spread.
Here be berries for a queen;
Some be red, some be green.

(How much better than if he had said "Some be red and some be green." He is like a great boy, poking over the basket, and pointing out the finest things in it with rustic fervour.)

These are of that luscious meat,
The great god Pan himself doth eat:
All these, and what the woods can yield,
The hanging mountain or the field,
I freely offer; and ere long
Will bring you more, more sweet and strong:
Till when humbly leave I take,
Lest the great Pan do awake,
That sleeping lies in a deep glade,
Under a broad beech's shade.
I must go, I must run;
Swifter than the fiery sun."

In this passage, Mr Seward, in his edition of 'Beaumont and Fletcher,' has a note containing an extract from Theocritus, so happily rendered, that, as it suits our purpose, we will repeat it. It is seldom that a writer not professedly a poet, and an eminent one too, has struck forth so masterly a bit of translation. The verb in the last line even surpasses the original. We will put the Greek first, both in justice to it, and because (to own a whim of ours) the glimmering and thorny look of the Greek characters gives, in our eyes, something of a hoarseness to one's pages. A page of a Greek pastoral is the next thing with us to a wood-side, or a landscape of Gaspar Poussin:—

Ου δαίμης, ο ποιμαν, το μισαμβεινον, ου δαίμης αμμου

Συριδι' τον Πανα δδοικαμης η γη απ' ανρας
Ταντα κενταυρος αμπαυεται, επι γη πικρος,
Και οι αι δριμυτα χορρα ποτι βρη καθηται

Shepherd, forbear: no song at noon's dread hour;
Tired with the chase, Pan sleeps in yonder bower:
Churlish he is; and, stirr'd in his repose,
The maddish choler quivers on his nose."

We must quote the Satyr's concluding speech, though it is not so much in character. The poet might have defended his straying in the air, but it must have been upon very abstract and ethereal grounds, foreign to the substantial part which he plays in this drama; and the fine allusion to Orpheus' lute is equally learned and out of its place. However, the whole passage is so beautiful, that we cannot help repeating it. Our Platonical friend is taking leave of the lady:—

"SAT. Thou divinest, fairest, brightest,
Thou most pow'ful maid, and whitest,
Thou most virtuous and most blessed,
Eyes of stars, and golden tressed
Like Apollo! tell me, sweetest,
What new service now is meetest
For the Satyr? Shall I stray
In the middle air, and stay
The sailing rack, or nimbly take
Hold by the moon, and gently make
Suit to the pale queen of night
For a beam to give thee light?
Shall I dive into the sea,
And bring thee coral, making way
Through the rising waves, that fall
In snowy fleeces? Dearest, shall
I catch thee wanton fawns, or flies,
Whose woven wings the summer dyes
Of many colours? Get thee fruit?
Or steal from heav'n old Orpheus' lute!"

What a relief! The lute of Orpheus! and laid up in some corner of heaven! Doubtless in the thick of one of its grassiest nooks of asphodel; and the winds play upon it, of evenings, to the ear of Proserpine when she visits her mother,—giving her trembling memories to carry back to Eurydice.

THOUGHTS ON LANGUAGE.

BY EDISTON WEBER.

NO III.

THE last chapter was chiefly occupied in considering the question—whether a society of people, cut off from the rest of the world, is equal to the task of framing its own language; and the course of reasoning adopted tended to the affirmative.

But a curious subject of inquiry may possibly suggest itself to the mind of the Reader in this place; which it may be worth while to notice. It is a subject that has often haunted me; flitting before me like a ghost; when I have been directing my view to some relative point; constituting a sort of side-scene in many a dreamy speculation, but never before subjecting itself in a palpable shape;—like those objects that the eye takes in at either side of its principal mark.*

Is it possible that the might of human genius can have slumbered for five thousand five hundred years, throughout one of the principal portions of the globe? Can all this wilderness of events that makes up what we of the cetus orbis call "universal history," all this procession of ages lost in the clouds—this infinite fantastic moving scene of fortunes, follies, virtues, vices, loves, hopes, miseries, and death—can it all have moved away and away into the grey horizon of the past; and can there have existed all the while,—and yet no syllable of a hint escape from the lips of nature,—no gossip Naiad of the deep, breathless with the news, whisper to her wondering sisters of the shore—AMERICA? One can hardly think that the "conscious moon" could so long have traversed it familiarly—coming out of its arms every day into our presence—without confessing the secret in her face. Wonderful, mysterious, America! This is that land for which Noah had no fourth son—of which the spoilt conqueror of Darius, when he wept for worlds on the banks of the Hydaspes, little thought—which never entered into the calculations of Pliny, nor mixed in the dreams of Plato. The grand, the colossal America, with its stupendous scenery and boundless expanse, and its noble-minded generous native tribes, that were capoled, trampled on, put to death, for civilization's sake; slaughtered and exterminated to make room for banking houses and joint stock companies; America, with its simple-hearted, honest, good-natured Peruvians—whose history makes the blood run cold in Christian veins, and renders the name of Spaniard a sound detestable in the ears of humanity; America, land for gods and heroes—now ransacked from North to South by the greedy hands of Commerce—continent of clerks and counting-houses—filthy Mammon's peculiar kingdom!

If the continent of America (supposed now by geographers to be insular, I believe,) is coeval with the cetus orbis, and has been peopled from the same point of time, then they who believe in mankind's indefinite power of advancement per se, have certainly a difficult cause to support. It is therefore at the risk of being suspected of too unscrupulous a desire to bolster my argument, but in reality with a sincere conviction, that I venture to state the following opinion. I do not believe that the continent of America is contemporary with the rest of the land; I believe that the "New World" is new in more senses than one. It seems to me that in her peculiarly wild and disordered aspect, America gives a sort of internal evidence of having left the bosom of the deep at no distant age. Her tremendous flood of rivers, with their jagged mouths cleft into a dozen pieces, as if by the impetuous recoil of waters after the first discharge, her towering heights and deep ravines, her lakes like seas, and thousand cataracts, all seem to bespeak a recent and violent birth. I know nothing of geology or chemistry, but I think those sciences would bear me out in asserting that there is a certain tendency throughout nature to equalization and amalgamation, the effect of which must be of course a diminution of marked features—a merging of the peculiar in the general. In chemistry, especially, I know, "give and take" is a leading principle; no anti-free-trade man can prevent this species of political economy as it is practised by chemical bodies, which carry on an unceasing interchange of their parts and qualities, mingling and communicating without end, and always hastening to a mass. So in the visible aspect of nature, I conceive the same principle is at work. Fill a glass with cold water, and leave it alone for a month; at the end of that time, behold! it is half gone; who has drunk it?—ask Anacreon. Dig a furrow a foot deep; visit it a twelvemonth afterwards—it is now no more than half a foot in depth; go at the end of another twelvemonth—it is not to be found. Rear a sand-hill two feet high—imperceptibly it dwindles away, inch by inch, till you can no longer point out even the spot where it stood. What matters the scale, if the principle be true? Are not these so many mountains, lakes, and valleys in miniature? It does not seem too much then to assume, that these phenomena, subject of course to numerous conditional circumstances, are fair indications, if not available criteria, of the age of different countries. Now, judged by this standard, must not America be looked upon as new in the world,—as a sort of infant Hercules, displaying its gigantic might in the cradle of childhood? There are, no doubt, in parts of the Old World, individual specimens of features as extraordinary as those which America exhibits (some of the Himalaya mountains, for example, are said to exceed the Andes in height) but where on the surface of the globe is to be found the same pervading magnificence, the same universal scale of grandeur in all the proportions of physical nature? Where else shall we find, individually or collectively, such rivers as the St Lawrence, the Amazon, &c.—such lakes as Lake Erie, and Ontario,—or where else a chain of mountains, such as the Titans of old with all the Ossas on all the Pelions could not have matched, spanning half a hemisphere, and topped with eternal snow under an equatorial sun,—with their very base—even the cities at their feet (as in the case of Quito plains) towering above the level of the sea, equidistantly with the summits of some of the most considerable mountains of Europe? If some few instances of a greater height are known, it need not disturb our conclusions, while hinge not so much upon a comparison of the existing appearances of different objects, as upon a comparison of the actual with the former appearance of the same object. The Dhwalegeri may exceed Chimborazo—but who can tell how much the Dhwalegeri may once have exceeded itself? Nay, the New World may be a wonderful world to us, but when the Old World was a New World, who can tell what may have been the glory of her strength—the beauty of her face? I think I hear her, with an indignant glance across the Atlantic—

"Si mihi quæ quondam fuerit, quæque improbus iste Exultat fidens, si nunc foret illa juvenia," &c.

— It is generally received that the continent of Africa, with Arabia, and the adjacent parts of western Asia, is the most ancient division of the terrestrial globe. Now this exactly describes the circle within which all those dreadful solitudes, that seem to have no counterpart in nature elsewhere, are found. These deserts—these flat, low, continents of sand, with hardly a single liquid drop in all their limits, were once, I doubt not, the site of beautiful and luxuriant countries, teeming with productions, watered with salubrious rivers, and broken into all the pleasant variety of mountains, lakes, and valleys; rivers and lakes which millions of thirsty summer suns have sucked dry; mountains which time has ground to dust; valleys that have become the graves of the mountains. And this I suppose to be the course of nature and the destination of the world, and these are the visible steps by which we are approaching a time when, in a literal sense, "every valley shall be exalted and every mountain shall be made low." So does the earth sensibly strip herself, and puts by her toys one by one, and prepares to return in original nakedness to the arms of old Chaos.

Then that curious geographical fact respecting the Caspian Sea. The Caspian Sea, it is well known, is a perfect lake, having no communication with the Ocean on any side. But it seems it has been ascertained, by barometrical observation, that this lake lies now as much as three hundred and six feet below the ocean level.* How this is accounted for, I do not know. That it must once have been parallel with the sea (to wit, at the general deluge) can admit of no question. There seems no other way of accounting for it, than to suppose that it has been gradually either evaporating, or subsiding away into the bosom of the earth;—and if we may reasonably suppose this, we may as reasonably suppose the same of all waters whatsoever, not distinguishing rivers from lakes, nor seas from rivers, otherwise than in the time and manner of their exhaustion.

I need not carry these speculations further for the object in view. Perhaps I have carried them too far, and ought to apologise for launching so freely into a subject which I understand so slightly. If, however, there be any ray of truth in what I have thus hazarded, I could wish that some shrewd person, really qualified to handle such matters, would take up the question, and try how far it would be possible to proceed in a theory grounded on geological facts relating to the mutations of the earth. And let such person examine with a nice scrutiny all accounts in figures, respecting the heights, depths, distances and general relations of natural objects, that have come down to us in the works of the ancient geographers, and bring them into a close comparison with modern calculations, and see if he cannot bring to light some curious private charges against particular mountains, seas, &c., living or defunct. But if on the contrary I have deceived myself in this course of conjecture, I beg pardon of the better-informed; and shall hope presently to arrive at true conclusions. It is so tempting, to be sure, to frame theories, when facts are not in the way to refute us—so easy to talk of Truth behind her back,—that one is apt to take too much delight perhaps in this sort of invention; yet it may be observed, in a general way, that if the absence of facts is felt as a relief by the visionary theorist, it is no convenience to him whose conjectures may happen to be based in truth; since, where there are no facts to be thrown into the scale, it only requires the greater weight of reasonableness to induce conviction.

I have been led to dwell on this point, because I foresaw that if America was to be understood as being coeval with the vetus orbis, it would prove an almost insurmountable objection to an argument in favour of human sufficiency in the formation of language and the arts of civilized life. But entertaining the belief that I have endeavoured to support,—that America is a comparatively recent acquisition from the Ocean,—I consider that the condition of the natives at the discovery (and let it never be forgotten that the Peruvians were found in a state of society hardly to be called less than civilized) can afford nothing in disproof but may afford much in corroboration of these views.

[HAD the worthy gentleman who wrote to us in deprecation of too familiar a use of the name of "Tomkins," foreseen that it would have graced the title-page of a man of wit and observation, who has just given the public some curious intelligence respecting the upper circles, he would have waited in contentment for that best possible assertion of its dignity. The following remarks are taken from a pamphlet just published, intitled 'Thoughts upon the Aristocracy of England, by Isaac Tomkins, Gent.' We do not conceive ourselves to be trenching upon politics in extracting them. In fact, we have studiously omitted the political remarks that both precede and follow them; but we cannot omit passages in books every way interesting to us all, and to the purposes of knowledge, merely because they more immediately concern a class who have the misfortune to be better known as influencers of politics, than dispensers and perfecters of the elegancies they possess. We quoted Mr Simpson's remarks on the imperfections of their education, and we now quote this very curious and pungent testimony in evidence of his truth.]

THE picture we are about to contemplate is not pleasing; it is, however, like: it has many features peculiar to the past state of things; it has some which would remain, and be as revolting as they now are, even if all artificial distinctions of rank were swept away, as long as the accumulation of property is permitted—and with that no man of sense would wish to interfere. The progress of knowledge will be the best softener of those harsher features; and when the basis of the present distinctions is gone, that remedy will prove effectual—not till then.

The question is this. A substantial farmer or a reputable shopkeeper, intending to let two or three of his sons continue in his own business, has the spirit and the means to give one of them, who shows good abilities, a better education, that he may be a parson or a lawyer. The lad goes to Oxford, and he there meets the younger son of the squire or the nobleman, about his own age.—Now which of the two finds it easiest to get on in the world? Which is soonest received into the company of men of influence in the college? Which makes his way best to notice, wherever it is of importance to him that he should obtain notice? Which has, first at college, and afterwards in town, most favour bestowed on his efforts? Which rises the fastest and mounts the highest, supposing their abilities and understanding equal? Does it not require that the obscure man should be a first-rate genius to climb the heights of his career, be that civil or military, ecclesiastical or political? In England these questions can be answered in one only way.

stantial interest, and say a word of society merely. The one of the two youths whom we are supposing to be started together in life, is born to admittance everywhere, and to the unsolicited enjoyment of the most refined society; the other may arrive at the same favour after he has made himself famous by his talents, or powerful by his success, when the silly creatures who preside over such intercourse would feel themselves neglected if he were not found among their attendants. As for the daughter of the tradesman or the yeoman, no fancy can help us to picture her in those haunts of fashion, be she as fair as Venus, as chaste as Diana, as wise as Minerva, unless she has been able to repair the ruined fortunes of some noble rake by the legacy of an uncle in the East Indies. For the brother, parliamentary eloquence, (not learning or solid wisdom,) party devotion, or professional success, may cast a plank across the gulph which separates the circles of high and middling society. For the sister there is but one bridge, and it must be made of solid and massive gold. Passing across it, she will be admitted to the enjoyment of having her relations sneered at, and, if her ears are very acute, herself nicknamed among those whom she saves from want of bread; she will listen to the horrors of vulgar life, the atrocities of under-breeding, the hatefulness of honest industry, the misfortune of humble birth, until she dares not look about her or behind her, but is haunted by the recollection of her origin as if it had been a crime, and is brought to be more ashamed of her humble and virtuous family than if they had borne her in the hulks or bred her on the tread-mill.

"But surely," the country or the city reader will exclaim, "there must be something extremely captivating in this fine society, which makes it so much run after, and gives it so much sway, not only over the fashion, but even over the policy of the country!" For that it does exercise such influence we cannot deny. Statesmen pass much of their time in it; they discuss their measures of a party nature before the empty women and the frivolous youths who compose it. They are not a little moved by the opinion which has dominion in these select circles; they are prevented from making useful appointments of men unknown to these arbiters and arbitresses of fashion—and therefore despised by them—but who would be still more despised if they were known, because they are men of learning and sound sense. The same statesmen are also kept from taking an interest in many good works—as in humane and philanthropic pursuits—and in supporting wise measures of improvement founded upon profound views of human nature and of man's wants, by the same tone of ridicule with which, within these sacred precincts, all mention of such things is sure to be greeted. Lastly, as those circles are drawn round the very focus of all hatred and contempt for the people, they are the very hotbeds of Toryism and intolerance; nothing being more certain than that the Women of Fashion and all the young Aristocrats (perhaps more or less of all parties) hate Reform,—desire more or less openly to have a strong, arbitrary, Tory government, and would fain see the day dawn upon military power established on the ruins of the national representation.

"What, then," our honest yeoman's son, our worthy tradesman's daughter, may properly ask, "what is it that gives the Aristocratic circles all this extraordinary influence? and first of all, why is the admission into Aristocratic society so very highly prized, that we of the middle classes are ready to leave father or mother, and brother and sister, and cleave unto them, if we can only, at the cost of such sacrifices, obtain admission within their pale?"

First, it must be admitted that there is a very great, a very real charm, in those circles of society. The elegance of manners which there prevails is perfect; the taste which reigns over all is complete; the tone of conversation is highly agreeable—ininitely below that of France indeed—but still most fascinating. There is a lightness, an ease, a gaiety, which to those who have no important object in view, and who deem it the highest privilege of existence, and the utmost effort of genius, to pass the hours agreeably, must be all that is most attractive.

After this ample admission, let us add, that whoever, after passing an evening in this society, shall attempt to recollect the substance of the conversation, will find himself engaged in a hopeless task. It would be easier to record the changes of colour in a pigeon's neck, or the series of sounds made by an Æolian harp, or the forms and hues of an Aurora Borealis. All is pleasing; all pretty; all serviceable in passing the time; but all unsubstantial. If man had nothing to do here below but to spend without pain or uneasiness the hours not devoted to sleep, certainly there would be no reason to complain of these coteries. But if he is accountable for his time, then surely he has no right to pass it thus. Compared with this, chess becomes a science; drafts and backgammon are highly respectable. Compared with this, dancing, which is exercise, and even games of romps are rational modes of passing the hours. Compared with this, it is worthy of a rational being to read the most frivolous romance that was ever penned, or gaze upon the poorest mime that ever strutted on the stage.

The want of sense and reason which prevails in these circles is wholly inconceivable. An ignorance of all that the more refined of the middle, or even of the lower classes, well know, is accompanied by an insulting contempt for any one who does not know any of the silly and worthless trifles which form the staple of their only knowledge. An intire incapacity of reasoning is twin sister to a ready and flippant and authoritative denial of all that reason has taught others. An utter impossibility of understanding what men of learning and experience have become familiar with, stalks hand in hand, insolent and exulting, with a stupid denial of truths which are all but self-evident, and are of extreme importance. Every female member of this exquisite class is under the exclusive dominion of some waiting-maid, or silly young lover, or slandermongering newspaper; and if not under the sway of one paper, lives in bodily fear of two or three. Bribes, entreaties, threats, are by turns employed to disarm these tyrants; and however tormented the wretched victim may be, she is forced by some strange fatality, or propensity, to read what most tortures her.

Indeed, the relations of this Aristocratic class with the press, form one of the features most illustrative of the Aristocratic character, replete as it is with all the caprice and waywardness, the unreasoning and often unfeeling propensities, the alternate fits of blindness to all danger, and alarm where all is safe; in short, all that goes to the composition of a child, and a spoiled child.

Of the press, then, they live in habitual dread; but it is a fear, which being altogether void of wisdom, produces good neither to its victims nor its objects. Frightened to death at any unfavourable allusion to themselves or their ways, they support with the most stoical indifference all attacks upon their professed principles, all opposition to the policy they fancy they approve. Furious to the pitch of Bethlehem or St Luke's, if they themselves be but touched or threatened, nothing can be more exemplary than the fortitude with which they sustain the rudest shocks that can be given to the reputation of their dearest and nearest connexions. Nay, they bear without flinching, with the patience of anchorites, and the courage of martyrs, (but that the pain is vicarious,) the most exquisite and long-continued tortures to which the feelings of their friends and relations can be subjected. This is no exaggeration; for it is below, very much below the truth. They delight in the slander of that press, the terrors of which daily haunt them, and nightly break their slumbers. Nothing is to them a greater enjoyment than to read all that can be said against their friends. They know, to be sure, that all is false; but, judging by themselves, they know that all of it gives pain. The public, they are quite aware, believe little of it; for of late years the press has taken pretty good care to make its attacks very harmless in that respect; but then they feel that those friends who are the objects of the abuse are probably as sensitive as themselves. Thus, the class we are speaking of form in reality the slander-market of the day; and yet, with a miraculous inconsistency, they are in one everlasting chorus against "the license of the press," which, but for them, would have no being; but for their follies, no object; but for their malice, no support; but for their spiteful credulity, no dupes to work upon; but for their existence, no chance of continuing its own. They, indeed, turn upon their own instruments—make war upon the tools they work with—the very limbs they sustain and move! It is the rebellion of the members reversed; for here we have the overgrown belly attacking the limbs! Had the Aristocrats the power and the industry, they would indite their book 'A Good Name worthless,' or 'The Crimes of the Press,' but we should then expect to see 'Sermons on the Sixth Commandment, by a Receiver of Stolen Goods.'

That their encouragement is confined to the vilest portion of the press, has long ago been affirmed, and is not denied. The respectable journals are no favourite reading of theirs. The newspaper that fearlessly defends the right; that refuses to pander for the headlong passions of the multitude, or cater for the vicious appetites of the selector circles; that does its duty alike regardless of the hustings and the boudoir; has little chance of lying on the satin-wood table, of being blotted with ungrammatical ill-spelt notes, half bad English, half worse French, or of being fondled by fingers that have just broken a gold-wax seal on a grass-green paper. But more especially will it be excluded, possibly extruded, from those sacred haunts of the Corinthian order, if it convey any solid instruction upon a useful or important subject, interesting to the species which the writers adorn, and the patricians do their best to degrade. Even wit the most refined finds no echo in such minds; and if it be used in illustrating an argument or in pressing home the demonstration (which it often may be), the author is charged with treating a serious subject lightly, and of jesting where he should reason. Broad humour, descending to farce, is the utmost reach of their capacity; and that is of no value in their eyes unless it raises a laugh at a friend's expense. Some who have lived at Court, and are capable of better things, say they carefully eschew all jests; for Princes take such things as a personal affront—as raising the joker to their own level, by calling on them to laugh with him. One kind of jest, indeed, never fails to find favour in those high latitudes—where the author is himself the subject of the merriment. Buffoonery is a denizen in all courts, but most commonly indigenous; and, after the court's example patrician society is fashioned. It is not in the true Aristocratic circles that anyone will adventure the most harmless jest who would not pass for a jacobin or a free-thinker. He may make merry with the led-captain, or the humble companion, or possibly the chaplain (though that was rather in the olden time, before the French Revolution had taught the upper orders to pay the homage rendered by vice to virtue,* without acquiring piety or morals). Any other kind of wit rather indicates, if tolerated, that the adventurous individual has found his way thither from the lower latitudes of the liberal party.

* Hypocrisy—thus described by a French writer, wit, and nobleman—indeed a duke; for in France, where, even under the absolute monarchy, the claims of letters and talents were always admitted, the nobility cultivated wit and learning, and were a race infinitely superior to our own, in proportion as literary men were admitted into their society on a footing of equality.

OLD TIMES AND NEW.

Read the supplement to 'Sully's Memoirs.' Sully, such is the total change of manners, appears to have kept up more state in private life, after his retirement, than a crowned head does at present in the plenitude of power. Yet I question whether Henry IV himself enjoyed half the personal accommodation and real luxury of a respectable London merchant of this day.—Diary of a Lover of Literature.

THE WEEK.

PERSONAL PORTRAITS OF EMINENT MEN.

WOLFF, THE GERMAN SCHOLAR.

WOLFF was of middle stature; his demeanour natural, yet dignified; his forehead broad and lofty, his eyes blue, deep set, and penetrating; the mouth gracefully formed; but with a slightly sarcastic expression; the general expression of his countenance was that of power, tempered with mildness. His gait and movements partook of the vivacity of his mind; his temper was quick and sensitive; he was easily offended, but as easily reconciled. He never brooded over vexations and disappointments, but expressed his feelings strongly, once for all, and forgot them. So open was his mind to the influence of the pathetic, that, like our Richard Bentley, he could not peruse a tender passage in his favourite poets without tears.

In his conversation there was a singular charm,—wisdom was so set off by wit, and profound learning poured forth with so little pedantry; anecdotes and characteristic sketches of the many eminent men, with whom his long literary career had brought him in contact, succeeded each other so amusingly, and with so little appearance of egotism, that it had equal attractions for the learned and unlearned. With none was Wolff a greater favourite in society than with the ladies, with whom he could intirely abandon the dictatorial and Johnsonian style into which, in argument with the other sex, he was not unfrequently betrayed. Of irony, he had a wonderful command, and when provoked by any appearance of pretension or affectation, he used it unsparingly. He had less of the intellectual gladiator about him, however, than the Doctor; he did not throw down the gauntlet to all comers, though, when once embarked in debate, their conversation had many features in common.

His household arrangements, with a great pretension to order, seem to have been confusion worse confounded. Knowing the peculiarity of his own habits and dispositions, he entertained a great dislike to "clever servants;" his object always was to secure some quiet, good-natured creature, who would be as much as possible an automaton in his hands, and live, move, and have his being exactly as the professor choose to direct.

Wolff had the greatest aversion to being kept waiting, and had never, probably, kept a coachman waiting five minutes, in his life. He exacted the same punctuality from his unfortunate servant: in the morning he would give him a list of twenty messages to be performed, for each of which a quarter of an hour, or half an hour was allowed, as the case might be; and if, as was occasionally unavoidable, his servant exceeded the time allowed, the professor would pour such a storm about his ears, that with all his liberality he had enough to do to retain a servant in his house.

Of taste, either in matters of dress or ornament, he had not a vestige. He was fond of fine clothes, but never could contrive to dress decently; the furniture of his house was gaudy, but selected without the least regard to propriety, and huddled together as in an upholsterer's ware-room.

Like many other literary men, he was a most irregular correspondent; letters from his correspondents would be occasionally left unanswered for years: his own, when he did write any, are generally distinguished by wit, and a careless felicity of expression.

As a teacher, we have already said, he was active and conscientious in the highest degree; and few seem to have so thoroughly possessed the art of conciliating affection united with respect. He had the satisfaction of witnessing in his lifetime the most gratifying results of these exertions, in the progress and high character of many who had derived their instruction from him, and drawn their inspiration from his example. "I enjoy," he writes in a blank leaf of his journal, on one of his last birth-days, "a good fortune, which falls to the lot of few, that of seeing, while alive, the promise of a plentiful harvest from the seed I had sown with toil, and of calculating, in some measure, its increase when I am no more."

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

LXV.—A TALE OF OLD ITALIAN REVENGE.

[This is from our old friend 'Camerarius' (see Nos. 28-29); and is full of frightful truth. We behold the horrible human relics (taken for bats!) blackening on the city gate. There are no such sights now in Italy, thanks to the progress of knowledge and Christian feeling; and we shall not be too hasty to triumph over "Italian" stories of revenge, when we call to mind, that spectacles not very dissimilar (more horrible in one respect, because they had faces) were to be seen, not a great many years ago, over Temple Bar and one of the bridges. And even against stories of modern Italian assassination may be set off too many appalling things in our daily newspapers. But there more of them transpire now than they used to do, owing to those channels of publicity. We are all getting on, thank God, generally speaking, in knowledge and humanity, the whole civilized world, say, and the uncivilized; and we should desire and love to get on, all together,—nobody lording it or valuing himself over another. English, Italians, French, &c., will, we verily believe, before many years are past, be like all one great intelligent family, acknowledging the same guidance of public opinion, and interchanging all the blessings of advancement.]

One day (says our honest and earnest old scholar) as I went from Rome with my companion, and past through the Marquis of Ancone, we were to go through a citie called Terni, seated in a very pleasant and fruitfull valley, betwene the armes of a river called the Mar. As we entered into the citie, we saw over the gate a certaine tablet upon a high tower, to which were tied (as it seemed to us at first), a great many Bats or Reere-mise. Wee thinking it a strange sight, and not knowing what it meant, being set up in so eminent a place; one of the citie whom we asked, told us of a certaine thing that had happned some years before. There were (quoth he) in this citie, two noble, rich, and mightie houses; which for a very long time carried on an irreconcilable hatred the one against the other, in so much as the malice passed from the father to the son, as it were by inheritance; by occasion whereof many of both houses were slain and murdered. At last, the one house not able to stay the fire of their violent wrath, resolved to stand about murdering no more of the aduerse by surprise and treason, but to run upon them all at once, and not to leave one bodie thereof alive. They of this bloodie familie gathered together out of the countrie adioyning (under some other pretence) many of their seruants which met in the citie, whereof they ioyned them to their Bravos (which are swaggerers, assassins, and backsters, such as many Italians that haue quarrels, keep in pay, to employ them in the execution of their revenges) and secretly armed them enioyning them to be always readie to do some notable exploit whensoever they should be called upon. Soon after taking hold of occasion, they march about midnight with their people to the Gouvernour's house, who mistrusted nothing, seare of his person, being a man of authoritie and power, and (leaving guards in the same house until they should haue executed their purpose) goe on silent towards the house of their enemies, and disposing their troops at euery street end, about ten of them goe on to the same house (the Gouvernour being between them) as if they had been the archers of his guard, whom they compelled to command that speedy opening might be made him, as if he had some seruice of importance to dispatch within their house: and withal they held a poynard at his throat, threatening to kill him if they said not that which they had put into his mouth. He amazed at the death which he saw present before his eyes, caused all the doors to be opened, a thing which they within made no refusal of, seeing the Gouvernour there: which being done, those ten cast their complices, not farre off, put the Gouvernour into safe keeping, enter into the house, and there most cruelly murder man, woman, and child, nay, they spare not so much as the horses in the stable. That done, they make the Gouvernour set open the city gates, and so depart, and disperse themselves into diuers secret places, here and there, among their friends. The wisest of them fled to the next sea-ports, and got them away far off: but as for those that kept anything neere, they were so diligently searcht for, that they were found and drawn out of their holes by the justices, greatly mooued (as good cause there was) with such a horrible massacre: so these wicked offenders were put to death with the most greiuous punishments, and after, their hands and their feet being cut off, were nailed to the tablet, which you saw (quoth he) as ye entered the gate, on the top of the tower, set up for a show to terrifie the cruel, and to serue for a lesson to posteritie: the sun having broiled those limbs so fastened and set up, maketh travellers to think (that know nothing of this horrible tragedie) that they be Reere-mise. Wee haue heard this pitiful discourse, with detestation of such a furious and cruel desire of reuenge, kept on our way.

CHARACTERS OF SHAKSPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

NO. XIII.—ROMEO AND JULIET.

'ROMEO AND JULIET' is the only tragedy which Shakspeare has written intirely on a love-story. It is supposed to have been his first play, and it deserves to stand in that proud rank. There is the buoyant spirit of youth in every line, in the rapturous intoxication of hope, and in the bitterness of despair. It has been said of 'Romeo and Juliet,' by a great critic, that "whatever is most intoxicating in the odour of a southern spring, languishing in the song of the nightingale, or voluptuous in the first opening of the rose, is to be found in this poem." The description is true; and yet it does not answer to our idea of the play. For if it has the sweetness of the rose, it has its freshness too; if it has the languor of the nightingale's song, it has also its giddy transport; if it has the softness of a southern spring, it is as glowing and as bright. There is nothing of a sickly and sentimental cast. Romeo and Juliet are in love, but they are not love-sick. Everything speaks the very soul of pleasure, the high and healthy pulse of the passions: the heart beats, the blood circulates and mantles throughout. Their courtship is not an insipid interchange of sentiments lip-deep, learnt at second-hand from poems and plays,—made up of beauties of the most shadowy kind, of "fancies wan that hang the pensive head," of evanescent smiles and sighs that breathe not, of delicacy that shrinks from the touch, and feebleness that scarce supports itself, an elaborate vacuity of thought, and an artificial dearth of sense, spirit, truth and nature! It is the reverse of all this. It is Shakspeare all over, and Shakspeare when he was young.

We have heard it objected to 'Romeo and Juliet,' that it is founded on an idle passion between a boy and a girl, who have scarcely seen and can have but little sympathy or rational esteem for one another, who have had no experience of the good or ill of life, and whose raptures or despair must be therefore equally groundless and fantastical. Whoever objects to the youth of the parties in this play as "too unripe and crude" to pluck the sweets of love, and wishes to see a first-love carried on into a good old age, and the passions taken at the rebound, when their force is spent, may find all this done in the 'Stranger,' and in other German plays, where they do things by contraries, and transpose nature to inspire sentiment and create philosophy. Shakspeare proceeded in a more straight-forward, and, we think, effectual way. He did not endeavour to extract beauty from wrinkles, or the wild throb of passion from the last expiring sigh of indifference. He did not "gather grapes of thorns or figs of thistles." It was not his way. But he has given a picture of human life, such as it is in the order of nature. He has founded the passion of the two lovers not on the pleasures they had experienced; but on all the pleasures they had not experienced. All that was to come of life was theirs. At that untried source of promised happiness they slaked their thirst, and the first eager draught made them drunk with love and joy. They were in full possession of their senses and their affections. Their hopes were of air, their desires of fire. Youth is the season of love, because the heart is then first melted in tenderness from the touch of novelty, and kindled to rapture, for it knows no end of its enjoyments or its wishes. Desire has no limit but itself. Passion, the love and expectation of pleasure, is infinite, extravagant, inexhaustible, till experience comes to kill and check it. Juliet exclaims on her first interview with Romeo—

"My bounty is as boundless as the sea,
My love as deep."

And why should it not? What was to hinder the thrilling tide of pleasure, which had just gushed from her heart, from flowing on without stint or measure, but experience which she was yet without? What was to abate the transport of the first sweet sense of pleasure, which her heart and her senses had just tasted, but indifference which she was yet a stranger to? What was there to check the ardour of hope, of faith, of constancy, just rising in her breast, but disappointment which she had not yet felt? As are the desires and the hopes of youthful passion, such is the keenness of its disappointments, and their baleful effect. Such is the transition in this play from the highest bliss to the lowest despair, from the nuptial couch to an untimely grave. The only evil that even in apprehension befalls the two lovers is the loss of the greatest possible felicity; yet this loss is fatal to both, for they had rather part with life than bear the thought of surviving all that had made life dear to them. In all this, Shakspeare has but followed nature, which existed in his time, as well as now. The modern philosophy, which reduces the whole theory of the mind to habitual impressions, and leaves the natural impulses of passion and imagination out of the account, had not then been discovered; or if it had, would have been little calculated for the uses of poetry.

It is the inadequacy of the same false system of philosophy to account for the strength of our earliest attachments, which has led Mr Wordsworth to indulge in the mystical visions of Platonism in his 'Ode on the Progress of Life.' He has very admirably described the vividness of our impressions in youth and childhood, and how "they fade by degrees into the light of common day," and he ascribes the change to the supposition of a pre-existent state, as if our early thoughts were nearer heaven, reflections of former trails of glory, shadows of our past being. This is idle. It is not from the knowledge of the past that the first impressions of things derive their gloss and splendour, but from our ignorance of the future, which fills the void to come with the warmth of our desires, with our gayest hopes, and brightest fancies. It is the obscurity spread before it that colours the prospect of life with hope, as it is the cloud which reflects the rainbow. There is no occasion to resort to any mystical union and transmission of feeling through different states of being to account for the romantic enthusiasm of youth; nor to plant the root of hope in the grave, nor to derive it from the skies. Its root is in the heart of man: it lifts its head above the stars. Desire and imagination are inmates of the human breast. The heaven "that lies about us in our infancy" is only a new world, of which we know nothing but what we wish it to be, and believe all that we wish. In youth and boyhood, the world we live in is the world of desire, and of fancy: it is experience that brings us down to the world of reality. What is it that in youth sheds a dewy light round the evening star? That makes the daisy look so bright? That perfumes the hyacinth? That embalms the first kiss of love? It is the delight of novelty, and the feeling no end to the pleasure that we fondly believe is still in store for us. The heart revels in the luxury of its own thoughts, and is unable to sustain the weight of hope and love that presses upon it.—The effects of the passion of love alone might have dissipated Mr Wordsworth's theory, if he means anything more by it than an ingenious and poetical allegory. That at least is not a link in the chain let down from other worlds; "the purple light of love" is not a dim reflection of the smiles of celestial bliss. It does not appear till the middle of life, and then seems like "another morn risen on mid-day." In this respect the soul comes into the world "in utter nakedness." Love waits for the ripening of the youthful blood. The sense of pleasure precedes the love of pleasure, but with the sense of pleasure, as soon as it is felt, come thronging infinite desires and hopes of pleasure, and love is mature as soon as born. It withers and it dies almost as soon!

This play presents a beautiful coup-d'œil of the progress of human life. In thought it occupies years, and embraces the circle of the affections from childhood to old age. Juliet has become a great girl, a young woman since we first remember her a little thing in the idle prattle of the nurse. Lady Capulet was about her age when she became a mother, and old Capulet somewhat impatiently tells his younger visitors,—

"I've seen the day,

That I have worn a visor, and could tell

"A whispering tale in a fair lady's ear,
Such as would please; 'tis gone, 'tis gone, 'tis gone."

Thus one period of life makes way for the following, and one generation pushes another off the stage. One of the most striking passages to show the intense feeling of youth in this play is Capulet's invitation to Paris to visit his entertainment.

"At my poor house, look to behold this night
Earth-treading stars that make dark heaven light;
Such comfort as do lusty young men feel
When well-apparell'd April on the heel
Of limping winter treads, even such delight
Among fresh female-buds shall you this night
Inherit at my house."

The feelings of youth and of the spring are here blended together like the breath of opening flowers. Images of vernal beauty appear to have floated before the author's mind, in writing this poem, in profusion. Here is another of exquisite beauty, brought in more by accident than by necessity. Montague declares of his son smit with a hopeless passion, which he will not reveal—

"But he, his own affection's counsellor,
Is to himself so secret and so close,
So far from sounding and discovery,
As is the bud bit with an envious worm,
Ere he can spread his sweet-leaves to the air,
Or dedicate his beauty to the sun."

This casual description is as full of passionate beauty as when Romeo dwells in frantic fondness on "the white wonder of his Juliet's hand." The Reader may, if he pleases, contrast the exquisite pastoral simplicity of the above lines with the gorgeous description of Juliet when Romeo first sees her at her father's house, surrounded by company and artificial splendour.

"What lady's that which doth enrich the hand
Of yonder knight?
O she doth teach the torches to burn bright;
Her beauty hangs upon the cheek of night,
Like a rich jewel in an Æthiop's ear."

TRUE IDEA OF POETRY.

Poetry were it the rudest, so it be sincere, is the attempt which man makes to render his existence harmonious, the utmost he can do for that end; it springs, therefore, from his whole feelings, opinions, activity, and takes its character from these. It may be called the music of his whole manner of being; and, historically considered, is the best test how far music or freedom existed therein; how far the feeling of love, of beauty, and dignity, could be elicited from that peculiar situation of his, and from the views he there had of life and nature, of the universe internal and external.—Thomas Carlyle.

PORTRAITS FROM LIFE, BY GOETHE.

LET me pay due homage to several respectable individuals to whom I was under great obligations. I will begin with M. Oelenschlager, of the family of Frauenstein, a senator, and son-in-law to Dr Orth, whom I have already mentioned. This gentleman, in his grand costume of burgomaster, might have passed for one of the principal French prelates. Business and travel had made him a remarkable character. He showed some esteem for me, and willingly conversed with me on the subjects which interested him. I was privy to the composition of his explanation of the Golden Bull. He had the goodness to make me sensible of the object and importance of this celebrated document. I had so familiarized myself with the rude and troubled times which had provoked it, that I could not refrain from representing the character and facts with which my friend entertained me, by imitating the tone and gestures of these men of other times, as if we had had them before our eyes. This pantomime afforded him great amusement, and he was fond of making me repeat it.

I had from infancy accustomed myself to the singular habit of learning by heart the tables of contents prefixed to the chapters and commencements of the books I read. I had adopted this method with the 'Pentateuch,' the 'Æneid,' and the 'Metamorphoses.' I continued it with the 'Golden Bull'; and my good friend Oelenschlager laughed heartily, when I unexpectedly called out in a very grave tone—"Omne regnum in se divium desolabitur: nam principes ejus facti sunt socii furum!"—"Every kingdom divided against itself shall be brought to desolation; for the princes thereof are become the associates of robbers." The worthy Oelenschlager, shaking his head, said, in a significant manner—"What sort of times, then, were those in which the emperor thundered such expressions in the ears of the princes of the empire in a solemn diet?"

He saw little company, although his manners were highly agreeable, and he took great pleasure in lively conversation. He would now and then get us to perform a dramatic piece. This was considered an useful exercise for youth. We played Schlegel's 'Caesar,' and afterwards ventured on 'Britannicus,' both so perfect ourselves in the French language and to practise declamation. I played Nero, and my sister Agrippina. We were applauded far beyond our deserts; but we thought we received less praise than we merited.

I used also to visit Mr Reineck, a gentleman of a very ancient noble family. He was a thin man, of a brown complexion; of the most upright character, and firm to a degree that often amounted to obstinacy. Never did I see him laugh. He had suffered a severe affliction, his daughter having eloped with a friend of the family. He commenced a prosecution against his son-in-law, which he continued with great animosity; but the tardy formalities of the tribunals affording him no hopes of a speedy vengeance, or one agreeable to his wishes, he attacked his son-in-law personally, which measure produced action after action. From that time he kept himself shut up in his house and garden. He inhabited a spacious but dismal ground-floor, which for many years had neither been painted nor, perhaps, cleaned. He seemed to place some confidence in me, and recommended his youngest son to my attention. His oldest friends, who knew how to accommodate themselves to his situation, his agents, and his counsellor, often dined with him. He never failed to invite me to these entertainments. The dinners were good; the wine still better; but a dilapidated stove, which emitted smoke on every side through its crevices, annoyed the guests excessively. One of Mr Reineck's best friends ventured one day to mention it to him, asking him how he could endure so great an inconvenience all the winter. "Would to God," replied he, "that that were the greatest inconvenience that I have to put up with." It was long before he could be prevailed upon to see his daughter and grandson. His son-in-law never durst appear before him.

My company had a favourable effect on this worthy and unfortunate man. When in conversation he imparted to me his information respecting the world and political affairs, he seemed to forget his troubles. The few friends who used to meet at his house employed me when they wished to divert his mind from his sorrows. We prevailed on him to take a walk with us occasionally. He seemed to take pleasure in viewing once more the fields which he had not entered for many years. He talked to us about the old proprietors of them, his neighbours, related their histories, and described their characters. His judgments were always severe, but there was much wit and pleasantness in his narrative. We made some attempts to induce him to return to the society of men, but were always unsuccessful.

Another person, nearly of the same age, whom I often saw at this period, was a Mr Malapart, a wealthy man, who possessed a very handsome house in the horse market, and derived a good revenue from his salt-works. He also lived in seclusion, passing the summer at his garden, near the Bockenheim gate, where he cultivated very fine tulips.

Mr Reineck was also an amateur. Flowers were now in season. We formed a plan for bringing them together, and, after having gradually paved the way for the interview, we one day took Mr Reineck to Mr Malapart's garden. The two old gentlemen bowed to each other, and the company walked up and down, between the beds of tulips, with true diplomatic gravity. The flowers were really superb: their various forms and colours, the superiority of some to others, and the rarity of several sorts, furnished matter for the conversation, which took a very friendly turn. This gave us the more pleasure, as we perceived, in an adjacent harbour, several flag-gons of old Rhenish wine set out on a table. Unfortunately, Mr Reineck observed a very fine tulip, the head of which hung down a little; he took hold of the stalk very carefully and raised the flower, in order to examine it more minutely. But, gently as he touched it, the owner was displeased. Mr Malapart, politely, but with a determined air, and as if congratulating himself on his habitual reserve, reminded him of oculis, non manibus. ("Eyes, not hands.") Reineck had already let go the flower. At these words the colour came into his cheeks, and he replied, in his usual dry, grave, tone, that amateurs and connoisseurs might freely examine any flower, with proper precautions, and upon this he again took hold of the flower. The mutual friends were embarrassed. They started several subjects of conversation; but unsuccessfully. The two old gentlemen appeared to be struck mute. We dreaded every moment that Reineck would touch the flowers again. To prevent his doing so, we took them each apart, and soon put an end to the visit, thus turning our backs on the well-furnished table which we had viewed with longing eyes, but had not been able to approach.

The privy counsellor, Huisgen, was another of the friends I used to visit. He was not a Frankfort man, and he professed the reformed religion; two obstacles which hindered him from holding any public employment, and even from exercising the functions of an advocate. He, nevertheless, practised under the signature of another person, at Frankfort, and in the courts of the empire; his reputation as an excellent lawyer procured him many clients. He was then sixty years of age. I used to go to his house to take lessons in writing with his son. Mr Huisgen had a very long face, although he was not thin. Disfigured by the small-pox and the loss of an eye, he appeared frightful at the first glance. His bald head was surmounted by a white cap, tied at the top with a riband; he always wore very handsome damask or calamanco robes de chambre. He inhabited a small apartment on the ground floor, the neatness of which was as perfect as the serenity of his temper. It was a treat to see the perfect order of his papers, his books, and his geographical maps. It was not long before I discovered that he was at

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

LIV.—A TALE OF OLD ITALIAN REVENGE.

[THIS is from our old friend 'Camerarius' (see Nos. 26-29); and is full of frightful truth. We behold the horrible human relics (taken for bats!) blackening on the city gate. There are no such sights now in Italy, thanks to the progress of knowledge and Christian feeling; and we shall not be too hasty to triumph over "Italian" stories of revenge, when we call to mind, that spectacles not very dissimilar (more horrible in one respect, because they had faces) were to be seen, not a great many years ago, over Temple Bar and one of the bridges. And even against stories of modern Italian assassination may be set off too many appalling things in our daily newspapers. But their more of them transpire now than they used to do, owing to those channels of publicity. We are all getting on, thank God, generally speaking, in knowledge and humanity, the whole civilized world,—ay, and the uncivilized; and we should desire and love to get on, all together,—nobody lordling it or valuing himself over another. English, Italians, French, &c., will, we verily believe, before many years are past, be like all one great intelligent family, acknowledging the same guidance of public opinion, and interchanging all the blessings of advancement.]

ONE day (says our honest and earnest old scholar) as I went from Rome with my companion, and past through the Marquisal of Ancone, we were to go through a citie called Termi, seated in a very pleasant and fruitfull valley, betweene the armes of a river called the Mar. As we entered into the citie, we saw over the gate a certaine tablet upon a high tower, to which were tied (as it seemed to us at first), a great many Bats or Reere-mise. Wee thinking it a strange sight, and not knowing what it meant, being set up in so eminent a place; one of the citie whom we asked, told us of a certaine thing that had happed some years before. There were (quoth he) in this citie, two noble, rich, and mightie houses; which for a very long time carried on an irreconcilable hatred the one against the other, in so much as the malice passed from the father to the son, as it were by inheritance; by occasion whereof many of both houses were slain and murdered. At last, the one house not able to stay the fire of their violent wrath, resolved to stand about murdering no more of the aduerse by surprise and treason, but to run upon them all at once, and not to leave one bodie thereof alive. They of this bloodie familie gathered together out of the countrie adioyning (under some other pretence) many of their seruants which met in the citie, whereof they ioyned them to their Bravos (which are swaggerers, assassins, and backsters, such as many Italians that haue quatrrels, keep in pay, to employ them in the execution of their revenges) and secretly armed them enioyning them to be always readie to do some notable exploit whensoever they should be called upon. Soon after taking hold of occasion, they march about midnight with their people to the Gouvernour's house, who mistrusted nothing, seare of his person, being a man of authoritie and power, and (leaving guards in the same house until they should haue executed their purpose) goe on silent towards the house of their enemies, and disposing their troops at euery street end, about ten of them goe on to the same house (the Gouvernour being between them) as if they had been the archers of his guard, whom they compelled to command that speedy opening might be made him, as if he had some seruice of importance to dispatch within their house: and withal they held a pofnyard at his throat, threatening to kill him if they said not that which they had put into his mouth. He amazed at the death which he saw present before his eyes, caused all the doors to be opened, a thing which they within made no refusal of, seeing the Gouvernour there: which being done, those ten call their complices, not farre off, put the Gouvernour into safe keeping, enter into the house, and there most cruelly murder man, woman, and child, nay, they spare not so much as the horses in the stable. That done, they make the Gouvernour set open the city gates, and so depart, and disperse themselves into diuers secret places, here and there, among their friends. The wisest of them fled to the next sea-ports, and got them away far off: but as for those that kept anything neere, they were so diligently searcht for, that they were found and drawn out of their holes by the justices, greatly mooued (as good cause there was) with such a horrible massacre: so these wicked offenders were put to death with the most greiuous punishments, and after, their hands and their feet being cut off, were nailed to the tablet which you saw (quoth he) as ye entered the gate, on the top of the tower, set up for a show to terrifie the cruel, and to serue for a lesson to posteritie: the sun having broiled those limbs so fastened and set up, maketh travellers to think (that know nothing of this horrible tragedie) that they be Reere-mise. Wee hauing heard this pitiful discourse; with detestation of such a furious and cruel desire of reuenge, kept on our way.

CHARACTERS OF SHAKESPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

NO. XIII.—ROMEO AND JULIET.

'ROMEO AND JULIET' is the only tragedy which Shakspeare has written intirely on a love-story. It is supposed to have been his first play, and it deserves to stand in that proud rank. There is the buoyant spirit of youth in every line, in the rapturous intoxication of hope, and in the bitterness of despair. It has been said of 'Romeo and Juliet,' by a great critic, that "whatever is most intoxicating in the odour of a southern spring, languishing in the song of the nightingale, or voluptuous in the first opening of the rose, is to be found in this poem." The description is true; and yet it does not answer to our idea of the play. For if it has the sweetness of the rose, it has its freshness too; if it has the languor of the nightingale's song, it has also its giddy transport; if it has the softness of a southern spring, it is as glowing and as bright. There is nothing of a sickly and sentimental cast. Romeo and Juliet are in love, but they are not love-sick. Everything speaks the very soul of pleasure, the high and healthy pulse of the passions: the heart beats, the blood circulates and mantles throughout. Their courtship is not an insipid interchange of sentiments lip-deep, learnt at second-hand from poems and plays,—made up of beauties of the most shadowy kind, of "fancies wan that hang the pensive head," of evanescent smiles and sighs that breathe not, of delicacy that shrinks from the touch, and feebleness that scarce supports itself, an elaborate vacuity of thought, and an artificial dearth of sense, spirit, truth and nature! It is the reverse of all this. It is Shakspeare all over, and Shakspeare when he was young.

We have heard it objected to 'Romeo and Juliet,' that it is founded on an idle passion between a boy and a girl, who have scarcely seen and can have but little sympathy or rational esteem for one another, who have had no experience of the good or ill of life, and whose raptures or despair must be therefore equally groundless and fantastical. Whoever objects to the youth of the parties in this play as "too unripe and crude" to pluck the sweets of love, and wishes to see a first-love carried on into a good old age, and the passions taken at the rebound, when their force is spent, may find all this done in the 'Stranger,' and in other German plays, where they do things by contraries, and transpose nature to inspire sentiment and create philosophy. Shakspeare proceeded in a more straight-forward, and, we think, effectual way. He did not endeavour to extract beauty from wrinkles, or the wild throb of passion from the last expiring sigh of indifference. He did not "gather grapes of thorns nor figs of thistles." It was not his way. But he has given a picture of human life, such as it is in the order of nature. He has founded the passion of the two lovers not on the pleasures they had experienced, but on all the pleasures they had not experienced. All that was to come of life was theirs. At that untried source of promised happiness they slaked their thirst, and the first eager draught made them drunk with love and joy. They were in full possession of their senses and their affections. Their hopes were of air, their desires of fire. Youth is the season of love, because the heart is then first melted in tenderness from the touch of novelty, and kindled to rapture, for it knows no end of its enjoyments or its wishes. Desire has no limit but itself. Passion, the love and expectation of pleasure, is infinite, extravagant, inexhaustible, till experience comes to kill and check it. Juliet exclaims on her first interview with Romeo—

"My bounty is as boundless as the sea,
My love as deep."

And why should it not? What was to hinder the thrilling tide of pleasure, which had just gushed from her heart, from flowing on without stint or measure, but experience which she was yet without? What was to abate the transport of the first sweet sense of pleasure, which her heart and her senses had just tasted, but indifference which she was yet a stranger to? What was there to check the ardour of hope, of faith, of constancy, just rising in her breast, but disappointment which she had not yet felt? As are the desires and the hopes of youthful passion, such is the keenness of its disappointments, and their baleful effect. Such is the transition in this play from the highest bliss to the lowest despair, from the nuptial couch to an untimely grave. The only evil that even in apprehension befalls the two lovers is the loss of the greatest possible felicity; yet this loss is fatal to both, for they had rather part with life than bear the thought of surviving all that had made life dear to them. In all this, Shakspeare has but followed nature, which existed in his time, as well as now. The modern philosophy, which reduces the whole theory of the mind to habitual impressions, and leaves the natural impulses of passion and imagination out of the account, had not then been discovered; or if it had, would have been little calculated for the uses of poetry.

It is the inadequacy of the same false system of philosophy to account for the strength of our earliest attachments, which has led Mr Wordsworth to indulge in the mystical visions of Platonism in his 'Ode on the Progress of Life.' He has very admirably described the vividness of our impressions in youth and childhood, and how "they fade by degrees into the light of common day," and he ascribes the change to the supposition of a pre-existent state, as if our early thoughts were nearer heaven, reflections of former trails of glory, shadows of our past being. This is idle. It is not from the knowledge of the past that the first impressions of things derive their gloss and splendour, but from our ignorance of the future, which fills the void to come with the warmth of our desires, with our gayest hopes, and brightest fancies. It is the obscurity spread before it that colours the prospect of life with hope, as it is the cloud which reflects the rainbow. There is no occasion to resort to any mystical union and transmission of feeling through different states of being to account for the romantic enthusiasm of youth; nor to plant the root of hope in the grave, nor to derive it from the skies. Its root is in the heart of man: it lifts its head above the stars. Desire and imagination are inmates of the human breast. The heaven "that lies about us in our infancy" is only a new world, of which we know nothing but what we wish it to be, and believe all that we wish. In youth and boyhood, the world we live in is the world of desire, and of fancy: it is experience that brings us down to the world of reality. What is it that in youth sheds a dewy light round the evening star? That makes the daisy look so bright? That perfumes the hyacinth? That embelms the first kiss of love? It is the delight of novelty, and the seeking no end to the pleasure that we fondly believe is still in store for us. The heart revels in the luxury of its own thoughts, and is unable to sustain the weight of hope and love that presses upon it.—The effects of the passion of love alone might have dissipated Mr Wordsworth's theory, if he means anything more by it than an ingenious and poetical allegory. That at least is not a link in the chain let down from other worlds; "the purple light of love" is not a dim reflection of the smiles of celestial bliss. It does not appear till the middle of life, and then seems like "another morn risen on mid-day." In this respect the soul comes into the world "in utter nakedness." Love waits for the ripening of the youthful blood. The sense of pleasure precedes the love of pleasure, but with the sense of pleasure, as soon as it is felt, come thronging infinite desires and hopes of pleasure, and love is mature as soon as born. It withers and it dies almost as soon!"

This play presents a beautiful coup-d'œil of the progress of human life. In thought it occupies years, and embraces the circle of the affections from childhood to old age. Juliet has become a great girl, a young woman since we first remember her a little thing in the idle prattle of the nurse. Lady Capulet was about her age when she became a mother, and old Capulet somewhat impatiently tells his younger visitors,—

"I've seen the day,

That I have worn a visor, and could tell

"A whispering tale in a fair lady's ear,
Such as would please; 'tis gone, 'tis gone, 'tis gone."

Thus one period of life makes way for the following, and one generation pushes another off the stage. One of the most striking passages to show the intense feeling of youth in this play is Capulet's invitation to Paris to visit his entertainment.

"At my poor house, look to behold this night
Earth-treading stars that make dark heav'n light;
Such comfort as do lusty young men feel
When well-appareld April on the heel
Of limping winter treads, even such delight
Among fresh female-buds shall you this night
Inherit at my house."

The feelings of youth and of the spring are here blended together like the breath of opening flowers. Images of vernal beauty appear to have floated before the author's mind, in writing this poem, in profusion. Here is another of exquisite beauty, brought in more by accident than by necessity. Montague declares of his son smit with a hopeless passion, which he will not reveal—

"But he, his own affection's counsellor,
Is to himself so secret and so close,
So far from sounding and discovery,
As is the bud bit with an envious worm,
Ere he can spread his sweet-leaves to the air,
Or dedicate his beauty to the sun."

This casual description is as full of passionate beauty as when Romeo dwells in frantic fondness on "the white wonder of his Juliet's hand." The Reader may, if he pleases, contrast the exquisite pastoral simplicity of the above lines with the gorgeous description of Juliet when Romeo first sees her at her father's house, surrounded by company and artificial splendour.

"What lady's that which doth enrich the hand
Of yonder knight?
O she doth teach the torches to burn bright;
Her beauty hangs upon the cheek of night,
Like a rich jewel in an Æthiop's ear."

TRUE IDEA OF POETRY.

Poetry were it the rudest, so it be sincere, is the attempt which man makes to render his existence harmonious, the utmost he can do for that end; it springs, therefore, from his whole feelings, opinions, activity, and takes its character from these. It may be called the music of his whole manner of being; and, historically considered, is the best test how far music or freedom existed therein; how far the feeling of love, of beauty, and dignity, could be elicited from that peculiar situation of life, and from the views he there had of life and nature, of the universe internal and external.—Thomas Campbell.

PORTRAITS FROM LIFE, BY GOETHE.

LET me pay due homage to several respectable individuals to whom I was under great obligations. I will begin with M. Oelenschlager, of the family of Frauenstein, a senator, and son-in-law to Dr Orth, whom I have already mentioned. This gentleman, in his grand costume of burgomaster, might have passed for one of the principal French prelates. Business and travel had made him a remarkable character. He showed some esteem for me, and willingly conversed with me on the subjects which interested him. I was privy to the composition of his explanation of the Golden Bull. He had the goodness to make me sensible of the object and importance of this celebrated document. I had so familiarized myself with the rude and troubled times which had provoked it, that I could not refrain from representing the character and facts with which my friend entertained me, by imitating the tone and gestures of these men of other times, as if we had had them before our eyes. This pantomime afforded him great amusement, and he was fond of making me repeat it.

I had from infancy accustomed myself to the singular habit of learning by heart the tables of contents prefixed to the chapters and commencements of the books I read. I had adopted this method with the 'Pentateuch,' the 'Æneid,' and the 'Metamorphoses.' I continued it with the 'Golden Bull'; and my good friend Oelenschlager laughed heartily, when I unexpectedly called out in a very grave tone—"Omne regnum in se divinum desolabitur: nam principes ejus facti sunt socii furum!"—"Every kingdom divided against itself shall be brought to desolation; for the princes thereof are become the associates of robbers." The worthy Oelenschlager, shaking his head, said, in a significant manner—"What sort of times, then, were those in which the emperor thundered such expressions in the ears of the princes of the empire in a solemn diet?"

He saw little company, although his manners were highly agreeable, and he took great pleasure in lively conversation. He would now and then get us to perform a dramatic piece. This was considered a useful exercise for youth. We played Schlegel's 'Cæsar,' and afterwards ventured on 'Britannicus,' both to perfect ourselves in the French language and to practise declamation. I played Nero, and my sister Agrippina. We were applauded far beyond our deserts; but we thought we received less praise than we merited.

I used also to visit Mr Reineck, a gentleman of a very ancient noble family. He was a thin man, of a brown complexion; of the most upright character, and firm to a degree that often amounted to obstinacy. Never did I see him laugh. He had suffered a severe affliction, his daughter having eloped with a friend of the family. He commenced a prosecution against his son-in-law, which he continued with great animosity; but the tardy formalities of the tribunals affording him no hopes of a speedy vengeance, or one agreeable to his wishes, he attacked his son-in-law personally, which measure produced action after action. From that time he kept himself shut up in his house and garden. He inhabited a spacious but dismal ground-floor, which for many years had neither been painted nor, perhaps, cleaned. He seemed to place some confidence in me, and recommended his youngest son to my attention. His oldest friends, who knew how to accommodate themselves to his situation, his agents, and his counsellor, often dined with him. He never failed to invite me to these entertainments. The dinners were good; the wine still better; but a dilapidated stove, which emitted smoke on every side through its crevices, annoyed the guests excessively. One of Mr Reineck's best friends ventured one day to mention it to him, asking him how he could endure so great an inconvenience all the winter. "Would to God," replied he, "that that were the greatest inconvenience that I have to put up with." It was long before he could be prevailed upon to see his daughter and grandson. His son-in-law never durst appear before him.

My company had a favourable effect on this worthy and unfortunate man. When in conversation he imparted to me his information respecting the world and political affairs, he seemed to forget his troubles. The few friends who used to meet at his house employed me when they wished to divert his mind from his sorrows. We prevailed on him to take a walk with us occasionally. He seemed to take pleasure in viewing once more the fields which he had not entered for many years. He talked to us about the old proprietors of them, his neighbours, related their histories, and described their characters. His judgments were always severe, but there was much wit and pleasantry in his narratives. We made some attempts to induce him to return to the society of men, but were always unsuccessful.

Another person, nearly of the same age, whom I often saw at this period, was a Mr Malapart, a wealthy man, who possessed a very handsome house in the horse market, and derived a good revenue from his salt-works. He also lived in seclusion, passing the summer at his garden, near the Bockenheim gate, where he cultivated very fine tulips.

Mr Reineck was also an amateur. Flowers were new in season. We formed a plan for bringing them together, and, after having gradually paved the way for the interview, we one day took Mr Reineck to Mr Malapart's garden. The two old gentlemen bowed to each other, and the company walked up and down, between the beds of tulips, with true diplomatic gravity. The flowers were really superb: their various forms and colours, the superiority of some to others, and the rarity of several sorts, furnished matter for the conversation, which took a very friendly turn. This gave us the more pleasure, as we perceived, in an adjacent harbour, several flag-gons of old Rhenish wine set out on a table. Unfortunately, Mr Reineck observed a very fine tulip, the head of which hung down a little; he took hold of the stalk very carefully and raised the flower, in order to examine it more minutely. But, gently as he touched it, the owner was displeased. Mr Malapart, politely, but with a determined air, and as if congratulating himself on his habitual reserve, reminded him of oculis, non manibus. ("Eyes, not hands.") Reineck had already let go the flower. At these words the colour came into his cheeks, and he replied, in his usual dry, grave tone, that amateurs and connoisseurs might freely examine any flower, with proper precautions, and upon this he again took hold of the flower. The mutual friends were embarrassed. They started several subjects of conversation, but unsuccessfully. The two old gentlemen appeared to be struck mute. We dreaded every moment that Reineck would touch the flowers again. To prevent his doing so, we took them each apart, and soon put an end to the visit, thus turning our backs on the well-furnished table which we had viewed with longing eyes, but had not been able to approach.

The privy councillor, Huisgen, was another of the friends I used to visit. He was not a Frankfort man, and he professed the reformed religion; two obstacles which hindered him from holding any public employment, and even from exercising the functions of an advocate. He, nevertheless, practised under the signature of another person, at Frankfort, and in the courts of the empire; his reputation as an excellent lawyer procured him many clients. He was then sixty years of age. I used to go to his house to take lessons in writing with his son. Mr Huisgen had a very long face, although he was not thin. Disfigured by the small-pox and the loss of an eye, he appeared frightful at the first glance. His bald head was surmounted by a white cap, tied at the top with a riband; he always wore very handsome damask or calamanco robes de chambre. He inhabited a small apartment on the ground floor, the neatness of which was as perfect as the serenity of his temper. It was a treat to see the perfect order of his papers, his books, and his geographical maps. It was not long before I discovered that he was at secutive, rather than discursive. He arrived at truth through a certain process; Shakspeare saw everything by intuition. Chaucer had great variety of power, but he could do only one thing at once. He set himself to work on a particular subject. His ideas were kept separate, labelled, ticketed and parcelled out in a set form, in pews and compartments by themselves. They did not play into one another's hands. They did not re-act upon one another, as the blower's breath moulds the yielding glass. There is something hard and dry in them. What is the most wonderful thing in Shakspeare's faculties is their excessive sociability, and how they gossiped and compared notes together.

We must conclude this criticism; and we will do it with a quotation or two. One of the most beautiful passages in Chaucer's tale is the description of Cresseide's first avowal of her love:—

"And as the new abashed nightingale,
That stinteth first when she beginneth sing,
When that she heareth any herde's tale,
Or in the hedges any wight stirring,
And, after, sicker doth her voice outting;
Right so Cresseide, when that her dread stent,
Opened her heart, and told him her intent."

See also the two next stanzas, and particularly that divine one beginning

"Her armes small, her back both straight and soft," &c.

Compare this with the following speech of Troilus to Cressida in the play.

"O, that I thought it could be in a woman;
And if it can, I will presume in you,
To feed for aye her lamp and flame of love,
To keep her constancy in plight and youth,
Out-living beauties out-ward, with a mind
That doth renew swifter than blood decays.
Or, that persuasion could but thus convince me,
That my integrity and truth to you
Might be affronted with the match and weight
Of such a winnow'd purity in love;
How were I then uplifted! But alas,
I am as true as Truth's simplicity,
And simpler than the infancy of Truth."

These passages may not seem very characteristic at first sight, though we think they are so. We will give two, that cannot be mistaken. Patroclus says to Achilles,—

"Rouse yourself; and the weak-wanton Cupid
Shall from your neck unloose his amorous fold,
And like a dew-drop from the lion's mane,
Be shook to air."

Troilus, addressing the God of Day on the approach of the morning that parts him from Cressida, says with much scorn,—

"What! proffer'st thou thy light here for to sell?
Go, sell it them that smallé selés grave."

If nobody but Shakspeare could have written the former, nobody but Chaucer would have thought of the latter.—Chaucer was the most literal of poets, as Richardson was of prose-writers.

We have much pleasure in inserting the following literary notice which has been sent us. In the press, 'Corn Law Rhymes.' The third volume of the works of Ebenezer Elliott will appear in the ensuing month. Amongst its contents will be found some of the earliest productions of this talented writer, without any political allusions,—productions which were almost unheeded at the time of their publication.—Southey alone addressing him to this effect: "There is power in the least serious of these tales, but the higher you pitch your tone the better you succeed. Thirty years ago they would have made your reputation; thirty years hence the world will wonder that they did not do so."

FINE ARTS.

Wanderings through North Wales, by Thomas Roscoe, embellished with highly finished Engravings, by Wm. Radcliffe, from Drawings made expressly for this work, by Cattermole, Cox, and Creswick. Part I. London. Tilt; Simpkin and Marshall.

MR RADCLIFFE'S engravings in the Part before us are a little hard, with a degree of coarseness and flatness in the fore-ground; but they are distinct, and not unpleasing in the effect. 'Caunant Mawr,' after Creswick, is a striking scene. 'Langollen Valley' is a lovely scene, and makes one think directly of its 'Maid' and her 'contented' Shepherd. Cattermole's 'Death of Llewellyn' is spirited; but not very carefully drawn.

Poems, with Illustrations, by Louisa Anne Twamley. London. Tilt.

MISS TWAMLEY urges that the illustrations to her poems are her first attempt at etching on copper; she need scarcely have done so, for they are executed with much feeling and talent, and bear no signs of incapacity or immaturity. They consist of landscapes and flower-pieces. Of the landscapes, we prefer Tintern Abbey, which we never saw look better on paper; more venerable or picturesque; and a friend, who has visited the veritable edifice, praises it for its fidelity. The flower-piece immediately following it is still better in point of execution; it is drawn with great freedom and feeling, and the blending and variety of the tints is very happily caught. Something will be said of the poetry in another number.

TO F. M. W.

WITH A QUARTO EDITION OF LADY RACHEL RUSSELL'S LETTERS.

OR more than Russell in thy fortitude,
And in thy love too, capable of more,
— Say, either may we bless or must deplore
The lot which makes thy evil and our good.
For, Lady, had the silken lap of ease
Nursed the charms thy friends so doat upon,
Then hadst thou not from adverse fortune won
The triumph which a chastened heart decrees,
For hadst thou known the subtle bands that knit
Into one web meek feeling and high thought,
Making the soul a holy garment, wrought
With nicest art, magnificently fit—
Then unto us thy love had only brought
The grace of manners and the charm of wit.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE enlarged copy of Mr Landon's ode will appear in our next. Its insertion has been delayed by a provoking accident, which has conspired, we fear, with another hindrance, to make us seem very unaccountable and thankless in the eyes of the fair Correspondent by whom it was forwarded. But we have been hoping, day by day, to be able to beg her acceptance of a little volume, which would have accompanied our letter of explanation; and in case this volume does not appear before the present Number of our JOURNAL, we hereby mention the circumstance that she may see we are not quite so absurd as she might otherwise reasonably imagine.

We shall be glad to hear again from H. F.

We cordially thank the gentleman who has written to us so kindly about the LONDON JOURNAL, and whose letter inclosed some of the poems of Sir Richard Fanshawe, &c. He will see that we are not forgetful.

The MS. sent us by Mr J. will be attended to at our very first leisure.

We are much mistaken if we have not inserted some article written by J. M. C. Will he favour us with copy or copies of some later communications, in case they have been mislaid?

Our friend G. H. L. seems to be full of good feeling, and fancy too; but he is in too great a hurry both with his verse and prose, and therefore writes at too great length. He reminds us of the letter-writer, who said, "Excuse my being so long, but I have not time to be shorter." Is this our friend's case? At present he wants concentration; and must also study his versification a little more. He is in such haste to live in his pleasant bowers, that he must needs inhabit them, before they are built!

The writer of a letter in pencil, who notices the doctrine of Berkeley, is, we take it, not the same Correspondent who made the quotation alluded to. We have two Readers who seem to have objections to pen and ink. With regard to Berkeley's arguments we would recommend him to read them for himself in the philosopher's works. He would find them very amusing at least, and, we suspect, very startling. And we should be glad to hear from him afterwards on the subject, for our own acquaintance with them was both partial and hasty.

AN OLD ENGLISH GENTLEMAN will probably have seen the announcement of 'Captain Sword and Captain Pen' before this answer appears. At all events, it will be speedily published by Mr Knight. His other query we cannot notice, because it would trench upon the forbidden ground of advertisement. We are much flattered by his idea of the "Series" he speaks of.

Agreeably to our wish to avoid all possible themes of controversy, we are sorry that the mention of the "Clergyman" in 'Sunday in the Suburbs' was not omitted. F., who takes such a kindly interest in our pages, is informed that the article was written some time back, and the passage, on a hasty review of it, overlooked.

What S. J. says upon 'Love and Matrimony' is very true, and does him honour; but we fear to open our columns to all that may be said on this subject.

We agree with all the opinions expressed in the letter of X; but has he not made his 'Gipsy's Song' somewhat too intimate with the language and luxuries of high living?

Thanks to GODFREY GRAFTON; who will hear further from us.

The printed articles on Mr Lamb reached us unfortunately too late to be made use of in our present number. Due attention shall be paid to them in our next. Meantime we must observe that the writer is under a great mistake respecting the absence of some of Mr Hazlitt's friends, when his funeral took place.

We will not do venerable JOHN PACEY the injustice of publishing the lines sent us by the gentleman who gives us the following account of him, because the homeliness of their attire may not allow everybody to pay honour enough to their spirit; but no one will misunderstand the reverend and living piece of poetry here presented us in the person of a cheerful old man of eighty, rendered superior to his adversity by a good conscience and a mind willing to look around it for sources of comfort:—

"The author of the accompanying trifles, John Pacey, now eighty years of age, was born in the village of Charlton-Kings, Gloucestershire, of honest and industrious parents. He was apprenticed at an early age to a laborious trade, which he has, however, with commendable industry, pursued until within these last few years, when age and infirmities prevented his further exertions, and drove him to seek refuge from penury and distress in the cultivation of a little vegetable-garden. His wants are few and easily supplied; a life of industry has rendered him frugal and abstinent, while honesty and good-feeling have preserved him in the paths of sobriety and rectitude. He married at the early age of twenty-one, and has decently brought up seven children. His eldest son is an object of great compassion, being alike infirm in body and imbecile in mind; he is dependant upon the kindness of his parents, not only for the necessities of life, but also for his actual support,—he is helpless. Notwithstanding this unusual clog, poor old Pacey bears up under the burdens of existence, is cheerful and contented, and even bestows his leisure hours to the cultivation of an humble and amusing taste for poetry."

THE SATYR OF MYTHOLOGY AND THE POETS.

We intended this week to present our poetry-loving Readers with a new and greatly improved edition of Mr Landon's 'Ode to a Friend,' published in one of our December Numbers last year; but as we have just received some contributions from other friends, which will harmonize with it, and expect one or two more, we delay introducing it till our next. Meanwhile, we lay before them the portrait, if not of an eminent man, of a very eminent half or four-fifths man, an old friend of the poets, particularly of the sequestered and descriptive order, and constantly alluded to in all modern as well as ancient quarters poetical. He is alive, not only in Virgil, and Theocritus, and Spenser, but in Wordsworth, in Keats, and Shelley, and in the 'pages of 'Blackwood' and the LONDON JOURNAL.

We keep the public in mind, from time to time, that one of the objects of the LONDON JOURNAL is to bring uneducated readers of taste and capacity acquainted with the pleasures of those who are educated; and we write articles of this description accordingly, in a spirit intended to be not unacceptable to either. Enter, therefore, the Satyr,—as in one of the Prologues to an old play. By-and-by, we shall give a Triton, a Nymph, &c. &c. and so on through all the gentle populace of fiction,—the plebe degli dei, as Tasso calls them,—the "common people of the gods." Such, we hope, in future times,—or worthy rather of such appellation,—will be all the people of the earth,—their poetry in common, their education in common, knowledge and its divine pleasures being as cheap as daisies in the mead.

The Satyr (not always, but generally) is a goat below the waist, and a man above, with a head in which the two beings are united. He has horns, pointed ears, and a beard; and there is just enough humanity in his face to make the look of the inferior being more observable. The expression is drawn up to the height of the salient and wilful. He is a merry brute of a demigod; and when not sleeping in the grass, is for ever in motion, dancing after his quaint fashion, and butting when he fights. He goes in herds, though he is often found straying. His haunt is in the woods, where he makes love to the Dryads and other nymphs, not always with their good will.

When he gets old, he takes to drinking, grows fat, and is called a Silenus, after the most eminent gorbelly of his race: and then he becomes oracular in his drink, and disbursts the material philosophy which his way of life has taught him. He is not immortal, but has a long life as well as a merry; some say a thousand years; others, many thousand. A thousand years, according to Aristotle, is the duration both of the Satyr and the Nymph.

The Faun, though often confounded with the Satyr, and supposed by some to be nothing but a Latin version of him, is generally taken by the moderns for a Satyr mitigated and more human. Goat's feet are not necessary to him. He can be content with a tail, and two little budding horns, like a kid.

"How the Satyrs originated," quoth the "serious" but not very "sage" Natalis Comes, "or of what parents they were begotten, or where, or when they began to exist, or for what reason they were held to be gods by antiquity, neither have I happened upon any creditable ancient who can inform me, nor can I make it out myself." He says he takes no heed of the opinion of those who suppose them to have been the children of Saturn or Faunus. Pliny, he tells us, speaks of Satyrs, as certain animals in the Indian mountains, of great swiftness, going on all fours, but with a human aspect, and running upright. Furthermore, Pausanias mentions one Euphemus of Caria, who coming upon a cluster of "desert" islands, in the extreme parts of the sea, and being forced by a tempest to alight on one of them called Satyras, found it inhabited by people of a red colour, with tails not much inferior to those of horses. These gentlemen invaded the ships of their new acquaintance, and without saying a word, began helping themselves to what they liked. Finally, Pomponius Mela speaks of certain islands beyond Mount Atlas, in which lights were seen at night, and a great sound was heard of drums, and cymbals, and pipes, though nobody was to be seen by day; and these islands were said to be inhabited by Satyrs. To which beareth testimony the famous Hanno the Carthaginian.*

Boccaccio, in his treatise 'De Montibus,' appears to have transferred these islands to Mount Atlas itself; of which he says (dwelling upon the subject with his usual romantic fondness) that, "such a depth of silence is reported to prevail there by day, that none approach it without a certain horror, and a feeling of some divine presence; but at night-time, like heaven, it is lit up with many lights, and resounds with the songs and cymbals, the pipes and whistling reeds, of Ægipans and Satyrs."†

The same writer, speaking of the opinion that Satyrs were goat-footed homunciones, or little men, tells the story of St Anthony: "who, searching through the deserts of the Thebais for the most holy eremite Paul, did behold one of them, and question him: the which made answer, that he was mortal; and that he was one of the people, bordering thereabouts, whom the Gentiles, led away by a vain error, did worship as Fauns and Satyrs." Other authors, he says, "esteemed them to be men of the woods, and called them Incubi, or Ficarii (Fig-eaters)." We here see who had the merit of it when figs were stolen.

Chaucer takes the Satyr for an Incubus, probably from this passage of his favourite author. Speaking of the friar, whose office it was to go about blessing people's grounds and houses (which was the reason, he says, why there were no longer any fairies) he adds, in his pleasant manner,

"Women may now go safely up and down:—
In every bush, and under every tree,
There is none other Incubus but he."

Wife of Bath's Tale.

But the most "particular fellow" on this subject is Philostratus; who, among the wild stories which he relates with such gravity of Apollonius the Tyanæan, has this, the wildest of them all, and, in his opinion, the most weighty. As the account is amusing, we will extract nearly the whole of it:—

"After visiting," says he, "the cataracts (of the Nile), Apollonius and his companions stopped in a small village in Ethiopia, where, whilst they were at supper, they amused themselves with a variety of conversation, both grave and gay. On a sudden was heard a confused uproar, as if from the women of the village exhorting one another to seize and pursue. They called to the men for assistance, who immediately sallied forth, snatching up sticks and stones, with whatever other weapons they chanced to find.

• • • All this hubbub arose from a Satyr having made his appearance, who for ten months past had infested the village. • • • The moment Apollonius perceived his friends were alarmed at this, he said, 'Don't be terrified. • • • There is but one remedy to be used in cases of such kind of insolence, and is what Midas had recourse to. He was himself of the race of the Satyrs, as appeared plainly by his ears. A Satyr once invited himself to his house, on the ground of consanguinity, and whilst he was his guest, libelled his ears in a copy of verses, which he set to music, and played on his harp. Midas, who was instructed, I think, by his mother, learnt from her, that if a Satyr was made drunk with wine, and fell asleep, he recovered his senses, and became quite a new creature. A fountain happening to be near his palace, he mixed it with wine, to which he sent the Satyr, who drank it till he was quite overcome with it. Now to show you that this is not all mere fable, let us go to the governor of the village, and if the inhabitants have any wine, let us make the Satyr drink, and I will be answerable for what happened in the case of the Satyr of Midas.'

All were willing to try the experiment; and immediately four Egyptian amphoras of wine were poured into the pond, in which the cattle of the village were accustomed to drink. Apollonius invited the Satyr to drink, and added, along with the invitation, some private menaces, in case of refusal. The Satyr did not appear; nevertheless the wine sank as if it was drunk. When the pond was emptied, Apollonius said, 'Let us offer libations to the Satyr, who is now fast asleep.' After saying this, he carried the men of the village to the cave of the Nymphs, which was not more than the distance of a plethron from the hamlet, where, after showing them the Satyr asleep, he ordered them to give him no ill-usage, either by beating or abusing him: 'For,' said he, 'I will answer for his good behaviour for the time to come.'

—This is the action of Apollonius, which, by Jupiter, I consider as what gave greatest lustre to his travels, and which was, in truth, their greatest feat. Anyone who has perused the letter which he wrote to a dissipated young man, wherein he tells him he had tamed a Satyr in Ethiopia, must call to mind this story. Consequently, no doubt can now remain of the existence of Satyrs. • • • When I was myself in Lemnos, I remember one of my contemporaries, whose mother, they said, was visited by a Satyr, formed according to the traditional accounts we have of that race of beings. He wore a deer-skin on his shoulders, which exactly fitted him, the fore-feet of which, encircling his neck, were fastened to his breast. But of this I shall say no more, as I am sensible credit is due to experience, as well as to me."

It is clear, from all these authorities, that various circumstances might have given rise to the idea of Satyrs.—The Great Ape species alone, which like the monkeys in Africa, might easily be supposed to be a race of men too idle to work, and holding their tongues to avoid it, would be sufficient to suggest the fancy to an imaginative people. The Satyr Islands of Pausanias are evidently islands frequented by apes, or rather baboons; unless indeed we are to believe with Monboddo, that men once had tails; which is hardly a greater distinction from some men without them, than a philosopher is from a savage. Oran Oran signifies a wild man; and Linnæus has called the Great Ape the Ape Satyr (Simia Satyrus.) Again, there have been real wild men; and a single one of these, such as Peter the Wild Boy, would people a country like Greece with Satyrs.

* 'Life of Apollonius of Tyanæ,' translated from the Greek of Philostratus, by the Rev. Edward Berwick, p. 246.

But it is not necessary to recur to palpable beings for a poetical stock. A sound, a shadow, a look of something in the dark, was enough to make them; and if this had not been found, they would still have been fancied. Satyrs, in an allegorical sense, are the animal spirits of the creation, its exuberance, its natural health and vigour, its headlong tendency to reproduction. In a superstitious and popular point of view, they were the spirits of the woods, a branch of the universal family of genii and fairies. Finally, in the great world of poetry, they partake, on both these accounts, of whatever has been said or done for them, that remains interesting to the imagination; and are still to be found there, immortal as their poets. As long as there is a mystery in the world, and men are unable to affirm what beings may not exist, so long poetry will have what existences it pleases, and the mind will have a corner in which to entertain them. Therefore, "the sage and serious Spenser" tells us wisely of

In no part of the world of poetry were they ever more alive or lasting, than in the woods of his 'Faerie Queene.' You have, indeed, a stronger sense of them in his pages, than in the works of antiquity. The ancient poets appear to have been too close at hand with them. The familiarity, though of a religious sort, had in it something of contempt. Spenser is always remote; in the uttermost parts of poetry; and thither shall he take us to meet them. Here they are, on a bright morning, in the thick of their glades. Una is in distress, and has cried out, so that her voice is heard throughout the woods.

"A troupe of Faunes and Satyres, far away
Within the wood, were dancing in a rownd,
Whiles old Sylvanus slept in shady arber sownd.

Who when they heard that piteous, strained voice,
In haste forsooke their rural merriment,
And ran towards the far rebownded noyse,
To meet what wight so loudly did lament.
Unto the place they come incontinent:
Whom when the raging Sarazin espide,
A rude, mishapen, monstrous rabblement,
Whose like he never saw, he durst not byde;
But got his ready steed, and fast away gan ryde."

Such fearefull fitt assaid her trembling hart,
Ne word to speake, ne joynt to move, she had:
The salvage nation feele her secret smart,
And read her sorrow in her count'nance sad:
Their frowning forheads, with rough hornes yelad
And rustick horror, all asyde doe lay;
And, gently grenning, shew a semblance glad
To comfort her; and (feare to put away)
Their backward-bent knees teach, her humbly to obey.

The doubtfull damzell dare not yet committ
Her single person to their barbarous truth;
But still twixt feare and hope amazed does sitt,
Late learnd what harme to hasty truth ensu'th:
They in compassion of her tender youth
And wonder of her beautie soveraigne,
Are wonne with pittie and unwonted ruth:
And, all prostraite upon the lowly playne,
Doe kisse her feete, and fawne on her with count'nance fayne.

Their harts she guesseth by their humble guise,
And yieldees her to extremitie of time:

So from the ground she fearelesse doth arise,
And walketh forth without suspect of crime:
They, all as glad as birdes of joyous pryme,
Thence lead her forth, about her dauncing round,
Shouting, and singing all a shepherd's ryme:
And, with greene branches strowing all the ground,
Do worship her as queene, with olive girlond cround.

And all the way their merry pipes they sound,
That all the woods with doubled echo ring;
And with their horned feet doe weare the ground,
Leaping like wanton kids in pleasant spring.
So towards old Sylvanus her they bring;
Who, with the noyse awaked, commeth out
To meet the cause, his weak steps governing
And aged limbs on cypresse stable stout;
And with an yvie twyne his waste is girt about.

The wood-born people fall before her flat,
And worship her as goddesses of the wood;
And old Sylvanus self bethinkes not, what
To think of wight so fayre: but gazing stood
In doubt to deeme her born of earthly brood.

The wooddy nymphes, faire Hamadryades,
Her to behold doe thether runne apace;
And all the troupe of light-foot Naiades
Flocke all about to see her lovely face."

Book I, canto 6.

Spenser has a knight among his chivalry, who was the son of a Satyr by the wife of a country-gentleman, one Theonion (or Brute) by name,—a severe insinuation on the part of the gentle poet:—

"A loose unruly swayne,
Who had more joy to rauage the forest wide
And chase the salvage beast with busie payne,
Than serve his ladie's love."

Perhaps the poet intended a hint to the squires of his time. He tells us of another wife, who had a considerable acquaintance among the wood-gods. It is not so easy to relate her story; but she would be a charming person by the time she was thirty, and make a delicate heart content! His account of her is certainly intended as a lesson to old gentlemen.

"The gentle lady, loose at random left,
The greenwood long did walke, and wander wide
At wilde adventure, like a forlorne wiffe;
Till on a daye the Satyres her espide
Straying alone withouten grooms or guide:
Her up they took, and with them home her ledd,
With them as housewife ever to abide,
To milk their goats, and make them cheese and bredd."

She forgets her old husband Malbecco, who has just arrived at the spot where she lives,—

"And eke Sir Paridell, all were he deare,
Who from her went to seek another lott,
And now by fortune was arrived here.
* * * * *
Soon as the old man saw Sir Paridell,

(who was the person that had taken his wife from him),

He fainted, and was almost dead with feare;
Ne word he had to speake, his grieve to tell,
But to him louted low, and greeted goodly well:

And, after, asked him for Hellenore:
'I take no keepe of her,' sayd Paridell;
'She wonneth in the forest, there before.'
So forth he rode as his adventure fell."

A great noise is afterwards heard in the woods, of bagpipes and "shrieking hubbubs;" the old man hides in a bush; and after a while

"The jolly Satyres full of fresh delight
Came dancing forth, and with them nimbly ledd
Faire Hellenore, with girlonds all bespredd,
Whom their May-lady they had newly made:

She, proud of that new honour which they radd,
And of their lovely fellowship full glade,
Daunst lively, and her face did with a lewrell shade."

What a sunny picture is in this line!

"The silly man, that in the thicket lay
Saw all this goodly sport; and grieved sore;
Yet durst he not against it do or say,
But did his hart with bitter thoughts engore,
To see th' unkindness of his Hellenore.
All day they daunced with great lustyhedd,
And with their horned feet the greene grass wore;
The wiles their gotes upon the brouzes fedd,
Till drouping Phoebus gan to hyde his golden hedd.

"Tho up they gan their merry pypes to trusse,
And all their goodly heardees did gather rownde."

The old gentleman creeps to his wife's bed's-head at night, and endeavours to persuade her to go away with him; but she is deaf to all he can say; so in the passion of his misery, and supernatural strength of his very weakness, he runs away, "runs with himself away,"—till, under the most appalling circumstances, he undergoes a transformation into Jealousy itself! a poetical flight, the daringness of which can only be equalled (and vindicated, as it is) by the mastery of its execution. See the passage; which, through a half-allegory, is calculated to affect the feelings of the poetical reader, almost as much as Burley and his cavern in 'Old Mortality' do readers in general. It is at the end of Canto xi, Book 3.

Spenser has a story of 'Foolish god Faunus,' who comes on Diana when she is bathing; for which he is put into a deer-skin, and she and her nymphs hunt him through wood and dale. Fauns and Satyrs, it is to be observed, are represented as wise or foolish, according as the poet allegorizes the elements of a country life, and the reflections, or clownish impulses, of sequestered people. The Faun, in particular, who was the more oracular of the two, might be supposed either to speak from his own knowledge, or to be merely the channel of a higher one, and so to partake of that reverend character of fatuity, which is ascribed in some countries to idiots. The Satyr was more conscious and petulant: he waited more especially upon Bacchus; was loud and saucy; may easily be supposed to have been noisiest and most abusive at the time of grapes; and it is to him, we think, and him alone (whatever learned distinctions have been made between satyri and satyrs, or the fruit which he got together, and him who got them), that the origin of the word Satire is to be traced; that is to say, Satire was such free and abusive speech, as the vintagers pelted people with, just as they might with the contents of their baskets.

To make Satyr, therefore, clever or clownish, or both, just as it suits the writer's purpose, is in good keeping. To make him revengeful for not having his will, is equally good, as Tasso has done in the 'Aminta.' To make him old, and scorned by a young mistress, is warrantable, as Guarini has done in the 'Pastor Fido'; and even a touch of sentiment may not be refused him, if visited by a painful sense of the difference of his shape; which is an imitation of the beautiful Polyphemus invention of Theocritus, and was introduced into modern poetry by the precursor of those poets, the inventor of the Sylvan Drama, Boccaccio. But we cannot say so much for another great poet of ours, Fletcher, who, spoilt by his town breeding, and thinking he could not make out a case for chastity, and the admiration of it, but by carrying it to a pitch of the improbable, introduces into his 'Faithful Shepherdess,' a Satyr thoroughly divested of his nature, the most sentimental and Platonical of lovers, and absolute guardian of what he exists only to oppose. The clipping of hedges into peacocks was nothing to this. It was like changing warmth into cold, and taking the fertility out of the earth. Elegance was another affair. The rudest things natural contain a principle of that. You may show even a Satyr in his graces, as you may a goat in a graceful attitude, or the turns and blossoms of a thorn. But to make the shaggy and impetuous wood-god, with his veins full of the sap of the vine, a polished and retiring lover, all for the metaphysics of the passion, and bowing and backing himself out of doors like a "sweet Signior," was to strike barrenness into the spring, and make the "swift and fiery sun," which the poet so finely speaks of, halt, and become a thing deliberate. Pan, at the sight, should have cut off his universal beard. Certainly, the Satyr ought to have clipped his coat, and withdrawn into the urbanities of a suit of clothes. He should have "walked gowned."

However, there is a ruddy and rough side of the apple still left; and with this we proceed to indulge ourselves, cutting away the rest. Fletcher is a true poet, and could not speak of woods and wood-gods, without finding means to give us a proper taste of them. His Satyr comes in well.

"ENTER A SATYR WITH A BASKET OF FRUIT."

SAT. Thorough yon same bending plain,
That flings his arms down to the main,
And through these thick woods have I run,
Whose bottom never kiss'd the sun
Since the lusty spring began:
All to please my master Pan
Have I trotted without rest
To get him fruit: for at a feast
He entertains, this coming night,
His paramour, the Syrinx bright.

Here be grapes, whose lusty blood
Is the learned poet's good;
Sweeter yet did never crown
The head of Bacchus: nuts more brown
Than the squirrel's teeth, that crack them:
Design, oh fairest fair, to take them.
For these, black-eyed Dryope
Hath oftentimes commanded me
With my clasped knee to climb:
See how well the lusty time
Hath deck'd their rising cheeks in red;
Such as on your lips is spread.
Here be berries for a queen;
Some be red, some be green.

(How much better than if he had said "Some be red and some be green." He is like a great boy, poking over the basket, and pointing out the finest things in it with rustic fervour.)

These are of that luscious meat,
The great god Pan himself doth eat:
All these, and what the woods can yield,
The hanging mountain or the field,
I freely offer; and ere long
Will bring you more, more sweet and strong:
Till when humbly leave I take,
Lest the great Pan do awake,
That sleeping lies in a deep glade,
Under a broad beech's shade.
I must go, I must run;
Swifter than the fiery sun."

In this passage, Mr Seward, in his edition of 'Beaumont and Fletcher,' has a note containing an extract from Theocritus, so happily rendered, that, as it suits our purpose, we will repeat it. It is seldom that a writer not professedly a poet, and an eminent one too, has struck forth so masterly a bit of translation. The verb in the last line even surpasses the original. We will put the Greek first, both in justice to it, and because (to own a whim of ours) the glimmering and thorny look of the Greek characters gives, in our eyes, something of a hoarseness to one's pages. A page of a Greek pastoral is the next thing with us to a wood-side, or a landscape of Gaspar Poussin:—

Ου δῆμις, οὐ ποιμαίν, τοῖς μισομυβρίνοι, οὐ δῆμις αἶμμα

Συρίδι' τον Πανα δίδοικαμ' η γὰρ γὰρ ἀγῶν
Ταῖς καὶ κηλῶν ἀμυνομένη, ὅτι γὰρ πικρὸς,
Καὶ οἱ αἱ δριμύτι' χόλα ποτὶ βίη κελύτῃ"

Shepherd, forbear: no song at noon's dread hour;
Tis'd with the chase, Pan sleeps in yonder bower:
Churlish he is; and, stirr'd in his repose,
The snappish cholera quivers on his nose."

We must quote the Satyr's concluding speech, though it is not so much in character. The poet might have defended his straying in the air, but it must have been upon very abstract and ethereal grounds, foreign to the substantial part which he plays in this drama; and the fine allusion to Orpheus' lute is equally learned and out of its place. However, the whole passage is so beautiful, that we cannot help repeating it. Our Platonical friend is taking leave of the lady:—

"SAT. Thou divinest, fairest, brightest,
Thou most pow'ful maid, and whitest,
Thou most virtuous and most blessed;
Eyes of stars, and golden tressed:
Like Apollo! tell me, sweetest,
What new service now is meetest
For the Satyr? Shall I stray
In the middle air, and stay
The sailing rack, or nimbly take
Hold by the moon, and gently make
Suit to the pale queen of night
For a beam to give thee light?
Shall I dive into the sea,
And bring thee coral, making way
Through the rising waves, that fall
In snowy fleeces? Dearest, shall
I catch thee wanton fawns, or flies,
Whose woven wings the summer dyes
Of many colours? Get thee fruit?
Or steal from heav'n old Orpheus' lute!"

What a relief! The lute of Orpheus! and laid up in some corner of heaven! Doubtless in the thick of one of its grassiest nooks of asphodel; and the winds play upon it, of evenings, to the ear of Proserpine when she visits her mother,—giving her trembling memories to carry back to Eurydice.

THOUGHTS ON LANGUAGE.

BY EDGEMONT WEBER.

NO III.

THE last chapter was chiefly occupied in considering the question—whether a society of people, cut off from the rest of the world, is equal to the task of framing its own language; and the course of reasoning adopted tended to the affirmative.

But a curious subject of inquiry may possibly suggest itself to the mind of the Reader in this place; which it may be worth while to notice. It is a subject that has often haunted me; flitting before me like a ghost, when I have been directing my view to some relative point; constituting a sort of side-scene in many a dreamy speculation, but never before subjecting itself in a palpable shape;—like those objects that the eye takes in at either side of its principal mark.*

Is it possible that the might of human genius can have slumbered for five thousand five hundred years, throughout one of the principal portions of the globe? Can all this wilderness of events that makes up what we of the vetus orbis call "universal history," all this procession of ages lost in the clouds—this infinite fantastic moving scene of fortunes, follies, virtues, vices, loves, hopes, miseries, and death—can it all have moved away and away into the grey horizon of the past; and can there have existed all the while,—and yet no syllable of a hint escape from the lips of nature,—no gossip Naiad of the deep, breathless with the news, whisper to her wondering sisters of the shore—AMERICA? One can hardly think that the "conscious moon" could so long have traversed it familiarly,—coming out of its arms every day into our presence—without confessing the secret in her face. Wonderful, mysterious, America! This is that land for which Noah had no fourth son—of which the spoilt conqueror of Darius, when he wept for worlds on the banks of the Hydaspes, little thought—which never entered into the calculations of Pliny, nor mixed in the dreams of Plato. The grand, the colossal America, with its stupendous scenery and boundless expanse, and its noble-minded generous native tribes, that were: captured, trampled on, put to death, for civilisation's sake; slaughtered and exterminated to make room for banking houses and joint stock companies; America, with its simple-hearted, honest, good-natured Peruvians—whose history makes the blood run cold in Christian veins, and renders the name of Spaniard a sound detestable in the ears of humanity; America, land for gods and heroes—now ransacked from North to South by the greedy hands of Commerce—continent of clerks and counting-houses—filthy Mammon's peculiar kingdom!

If the continent of America (supposed now by geographers to be insular, I believe,) is coeval with the vetus orbis, and has been peopled from the same point of time, then they who believe in mankind's indefinite power of advancement per se, have certainly a difficult cause to support. It is therefore at the risk of being suspected of too unscrupulous a desire to bolster my argument, but in reality with a sincere conviction, that I venture to state the following opinion. I do not believe that the continent of America is contemporary with the rest of the land; I believe that the "New World" is new in more senses than one. It seems to me that in her peculiarly wild and disordered aspect, America gives a sort of internal evidence of having left the bosom of the deep at no distant age. Her tremendous flood of rivers, with their jagged mouths cleft into a dozen pieces, as if by the impetuous recoil of waters after the first discharge, her towering heights and deep ravines, her lakes like seas, and thousand cataracts, all seem to bespeak a recent and violent birth. I know nothing of geology or chemistry, but I think those sciences would bear me out in asserting that there is a certain tendency throughout nature to equalization and amalgamation, the effect of which must be of course a diminution of marked features—a merging of the peculiar in the general. In chemistry, especially, I know, "give and take" is a leading principle; no anti-free-trade man can prevent this species of political economy as it is practised by chemical bodies, which carry on an unceasing interchange of their parts and qualities, mingling and communicating without end, and always hastening to a mass. So in the visible aspect of nature, I conceive the same principle is at work. Fill a glass with cold water, and leave it alone for a month; at the end of that time, behold! it is half gone; who has drunk it?—ask Anacreon. Dig a furrow a foot deep; visit it a twelvemonth afterwards—it is now no more than half a foot in depth; go at the end of another twelvemonth—it is not to be found. Rear a sand-hill two feet high—imperceptibly it dwindles away, inch by inch, till you can no longer point out even the spot where it stood. What matters the scale, if the principle be true? Are not these so many mountains, lakes, and valleys in miniature? It does not seem too much then to assume, that these phenomena, subject of course to numerous conditional circumstances, are fair indications, if not available criteria, of the age of different countries. Now, judged by this standard, must not America be looked upon as new in the world,—as a sort of infant Hercules, displaying its gigantic might in the cradle of childhood? There are, no doubt, in parts of the Old World, individual specimens of features as extraordinary as those which America exhibits (some of the Himalaya mountains, for example, are said to exceed the Andes in height) but where on the surface of the globe is to be found the same pervading magnificence, the same universal scale of grandeur in all the proportions of physical nature? Where else shall we find, individually or collectively, such rivers as the St Lawrence, the Amazon, &c.—such lakes as Lake Erie, and Ontario,—or where else a chain of mountains, such as the Titans of old with all the Ossas on all the Pelions could not have matched, spanning half a hemisphere, and topped with eternal snow under an equatorial sun,—with their very base—even the cities at their feet (as in the case of Quito plains) towering above the level of the sea, equidistantly with the summits of some of the most considerable mountains of Europe? If some few instances of a greater height are known, it need not disturb our conclusions, while hinge not so much upon a comparison of the existing appearances of different objects, as upon a comparison of the actual with the former appearance of the same object. The Dhwalegeri may exceed Chimborazo—but who can tell how much the Dhwalegeri may once have exceeded itself? Nay, the New World may be a wonderful world to us, but when the Old World was a New World, who can tell what may have been the glory of her strength—the beauty of her face? I think I hear her, with an indignant glance across the Atlantic—

"Si mihi quæ quondam fuerit, quæque improbus iste Exultat fidens, si nunc foret illa juventa," &c.

It is generally received that the continent of Africa, with Arabia, and the adjacent parts of western Asia, is the most ancient division of the terrestrial globe. Now this exactly describes the circle within which all those dreadful solitudes, that seem to have no counterpart in nature elsewhere, are found. These deserts—these flat, low, continents of sand, with hardly a single liquid drop in all their limits, were once, I doubt not, the site of beautiful and luxuriant countries, teeming with productions, watered with salubrious rivers, and broken into all the pleasant variety of mountains, lakes, and valleys; rivers and lakes which millions of thirsty summer suns have sucked dry; mountains which time has ground to dust; valleys that have become the graves of the mountains. And this I suppose to be the course of nature and the destination of the world, and these are the visible steps by which we are approaching a time when, in a literal sense, "every valley shall be exalted and every mountain shall be made low." So does the earth sensibly strip herself, and puts by her toys one by one, and prepares to return in original nakedness to the arms of old Chaos.

Then that curious geographical fact respecting the Caspian Sea. The Caspian Sea, it is well known, is a perfect lake, having no communication with the Ocean on any side. But it seems it has been ascertained, by barometrical observation, that this lake lies now as much as three hundred and six feet below the ocean level.* How this is accounted for, I do not know. That it must once have been parallel with the sea (to wit, at the general deluge) can admit of no question. There seems no other way of accounting for it, than to suppose that it has been gradually either evaporating, or subsiding away into the bosom of the earth;—and if we may reasonably suppose this, we may as reasonably suppose the same of all waters whatsoever, not distinguishing rivers from lakes, nor seas from rivers, otherwise than in the time and manner of their exhaustion.

I need not carry these speculations further for the object in view. Perhaps I have carried them too far, and ought to apologise for launching so freely into a subject which I understand so slightly. If, however, there be any ray of truth in what I have thus hazarded, I could wish that some shrewd person, really qualified to handle such matters, would take up the question, and try how far it would be possible to proceed in a theory grounded on geological facts relating to the mutations of the earth. And let such person examine with a nice scrutiny all accounts in figures, respecting the heights, depths, distances and general relations of natural objects, that have come down to us in the works of the ancient geographers, and bring them into a close comparison with modern calculations, and see if he cannot bring to light some curious private charges against particular mountains, seas, &c., living or defunct. But if on the contrary I have deceived myself in this course of conjecture, I beg pardon of the better-informed; and shall hope presently to arrive at true conclusions. It is so tempting, to be sure, to frame theories, when facts are not in the way to refute us—so easy to talk of Truth behind her back,—that one is apt to take too much delight perhaps in this sort of invention; yet it may be observed, in a general way, that if the absence of facts is felt as a relief by the visionary theorist, it is no convenience to him whose conjectures may happen to be based in truth; since, where there are no facts to be thrown into the scale, it only requires the greater weight of reasonableness to induce conviction.

I have been led to dwell on this point, because I foresaw that if America was to be understood as being coeval with the vetus orbis, it would prove an almost insurmountable objection to an argument in favour of human sufficiency in the formation of language and the arts of civilized life. But entertaining the belief that I have endeavoured to support,—that America is a comparatively recent acquisition from the Ocean,—I consider that the condition of the natives at the discovery (and let it never be forgotten that the Peruvians were found in a state of society hardly to be called less than civilized) can afford nothing in disproof but may afford much in corroboration of these views.

[HAD the worthy gentleman who wrote to us in deprecation of too familiar a use of the name of "Tomkins," foreseen that it would have graced the title-page of a man of wit and observation, who has just given the public some curious intelligence respecting the upper circles, he would have waited in contentment for that best possible assertion of its dignity. The following remarks are taken from a pamphlet just published, intitled 'Thoughts upon the Aristocracy of England, by Isaac Tomkins, Gent.' We do not conceive ourselves to be trenching upon politics in extracting them. In fact, we have studiously omitted the political remarks that both precede and follow them; but we cannot omit passages in books every way interesting to us all, and to the purposes of knowledge, merely because they more immediately concern a class who have the misfortune to be better known as influencers of politics, than dispensers and perfectors of the elegancies they possess. We quoted Mr Simpson's remarks on the imperfections of their education, and we now quote this very curious and pungent testimony in evidence of his truth.]

THE picture we are about to contemplate is not pleasing; it is, however, like: it has many features peculiar to the past state of things; it has some which would remain, and be as revolting as they now are, even if all artificial distinctions of rank were swept away, as long as the accumulation of property is permitted—and with that no man of sense would wish to interfere. The progress of knowledge will be the best softener of those harsher features; and when the basis of the present distinctions is gone, that remedy will prove effectual—not till then.

The question is this. A substantial farmer or a reputable shopkeeper, intending to let two or three of his sons continue in his own business, has the spirit and the means to give one of them, who shows good abilities, a better education, that he may be a parson or a lawyer. The lad goes to Oxford, and he there meets the younger son of the squire or the nobleman, about his own age.—Now which of the two finds it easiest to get on in the world? Which is soonest received into the company of men of influence in the college? Which makes his way best to notice, wherever it is of importance to him that he should obtain notice? Which has, first at college, and afterwards in town, most favour bestowed on his efforts? Which rises the fastest and mounts the highest, supposing their abilities and understanding equal? Does it not require that the obscure man should be a first-rate genius to climb the heights of his career, be that civil or military, ecclesiastical or political? In England these questions can be answered in one only way.

stantial interest, and say a word of society merely. The one of the two youths whom we are supposing to be started together in life, is born to admittance everywhere, and to the unsolicited enjoyment of the most refined society; the other may arrive at the same favour after he has made himself famous by his talents, or powerful by his success, when the silly creatures who preside over such intercourse would feel themselves neglected if he were not found among their attendants. As for the daughter of the tradesman or the yeoman, no fancy can help us to picture her in those haunts of fashion, be she as fair as Venus, as chaste as Diana, as wise as Minerva, unless she has been able to repair the ruined fortunes of some noble rake by the legacy of an uncle in the East Indies. For the brother, parliamentary eloquence, (not learning or solid wisdom,) party devotion, or professional success, may cast a plank across the gulph which separates the circles of high and middling society. For the sister there is but one bridge, and it must be made of solid and massive gold. Passing across it, she will be admitted to the enjoyment of having her relations sneered at, and, if her ears are very acute, herself nicknamed among those whom she saves from want of bread; she will listen to the horrors of vulgar life, the atrocities of under-breeding, the hatefulness of honest industry, the misfortune of humble birth, until she dares not look about her or behind her, but is haunted by the recollection of her origin as if it had been a crime, and is brought to be more ashamed of her humble and virtuous family than if they had borne her in the hulks or bred her on the tread-mill.

"But surely," the country or the city reader will exclaim, "there must be something extremely captivating in this fine society, which makes it so much run after, and gives it so much sway, not only over the fashion, but even over the policy of the country!" For that it does exercise such influence we cannot deny. Statesmen pass much of their time in it; they discuss their measures of a party nature before the empty women and the frivolous youths who compose it. They are not a little moved by the opinion which has dominion in these select circles; they are prevented from making useful appointments of men unknown to these arbiters and arbitresses of fashion—and therefore despised by them—but who would be still more despised if they were known, because they are men of learning and sound sense. The same statesmen are also kept from taking an interest in many good works—as in humane and philanthropic pursuits—and in supporting wise measures of improvement founded upon profound views of human nature and of man's wants, by the same tone of ridicule with which, within these sacred precincts, all mention of such things is sure to be greeted. Lastly, as those circles are drawn round the very focus of all hatred and contempt for the people, they are the very hotbeds of Toryism and intolerance; nothing being more certain than that the Women of Fashion and all the young Aristocrats (perhaps more or less of all parties) hate Reform,—desire more or less openly to have a strong, arbitrary, Tory government, and would fain see the day dawn upon military power established on the ruins of the national representation.

"What, then," our honest yeoman's son, our worthy tradesman's daughter, may properly ask, "what is it that gives the Aristocratic circles all this extraordinary influence? and first of all, why is the admission into Aristocratic society so very highly prized, that we of the middle classes are ready to leave father or mother, and brother and sister, and cleave unto them, if we can only, at the cost of such sacrifices, obtain admission within their pale?"

First, it must be admitted that there is a very great, a very real charm, in those circles of society. The elegance of manners which there prevails is perfect; the taste which reigns over all is complete; the tone of conversation is highly agreeable—infinately below that of France indeed—but still most fascinating. There is a lightness, an ease, a gaiety, which to those who have no important object in view, and who deem it the highest privilege of existence, and the utmost effort of genius, to pass the hours agreeably, must be all that is most attractive.

After this ample admission, let us add, that whoever, after passing an evening in this society, shall attempt to recollect the substance of the conversation, will find himself engaged in a hopeless task. It would be easier to record the changes of colour in a pigeon's neck, or the series of sounds made by an Æolian harp, or the forms and hues of an Aurora Borealis. All is pleasing; all pretty; all serviceable in passing the time; but all unsubstantial. If man had nothing to do here below but to spend without pain or uneasiness the hours not devoted to sleep, certainly there would be no reason to complain of these coteries. But if he is accountable for his time, then surely he has no right to pass it thus. Compared with this, chess becomes a science; drafts and backgammon are highly respectable. Compared with this, dancing, which is exercise, and even games of romps are rational modes of passing the hours. Compared with this, it is worthy of a rational being to read the most frivolous romance that was ever penned, or gaze upon the poorest mime that ever strutted on the stage.

The want of sense and reason which prevails in these circles is wholly inconceivable. An ignorance of all that the more refined of the middle, or even of the lower classes, well know, is accompanied by an insulting contempt for any one who does not know any of the silly and worthless trifles which form the staple of their only knowledge. An intire incapacity of reasoning is twin sister to a ready and flippant and authoritative denial of all that reason has taught others. An utter impossibility of understanding what men of learning and experience have become familiar with, stalks hand in hand, insolent and exulting, with a stupid denial of truths which are all but self-evident, and are of extreme importance. Every female member of this exquisite class is under the exclusive dominion of some waiting-maid, or silly young lover, or slander-mongering newspaper; and if not under the sway of one paper, lives in bodily fear of two or three. Bribes, entreaties, threats, are by turns employed to disarm these tyrants; and however tormented the wretched victim may be, she is forced by some strange fatality, or propensity, to read what most tortures her.

Indeed, the relations of this Aristocratic class with the press, form one of the features most illustrative of the Aristocratic character, replete as it is with all the caprice and waywardness, the unreasoning and often unfeeling propensities, the alternate fits of blindness to all danger, and alarm where all is safe; in short, all that goes to the composition of a child, and a spoiled child.

Of the press, then, they live in habitual dread; but it is a fear, which being altogether void of wisdom, produces good neither to its victims nor its objects. Frightened to death at any unfavourable allusion to themselves or their ways, they support with the most stoical indifference all attacks upon their professed principles, all opposition to the policy they fancy they approve. Furious to the pitch of Bethlehem or St Luke's, if they themselves be but touched or threatened, nothing can be more exemplary than the fortitude with which they sustain the rudest shocks that can be given to the reputation of their dearest and nearest connexions. Nay, they bear without flinching, with the patience of anchorites, and the courage of martyrs, (but that the pain is vicarious,) the most exquisite and long-continued tortures to which the feelings of their friends and relations can be subjected. This is no exaggeration; for it is below, very much below the truth. They delight in the slander of that press, the terrors of which daily haunt them, and nightly break their slumbers. Nothing is to them a greater enjoyment than to read all that can be said against their friends. They know, to be sure, that all is false; but, judging by themselves, they know that all of it gives pain. The public, they are quite aware, believe little of it; for of late years the press has taken pretty good care to make its attacks very harmless in that respect; but then they feel that those friends who are the objects of the abuse are probably as sensitive as themselves. Thus, the class we are speaking of form in reality the slander-market of the day; and yet, with a miraculous inconsistency, they are in one everlasting chorus against "the license of the press," which, but for them, would have no being; but for their follies, no object; but for their malice, no support; but for their spiteful credulity, no dupes to work upon; but for their existence, no chance of continuing its own. They, indeed, turn upon their own instruments—make war upon the tools they work with—the very limbs they sustain and move! It is the rebellion of the members reversed; for here we have the overgrown belly attacking the limbs! Had the Aristocrats the power and the industry, they would indict their book 'A Good Name worthless,' or 'The Crimes of the Press,' but we should then expect to see 'Sermons on the Sixth Commandment, by a Receiver of Stolen Goods.'

That their encouragement is confined to the vilest portion of the press, has long ago been affirmed, and is not denied. The respectable journals are no favourite reading of theirs. The newspaper that fearlessly defends the right; that refuses to pander for the headlong passions of the multitude, or cater for the vicious appetites of the selecter circles; that does its duty alike regardless of the hustings and the bowdoin; has little chance of lying on the satin-wood table, of being blotted with ungrammatical ill-spelt notes, half bad English, half worse French, or of being fondled by fingers that have just broken a gold-wax seal on a grass-green paper. But more especially will it be excluded, possibly extruded, from those sacred haunts of the Corinthian order, if it convey any solid instruction upon a useful or important subject, interesting to the species which the writers adorn, and the patricians do their best to degrade. Even wit the most refined finds no echo in such minds; and if it be used in illustrating an argument or in pressing home the demonstration (which it often may be), the author is charged with treating a serious subject lightly, and of jesting where he should reason. Broad humour, descending to farce, is the utmost reach of their capacity; and that is of no value in their eyes unless it raises a laugh at a friend's expense. Some who have lived at Court, and are capable of better things, say they carefully eschew all jests; for Princes take such things as a personal affront—as raising the joker to their own level, by calling on them to laugh with him. One kind of jest, indeed, never fails to find favour in those high latitudes—where the author is himself the subject of the merriment. Buffoonery is a denizen in all courts, but most commonly indigenous; and, after the court's example patrician society is fashioned. It is not in the true Aristocratic circles that anyone will adventure the most harmless jest who would not pass for a jacobin or a free-thinker. He may make merry with the led-captain, or the humble companion, or possibly the chaplain (though that was rather in the olden time, before the French Revolution had taught the upper orders to pay the homage rendered by vice to virtue,* without acquiring piety or morals). Any other kind of wit rather indicates, if tolerated, that the adventurous individual has found his way thither from the lower latitudes of the liberal party.

* Hypocrisy—thus described by a French writer, wit, and nobleman—indeed a duke; for in France, where, even under the absolute monarchy, the claims of letters and talents were always admitted, the nobility cultivated wit and learning, and were a race infinitely superior to our own, in proportion as literary men were admitted into their society on a footing of equality.

OLD TIMES AND NEW.

Read the supplement to 'Sully's Memoirs.' Sully, such is the total change of manners, appears to have kept up more state in private life, after his retirement, than a crowned head does at present in the plenitude of power. Yet I question whether Henry IV himself enjoyed half the personal accommodation and real luxury of a respectable London merchant of this day.—Diary of a Lover of Literature.

THE WEEK.

PERSONAL PORTRAITS OF EMINENT MEN.

WOLFF, THE GERMAN SCHOLAR.

WOLFF was of middle stature; his demeanour natural, yet dignified; his forehead broad and lofty, his eyes blue, deep set, and penetrating; the mouth gracefully formed; but with a slightly sarcastic expression; the general expression of his countenance was that of power, tempered with mildness. His gait and movements partook of the vivacity of his mind; his temper was quick and sensitive; he was easily offended, but as easily reconciled. He never brooded over vexations and disappointments, but expressed his feelings strongly, once for all, and forgot them. So open was his mind to the influence of the pathetic, that, like our Richard Bentley, he could not peruse a tender passage in his favourite poets without tears.

In his conversation there was a singular charm,—wisdom was so set off by wit, and profound learning poured forth with so little pedantry; anecdotes and characteristic sketches of the many eminent men, with whom his long literary career had brought him in contact, succeeded each other so amusingly, and with so little appearance of egotism, that it had equal attractions for the learned and unlearned. With none was Wolff a greater favourite in society than with the ladies, with whom he could intirely abandon the dictatorial and Johnsonian style into which, in argument with the other sex, he was not unfrequently betrayed. Of irony, he had a wonderful command, and when provoked by any appearance of pretension or affectation, he used it unsparingly. He had less of the intellectual gladiator about him, however, than the Doctor; he did not throw down the gauntlet to all comers, though, when once embarked in debate, their conversation had many features in common.

His household arrangements, with a great pretension to order, seem to have been confusion worse confounded. Knowing the peculiarity of his own habits and dispositions, he entertained a great dislike to "clever servants;" his object always was to secure some quiet, good-natured creature, who would be as much as possible an automaton in his hands, and live, move, and have his being exactly as the professor choose to direct.

Wolff had the greatest aversion to being kept waiting, and had never, probably, kept a coachman waiting five minutes, in his life. He exacted the same punctuality from his unfortunate servant: in the morning he would give him a list of twenty messages to be performed, for each of which a quarter of an hour, or half an hour was allowed, as the case might be; and if, as was occasionally unavoidable, his servant exceeded the time allowed, the professor would pour such a storm about his ears, that with all his liberality he had enough to do to retain a servant in his house.

Of taste, either in matters of dress or ornament, he had not a vestige. He was fond of fine clothes, but never could contrive to dress decently; the furniture of his house was gaudy, but selected without the least regard to propriety, and huddled together as in an upholsterer's ware-room.

Like many other literary men, he was a most irregular correspondent; letters from his correspondents would be occasionally left unanswered for years: his own, when he did write any, are generally distinguished by wit, and a careless felicity of expression.

As a teacher, we have already said, he was active and conscientious in the highest degree; and few seem to have so thoroughly possessed the art of conciliating affection united with respect. He had the satisfaction of witnessing in his lifetime the most gratifying results of these exertions, in the progress and high character of many who had derived their instruction from him, and drawn their inspiration from his example. "I enjoy," he writes in a blank leaf of his journal, on one of his last birth-days, "a good fortune, which falls to the lot of few, that of seeing, while alive, the promise of a plentiful harvest from the seed I had sown with toil, and of calculating, in some measure, its increase when I am no more."

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

LXV.—A TALE OF OLD ITALIAN REVENGE.

[This is from our old friend 'Camerarius' (see Nos. 26—29); and is full of frightful truth. We behold the horrible human relics (taken for bats!) blackening on the city gate. There are no such sights now in Italy, thanks to the progress of knowledge and Christian feeling; and we shall not be too hasty to triumph over "Italian" stories of revenge, when we call to mind, that spectacles not very dissimilar (more horrible in one respect, because they had faces) were to be seen, not a great many years ago, over Temple Bar and one of the bridges. And even against stories of modern Italian assassination may be set off too many appalling things in our daily newspapers. But then more of them transpire now than they used to do, owing to those channels of publicity. We are all getting on, thank God, generally speaking, in knowledge and humanity, the whole civilized world,—ay; and the uncivilized; and we should desire and love to get on, all together,—nobody lording it or valuing himself over another. English, Italians, French, &c., will, we verily believe, before many years are past, be like all one great intelligent family, acknowledging the same guidance of public opinion, and interchanging all the blessings of advancement.]

One day (says our honest and earnest old scholar) as I went from Rome with my companion, and past through the Marquis of Ancone; we were to go through a citie called Terni, seated in a very pleasant and fruitfull valley, between the arms of a river called the Mar. As we entered into the citie, we saw over the gate a certaine tablet upon a high tower, to which were tied (as it seemed to us at first), a great many Bats or Reere-mise. Wee thinking it a strange sight, and not knowing what it meant, being set vp in so eminent a place; one of the citie whom we asked, told us of a certaine thing that had hapned some years before. There were (quoth he) in this citie, two noble, rich, and mightie houses; which for a very long time carried on an irreconcilable hatred the one against the other, in so much as the malice passed from the father to the son, as it were by inheritance; by occasion whereof many of both houses were slain and murdered. At last, the one house not able to stay the fire of their violent wrath, resolved to stand about murdering no more of the aduerse by surprise and treason, but to run upon them all at once, and not to leave one bodie thereof alive. They of this bloodie familie gathered together out of the countrie adjoining (vnder some other pretence) many of their seruants which met in the citie, whereof they ioyned them to their Bravos (which are swaggerers, assassins, and hacksters, such as many Italians that haue quarrels, keep in pay, to employ them in the execution of their reuenges) and secretly armed them employing them to be always readie to do some notable exploit whensoever they should be called upon. Soon after taking hold of occasion, they march about midnight with their people to the Gouvernour's house, who mistrusted nothing, secure of his person, being a man of authoritie and power, and (leaving guards in the same house until they should haue executed their purpose) goe on silent towards the house of their enemies, and disposing their troops at euery street end, about ten of them goe on to the same house (the Gouvernour being between them) as if they had been the archers of his guard, whom they compelled to command that speedy opening might be made him, as if he had some seruice of importance to dispatch within their house: and withal they held a pofnyard at his throat, threatening to kill him if they said not that which they had put into his mouth. He amazed at the death which he saw present before his eyes, caused all the doors to be opened, a thing which they within made no refusal of, seeing the Gouvernour there: which being done, those ten cast their complices, not farre off, put the Gouvernour into safe keeping, enter into the house, and there most cruelly murder man, woman, and child, nay, they spare not so much as the horses in the stable. That done, they make the Gouvernour set open the city gates, and so depart, and disperse themselves into diuers secret places, here and there, among their friends. The wisest of them fled to the next sea-ports, and got them away far off: but as for those that kept anything neere, they were so diligently searcht for, that they were found and drawn out of their holes by the justices, greatly mooued (as good cause there was) with such a horrible massacre: so these wicked offenders were put to death with the most greivous punishments, and after, their hands and their feet being cut off, were nailed to the tablet which you saw (quoth he) as ye entered the gate, on the top of the tower, set up for a show to terrifie the cruel, and to serue for a lesson to posteritie: the sun having broiled those limbs so fastened and set up, maketh travellers to think (that know nothing of this horrible tragedie) that they be Reere-mise. Wee hauing heard this pitiful discourse; with detestation of such a furious and cruel desire of reuenge, kept on our way.

CHARACTERS OF SHAKESPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

NO. XIII.—ROMEO AND JULIET.

'ROMEO AND JULIET' is the only tragedy which Shakspeare has written intirely on a love-story. It is supposed to have been his first play, and it deserves to stand in that proud rank. There is the buoyant spirit of youth in every line, in the rapturous intoxication of hope, and in the bitterness of despair. It has been said of 'Romeo and Juliet,' by a great critic, that "whatever is most intoxicating in the odour of a southern spring, languishing in the song of the nightingale, or voluptuous in the first opening of the rose, is to be found in this poem." The description is true; and yet it does not answer to our idea of the play. For if it has the sweetness of the rose, it has its freshness too; if it has the languor of the nightingale's song, it has also its giddy transport; if it has the softness of a southern spring, it is as glowing and as bright. There is nothing of a sickly and sentimental cast. Romeo and Juliet are in love, but they are not love-sick. Everything speaks the very soul of pleasure, the high and healthy pulse of the passions: the heart beats, the blood circulates and mantles throughout. Their courtship is not an insipid interchange of sentiments lip-deep, learnt at second-hand from poems and plays,—made up of beauties of the most shadowy kind, of "fancies wan that hang the pensive head," of evanescent smiles and sighs that breathe not, of delicacy that shrinks from the touch, and feebleness that scarce supports itself, an elaborate vacuity of thought, and an artificial dearth of sense, spirit, truth and nature! It is the reverse of all this. It is Shakspeare all over, and Shakspeare when he was young.

We have heard it objected to 'Romeo and Juliet,' that it has founded on an idle passion between a boy and a girl, who have scarcely seen and can have but little sympathy or rational esteem for one another, who have had no experience of the good or ill of life, and whose raptures or despair must be therefore equally groundless and fantastical. Whoever objects to the youth of the parties in this play as "too-unripe and crude" to pluck the sweets of love, and wishes to see a first-love carried on into a good old age, and the passions taken at the rebound, when their force is spent, may find all this done in the 'Stranger,' and in other German plays, where they do things by contraries, and transpose nature to inspire sentiment and create philosophy. Shakspeare proceeded in a more straight-forward, and, we think, effectual way. He did not endeavour to extract beauty from wrinkles, or the wild throbb of passion from the last expiring sigh of indifference. He did not "gather grapes of thorns nor figs of thistles." It was not his way. But he has given a picture of human life, such as it is in the order of nature. He has founded the passion of the two lovers not on the pleasures they had experienced, but on all the pleasures they had not experienced. All that was to come of life was theirs. At that untried source of promised happiness they slaked their thirst, and the first eager draught made them drunk with love and joy. They were in full possession of their senses and their affections. Their hopes were of air, their desires of fire. Youth is the season of love, because the heart is then first melted in tenderness from the touch of novelty, and kindled to rapture, for it knows no end of its enjoyments or its wishes. Desire has no limit but itself. Passion, the love and expectation of pleasure, is infinite, extravagant, inexhaustible, till experience comes to kill and check it. Juliet exclaims on her first interview with Romeo—

"My bounty is as boundless as the sea,
My love as deep."

And why should it not? What was to hinder the thrilling tide of pleasure, which had just gushed from her heart, from flowing on without stint or measure, but experience which she was yet without? What was to abate the transport of the first sweet sense of pleasure, which her heart and her senses had just tasted, but indifference which she was yet a stranger to? What was there to check the ardour of hope, of faith, of constancy, just rising in her breast, but disappointment which she had not yet felt? As are the desires and the hopes of youthful passion, such is the keenness of its disappointments, and their baleful effect. Such is the transition in this play from the highest bliss to the lowest despair, from the nuptial couch to an untimely grave. The only evil that even in apprehension befalls the two lovers is the loss of the greatest possible felicity; yet this loss is fatal to both, for they had rather part with life than bear the thought of surviving all that had made life dear to them. In all this, Shakspeare has but followed nature, which existed in his time, as well as now. The modern philosophy, which reduces the whole theory of the mind to habitual impressions, and leaves the natural impulses of passion and imagination out of the account, had not then been discovered; or if it had, would have been little calculated for the uses of poetry.

It is the inadequacy of the same false system of philosophy to account for the strength of our earliest attachments, which has led Mr Wordsworth to indulge in the mystical visions of Platonism in his 'Ode on the Progress of Life.' He has very admirably described the vividness of our impressions in youth and childhood, and how "they fade by degrees into the light of common day," and he ascribes the change to the supposition of a pre-existent state, as if our early thoughts were nearer heaven, reflections of former trails of glory, shadows of our past being. This is idle. It is not from the knowledge of the past that the first impressions of things derive their gloss and splendour, but from our ignorance of the future, which fills the void to come with the warmth of our desires, with our gayest hopes, and brightest fancies. It is the obscurity spread before it that colours the prospect of life with hope, as it is the cloud which reflects the rainbow. There is no occasion to resort to any mystical union and transmission of feeling through different states of being to account for the romantic enthusiasm of youth; nor to plant the root of hope in the grave, nor to derive it from the skies. Its root is in the heart of man: it lifts its head above the stars. Desire and imagination are inmates of the human breast. The heaven "that lies about us in our infancy" is only a new world, of which we know nothing but what we wish it to be, and believe all that we wish. In youth and boyhood, the world we live in is the world of desire, and of fancy: it is experience that brings us down to the world of reality. What is it that in youth sheds a dewy light round the evening star? That makes the daisy look so bright? That perfumes the hyacinth? That embalms the first kiss of love? It is the delight of novelty, and the seeing no end to the pleasure that we fondly believe is still in store for us. The heart revels in the luxury of its own thoughts, and is unable to sustain the weight of hope and love that presses upon it.—The effects of the passion of love alone might have dissipated Mr Wordsworth's theory, if he means anything more by it than an ingenious and poetical allegory. That at least is not a link in the chain let down from other worlds; "the purple light of love" is not a dim reflection of the smiles of celestial bliss. It does not appear till the middle of life, and then seems like "another morn risen on mid-day." In this respect the soul comes into the world "in utter nakedness." Love waits for the ripening of the youthful blood. The sense of pleasure precedes the love of pleasure, but with the sense of pleasure, as soon as it is felt, come thronging infinite desires and hopes of pleasure, and love is mature as soon as born. It withers and it dies almost as soon!

This play presents a beautiful coup-d'œil of the progress of human life. In thought it occupies years, and embraces the circle of the affections from childhood to old age. Juliet has become a great girl, a young woman since we first remember her a little thing in the idle prattle of the nurse. Lady Capulet was about her age when she became a mother, and old Capulet somewhat impatiently tells his younger visitors,—

"I've seen the day,

That I have worn a visor, and could tell

"A whispering tale in a fair lady's ear,

Such as would please; 'tis gone, 'tis gone, 'tis gone."

Thus one period of life makes way for the following, and one generation pushes another off the stage. One of the most striking passages to show the intense feeling of youth in this play is Capulet's invitation to Paris to visit his entertainment.

"At my poor house, look to behold this night
Earth-treading stars that make dark heav'n light;
Such comfort as do lusty young men feel
When well-apparell'd April on the heel
Of limping winter treads, even such delight
Among fresh female-buds shall you this night
Inherit at my house."

The feelings of youth and of the spring are here blended together like the breath of opening flowers. Images of vernal beauty appear to have floated before the author's mind, in writing this poem, in profusion. Here is another of exquisite beauty, brought in more by accident than by necessity. Montague declares of his son smit with a hopeless passion, which he will not reveal—

"But he, his own affection's counsellor,
Is to himself so secret and so close,
So far from sounding and discovery,
As is the bud bit with an envious worm,
Ere he can spread his sweet-leaves to the air,
Or dedicate his beauty to the sun."

This casual description is as full of passionate beauty as when Romeo dwells in frantic fondness on "the white wonder of his Juliet's hand." The Reader may, if he pleases, contrast the exquisite pastoral simplicity of the above lines with the gorgeous description of Juliet when Romeo first sees her at her father's house, surrounded by company and artificial splendour.

"What lady's that which doth enrich the hand
Of yonder knight?
O she doth teach the torches to burn bright;
Her beauty hangs upon the cheek of night,
Like a rich jewel in an Æthiop's ear."

TRUE IDEA OF POETRY.

Poetry were it the rudest, so it be sincere, is the attempt which man makes to render his existence harmonious, the utmost he can do for that end; it springs, therefore, from his whole feelings, opinions, activity, and takes its character from these. It may be called the music of his whole manner of being; and, historically considered, is the best test how far music or freedom existed therein; how far the feeling of love, of beauty, and dignity, could be elicited from that peculiar situation of his, and from the views he there had of life and nature, of the universe internal and external.—Thomas Carlyle.

PORTRAITS FROM LIFE, BY GÖTTE.

LET me pay due homage to several respectable individuals to whom I was under great obligations. I will begin with M. Oelenschlager, of the family of Frauenstein, a senator, and son-in-law to Dr Orth, whom I have already mentioned. This gentleman, in his grand costume of burgomaster, might have passed for one of the principal French prelates. Business and travel had made him a remarkable character. He showed some esteem for me, and willingly conversed with me on the subjects which interested him. I was privy to the composition of his explanation of the Golden Bull. He had the goodness to make me sensible of the object and importance of this celebrated document. I had so familiarized myself with the rude and troubled times which had provoked it, that I could not refrain from representing the character and facts with which my friend entertained me, by imitating the tone and gestures of these men of other times, as if we had had them before our eyes. This pantomime afforded him great amusement, and he was fond of making me repeat it.

I had from infancy accustomed myself to the singular habit of learning by heart the tables of contents prefixed to the chapters and commencements of the books I read. I had adopted this method with the 'Pentateuch,' the 'Æneid,' and the 'Metamorphoses.' I continued it with the 'Golden Bull'; and my good friend Oelenschlager laughed heartily, when I unexpectedly called out in a very grave tone—"Omne regnum in se divinum desolabitur: nam principes ejus facti sunt socii furum!"—"Every kingdom divided against itself shall be brought to desolation; for the princes thereof are become the associates of robbers." The worthy Oelenschlager, shaking his head, said, in a significant manner—"What sort of times, then, were those in which the emperor thundered such expressions in the ears of the princes of the empire in a solemn diet?"

He saw little company, although his manners were highly agreeable, and he took great pleasure in lively conversation. He would now and then get us to perform a dramatic piece. This was considered an useful exercise for youth. We played Schlegel's 'Cæsar,' and afterwards ventured on 'Britannicus,' both so perfect ourselves in the French language and to practise declamation. I played Nero, and my sister Agrippina. We were applauded far beyond our deserts; but we thought we received less praise than we merited.

I used also to visit Mr Reineck, a gentleman of a very ancient noble family. He was a thin man, of a brown complexion; of the most upright character, and firm to a degree that often amounted to obstinacy. Never did I see him laugh. He had suffered a severe affliction, his daughter having eloped with a friend of the family. He commenced a prosecution against his son-in-law, which he continued with great animosity; but the tardy formalities of the tribunals affording him no hopes of a speedy vengeance, or one agreeable to his wishes, he attacked his son-in-law personally, which measure produced action after action. From that time he kept himself shut up in his house and garden. He inhabited a spacious but dismal ground-floor, which for many years had neither been painted nor, perhaps, cleaned. He seemed to place some confidence in me, and recommended his youngest son to my attention. His oldest friends, who knew how to accommodate themselves to his situation, his agents, and his counsellor, often dined with him. He never failed to invite me to these entertainments. The diners were good; the wine still better; but a dilapidated stove, which emitted smoke on every side through its crevices, annoyed the guests excessively. One of Mr Reineck's best friends ventured one day to mention it to him, asking him how he could endure so great an inconvenience all the winter. "Would to God," replied he, "that that were the greatest inconvenience that I have to put up with." It was long before he could be prevailed upon to see his daughter and grandson. His son-in-law never durst appear before him.

My company had a favourable effect on this worthy and unfortunate man. When in conversation he imparted to me his information respecting the world and political affairs, he seemed to forget his troubles. The few friends who used to meet at his house employed me when they wished to divert his mind from his sorrows. We prevailed on him to take a walk with us occasionally. He seemed to take pleasure in viewing once more the fields which he had not entered for many years. He talked to us about the old proprietors of them, his neighbours, related their histories, and described their characters. His judgments were always severe, but there was much wit and pleasantry in his narratives. We made some attempts to induce him to return to the society of men, but were always unsuccessful.

Another person, nearly of the same age, whom I often saw at this period, was a Mr Malapart, a wealthy man, who possessed a very handsome house in the horse market, and derived a good revenue from his salt-works. He also lived in seclusion, passing the summer at his garden, near the Bockenheim gate, where he cultivated very fine tulips.

Mr Reineck was also an amateur. Flowers were new in season. We formed a plan for bringing them together, and, after having gradually paved the way for the interview, we one day took Mr Reineck to Mr Malapart's garden. The two old gentlemen bowed to each other, and the company walked up and down, between the beds of tulips, with true diplomatic gravity. The flowers were really superb: their various forms and colours, the superiority of some to others, and the rarity of several sorts, furnished matter for the conversation, which took a very friendly turn. This gave us the more pleasure, as we perceived, in an adjacent harbour, several flag-gons of old Rhenish wine set out on a table. Unfortunately, Mr Reineck observed a very fine tulip, the head of which hung down a little; he took hold of the stalk very carefully and raised the flower, in order to examine it more minutely. But, gently as he touched it, the owner was displeased. Mr Malapart, politely, but with a determined air, and as if congratulating himself on his habitual reserve, reminded him of oculis, non manibus. ("Eyes, not hands.") Reineck had already let go the flower. At these words the colour came into his cheeks, and he replied, in his usual dry, grave tone, that amateurs and connoisseurs might freely examine any flower, with proper precautions, and upon this he again took hold of the flower. The mutual friends were embarrassed. They started several subjects of conversation, but unsuccessfully. The two old gentlemen appeared to be struck mute. We dreaded every moment that Reineck would touch the flowers again. To prevent his doing so, we took them each apart, and soon put an end to the visit, thus turning our backs on the well-furnished table which we had viewed with longing eyes, but had not been able to approach.

The privy councillor, Huisgen, was another of the friends I used to visit. He was not a Frankfort man, and he professed the reformed religion; two obstacles which hindered him from holding any public employment, and even from exercising the functions of an advocate. He, nevertheless, practised under the signature of another person, at Frankfort, and in the courts of the empire; his reputation as an excellent lawyer procured him many clients. He was then sixty years of age. I used to go to his house to take lessons in writing with his son. Mr Huisgen had a very long face, although he was not thin. Disfigured by the small-pox and the loss of an eye, he appeared frightful at the first glance. His bald head was surmounted by a white cap, tied at the top with a riband; he always wore very handsome damask or calamanco robes de chambre. He inhabited a small apartment on the ground floor, the neatness of which was as perfect as the serenity of his temper. It was a treat to see the perfect order of his papers, his books, and his geographical maps. It was not long before I discovered that he was at variance, not only with the world, but with heaven also. His favourite book was Agrippa's work, 'De Vanitate Scientiarum.' He advised me to read it. This book unsettled my ideas for some time. In the peaceful happiness of youth, I was inclined to a kind of optimism. I had reconciled myself to heaven, or rather to the divinity. The experience I had already gained had taught me that good and evil are often balanced. I had seen that it was possible to avoid misfortune, and escape the greatest danger. I looked with indulgence on the actions and passions of men; and what my aged Mentor observed with disapprobation, often appeared to me to merit the highest encomiums. One day, when I had launched forth in praise of the divine perfections, he bent the brow of the eye he had lost, gave me a piercing look with the other, and said, in a nasal tone, "Do you know that I see defects even in the Deity?" I never met any person at his residence, and, during ten years, I do not think I ever saw him go out but once.

My conversations with these remarkable men were not fruitless. Each of them influenced me according to his peculiar manners. I listened to them with more attention than is commonly paid by children. Each of them endeavoured to bend me to his views, as a dear son, and to revive his own moral physiognomy in me. Oelenschlager wanted to make a courtier of me; Reineck, a diplomatist; both, and the latter particularly, endeavoured to persuade me from poetry and my passion for writing. Huisgen endeavoured to convert me into a misanthrope, like himself, and at the same time persuading me to endeavour to become an able lawyer. According to him, jurisprudence was a science which it was necessary to acquire, in order to be able to make use of the laws as a protection against the injustice of mankind, and in defence of the oppressed.—Life of Goethe.

FINE ARTS.

British Institution.

(Concluding Notice.)

ONE of the most striking pictures in the rooms is by an artist whose name, (J. R. Herbert,) is new to us, and therefore we suppose him to be young; we mean, 'The appointed hour, a subject from a Venetian MS.' (418). A young girl, summoned by her lover's lute, is descending the steps of a palace; at their foot is the young man, finely formed, gaily dressed, just now so gallant and so living, now thrown down, emptied of his ruddy life by an assassin, who is making off in the distance. The happy, affectionate face of the girl, (which, by the way, is an English one) who has known no doubt of happiness, is in awful contrast to the early coming experience of our most dreaded evil in its most dreaded shape. Calcott deals much in figures this time; his 'Girl dressed for the Vintage' is very pretty; 'Falstaff' is excellent; but the best is 'Dutch Peasants coming to meet the return of the Fishing Boats.' The grey horse, but for a degree of coldness in the colour, might be taken for one of Cuy's; there is the same appearance of life, the same placidity and mildness as in the animals of the Dutch artist. The effect of the shadows of clouds fleeting over the low land in the back-ground is very true to nature, and gives a motion and vitality to the elements in the picture, such as landscapes are too apt to be deficient in. 'Robinson Crusoe instructing his man Friday' (371), by A. Fraser, is very elaborately studied, and painted with considerable skill and power. The still life is unexceptionable; the bird (macaw, viz a parrot), is a fine piece of colour. Friday is well drawn; but looks too much like a set model; this, in fact, is the general fault of the picture; too obvious an appearance of studied effect, and laboured design. Crusoe's face is a blank in the picture. Defoe has left us no portrait of his friend Robinson; but the patient, brave, enterprising, energetic lord of the solitary island must have had some outward sign of the enthusiasm and hopeful courage within him, and marks of mental and bodily suffering besides.

Lance has some fruit, and much of it as wonderful in crisp and glowing beauty as ever; but the back-ground to one of the pictures is a grievous drawback upon the beauty of the rest. Mr Lance paints fruit so well, that we should be content to relinquish figures, which he cannot paint at all. The attempt at imitating a reflected ray of light in the silver cup, we cannot but think a failure; though in a more front light it might show better. Mr M'Clise's picture of 'Salvator Rosa and his Patron' (138) is richly coloured, and carefully studied; the old patron is excellent; but we cannot fancy Salvator to have been quite so sleek a dandy: affected we can imagine him to have been in his dress, but after a more romantic and picturesque fashion, with more gravity, and a frown as well as a smile in his face. 'Trouville Fishing-smack entering the Port of Havre de Grace,' (490) Edward Cooke, is a capital bit of nautical life; very pleasantly coloured, as real as a Dutch picture, and as crisp and fresh as the sea breeze; the sea water is curling, heaving, and hissing, in every part; clear and ever restless. Hilton's 'Editha and the Monks searching for the body of Harold' (473) we do not reckon among his best performances. The drawing is learned, and the grouping good; the heads of the monks are solid and finely painted; but Editha is strangely coloured, and appears rather repelled by the physical horror, than drawn to her friend's relics by affection, which is stronger than all things. The drawing is very skilful and bold; we particularly admire the foreshortening of Harold's figure, and the fall of the flesh below the breast-bone and margin of the ribs.

Gallery of Portraits. Part XXXV.

LOCKE's anxious face is the first that meets us. It is very excellently engraved, by Possetwhite. Selden is next, grave and judicious; but with less power about the eyes than we should expect. The very benign and pleasant face of Ambroise Paré, the father of French surgery, concludes the series. The expression is one proper to a medical man,—staid, therefore imparting confidence, good-humoured and cheerful, therefore diffusing hope and comfort in the sick room.

TABLE TALK.

—We are sorry to see by the newspapers, that Mr Rogers has been robbed of plate by his footman, to the amount of two thousand pounds. But what a beautiful calamity for a poet! to be able to lose two thousand pounds!

TRUTH AND FALSEHOOD.

Truth, it is said, ought not to be spoken at all times. But there is a dangerous ambiguity in the aphorism, and hence it is often employed to a pernicious purpose. It has two senses, one a bad, the other a good one. "Falsehood ought sometimes to be spoken,"—this is the bad and perilous sense. Cases there are in which truth ought not to be spoken. What, then, ought to be spoken? Falsehood? No! nothing at all. That is the good sense. And this is the sense in which only it should be employed as an aphorism by the moralist.—Bentham's Deontology.

MR BOWLES AND HIS NEW WORK.

We are glad to see that the Rev. William Lisle Bowles is about to favour the lovers of antiquity with 'Annals of Lacock Abbey in the county of Wilts, including Memorials of its foundress, Ela, Countess of Salisbury, and the Earls of the Houses of Salisbury and Longespé.' Antiquarianism is welcome to us from almost any hand; but when a poet touches the old walls, he dresses them with double grace, as time does with moss. If we are not mistaken, it was a clergyman who wrote the novel of 'Longsword, Earl of Salisbury;' but we forget who;—a man we believe, of some note. We suppose Mr Bowles will tell us about him in his book. We happen, by an unfortunate and singular chance, to be less acquainted with Mr Bowles's writings than those of almost any other living poet; and fear we may have done him, as well as others, an injustice of omission on some occasions. But he, who has been praised by Coleridge, may dispense with minor commendation.

"CONVERSATION SHARP."

The gentleman known among his friends by this honourable title, owing to his colloquial powers, and whose name has become familiar with our Readers in consequence of our extracts from his terse and instructive Essays, lately published, has just died at an inn in the country, apparently while on a journey, but not without friends about him whom he valued. A happy death, and at a good age; for Mr Sharp must have been old.

SALUTARY EARLY OCCUPATION.

My father had early accustomed me to act as his factotum. He particularly employed me in quickening the diligence of the artists or workmen he employed. He paid well, and required everything to be finished and delivered on the day fixed. This superintendence gave me an opportunity of getting some knowledge of most arts and trades; it likewise afforded me the means of gratifying my innate propensity to identify myself with the feelings and notions of others; and to interest myself in everything that constitutes a mode of existence. I derived many agreeable hours from this kind of study, learning to judge of every condition of life, and to estimate the pleasures and pains, the difficulties and enjoyments which each of them presented.—Goethe's Life.

PICTURES IN SCHOOLS.

We should early accustom the child to beauty. The Scuola di San Rocco, at Venice, possesses one of the best of Tintoretto's pictures. I would, though it is a vain wish, that the walls of the dining-hall could be adorned with the finest pictures of the greatest masters, consecrated to great men; and those of the school-room with others, or subjects connected with science and the arts, as the 'School of Athens' by Raphael, &c. Fine paintings are but a portion of the furniture of a rich man's house;—here they would form a part of the child's education, and no small one. With models of a high beauty before them, our children would soon outgrow that love for glaring ornament and tinsel magnificence natural to their age, and which we carry with us to our graves. They would acquire pure and simple tastes, and the oftener you presented to their view, and drew their attention to, all that is grand in nature and in art, the more deeply would you impress their souls with the sense of beauty, which, growing with their other powers, would at length become a living and creative principle within them, and would find itself in, and diffuse itself over, their whole being.—Outline of a System of National Education. [The wish, perhaps, is "vain," for the "finest pictures of the greatest masters;" but a good copy, even of a single one, would be a god-send; only it would require an instructor with taste enough himself to explain and impress it. And herein lies the chief difficulty; for even engravings might furnish the rest. Schoolmasters thus capable, are no doubt to be found; and others, who might acquire the capability; but a crop of good schoolmasters is the first great desideratum (as Mr Simpson has shown) towards producing the harvest of good generations. These however will be found, as the taste for rural beauty is diffused, and creates a demand.]

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

THE extracts from the notice of Mr Lamb are unavoidably postponed to next week.

If the writer of 'Hints for Table Talk' will have the goodness to send to the Publisher's, he will find a letter for him.

We are obliged to J. S., and will pay due attention to his request.

The question respecting Milton's 'Latin and Italian Poems,' which is asked us by C. D. shall be noticed more fully by and by. Meantime he is informed, that translations of them, by Cowper, are to be found in the edition published by Hayley, and styled by him 'Cowper's Milton.'

D. G. has obliged us. Also, A. Z.—'Charles the Eleventh's Vision,' in our next.

ADOLESCENTS will be considered, and L. W. W.

MR LANDOR'S ODE TO A FRIEND.

ITALY AND FIESOLE.—LATIN VERSION OF A SONG
BY WITHERS.—LATIN EPIGRAM BY MR WEBBE.

AN accident, much against our will, prevents us, after all, from doing little more than barely introducing the new and improved edition of Mr Landor's ode, and one or two other favours of classical Correspondents. We thought to have had a chat with the Reader upon Italy, and the "pastoral oat," and Greek and Latin anthologies, but many things, alas! fall out between editorial cups and lips, as well as others; and we must not complain, seeing that not only the love of poetry, but love itself, has its interruptions in this life. Let us be grateful that the love exists.

"Ere I could

Give him that parting kiss which I had set
Betwixt too charming words, comes in my father,
And, like the tyrannous breathing of the north,
Shakes all our buds from blowing."

What an exquisite passage! What force and sweetness! And by the by, what were those "too charming words," between which the kiss was to be set?—a pretty subject for guessing,—and a trial for the refinements of our Readers. For our parts, we have our opinion; but shall not tell it, for fear of spoiling conjecture.

Mr Landor's rifacimento of his ode (re-modelling—there wants a word in English for this process) is as much superior to the former one in strength and richness (contrary to the usual fate of such "improvements") as it is greater in quantity. He has taken a picture, already good, and made it still better, enriching it with every passage of his brush. The critical Reader, who possesses the original copy (see LONDON JOURNAL, No. 36, page 282) will be interested in comparing the two. Mr Landor has the good fortune to live in a spot worthy of a scholar and poet, amidst the Fiesolan hills of Milton, Dante, Boccaccio, Michael Angelo, and Macchiavelli,—with the little river Affrico at his feet (the subject of one of Boccaccio's poems), and immortal memories all round him. The brilliant company of the Decameron retired there to relate their stories; and there, at Maiano, echoes the humbler but pleasant voice of La Tancia (the pastoral comedy of Michael Angelo the younger, nephew of the great artist), and Redi's Bacchus has left traces of his purple fingers.

"Fiesole viva; e seco viva il nome Del buon Salviati, ed il suo bel Maiano."

BACCO IN TOSCANA.

"Long live Fiesole, green old name!
And with it, long life to thy winy fame,
Lovely Maiano, lord of dells,
Where my gentle Salviati dwells."

Bacchus has the remains of an ancient temple at Fiesole; and the wine of Maiano (the select wine, such as Mr Landor speaks of, kept for the lord of the vintage) is the best we ever drank. We translated Redi's 'Bacchus in Tuscany,' on the spot (the Reader will forgive us for mentioning this); and there we have walked with Mr Landor himself, he carrying up hill in his arms, like a proper nature-loving poet, one of our boys who had got tired, and turning on him a face which always brightens at the sight of children. (This reminds us that next week we must give a poem of his, addressed to his own children, whom he loves with all the zeal of a father and the hilarity of a playmate.) He has done us the honour of bringing us into his new ode, and wishing we were at Maiano again. Would to God we were,—for the season—and corresponding with the Readers of the LONDON JOURNAL. We would write them such letters (inspired by the wine and the company), as should make them all rise up in a body, and say "Let us go and join them." But—What a word is this but in human life—and how it butteth our proceedings, and will not let them move on. We have invitations to Norfolk, invitations to Yorkshire (thanks to W. W. and his hearty memory); invitations to Northumberland from one of the men we love best in the world (A. D.), and here we have an invitation to Italy from the author of Fiesolan Idylls and the 'Examination of Shakspeare,' and not one of them can we accept. However, there are buts to oppose sorrow with, as well as joy; some of these invitations we shall certainly realize, if we live, and the Reader, we hope, shall hear the result; for, like our friends the Gipsies, we always travel in a body of some sort, personal or ideal. Meanwhile we must live in odes and books, and help to brighten "grim London,"—where no Reader or Writer of the LONDON JOURNAL (be it known to Mr Landor) groweth, but, on the contrary, maketh the best of things, and seeth Landorian visions of Pan and the Nymphs, and 'Examinations of Shakspeare.' Item, let us intimate to him, in (we hope) the complimentary candour of our gratitude, that the "Scotch Critics" alluded to in his ode, have matured the sourness of their young criticism into sweetness, like other wise men, and have no quarrel now with the illustrious Muse of the Lakes. What a beautiful line, by the way, is that concluding one of Mr Landor's fifth stanza—

"Serene creators of immortal things."

We seem to behold them sitting in the air of immortality, contemplating their works,—or "re-volving their orb'd thoughts," as the writer of 'Arthur Coningsby' finely phrases it.

Mr Landor's ode is followed by an elegant Latin version of George Wither's good old song, with which a valued Correspondent has favoured us, and which Mr Landor himself will not be sorry to read. And after this comes a Latin epigram from the accomplished pen of our friend Egerton Webbe, of which some of our scholarly Readers will perhaps favour their less fortunate brethren of taste with a translation. We give it untranslated, purposely for their amusement to that end.

"TO JOSEPH ABLETT, ESQRE. OF LLANEDRA HALL, DENBIGHSHIRE.

I.

Lord of the Celtick dells,
Where Clewyd listens as his minstrel tells
Of Arthur, or Pendragon, or perchance
The plumes of flashy France,
Or, in dark region far across the main,
Far as Grenada in the world of Spain,

II.

Warriors untold to Saxon ear,
Until their steel-clad spirits re-appear;—
How happy were the hours that held
Thy friend (long absent from his native home),
Amid thy scenes with thee! how wide a field
From all past cares, and all to come!

III.

What hath Ambition's feverish grasp, what hath Inconstant Fortune, panting Hope;
What Genius, that should cope
With the heart-whispers in that path
Winding so idly, where the idler stream
Flings at the white-hair'd poplars gleam for gleam?

IV.

Ablett, of all the days
My sixty summers ever knew,
Pleasant as there have been no few,
Memory not one surveys
Like those we spent together. Wisely spent
Are they alone, that leave the soul content.

V.

Together we have visited the men,
Whose Scottish critics vainly we'd have drown'd;
Ah, shall we ever clasp the hand again
That gave the British harp its truest sound?
Live Derwent's guest, and thou by Grasmere
springs!
Serene creators of immortal things.

VI.

And live, too, thou for happier days,
Whom Dryden's force and Spenser's lays
Have heart and soul possest:
Growl in grim London, he who will;
Revisit thou Maiano's hill,
And swell with pride his sunburnt breast.

VII.

Old Redi in his easy chair,
With varied chant awaits thee here,
And here are voices in the grove,
Aside my house, that make me think Bacchus is coming down to drink
To Ariadne's love.

VIII.

But whither am I borne away
From thee, to whom began my lay?
Courage! I am not yet quite lost;
I stept aside to greet my friends;
Believe me, soon the greeting ends,
I know but three or four at most.

IX.

Deem not that time hath borne too hard
Upon the fortunes of thy bard,
Leaving me only three or four:
'Tis my old number; dost thou start
At such a tale? in what man's heart
Is there fireside for more?

X.

I never courted friends or Fame;
She pouted at me long, at last she came,
And threw her arms around my neck and said,
"Take what hath been for years delay'd,
And fear not that the leaves will fall
One hour the earlier from thy coronal."

XI.

Ablett! thou knowest with what even hand
I waved away the offer'd seat
Among the clambering, clattering, stilted great,
The rulers of our land;
Nor crowds, nor kings can lift me up,
Nor sweeten Pleasure's purer cup.

XII.

Thou knowest how, and why, are dear to me
My citron groves of Fiesole;
My chirping Affrico; my beechwood nook;
My Naiads, with feet only in the brook,
Which runs away and giggles in their faces;
Yet there they sit, nor sigh for other places.

XIII.

'Tis not Pelasgian wall,
By him made sacred whom alone
'Twere not profane to call
The bard divine, nor (thrown Far under me), Valdarno, nor the crest
Of Vallombrosa in the crimson east.

XIV.

Here can I rest or roam at will;
Few trouble me, few wish me ill,
Few come across me, few too near;
Here all my wishes make their stand;
Here ask I no one's voice or hand;—
Scornful of favour, ignorant of fear.

XV.

You vine upon the maple bough
Flouts at the hearty wheat below;
Away her venal wines the wise-man sends,
While those of lower stem he brings
From inmost treasure vault, and sings
Their worth and ear among his chosen friends.

XVI.

Behold our Earth,* most nigh the sun,
Her zone least open to the genial heat,
But, farther off her veins more freely run;
'Tis thus with those who whirl about the Great;—
The nearest shrink and shiver; we remote
May open-breasted blow the pastoral oat.

OLD SONG, BY WITHERS.

Shall I, wastynge in despaire,
Die because a womanne's faire?
Shall my cheekes grow pale with care,
Because another's rosie are?
Be she fairer than the dale,
Or the flowery meades in Maie,
If she thinke not well of me,
What care I how faire she be?

Shall a womanne's goodnesse move
Me to perish for herre love?
Or, her worthie merittes knowne,
Make me quite forgette mine owne?
Be she kinder, meeke, thanne
The turtle dove, or pellicanne,
If she be not soe to me,
What care I how kinde she be?

Be she kinde, or meeke, or faire,
I wille ne'er the more despaire;
If she love me, this believe,
I will die ere she shall grieve;
If she slighte me when I wooe,
I will scorne and let her goe;
If she be not made for me,
What care I for whom she be?

CHARLES THE ELEVENTH'S VISION.*

I, CHARLES the Eleventh, at this day King of Sweden, on the night between the 16th and 17th of December 1676,† was more than usually troubled with my melancholy sickness. I awoke about half-past eleven, when, happening to cast my eyes on the window, I perceived that a strong light was shining in the state-chamber. I said to the Chancellor Bjelke, who was in the room with me, "What light is that in the state-chamber? something must have caught fire." He answered, "O no, your Majesty, it is the light of the moon shining on the window." This answer satisfied me, and I turned toward the wall to enjoy some rest; but an indescribable uneasiness came over me: I turned my face round again, and again saw the light. Then I said, "All can never be right here." "Yes," said my excellent and beloved Chancellor, "it is nothing but the moon." At the same moment, however, the Privy Councillor Bjelke entered, to inquire how I was. I asked this worthy man whether any accident had happened, and there was a fire in the state-chamber. "No," he answered, after a short silence, "God be praised! it is nothing: it is merely the moonlight, which makes it look as if there were a light in the hall." I again felt better satisfied; but, as I cast my eyes that way, it seemed to me that I saw people in it. I got up, threw my nightgown round me, went to the window, and opened it, when I perceived that the hall was quite full of lights. Then I said, "My good Lords, something is not right here. You are duly persuaded that he who fears God must fear nothing in the world. Therefore I will go to the hall to make out what this can be."

Then I desired them to go down to the officer on guard, and beg him to come up with the keys. When he was come, I went with him and them to the locked up secret passage, which led over my room to the right of Gustavus Ericson's bedroom. When we got to it, I ordered the officer to open the door; but out of fear he begged I would have the goodness to excuse him. Then I desired the Chancellor to do so; but he too refused. I desired the Privy Councillor Oxenstiern, who was never afraid of anything, to unlock the door; but he answered, "I have sworn to risk my body and blood for your Majesty, but not to open this door." I now began myself to be somewhat startled, but took courage, laid hold of the keys, and opened the door; when we found the whole room, even the floor, covered with black. I and all who were with me trembled much.

We went next to the door of the state-chamber. I again ordered the officer to open the door; but he begged I would be so good as to excuse him. Then I desired the other bystanders to do so; but they all begged to be let off. So I took the key myself, and opened the door; but I had no sooner set a foot in the hall, than I drew it hastily back. I was somewhat frightened; but I said, "My good friends, if you will follow me, we will see what is the matter here. Perhaps God Almighty may purpose to reveal something to us." They all made answer, with a trembling voice, "Yes." Then we went in.

All of us at the same moment saw a long table, with sixteen noble-looking men sitting round it. Each had a large book before him. Among them was a young King, of sixteen or eighteen, with a crown on his head, and a sceptre in his hand. On his right sat a tall handsome man of about forty, whose face bespoke his worth; on his left an old man of about seventy. It was strange to see the young King every now and then shake his head, whereupon each of these noble personages struck his hand hard on his book.

Then I turned my eyes away from them, and close by the table I saw block after block, and executioners, all with their shirt-sleeves tucked up; and they chopt off one head after another, so that the blood began to stream along the floor. God is my witness that I was more than terrified. I looked down at my slippers, to see whether any blood had touched them; but there was none. The persons beheaded were mostly young noblemen.

I turned my eyes away, and behind the table in a corner I saw a throne, which was almost upset, and by it a man who looked as if he must be the ruler of the state. He was about forty years old. I shuddered and trembled as I drew near the door, and cried aloud, "What is the voice of the Lord that I am to hear? O God, when shall this come to pass?" No answer was made me. I cried again, "O God, when shall this come to pass?" But no answer was made me; only the young King shook his head several times, while the other men smote their books with their hands. Again I cried, louder than before, "O God, when shall this come to pass? Grant me thy grace, great God, and tell me, how must I behave myself then?"

Hereupon the young King answered me, "Not in thy time shall this come to pass, but in the time of the sixth Sovereign after thee. And he shall be of the same age and form that thou seest in me; and he who stands here shows what will be the appearance of his guardian. The throne will be on the point of falling in the last years of his regency by means of certain young noblemen. But the guardian, who during his regency persecuted the young King, will then take up his cause; and they will establish his throne more firmly, so that never before shall there have been so great a King in Sweden, nor shall any like him ever come after him; and the Swedish people shall be happy in his days. And he shall live to a great age; he shall leave his kingdom free from debt, and several millions in the treasury. But, before he can sit safely on his throne, there must be a great slaughter, so that the like thereof has never been seen in Sweden, nor ever will be. Be it thy part, King of Sweden, to leave him thy good counsel."

When he had said this, everything disappeared, and we were left alone with our lights. We went away in the greatest astonishment, as everybody may suppose. When we got to the black room, that too was changed, and everything was as usual. Then we went up to my room, and straightway I sat down to write my counsels in letters as well as I could. [They are sealed up: the seal is broken by King after King; they are read, and sealed up again.]

the forest. A ray of light suddenly broke the line of continuity of this yet smoky barrier; and, as if touched by the enchanter's wand, castles, towers, and trees, were seen in an aggregated cluster, partly obscured by magnificent foliage. Every accession of light produced a change in the chittram, which, from the dense wall that it first exhibited, had now faded into a thin transparent film, broken into a thousand masses, each mass being a huge lens; and at length the too vivid power of the sun dissolved the vision; castles, towers, and foliage, melted like the enchantment of Prospero, into "thin air."

I had long imagined that the nature of the soil had some effect in producing this illusory phenomenon, especially as the chittram of the desert is seen chiefly on those extensive plains productive of the saji, or alkaline plant, whence, by incineration, the natives produce soda, and whose base is now known to be metallic. But I have since observed it on every kind of soil. That these lands, covered with saline incrustations, tend to increase the effect of the illusion, may be concluded. But the difference between the sekrab or chittram, and the see-kote or des-sasur, is, that the latter is never visible but in the cold season, when the gross vapours cannot rise; and that the rarification, which gives existence to the other, destroys this, whenever the sun has attained 20° of elevation. A high wind is alike adverse to the phenomenon, and it will mostly be observed that it covets shelter, and its general appearance is a long line, which is sure to be sustained by some height, such as a grove or village, as if it required support. The first time I observed it was in the Jupoor country; none of the party had ever witnessed it in the British provinces. It appeared like an immense walled town with bastions, nor could we give credit to our guides when they talked of the see-kote, and assured us that the objects were merely "castles in the air." I have since seen, though but once, this panoramic scene in motion, and nothing can possibly be imagined more beautiful.

It was at Kolah, just as the sun rose, whilst walking on the terraced roof of the garden-house, my residence. As I looked towards the low range which bounds the sight to the southeast, the hill appeared in motion, sweeping with an undulating or rotatory movement along the horizon. Trees and buildings were magnified, and all seemed a kind of enchantment. Some minutes elapsed before I could account for this wonder; until I determined that it must be the masses of a floating mirage, which had attained its most attenuated form, and being carried by a gentle current of air past the tops and sides of the hills, while it was itself imperceptible, made them appear in motion.

But although this was novel and pleasing, it wanted the splendour of the scene of this morning, which I never saw equalled but once. This occurred at Hissar, where I went to visit a beloved friend—gone, alas! to a better world,—whose ardent and honourable mind urged me to the task I have undertaken. It was on the terrace of James Lumsdaine's house, built amidst the ruins of the castle of Feroy, in the centre of one extended waste, where the lion was the sole inhabitant, that I saw the most perfect specimen of this phenomenon: it was really sublime. Let the reader fancy himself in the midst of a desert plain, with nothing to impede the wide scope of vision, his horizon bounded by a lofty black wall, encompassing him on all sides. Let him watch the forest sunbeam break upon this barrier, and at once, as by a touch of magic, shiver it into a thousand fantastic forms, leaving a splintered pinnacle in one place, a tower in another, an arch in a third, these in turn undergoing more than kaleidoscopic changes, until the "fairly fabric" vanishes. Here it was emphatically called Hurchend Raja ca poori, or "the city of Raja Hurchend," a celebrated prince of the brazen age of India. The power of reflection shown by this phenomenon cannot be better described, than by stating that it brought the very ancient Aggaroo,* which is thirteen miles distant, with its fort and bastions, close to my view.

The difference then between the mirage and the see-kote is, that the former exhibits a horizontal, the latter a columnar or vertical stratification; and in the latter case, likewise, a contrast to the other, its maximum of translucency is the last stage of its existence. In this stage it is only an eye accustomed to the phenomenon that can perceive it at all. I have passed over the plains of Meerut with a friend who had been thirty years in India, and he did not observe a see-kote then before our eyes; in fact, so complete was the illusion, that we only saw the town and fort considerably nearer. Monge gives a philosophical account of this phenomenon in Napoleon's campaign in Egypt; and Dr Clarke perfectly describes it in his journey to Rosetta, when "domes, turrets, and groves, were seen reflected on the glowing surface of the plain, which appeared like a vast lake extending itself between the city and the travellers." It is on reviewing this account that a critic has corrected the erroneous translation of the 'Septuagint,' and further dilated upon it in a review of Lichtenstein's 'Travels in Southern Africa;'* who exactly describes our see-kote, of the magnifying and reflecting powers of which he gives a singular instance. Indeed, whoever notices, while at sea, the atmospheric phenomena of these southern latitudes, will be struck by the deformity of objects as they pass through this medium: what the sailors term a fog-bank is the first stage of our see-kote. I observed it on my voyage home, but more especially in the passage out. About six o'clock in a dark evening, while we were dancing on the waste, I perceived a ship bearing down with full sail upon us, so distinctly that I gave the alarm in expectation of a collision; so far as I recollect the helm was instantly up; and in a second no ship was to be seen. The laugh was against me. I had seen the "Flying Dutchman," according to the opinion of the experienced officer on deck; and I believed it was really a vision of the mind; but I now feel convinced it was either the reflection of our own ship in a passing cloud of this vapour, or a more distant object therein refracted. But enough of this subject. I will only add, whoever has a desire to see one of the grandest phenomena in nature, let him repair to the plains of Mairta or Horsar, and watch before the sun rises the fairy palace of Hurchenda, infinitely grander and more imposing than a sunrise upon the Alpine Helvetia, which alone may compete with the chittram of the desert.

BRICK-AND-MORTAR ABORTIONS—RUINS OF MODERN BUILDINGS—HOUSES MADE TO BE SOLD—A COUGH — KILLING WITH KINDNESS — THE COUGHING CHORUS.

IN walking about the outskirts of the town we often see what I may call premature ruins—the commencements of buildings—the foundations of houses carried up perhaps as far as to be on a level with the ground;—the memorial of some building mania in the neighbourhood, in which the speculator has been cut short by bankruptcy. They have generally the appearance of being about ten years old or so—the effects of the panic of 1825. I do not recollect ever having seen any of these abortions of bricks and mortar, at any after period, carried on and completed. They have either been gradually obliterated from the face of the earth, which they disfigured, or removed to give place to buildings of altogether a different kind; and there are some which I have known for this dozen years, in the same rotten withering state. These premature ruins can never acquire a picturesque appearance. There is something in modern brick and mortar which seems altogether irreconcilable to Hesl or Vishnu. It might have been the capital of the Aggrames, whose immense army threatened Alexander; with Agra it may divide the honour, or both may have been founded by this prince, who was also a Porus, being of Poorus's race.

* See 'Edinburgh Review,' vol. xxi, pp. 66 and 136.

it—grass, and nettles, and weeds may grow upon the abortion—it may become green and covered with moss—bricks may be broken from the sockets for windows that were never filled—from the doorways that never were closed—from the fire-places that were never tenanted by stoves—bricks may fall or be torn from the corners and edges, so as to round them off, but they can never look like a genuine ruin. There is nothing so dusky, husky, dry, and disagreeable as brick and mortar rubbish, it seems so to antipathise with everything in nature. When a house, for instance, is being built in the middle of a green field, what a blot there is round the spot. The verdant sward trodden down by the horses' feet and the wheels of the carts that bring the bricks, and burnt up by the unslacked lime; as the building proceeds, the bits of broken bricks, and tiles, and mortar lying about all round; and at last, when finished and walled in, a long time must pass before the house will look pleasant and really in the fields. The walls must begin to be dingy, and the grass grow up close from the foundation, and every white spot be washed away, before it will have a settled look. I cannot imagine how a palace, or mansion, or church built of our modern yellow bricks will look when a few hundred years have passed, or when ruined and dismantled by the hand of time.

We are altogether depriving our posterity of the pleasure of beholding picturesque ruins or old buildings—there will be few antiquaries who will refer to the style, or anything else in architecture, belonging to the nineteenth century. St James's Palace, and the old red brick houses in the Temple and Lincoln's Inn, have a substantial, venerable, and in many cases picturesque appearance,—but how will our modern yellow brick-dust human packing-cases look when the same number of years have rolled over their heads—if indeed they stand so long.

Nine out of ten of the houses now built are built only, like the Pedlar's razors, to be sold;—that any one should live in them seems altogether an after thought. I am unfortunately fixed in one of this character. It looked all very close and compact and nicely finished when new, but in a very short time the shutting of a door would drive mortar from the corners and edgings of the walls, and plaster from the roof. The ceiling being covered with lime not sufficiently slacked, blistered and soon began to look as if it had had an attack of the small-pox. Every windy night the windows rattle most uproariously, as if they and the wind were old acquaintances, and were merry-making at their meeting. The heat of the fires in the rooms soon began to show of what stuff the floorings were made;—it so shrunk the boards that the floors soon looked more like railings than anything else. This last grievance I have more particularly felt—the March winds having made me the present of a delightful ticklish cough which has confined me to my room. To keep myself free from a draught has been the constant exercise of my ingenuity. My first discovery was that the wind blew upon me through the very carpet;—the carpet was therefore taken up and the seams stuffed with paper, then list was nailed round the edge of the doors, then strips of paper pasted round the window-sashes—and—and—but I might write my ink-glass dry, and my pen to a stump, without enumerating all my troubles.

What an extraordinary disease is a cough? It makes one bark like a dog, or grunt like a lion,—yach!—yach!—yow!—ugh-ugh-u-oo!—It feels as if some little imp had got into your thorax, and amused itself with tickling it with a feather;—and it soon becomes so tender that every cough feels as if a bundle of thorns were torn through your throat, and your whole frame is shaken like the world with an earthquake. Nor is it a malady which exhausts itself with the action; the more you cough the more tender, irritable, and ticklish, the throat becomes, and the more you are compelled to emit the yelping sounds till something or other allays the irritation. It is impossible to prevent yourself coughing,—yawning or laughter may be overcome, but coughing cannot. I have a faint recollection of an anecdote in which two persons were concealed under a table, and the one feeling an inclination to cough which he found it impossible to overcome, requested the other to stab him to the heart at once, to prevent a discovery. I think the circumstance relates to the adventures of some of the crown-losing Stuarts either in Cromwell's time or later.

* This is the ancient province of Horians, and the cradle of the Aggarmaal race, now mercantile, and all followers of

A cough, like the tooth-ache, is a disease which excites but little sympathy in those around you, it is so common—though probably accompanied with greater pain than many others with finer names—and “it's only a cough—he will soon be well,” is the usual comment upon the subject. I merely notice this to show how custom blunts the feelings.—It's such a common disease,—it can't be serious. Burns says, in his ‘Address to the Toothache,’—

“When fevers burn, or agues freeze us,
Rheumatics gnaw, or cholics squeeze us,
Our neighbour's sympathy may ease us
Wi' pitying moan;
But this—the hell o' a' diseases—
Aye mocks our groan.”

“I do not mean to say that their ‘pitying moan’ or sympathising ‘waes me!’ does one any good, or alleviates the malady in any degree, but it shows that there are human beings in the world to whom you are not altogether indifferent.

There is such a thing as “killing with kindness”—at all events I have often found kind intentions very annoying, and especially when troubled with a cough. Just after a fit of coughing, for instance, before you have time to draw a relieving breath, you feel a soft hand on your back, and another with a spoonful of jelly at your mouth,—almost thrusting it in, with “Poor dear!—what pain he must suffer—do take this jelly—it will prevent another fit!”—Thus they go on teasing and irritating you and nauseating you with sweets, till a dose of rhubarb would be a relief to your taste, and if you utter the least complaint, you are thought ungrateful, unkind, nay, barbarous. What can be more annoying than when you happen to have a little ease from the earthquakes that rend your heart, and are just falling into a doze on your easy chair, you hear a gentle “hush!” whispered by your nurse to somebody else in the room who is not making any noise, and then a light step across the room, and then falling lightly over your head a silk handkerchief, which tickles your nose, makes a draught, dispels your drowsiness, and makes you quake again! But you must not complain—it was done with the best intention—the good soul was afraid you would catch cold in your head! In my opinion, the whisperings and hushings, and soft treadings, and shutting doors quietly, and all that, tend far more to keep one awake when drowsy than an absolute noise. To dispose oneself to sleep requires an absence of any effort upon the subject—to endeavour to think upon nothing; but whispering and hushing keeps the mind in remembrance of the desired object, and so prevents its attainment.

You have just got a few moments respite from the commotion—you have just lain down upon the sofa, and a relieving slumber is gently stealing o'er you—Whuff! comes a cloak over your shoulders; you jump up—“Why the deuce did you disturb me!”—“You would get more cold, dear, to sleep without something over you.”—Well! it's all done for the best, and so must be endured.

I have amused myself with thinking whether a cough could not be imitated on some musical instrument. I have noticed all the different tones, and run up and down the gamut during a fit. The bassoon has occurred to me as the best suited for such an imitation. It would be a novelty, at all events, if some musician would compose a “Coughing Chorus,” and introduce a solo for the bassoon—Yach-yach-yow! ugh-ugh-u-oo-oo!

THE WEEK.

PERSONAL PORTRAITS OF EMINENT MEN.

[It was accidentally omitted to mention last week, that the account of Wolff, the German scholar, was taken from the first number, just published, of ‘Cochrane's Foreign Quarterly Review.’]

ROBERT BRUCE, KING OF SCOTLAND.

(From Fraser Tytler's History.)

In his figure, the King was tall and well-shaped. Before broken down by illness, and in the prime of life, he was nearly six feet high; his hair curled closely and shortly round his neck, which possessed that breadth and thickness that belong to men of great strength; he was broad-shouldered and open-chested, and the proportion of his limbs combined power with lightness and activity. These qualities were increased not only by his constant occupation in war, but by his fondness for the chase, and all manly amusements. It is not known whether he was dark or fair complexioned, but his forehead was low, his cheek bones strong and prominent, and the general expression of his countenance open and cheerful, although he was maimed by a wound which had injured his lower jaw. His manners were dignified and engaging; after battle, nothing could be pleasanter or more courteous; and it is infinitely to his honour, that in a savage age, and smarting under injuries which attacked him in his kindest and tenderest relations, he never abused a victory, but conquered often as effectually by his generosity and kindness, as by his great military talents. We know, however, from his interview with the Papal legates, that when he chose to express displeasure, his look was stern and kingly, and at once imposed silence and insured obedience. He excelled in all the exercises of chivalry, to such a degree, indeed, that the English themselves did not scruple to account him the third best knight in Europe.* His memory was stored with the romances of the period, in which he took great delight. Their hair-breadth ‘scapes and perilous adventures were sometimes scarcely more wonderful than his own, and he had early imbibed from such works an appetite for individual enterprise and glory, which, had it not been checked by a stronger passion, the love of liberty might have led him into fatal mistakes. It is quite conceivable, that Bruce, instead of a great King, might, like Richard the First, have become only a kingly knight-errant.

But from this error he was saved by the love of his country, directed by an admirable judgment, an unshaken perseverance, and a vein of strong good sense. It is here, although some may think it the homeliest, that we are to find assuredly the brightest part of the character of the King. It is these qualities which are especially conspicuous in his long war for the liberty of Scotland. They enabled him to follow out his plans through many a tedious year with undeviating energy; to bear reverses, to calculate his means, to wait for his opportunities, and to concentrate his whole strength upon one great point, till it was gained and secured to his country for ever. Brilliant military talent and consummate bravery have often been found amongst men, and proved far more of a curse than a blessing; but rarely indeed shall we discover them united to so excellent a judgment, controlled by such perfect disinterestedness, and employed for so sacred an end. There is but one instance on record where he seems to have thought more of himself than of his people,† and even this, though rash, was heroic.

Immediately after the King's death, his heart was taken out, as he had himself directed. He was then buried with great state and solemnity under the pavement of the choir, in the Abbey church of Dunfermline, and over the grave was raised a rich marble monument, which was made at Paris. Centuries passed on, the ancient church, with the marble monument, fell into ruins, and a more modern building was erected on the same site. This, in our own days, gave way to time, and in clearing the foundations for a third church, the workmen laid open a tomb which proved to be that of Robert the Bruce. The lead coating in which the body was found inclosed, was twisted round the head into the shape of a rude crown. A rich cloth of gold, but much decayed, was thrown over it, but, on examining the skeleton, it was found that the breast-bone had been sawn asunder, to get at the heart.*

There remained, therefore, no doubt, that after the lapse of almost five hundred years, his countrymen were permitted, with a mixture of delight and awe to behold the very bones of their great deliverer.

* See an interesting Report of the discovery of the Tomb, and the re-interment of the body of Robert Bruce, drawn up by Sir Henry Jardine, in the second volume of the ‘Transactions of the Antiquarian Society of Scotland,’ part ii, p. 435.

ROMANCE OF REAL LIFE.

NO. LXVI. GENEROUS CHILDREN GENEROUSLY HELPED.

[The compiler of the ‘Sixty Curious Narratives’ has extracted this delightful anecdote from the ‘Memoirs of —,’ we shall not say whom, that we may not injure the agreeable effect produced by the disclosure of his name, upon those who are acquainted with his writings. Every record of handsome actions performed by such men, is a boon to mankind, and should be received by them with gratitude; for it gives double zest to every handsome sentence in their books, increasing that faith in the good and beautiful which made them what they were.]

A GENTLEMAN, being at Marseilles, hired a boat with an intention of sailing for pleasure; he entered into conversation with the two young men who owned the vessel, and learned that they were not watermen by trade, but silversmiths; and that when they could be spared from their usual business, they employed themselves in that way to increase their earnings. On expressing his surprise at their conduct, and imputing it to an avaricious disposition; “Oh! sir,” said the young men, “if you knew our reasons, you would ascribe it to a better motive. Our father, anxious to assist his family, scraped together all he was worth, and purchased a vessel for the purpose of trading to the coast of Barbary; but was unfortunately taken by a pirate, carried to Tripoli, and sold for a slave. He writes word, that he has luckily fallen into the hands of a master who treats him with great humanity; but that the sum which is demanded for his ransom is so exorbitant, that it will be impossible for him ever to raise it: he adds, that we must therefore relinquish all hope of ever seeing him, and be contented; that he has as many comforts as his situation will admit. With the hopes of restoring to his family a beloved father, we are striving, by every honest means in our power, to collect the sum necessary for his ransom, and we are not ashamed to employ ourselves in this occupation of watermen.” The gentleman was struck with this account, and on his departure made them a handsome present. Some months afterward, the young men being at work in their shop, were greatly surprised at the sudden arrival of their father, who threw himself into their arms; exclaiming, at the same time, that he was fearful they had taken some unjust method to raise the money for his ransom, for it was too great a sum for them to have gained by their ordinary occupation. They professed their ignorance of the whole affair, and could only suspect they owed their father's release to that stranger to whose generosity they had been before so much obliged.

After Montesquieu's death, an account of this affair was found among his papers, and the sum actually remitted to Tripoli for the old man's ransom. It is a pleasure to hear of such an act of benevolence performed even by a person totally unknown to us; but the pleasure is infinitely increased, when it proves the union of virtue and talents in an author so renowned as Montesquieu.

CHARACTERS OF SHAKSPEARE'S PLAYS.

BY WILLIAM HAZLITT.

NO. XIX.—ROMEO AND JULIET.—(CONCLUDED).

It would be hard to say which of the two garden scenes is the finest, that where he first converses with his love, or takes leave of her the morning after their marriage. Both are like a heaven upon earth: the blissful bowers of Paradise let down upon this lower world. We will give only one passage of these well known scenes to show the perfect refinement and delicacy of Shakspeare's conception of the female character. It is wonderful how Collins, who was a critic and a poet of great sensibility, should have encouraged the common error on this subject by saying—"But stronger Shakspeare felt for man alone."

[The passage we mean is Juliet's apology for her maiden boldness.

"Thou know'st the mask of night is on my face;
Else would a maiden blush bepaint my cheek
For that which thou hast heard me speak to-night.
Fain would I dwell on form, fain, fain deny
What I have spoke—but farewell compliment:
Dost thou love me? I know thou wilt say ay,
And I will take thee at thy word—Yet if thou swear'st,
Thou may'st prove false: at lovers' perjuries
They say Jove laughs. Oh, gentle Romeo,
If thou dost love, pronounce it faithfully;
Or if thou think I am too quickly won,
I'll frown and be perverse, and say thee nay.
So thou wilt woo: but else not for the world.
In truth, fair Montague, I am too fond;
And therefore thou may'st think my haviour light;
But trust me, gentlemen, I'll prove move true
Than those that have more cunning to be strange.
I should have been more strange, I must confess,
But that thou over-heard'st ere I was ware,
My true love's passion; therefore pardon me,
And not impute this yielding to light love,
Which the dark night hath so discovered."

[In this and all the rest her heart, fluttering between pleasure, hope, and fear, seems to have dictated to her tongue, and "calls true love spoken simple modesty." Of the same sort, but bolder in virgin innocence, is her soliloquy after her marriage with Romeo.

"Gallop apace, you fiery-footed steeds,
Towards Phoebus' mansion; such a waggoner
As Phaëton would whip you to the west,
And bring in cloudy night immediately,
Spread thy close curtain, love-performing night,
That runaway's eyes may wink; and Romeo
Leap to these arms, untalked of, and unseen!—
Lovers can see to do their amorous rites
By their own beauties: or if love be blind,
It best agrees with night.—Come, civil night,
Thou sober-suited matron, all in black,
And learn me how to lose a winning match,
Play'd for a pair of stainless maidenhoods:
Hood my unmann'd blood bating in my cheeks
With thy black mantle; till strange love, grown bold,
Thinks true love acted, simple modesty.
Come, night!—Come, Romeo! come, thou day
in night;
For thou wilt lie upon the wings of night
Whiter than new snow on a raven's back.—
Come, gentle night; come, loving, black-brow'd
night,
Give me my Romeo: and when he shall die,
Take him and cut him out in little stars,
And he will make the face of heaven so fine,
That all the world shall be in love with night,
And pay no worship to the garish sun.—
O, I have bought the mansion of a love,
But not possess'd it; and though I am sold,
Not yet enjoy'd: so tedious is this day,
As is the night before some festival;
To an impatient child, that hath new robes,
And may not wear them."

We the rather insert this passage here, inasmuch as we have no doubt it has been expunged from the Family Shakspeare. Such critics do not perceive that the feelings of the heart sanctify, without disguising, the impulses of nature. Without refinement themselves, they confound modesty with hypocrisy. Not so the German critic, Schlegel. Speaking of 'Romeo and Juliet,' he says, "It was reserved for Shakspeare to unite purity of heart and the glow of imagination, sweetness and dignity of manners and passionate violence, in one ideal picture." The character is indeed one of perfect truth and sweetness. It has nothing forward, nothing coy, nothing affected or coquettish about it;—it is a pure effusion of nature. It is as frank as it is modest, for it has no thought that it wishes to conceal. It reposes in conscious innocence on the strength of its affections. Its delicacy does not consist in coldness and reserve, but in combining warmth of imagination and tenderness of heart with the most voluptuous sensibility. Love is a gentle flame that rarefies and expands her whole being. What an idea of trembling haste and airy grace, borne upon the thoughts of love, does the Friar's exclamation give of her, as she approaches his cell to be married—

"Here comes the lady. Oh, so light of foot
Will ne'er wear out the everlasting flint:
A lover may bestride the gossamer,
That idles in the wanton summer air,
And yet not fall, so light is vanity."

The tragic part of this character is of a piece with the rest. It is the heroic founded on tenderness and delicacy. Of this kind are her resolution to follow the Friar's advice, and the conflict in her bosom between apprehension and love when she comes to take the sleeping potion. Shakspeare is blamed for the mixture of low characters. If this is a deformity, it is the source of a thousand beauties. One instance is the contrast between the guileless simplicity of Juliet's attachment to her first love, and the convenient policy of the nurse in advising her to marry Paris, which excites such indignation in her mistress. "Ancient damnation! oh, most wicked fiend," &c.

Romeo is Hamlet in love. There is the same rich exuberance of passion and sentiment in the one, that there is of thought and sentiment in the other. Both are absent and self-involved, both live out of themselves in a world of imagination. Hamlet is abstracted from everything; Romeo is abstracted from everything but his love, and lost in it. His "frail thoughts dally with faint surmise," and are fashioned out of the suggestions of hope, "the flat-teries of sleep." He is himself only in his Juliet; she is his only reality, his heart's true home and idol. The rest of the world is to him a passing dream. How finely is this character portrayed where he recollects himself on seeing Paris slain at the tomb of Juliet!

"What said my man when my betossed soul
Did not attend him as we rode? I think
He told me Paris should have married Juliet."

And again, just before he hears the sudden tidings of her death—

"If I may trust the flattery of sleep,
My dreams prestage some joyful news at hand;
My bosom's lord sits lightly on his throne,
And all this day an unaccustom'd spirit
Lifts me above the ground with cheerful thoughts.
I dreamt my lady came and found me dead, (Strange dream! that gives a dead man leave to think)
And breath'd such life with kisses on my lips,
That I reviv'd and was an emperor.
Ah me! how sweet is love itself possess'd,
When but love's shadows are so rich in joy!"

Romeo's passion for Juliet is not a first love: it succeeds and drives out his passion for another mistress, Rosaline, as the sun hides the stars. This is perhaps an artifice (not absolutely necessary) to give us a higher opinion of the lady, while the first absolute surrender of her heart to him enhances the richness of the prize. The commencement, progress, and ending of his second passion are however complete in themselves, not injured, if they are not bettered by the first. The outline of the play is taken from an Italian novel; but the dramatic arrangement of the different scenes between the lovers, the more than dramatic interest in the progress of the story, the development of the characters with time and circumstances, just according to the degree and kind of interest excited, are not inferior to the expression of passion and nature. It has been ingeniously remarked, among other proofs of skill in the contrivance of the fable, that the improbability of the main incident in the piece, the administering of the sleeping-potion, is softened and obviated from the beginning by the introduction of the Friar on his first appearance culling simples and descanting on their virtues. Of the passionate scenes in this tragedy, that between the Friar and Romeo when he is told of his sentence of banishment, that between Juliet and the Nurse when she hears of it, and of the death of her cousin Tybalt (which bear no proportion in her mind, when passion after the first shock of surprise throws its weight into the scale of her affections) and the last scene at the tomb, are among the most natural and overpowering. In all of these it is not merely the force of any one passion that is given, but the slightest and most unlooked-for transitions from one to another, the mingling currents of every different feeling rising up and prevailing in turn, swayed by the master-mind of the poet, as the waves undulate beneath the gliding storm. Thus when Juliet has by her complaints encouraged the Nurse to say, "Shame come to Romeo," she instantly repels the wish, which she had herself occasioned, by answering—

"Blister'd be thy tongue
For such a wish, he was not born to shame.
Upon his brow shame is ashamed to sit,
For 'tis a throne where honour may be crown'd
Sole monarch of the universal earth!
O, what a beast was I to chide him so?
Nurse. Will you speak well of him that kill'd your cousin?
Juliet. Shall I speak ill of him that is my husband?
Ah, my poor lord, what tongue shall smooth thy name,
When I, thy three-hours' wife, have mangled it?"

And then follows, on the neck of her remorse and returning fondness, that wish treading almost on the brink of impiety, but still held back by the strength of her devotion to her lord, that "father, mother, nay, or both were dead," rather than Romeo banished. If she requires any other excuse, it is in the manner in which Romeo echoes her frantic grief and disappointment in the next scene at being banished from her.—Perhaps one of the finest pieces of acting that ever was witnessed on the stage, is Mr Kean's manner of doing this scene and his repetition of the word Banished. He treads close indeed upon the genius of his author.

A passage which this celebrated actor and able commentator on Shakspeare (actors are the best commentators on the poets) did not give with equal truth or force of feeling was the one which Romeo makes at the tomb of Juliet, before he drinks the poison.—

"Let me peruse this face—
Mercutio's kinsman! noble county Paris!
What said my man, when my betossed soul
Did not attend him as we rode! I think,
He told me, Paris should have married Juliet!
Said he not so? or did I dream it so?
Or am I mad, hearing him talk of Juliet,
To think it was so?—O, give me thy hand,
One writ with me in sour misfortune's book!
I'll bury thee in a triumphant grave—
For here lies Juliet.

O, my love! my wife!
Death that hath suck'd the honey of thy breath,
Hath had no power yet upon thy beauty;
Thou art not conquer'd; beauty's ensign yet
Is crimson in thy lips, and in thy cheeks,

And Death's pale flag is not advanced there.—
Tybalt, 't'at thou there in thy bloody sheet?
O, what more favour can I do to thee,
Than with that hand that out thy youth in twain,
To sunder his that was thine enemy?
Forgive me, cousin! Ah, dear Juliet,
Why art thou yet so fair! I will believe
That unsubstantial death is amorous;
And that the lean abhorred monster keeps
Thee here in dark to be his paramour.
For fear of that, I will stay still with thee;
And never from this palace of dim night
Depart again: here, here will I remain
With worms that are thy chamber-maids; oh, here
Will I set up my everlasting rest;
And shake the yoke of inauspicious stars
From this world-wearyed flesh.—Eyes, look your last!

Arms, take your last embrace! and lips, oh you
The doors of breath, seal with a righteous kiss
A dateless bargain to engrossing death!—
Come, bitter conduct, come unsavoury guide!
Thou desperate pilot, now at once run on
The dashing rocks my sea-sick weary bark!
Here's to my love!—[Drinks.] O, true apothecary!
Thy drugs are quick.—Thus with a kiss I die."

The lines in this speech describing the loveliness of Juliet, who is supposed to be dead, have been compared to those in which it is said of Cleopatra after her death, that she looked "as she would take another Antony in her strong toil of grace;" and a question has been started which is the finest, that we do not pretend to decide. We can more easily decide between Shakspeare and any other author, than between him and himself.—Shall we quote any more passages to show his genius or the beauty of 'Romeo and Juliet'? At that rate, we might quote the whole. The late Mr Sheridan, on being shown a volume of the 'Beauties of Shakspeare,' very properly asked—"But where are the other eleven?" The character of Mercutio in this play is one of the most mercurial and spirited of the productions of Shakspeare's comic muse.

ON THE DEATHS OF SOME ILLUSTRIOUS PERSONS OF ANTIQUITY.

(An Abridgment, with which a Correspondent has favoured us, from 'Sir Henry Hallford's Essays.')

SYLLA, the dictator, died by the rupture of an internal abscess, in a paroxysm of rage. He had, it seems, set his heart upon the restoration of the capitol, and upon its dedication, by a certain day. But a messenger brought him intelligence that the resources he expected for this purpose were not forthcoming; on which he gave way to his unbridled passion, vomited a large quantity of blood, passed a night of great distress, and died on the following morning. The expressions of Valerius Maximus are very forcible. "He vomited up his life, mingled with blood and threats;" so that, as he afterwards says, "it was doubtful whether Sylla or Sylla's wrath should first come to an end."

Crassus, the eminent Roman orator and friend of Cicero, died of a pleurisy. He had been speaking with great animation and effect in the Senate, when he was seized with a pain in his side, and broke out into a profuse perspiration. On going home he had a shivering fit, followed by fever. The pain in the side still continued, and he died on the 7th day of the disease. The terms of deep sorrow in which Cicero laments so feelingly and so beautifully the loss of this eminent man, may justify the regret of physicians, even at this distant period, that it has not been transmitted down to them what resources of our art were resorted to in order to save a life so valuable to his country. Thus much, however, we do know, that Celsus, who lived not many years afterwards, suggests the proper treatment of a pleurisy, by bleeding, cupping, and blistering; all the expedients, in fact, which we use at this era of improvement in the art of medicine. We may rest assured, therefore, that nothing was left undone to save this distinguished person; and that the regret of his friends was not aggravated, nor their grief rendered more poignant, by any consideration of that kind.

Socrates was put to death by the common mode at Athens, of despatching persons capitally convicted, that is, by a narcotic poison. But as neither Xenophon nor Plato mentions the precise poison which was employed, we are left to conjecture what it was by our knowledge of what narcotics the Greeks were acquainted with, or employed at that time. They knew, amongst others, the Aconite, the Black Poppy, the Hyocymus, and Hemlock. Dion, the father of Dionysius, the tyrant of Syracuse, who was intimately acquainted with Plato, and a contemporary of Socrates, was poisoned by hemlock; and Plutarch says that Phocion drank the conium (hemlock). This, we have reason to suppose, was always fresh pounded for the occasion; and we learn, from Theophrastus, that the whole plant was usually pounded together, but that the Chians peeled off the outer rind, as occasioning pain, and that then, having bruised the other part and put it in water, they drank the infusion, and found it to cause an easy death. Whatever the poison was, it must have been one of weak and tardy operation; for the executioner told Socrates, that it would prevent its effect, if he entered into earnest dispute, and that it was sometimes necessary to repeat the dose three or four times. After a while, the philosopher is described as having felt a weight in his legs, as if he had been intoxicated. The effect of the drug grew stronger, and made him, at length, so insensible to pain, that he did not feel when his foot was pinched. The extremities grew cold,—he was convulsed, and expired.

But what was the poison contained in that "ring, the avenger of Canaan, and the retributor for so much blood," by which Hannibal destroyed himself? Although the Carthaginians were a much more civilized people than their enemies, the Romans (who happen to be their historians) are willing to allow, it would be too much to suppose them acquainted with the inventions of modern chemistry, and the poison was most probably the inspissated juice of some deleterious vegetable. Mr Hatchett conjectures that it may have been derived from the Euphorbia officinalis, which is a native of Africa. As to the report of Hannibal's having been poisoned by drinking bullock's blood, which is mentioned by Plutarch, it must be a fable, as was that also of the death of Themistocles, by drinking a similar draught, for the blood of that animal is not poisonous. An accomplished nobleman told me that he was present at one of the bull-fights at Madrid, when a person rushed from the crowd, and having made his way to the bull, which the matador had just stricken, caught the blood, as it flowed from the wound, in a goblet, and drank it off before the assembly. On inquiring into the object which the poor Spaniard had in view, it appeared that the blood of a bull just slain was a popular remedy for consumptive symptoms. The poison with which Nero destroyed Britannicus was probably the laurel water. Tacitus states that, when Nero had determined to despatch the ill-fated youth, he sent for Locusta, a convicted female prisoner, who had been pardoned, and was kept for state purposes, and ordered her to prepare a poison which should produce its effect immediately. Locusta prepared one which killed a goat in five hours. This would not serve the tyrant's purpose—he ordered her to provide a more speedy instrument, to prepare it in his own chamber, and in his presence. The boiling began, and was urged to the effectual moment, in proof of which it was tried on a hog, and the animal was killed by it immediately. Dinner is served. The young members of the Imperial family are sitting at the foot of the table; the Emperor and his guests reclining on their sides. The unhappy youth calls for water—the prægustator tastes, and then serves it. It is too hot. Some of it is poured off, and the glass is filled up with a fluid resembling water—but this contains the poison. The young man drinks it, and is seized instantly with an epileptic fit, in which he expires. He is buried the same night. There is a great similarity in several points between this case and that of Sir Theodosius Boughton, who was poisoned by Captain Donellan, with laurel water, in 1780. In both there was the attempt on the part of the murderer to pass off the insensibility caused by the drug for an epileptic fit; and in both there was an extraordinary lividness of countenance in the victim. I remember to have seen the face of Sir Theodosius Boughton, when the corpse had been disinterred, in order to be examined for the satisfaction of the Coroner's jury, and its colour resembled that of a pickled walnut.

Alexander the Great was said to have been poisoned; but Arrian, who has written the best account of his death, though he mentions that such a report had prevailed, gives a rational account of his illness, and of the bulletins which were issued respecting it, the most ancient series of bulletins on record. The story goes, that the poison was of so subtle a nature, that no vessel of metal could hold it, and that accordingly it was carried in the hoof of a mule. But this is a mistake arising from the double meaning of the Greek word onyx, which signifies either the onyx, a precious stone, or a hoof. The fact is, that Alexander died of a remittent fever, which he caught in the marshes of Babylon.

Arrian, after detailing the daily progress of Alexander's last illness, gives a beautiful portraiture of the character of that great man, whose spirit and energy, manifested in the conquest of so large an extent of country, were fully equalled by his wisdom in controlling and attaching to his government the nations which he had subdued. Of the merit of his system of policy of intermarrying his wounded soldiers with the females of the conquered countries, and of appointing Macedonian officers to command the native troops, what stronger proofs can be given, than that the experience of more than two thousand years has added nothing to what his instinctive discernment had already suggested to him, that his successors were taught, by what he had done, to found and to govern kingdoms; and that the efficiency of the British army in India, to keep in subjection nearly one hundred millions of the inhabitants of that vast country, is at this moment maintained by the very same measures which Alexander devised and carried into execution?

ON THE GIPSIES

THE wonderful begets not wonder when Familiarised, and so do we behold
A race apart among the sons of men.
What are they? lost from sunny lands of gold,
Hath swart Bengala on their hearts a hold?
Or, scattered through the nations of the earth,
Are they a particle of Egypt old,
Stricken of prophecy? or claim they birth
With they which had a God to lead them forth,
And made the waves an avenue? Who know?
They are among the mysteries of worth,
To humble us to wisdom, for they show
How little is the knowledge that we boast,
And thence induce a faith where thought is lost.

G. E. I.

* * It is now pretty generally admitted, we believe, that the Gipsies come from Hindostan. The conjecture is, that they expatriated themselves during the irruption of one of its conquerors. Grellmann, a German writer (of whose work on them there is a translation) has quite proved this origin, in our opinion, by his comparison of the Gipsy and Hindostanee languages,—far more conclusive than such arguments are wont to be.—Ed.

FAMAS IN SHAKSPEARE CORRECTED.

"Faulting ambition that o'erleaps itself," should be "its sell." Sell is saddle in Spenser and elsewhere, from the Latin and Italian. This emendation was shown to the late Mr Hazlitt, an acute man at least, who expressed his conviction that it was the right reading, and added somewhat more in approbation of it.—Landon's Examination of William Shakspeare.

FINE ARTS.

Exhibition of the Society of British Artists in Suffolk Street.

THE Exhibition this season comprises few works of the higher classes of painting, but we think it shews an advance upon former years; the number of pictures positively bad being much reduced. The historical pictures are few, and, with one exception, contain little worth remark; the narrative pieces are few; the portraits are in greater number, but not many of them good. The strength of the collection lies among its landscapes, which are numerous; they are chiefly drawn from native scenery, and the best of them are of this number. Having premised these general observations, we will quote a few of the pictures that pleased us best. 'The Haarlem Meer—Moonlight' (10), G. Balmer, a very clever picture; the brilliant moon, the pale neutral tint of the distance, the half-developed colours of the foreground, the long, frequent, uncertain shadows, are in the true spirit of nature and beauty. 'Ancient Puteoli, in the Bay of Baia, with the Landing of Saint Paul' (131), W. Linton, is rich and shewy in colouring, but flimsy and unreal in substance; it is rather like a vision than a reality, but has scarcely grandeur enough to seem supernatural. 'A Monk reading a Tomb-stone' (18), T. Roods, is a clever piece of effect, but no more. The lamp burning before a shrine in the back-ground looks like a living flame. 'Village Festival' (20), W. Shayer, is a lively scene; but the best part is the roof of the house and the boughs overhanging it, the effect of which is so real, that one expects to see the tree move, or a bird alight on the tiles. 'Near Totnes, Devon' (148), F. W. Watts, is a lovely scene, and very tastefully painted. 'The Reprieve, from a Spanish Romance' (53), J. R. Herbert, wants a line or two of explanation in the catalogue; the girl is painted with great feeling and delicacy; the face is from you, and yet the little glimpse one catches of the features, suffices to suggest a lovely one. There is a little appearance of weakness in the expression of the knight to whom she is kneeling, which the story may warrant, or even require; but of this the catalogue leaves us in ignorance. 'Scene in Devonshire' (75), F. R. Lee, is a deep and leafy nook, such as England is richer in than any other country,—cool, verdant, fertile, sequestered. It is painted with a proper relish for its tranquillity and sweetness. 'Cassandra predicting the Murder of Agamemnon on his arrival, after ten years' absence, at Mycenæ, painted for the Duke of Sutherland; the head of Cassandra from the Hon. Mrs C. Norton' (149), B. R. Haydon. Agamemnon, returning from the siege of Troy, among his share of the spoils, brought home Cassandra, who had swindled Apollo out of the gift of prophecy, a gift spoiled in the making, and saddled with the incredulity of the hearers. Cassandra, arriving at the house of the King of Kings, denounces it as the future scene of his murder. This is the point of time Mr Haydon has chosen. The drawing is worthy of his reputation; and the colouring, though perhaps not quite natural, is solid and effective. But as a design, does not the picture want unity? The figures appear to us a little too much like separate studies for the characters. Cassandra raves, Agamemnon looks unconscious, Ægisthus grasps his dagger, Clytemnestra holds her husband with one hand and her paramour with the other, Orestes is panic-struck—all the figures are busy in their allotted parts; but they seem to pay no regard to one another; they neither look at nor from each other, but each appears intent solely upon the due performance of his own duty, like actors at a rehearsal. The effect of all this is, that one is struck with the prodigious energy and effort in detail, and the entire absence of effect in the whole. The individuals are full of intention, yet the total is not in earnest. The point worthiest of admiration, we think, is the horror-struck and understanding look of the horses, particularly of one of them, who seems absolutely inhaling what the prophetic utters. The subject is injured by want of space.

COLUMBUS.

As once, to him who his adventurous keel
Urged through Atlantic waves, (a man, I ween,
Full rich in evidence of things unseen,
Which to his soaring reason made appeal!)
The wished-for continent did itself reveal,
Not by its towering hills, or groves of green,—
For still an ocean wide did intervene;—
But odours on his senses 'gan to steal,
Wafted from the new world, more sweet than aught
In that he left behind; and now he felt,
With what delight! that he on truth had built:—
So, he who long his heavenward course hath held,
Finds, as he nears the port, his voyage fraught
With sweetest sense of things yet unbeheld!

TABLE TALK.

Self-conceit and malice are needed to discover or to imagine faults, and it is much easier for an ill-natured man than for a good-natured man to be smart and witty.—Sharp's Essays.

STRANGE RECORD.

I remember having seen the heart of one that was bowelled, as suffering for high treason, that being cast into the fire leaped, at first, at least a foot and half in height, and after by degrees lower and lower, for the space, as I remember, of seven or eight minutes.—Bacon on Life and Death.

SULTAN MAHOMED.

It is a fact but little known, that most of the Asiatic princes possess a trade; the great Arungzeb was a cap maker, and sold his caps to such advantage on those ninth-day fairs, that his funeral expenses were by his own express command defrayed from the privy purse, the accumulation of his personal labour. A delightful anecdote is recorded of the Ghias King Mahomed, whose profession was literary, and who obtained good prices from his Omrahs for his specimens of calligraphy. While engaged in transcribing one of the Persian poets, a professed scholar, who, with others, attended the conversation, suggested an emendation, which was instantly attended to, and the supposed error amended. When the Moolah was gone, the Monarch erased the emendation and re-inserted the passage. An Omrah had observed and questioned the action, to which the King replied: "It was better to make a blot in a manuscript, than wound the vanity of a humble scholar."—Tod's Antiquities of Rajahstan.

DRAMATIC PASSAGE BETWEEN A CALIPH AND A PEASANT.

The Khalif Al Mohdi being one day engaged in a hunting match, strayed from his attendants, and, being pressed with hunger and thirst, was obliged to betake himself to an Arab's tent, in order to meet with some refreshment. The poor man immediately brought out his coarse brown bread and a pot of milk. Al Mohdi asked him if he had nothing else to give him; upon which the Arab went directly to fetch a jug of wine, and presented it to him. After the Khalif had drunk a good draught, he demanded of the Arab whether he did not know him? The other having answered that he did not; "I would have you know then (replied Al Mohdi), that I am one of the principal Lords of the Khalif's court." After he had taken another draught, he put the same question to the Arab as before; who answering, "Have I not already told you that I know you not?" Al Mohdi returned, "I am a much greater person than I have made you believe." Then he drank again, and asked his host the third time, whether he did not know him? to which the other replied, "that he might depend upon the truth of the answer he had already given him." "I am, then (said Al Mohdi), the Khalif, before whom all the world prostrate themselves." The Arab no sooner heard those words, than he carried off the pitcher, and would not suffer his guest to drink any more. Al Mohdi being surprised at his behaviour, asked him why he took away his wine? The Arab replied, "Because I am afraid that, if you take a fourth draught, you will tell me you are the Prophet Mohammed; and if by chance a fifth, that you are God Almighty himself." This gentle rebuke so pleased the Khalif that he could not forbear laughing; and, being soon rejoined by his people, he ordered a purse of silver and a fine vest to be given the poor man, who had entertained him in so hospitable a manner. The Arab, in a transport of joy for the good fortune he had met with, exclaimed, "I shall henceforth take you for what you pretend to be, even though you should make yourself two or three times more considerable than you have done."—Universal History.

A PLEASANT FATHER!

Proud, silent, morose, the Comte de Chateaubriand's whole life (father of the celebrated French writer now living) had been spent in efforts to raise the fallen fortunes of his family—efforts which had uniformly terminated in vexation and disappointment. He is described as tall, with a severe and marked countenance, aquiline nose, thin and pale lips, and eyes deep set and grey, like those of a lion or those of the ancient barbarians ("aux yeux enforcés et glauques, comme ceux des lions, ou des anciens barbares"), and his eye-balls glowing like a ball of fire upon the least excitement.

"And oft in sudden mood, for many a day,"

From all communion he would start away;

And then his rarely called attendants said,

Through night's long hours would sound his heavy tread.

O'er the dark gallery, where his fathers frowned

In rude but antique portraiture around."
